

THE CAMBRIDGE
DICTIONARY
OF
CHRISTIANITY

Editor
DANIEL PATTE
Vanderbilt University

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

THE CAMBRIDGE DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIANITY

The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity is an authoritative reference guide that enables students, their teachers, Christian clergy, and general readers alike to reflect critically upon all aspects of Christianity from its origins to the present day. Written by a team of 828 scholars and practitioners from around the world, the volume reflects the plurality of Christianity throughout its history.

Key features of The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity:

- Provides a survey of the history of Christianity in the world, on each continent, and in each nation
- Offers a presentation of the Christian beliefs and practices of all major Christian traditions
- Highlights the different understandings of Christian beliefs and practices in different historical, cultural, religious, denominational, and secular contexts
- Includes entries on methodology and the plurality of approaches that are used in the study of Christianity
- Respects each Christian tradition by providing self-presentations of Christianity in each country or Christian tradition
- Includes clusters of entries on beliefs and practices, each examining the understanding of a given Christian belief or practice in different historical and contemporary contexts
- Presents the relationship and interaction of Christianity with other religious traditions in the world
- Provides, on a Web site (<http://hdl.handle.net/1803/3906>), a full bibliography covering all topics discussed in the signed articles of this volume

Daniel Patte is Professor of Religious Studies and Professor of New Testament and Early Christianity at Vanderbilt University.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS
Cambridge, New York, Melbourne, Madrid, Cape Town, Singapore, São Paulo, Delhi, Dubai, Tokyo, Mexico City

Cambridge University Press
32 Avenue of the Americas, New York, NY 10013-2473, USA

www.cambridge.org

Information on this title: www.cambridge.org/9780521527859

© Cambridge University Press 2010

This publication is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 2010

Printed in the United States of America

A catalog record for this publication is available from the British Library.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication data

The Cambridge dictionary of Christianity / edited by Daniel Patte.
p. cm.

ISBN 978-0-521-82096-7 (hardback) – ISBN 978-0-521-52785-9 (pbk.)

1. Christianity – Dictionaries. I. Patte, Daniel. II. Title: Dictionary of Christianity.

BR95.C24 2010

230.003 – dc22 2009019272

ISBN 978-0-521-82096-7 Hardback

ISBN 978-0-521-52785-9 Paperback

Additional resources for this publication at <http://hdl.handle.net/1803/3906>

Cambridge University Press has no responsibility for the persistence or accuracy of URLs for external or third-party Internet Web sites referred to in this publication and does not guarantee that any content on such Web sites is, or will remain, accurate or appropriate.

CONTENTS

Editorial Board	page vii
Area Editors and Advisors	ix
Contributors	xi
Preface by Daniel Patte	xlv
Acknowledgments	lxi
Abbreviations	lxv
Dictionary	1

For a comprehensive bibliography, see <http://hdl.handle.net/1803/3906>.

EDITORIAL BOARD

Ana María Bidegain, CEHILA; Universidad Nacional de Colombia, Bogotá; Florida International University, Miami, USA

Enrique Dussel, CEHILA; Universidad Autónoma Metropolitana, Mexico

Cristina Grenholm, Director of Theology and Ecumenical Relations, Church of Sweden; Karlstad University, Sweden

Beverly W. Harrison, Union Theological Seminary, New York, USA

Kwok Pui-lan, Episcopal Divinity School, Boston, USA

Archie Chi Chung Lee, Chung Chi College, Chinese University of Hong Kong, China

Kathleen E. McVey, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA

Vasile Mihoc, Facultatea de Teologie "Andrei Saguna," Sibiu University, Romania

Jesse Ndwiga Kanyua Mugambi, University of Nairobi, Kenya

Isabel Apawo Phiri, University of KwaZulu-Natal, Pietermaritzburg, South Africa

Eugene TeSelle, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, USA

AREA EDITORS AND ADVISORS

Jean-Noël Aletti, SJ, Pontifical Biblical Institute, Rome, Italy: Roman Catholicism

Ian Breward, University of Melbourne, Australia: Australasia; Australia and South Pacific

James P. Byrd, Vanderbilt University, USA: North America, History

Noriel Capulong, Silliman University, Philippines: Philippines

Elizabeth A. Clark, Duke University, USA: Women in the History of Christian Thought

Valentin Dedji, St. Mark's Methodist Church, London, UK: Western Africa (Francophone)

Beatriz de Vasconcellos Dias, Comissão de Estudos de História da Igreja na América Latina e no Caribe (CEHILA), Brasil: Brazil

Ramathate T. H. Dolamo, UNISA, Pretoria, South Africa: Southern Africa

Noel Leo Erskine, Emory University, USA: Caribbean Islands, Ethics, and Theology

George Thomas Kurian, Reference Books, New York, USA: Statistics (Christians in each nation)

Armando Lampe, Comisión de Estudios de Historia de la Iglesia en Latinoamérica (CEHILA), Universidad de Quintana Roo, Mexico: Caribbean Islands, History

Marjorie Lewis, United Theological College of the West Indies; former General Secretary of the Jamaica Council of Churches (area editor following the untimely death of Lewin Williams): Jamaica and Jamaican Theology

Frank D. Macchia, Vanguard University, USA: Charismatic Movement and Pentecostalism

Fortunato Mallimaci, Centro de Estudios e Investigaciones Laborales, Argentina: Southern Latin America

Bonnie J. Miller-McLemore, Vanderbilt University, USA: Family and Children; Pastoral Theology

Nektarios Morrow, Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America: Eastern Orthodoxy

Gerald O'Collins, SJ, The Pontifical Gregorian University, Italy: Roman Catholicism

Muriel Orevilla-Montenegro, Silliman University, Philippines: Philippines and Women in Asia

Peter Paris, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Poverty; Racism

Keith F. Pecklers, SJ, Pontifical Gregorian University, Italy: Roman Catholic Liturgy

Bishop Yeznik Petrossian, Holy See of Etchmiadzin, Armenia: Oriental Orthodoxy; Non-Chalcedonian Churches

María Alicia Puente Lutteroth, Universidad Autónoma del Estado de Morelos, Mexico; Comisión de Estudios de Historia de la Iglesia en Latinoamérica (CEHILA), Mexico:
Mexico

Fernando F. Segovia, Vanderbilt University, USA: Latino/a Christianity and Theology

Karel Steenbrink, Utrecht University, Netherlands: Islam and Christianity

Elsa Tamez, Universidad Bíblica Latinoamericana, Costa Rica; United Bible Societies, Colombia: Central America and Latin American Theology

Archbishop Demetrios [Trakatellis], Archbishop of America, Primate of the Greek (Eastern) Orthodox Church in America, USA: Eastern Orthodoxy

Justin Ukpong, Veritas University Abuja, Nigeria: Western Africa (Anglophone)

Andrew Walls, Centre for the Study of Christianity in the Non-Western World, University of Edinburgh, Scotland, and Akrofi Christaller Memorial Centre, Ghana:
Mission

Patricia A. Ward, Vanderbilt University, USA: Literature, the Bible, and Christianity

Paul Zamora, Greek Orthodox, Archdiocese of America, USA: Eastern Orthodoxy

CONTRIBUTORS

- Rose Teteki Abbey, Presbyterian Church, Ghana: God, African View
- K. C. Abraham, Tainan Theological Seminary, India: Eschatology and Apocalypticism in Asia; Liberation Theologies in Asia; Poverty, Asian View; Racism in Asia; South India, Church
- David Tuesday Adamo, Delta State University, Nigeria: African Religion and Bible
- LeRoy H. Aden, Lutheran Theological Seminary, USA: Compassion; Death, Bible, Patristic Views; Death, North American View
- Efrain Agosto, Hartford Theological Seminary, USA: Jesus, Latino/a View; Philippians
- Victor Aguilan, Silliman University, Philippines: Church and State in Philippines; Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Philippines
- Gillian T. W. Ahlgren, Xavier University, USA: Isabella I of Castille; Philip II;
Teresa of Ávila
- Charanjit Kaur AjitSingh, England: Sikhism
- Dorothy B E A Akoto, Trinity Theological Seminary, Ghana: Ghana
- Giuseppe Alberigo, Università di Bologna, Italy: Borromeo; Italy; RC in Italy
- Daniel E. Albrecht, Bethany University, USA: Pentecostal Worship
- Ruth Albrecht, Universität Hamburg, Germany: Pietism and Women
- Daniel O. Aleshire, Association of Theological Schools, USA: Theological Education
- Urs Altermatt, Universität Freiburg, Germany: Racism in Europe; Switzerland
- Anand Amaladass, Satya Nilayam, India: Hinduism; Nobili
- Michael Amaladoss, SJ, Loyola College, India: Uniqueness of Christ
- James N. Amanze, University of Botswana: Anglicanism in Southern Africa
- Lesley G. Anderson, United Theological College, West Indies: Christologies, Caribbean
- Thomas C. Anderson, Marquette University, USA: I–Thou; Marcel
- Victor Anderson, Vanderbilt University, USA: African American Theologies; Black Theology; Dewey; DuBois; Pragmatism; Racism; Thurman
- Hope S. Antone, Christian Conference of Asia, Hong Kong, China: Family in Asia; Marriage in Asia; Women’s Ordination in Asia
- María Pilar Aquino, University of San Diego, USA: Feminist Theology, Latina
- Paula Arai, Louisiana State University, USA: Shinto and Christianity

- Victorio Araya Guillén, Universidad de Costa Rica: Anthropology, Latin American; God, Latin American View; Incarnation, Latin American View; Justice in Latin America; Preferential Option for the Poor
- S. Wesley Ariarajah, Drew University, USA: Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Asia; God, Asian View
- Ellen T. Armour, Vanderbilt University, USA: Feminist Theology in North America; Postmodernism; Racism, Feminist View
- Brett Gregory Armstrong, Trevecca Nazarene University, USA: Bancroft
- Atsuhiro Asano, Nihon University, Ochanomizu, Japan: Galatians
- Naim Stifan Ateek, Sabeel Ecumenical Center, Israel: Palestinian Liberation Theology
- Mahmoud Ayoub, Temple University, USA: Muslim Views of Christianity
- John Alembillah Azumah, Director, Centre for Islamic Studies, London: Church and State in Islamic Africa; Islam in Africa
- Mercedes L. García Bachmann, Instituto Superior Evangélico de Estudios Teológicos, Argentina: Bible Interpretation in Latin America
- Irena Backus, Université de Genève, Switzerland: Bolsec; Geneva, Calvin's
- J. Wayne Baker, University of Akron, USA: Bullinger; Zwingli
- Mieke Bal, University of Amsterdam, Netherlands: Deborah
- Lewis V. Baldwin, Vanderbilt University, USA: Baker; Civil Rights; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Malcolm X; National Baptist Convention, USA; Slavery through the Centuries; Slavery in North America; Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Spirituals; Turner
- William Barbieri, Catholic University of America, USA: War
- António Barbosa da Silva, Universitetet i Oslo, Norway: Cape Verde
- David Basinger, Roberts Wesleyan College, USA: Philosophy of Religion; Predestination; Will
- Bolaji Olukemi Bateye, Obafemi Awolowo University, Nigeria: Women's Practices in Africa
- Oswald Bayer, Universität Tübingen, Germany: Justification, Western View; Lutheranism in Germany
- Daniel H. Bays, Calvin College, USA: Chinese House Churches
- Rosalie Beck, Baylor University, USA: Booth, C.; Booth, W.; Salvation Army; Women's Missionary Societies
- Nancy Elizabeth Bedford, Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary, USA: Christologies, Latin American View; Latin American Theologies
- Guy-Thomas Bedouelle, OP, Université de Fribourg, Switzerland: Devotio Moderna; Dominic; Dominican Order; Elisabeth of Hungary; Lefèvre D'Étaples
- Chorbishop Seely Beggiani, Our Lady of Lebanon Maronite Seminary, USA: Antioch; Aphrahat; Maronite Church
- Wolfgang Behringer, Universität des Saarlandes, Germany: Demonization; Devil; Witchcraft

- Christopher M. Bellitto, Kean University, USA: Constantinople, Councils; Lateran Councils; Vatican I
- Byard Bennett, Grand Rapids Theological Seminary, USA: Didymus
- Harold V. Bennett, Morehouse College, USA: Deuteronomy
- Teresa Berger, Duke University, USA: Women's Practices, History
- Fr. Miguel A. Bernad, Xavier University, Philippines: RC in the Philippines
- Henley Bernard, United Theological College, West Indies, Jamaica: Holy Spirit, Caribbean View
- Alan E. Bernstein, University of Arizona, USA: Damnation; Death, European View; Eternity; Hell; Judgment; Purgatory
- Jon L. Berquist, Westminster John Knox Press, USA: Ezekiel
- Johannes Beutler, SJ, Pontificio Instituto Biblico, Italy: John, Epistles
- Ana María Bidegain, Member of the Editorial Board; Universidad Nacional de Colombia & Florida International University, USA: Borda; Catholic Action; Catholic Action, Latin America; CELAM; Church and State in Colombia; Colombia; Contemplation; Feminist Theologies in Latin America; History of Christianity in Latin America; Mary in Latin America; Medellín; Protestantism in Colombia; Torres; Trujillo; Women's Religious Orders in Latin America
- Matthew P. Binkewicz, Hospice of the Finger Lakes, USA: Dying, Care of the
- Jennifer Bird, Greensboro College, USA: Church, Feminist View; Household Codes; Peter, 1 and 2
- Joseph Blenkinsopp, University of Notre Dame, USA: Isaiah
- Dmytro Bondarenko, Economic and Social Research Council, Ukraine: Orthodox Churches, Ukraine; Secularization and Orthodoxy
- Paulo Bonfatti, Juiz de Fora Federal University, Brasil: Charismatics in Brazil
- Riet en Pim Bons-Storm, Rijksuniversiteit Groningen, Netherland: Family in Western Europe
- Jessica A. Boon, Duke University, USA: Angela of Foligno; Clare of Assisi; Clare of Montefalco; Jeanne of Jussie; John of Avila; Julian of Norwich; Kempe; Poor Clares
- Marcus J. Borg, Oregon State University, USA: Jesus, Quest; Jesus Seminar
- Mark Bosco, SJ, Loyola University, Chicago, USA: Greene
- Peter C. Bouteneff, St. Vladimir Orthodox Theological Seminary, USA: Russian Orthodox Church
- François Bovon, Harvard Divinity School, USA: Apocryphal Acts; Philip, Acts; Thomas, Acts
- William D. Bowman, Gettysburg College, USA: Austria
- Paul S. Boyer, University of Wisconsin-Madison, USA: Millennialism; Millennialism in North America
- David Brakke, Indiana University, USA: Athanasius
- Richard E. Brantley, University of Florida, USA: Romanticism
- Marcus Braybrooke, World Congress of Faiths, UK: Baha'i: Christian View

- Ian Breward, University of Melbourne, Australia: Anglicanism in South Pacific; Australia; Evangelicals in South Pacific; History of Christianity in South Pacific; Independent Churches in South Pacific; Mission in South Pacific; New Zealand; Protestantism in South Pacific
- Ênio José da Costa Brito, Pontifícia Universidade Católica de São Paulo, Brasil: Slavery in Brazil
- Jewel Spears Brooker, Eckerd College, USA: Eliot, T. S.
- Johannes Brosseder, Universität zu Köln, Germany: RC and Lutheranism in Germany
- Nicholas Canfield Read Brown, Fuller Theological Seminary, USA: Peace
- Robert F. Brown, University of Delaware, USA: Schelling
- Pamela K. Brubaker, California Lutheran University, USA: Poverty, Feminist View
- Walter Brueggemann, Columbia Theological Seminary, Atlanta, USA: Psalms; Worship in Ancient Israel
- Bishop Colin O. Buchanan, Anglican Communion Institute, UK: Anglican Communion; Anglican Worship; Forty-two Articles; Lambeth Conferences; Lambeth Quadrilateral; Thirty-nine Articles
- Stanley M. Burgess, Regent University, USA: Charismatic Movement, History; Pentecostal Movement, History
- Amy Nelson Burnett, University of Nebraska, Lincoln, USA: Bucer; Marburg Colloquy
- J. Patout Burns, Vanderbilt University, USA: Cyprian
- David B. Burrell CSC, University of Notre Dame, USA: Maimonides
- David Buttrick, Vanderbilt University, USA: Preaching; Reformed Worship
- James P. Byrd, Vanderbilt University, USA: Adams; Asbury; Hodge; Jefferson; Plymouth Brethren; United States; Williams
- Lavinia Byrne, West Nave House, UK: Catherine of Sienna; Helena; Margaret of Scotland; Ward
- Gerado Caetano, Universidad de la República Uruguay: Church and State in Uruguay; RC in Uruguay; Uruguay
- Marcos Caldas, Universidade Federal Fluminense, Brasil: Inquisition in Brazil; Religious Orders in Brazil
- Alkiviadis Calivas, Holy Cross School of Theology, USA: Baptism, Orthodox View; Chrismation; Popular Practices in Orthodoxy
- William J. Callahan, University of Toronto, Canada: RC in Spain; Spain
- Salvatore Calomino, University of Wisconsin, USA: Barlaam and Josaphat
- Euan K. Cameron, Union Theological Seminary, New York, USA: Waldenses
- William S. Campbell, University of Wales Lampeter, UK: Käsemann
- Marcelo Ayres Camurça, Juiz de Fora Federal University, Brasil: Popular Practices in Brazil
- Daniel F. Caner, University of Connecticut, USA: Acoemetæ; Circumcellions; Messalians
- Paul E. Capetz, United Theological Seminary of the Twin Cities, USA: God, History

- Carlos F. Cardoza-Orlandi, Columbia Theological Seminary, New York, USA: Mission in Caribbean; Valladolid
- Patrick W. Carey, Marquette University, USA: Brownson; Hecker; Theological Education, RC View
- Barbara Carvill, Calvin College, USA: German Literature
- Hal Cauthron, Southern Nazarene University, USA: Nazarene, Church
- Subhadra Mitra Channa, University of Delhi, India: Tribalism
- Mark D. Chapman, University of Oxford, UK: History of Religion; Liberal Theology; Troeltsch
- James H. Charlesworth, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Dead Sea Scrolls
- Kenneth R. Chase, Wheaton College, USA: Violence
- Chen Zemin, Nanjing Union Theological Seminary, China: Chinese Protestant Churches
- Luciano Chianeque, Seminário Emanuel Unido do Huambo, Angola: Angola; Human Rights in Africa
- Philip Chia Phin Yin, Chung Chi College, Chinese University of Hong Kong, China: Obadiah; Tobit
- Francisca H. Chimhanda, Congregatio Jesu, Zimbabwe: Religious Orders in Africa
- Daniel Chiquete, Universität Hamburg, Germany: Charismatics in Central America; Health, Healing, in Latin America; Holy Spirit, Latin American View
- John T. Chirban, Harvard University, USA: Health, Healing, Orthodox View; Resurrection, Orthodox View
- Soobin Choi, Sogang University, Seoul, Korea: Daoist Canon and Bible
- Robert Choquette, University of Ottawa, Canada: Canada; Ryerson; Strachan; Taché
- Mita Choudhury, Vassar College, USA: Arnauld, Jacqueline; Joncoux
- Gerald Christianson, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Gettysburg, USA: Inner Mission; Wichern
- John Chrysavgis, Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America, USA: Ecology, Orthodox View
- Sejong Chun, Vanderbilt University, USA: New Creation
- Esther Chung-Kim, Claremont School of Theology, USA: Brenz; Hubmaier; Peasants' War
- Charles M. A. Clark, St. John's University, USA: Poverty and RC
- Elizabeth A. Clark, Duke University, USA: Asceticism; Historiography; Origenist Controversy; Virginity
- Sathianathan Clarke, Wesley Theological Seminary, USA: Caste System; Dalit Theology
- Fred Cloud, American Baptist College, USA: Prayer
- John B. Cobb, Jr., Claremont School of Theology, USA: Hartshorne; Process Theology; Whitehead
- W. Owen Cole, Shap Working Party on World Religions and Education, UK: Sikhism: Christian View; Sikh Scriptures

- John A Coleman, SJ, Loyola Marymount University, USA: Global Ethics; Globalization
- John J. Collins, Yale University, USA: Apocalypticism, Origins; Violence and the Bible
- Sylvia Collins-Mayo, Kingston University, UK: Secularization and Desecularization
- Paul K. Conkin, Vanderbilt University, USA: Darwinism; Edwards
- Beth A. Conklin, Vanderbilt University, USA: Climate Change
- Sean Connolly, Queen's University, Belfast, UK: Ireland
- Demetrios J. Constantelos, Richard Stockton College of New Jersey, USA: Poverty, Orthodox View
- Michael A. Conway, Pontifical University, Ireland: Blondel
- Paula M. Cooney, Macalester College, USA: Body
- Austin Cooper, OMI, Catholic Theological College, Australia: RC in South Pacific; Spirituality in South Pacific
- Michael L. Cooper-White, Gettysburg Seminary, USA: Lutheran Churches, Evangelical Lutheran Church in America
- Pamela Cooper-White, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, USA: Pastoral Theology
- L. William Countryman, Graduate Theological Union, USA: Honor and Shame
- Sérgio Coutinho, Universidade Católica de Brasília, Brasil: CEBs; Church in Brazil: Church and State in Brazil; RC in Brazil
- Pamela Couture, Saint Paul School of Theology, USA: Family in North America
- Shannon Craigo-Snell, Yale University, USA: Anthropology, Feminist View; Image of God, Feminist and Liberation Views
- James L. Crenshaw, Duke University, USA: Covenant; Ecclesiastes; Joel; Prophecy; Proverbs; Sacrifice of Isaac; Wisdom of Ben Sira
- David Crowner, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Gettysburg, USA: Inner Mission; Wichern
- Humberto Horacio Cucchetti, Centro de Estudios e Investigaciones Laborales, Buenos Aires, Argentina: Church and State in Argentina
- Lawrence S. Cunningham, University of Notre Dame, USA: Holiness
- Elizabeth Mason Currier, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, USA: Evangelicals; Evangelicals in North America; New Haven Theology
- Emmanuel Cutrone, University of Notre Dame, USA: Ambrosian (Milanese) Rite
- Mary L. Daniel, University of Wisconsin, USA: Portuguese Literature
- David D. Daniels III, McCormick Theological Seminary, USA: Church of God in Christ
- Robert Darden, Baylor University, USA: Gospel Music
- Rolf Darge, Katholisch-Theologische Fakultät der Universität Salzburg, Austria: Suárez
- Isaiah Dau, Nairobi Pentecostal Bible College, Kenya: Sudan

- Jeffry C. Davis, Wheaton College, USA: Canaan; Elijah; Exile; Flood; Joseph, Husband of Mary; Joseph, Son of Jacob and Rachel; Noah; Samaria; Shepherd; Sodom; Star; Vine, Vineyard; Wilderness; Zion
- Jane Dawson, University of Edinburgh, UK: Book of Common Order; Knox
- Valentin Dedji, St. Mark's Methodist Church, London, UK: African Instituted Churches in Western Africa; Benin; Burkina Faso; Central African Republic; Chad; Gabon; Mission in Africa; Senegal; Togo
- John W. de Gruchy, University of Cape Town, South Africa: Bonhoeffer; Democracy
- Paul DeHart, Vanderbilt Divinity School, USA: Radical Orthodoxy
- Wendy J. Deichmann Edwards, United Theological Seminary, USA: Shaw; Temperance; Willard
- Miguel A. De La Torre, Hope College, USA: Latino/a Theologies
- George E. Demacopoulos, Fordham University, USA: Mary, Theotokos
- Thomas de Mayo, J. Sargent Reynolds Community College, USA: Angels
- Leah DeVun, Texas A&M University, USA: Apocalypticism in Western History; Resurrection, Western View
- Beatriz de Vasconcellos Dias, CEHILA, Brasil: RC in Brazil; Women's Religious Orders in Brazil
- Dennis C. Dickerson, Vanderbilt University, USA: African American Churches; African American Holiness; African Methodist Episcopal Church; Allen; Payne
- John M. Dillon, Trinity College Dublin, Ireland: Neoplatonism; Platonism
- Luis Miguel Donatello, Universidad de Buenos Aires, Argentina: Angelelli; Argentina; Meinvielle; Moyano Llerena
- Igor Dorfmann-Lazarev, Centre d'Etudes ISTINA, France: Armenia; Armenian Genocide; Gregory the Illuminator; Mashtots; Moses of Khoren; Nerses
- Susanna Drake, Duke University, USA: Melania the Elder; Melania the Younger
- Jonathan A. Draper, University of KwaZulu-Natal, South Africa: Colenso
- Martin, N. Dreher, Universidade do Vale do Rio dos Sinos, Brasil: Protestantism in Brazil
- Otto Dreydoppel, Jr., Moravian Theological Seminary, USA: Bohemian Brethren; Comenius; Moravian Church; Moravian Worship; Zinzendorf
- Angelyn Dries, OSF, Saint Louis University, USA: Maryknoll Missionaries
- A. J. Droge, University of Toronto, Canada: Hellenistic Christian Self-definition
- Francis X. D'Sa, SJ, Bayerische Julius-Maximilians-Universität Würzburg, Germany: Hinduism; Hindu Scriptures
- Marilyn Dunn, University of Glasgow, Scotland: Benedict; Benedict, Rule of; Carthusian; Cistercian; Columba; Columbanus; Carta Caritatis; Iona; Monastic Rules; Regula Magistri
- Nicole Wilkinson Duran, Meadville Lombard Theological School, USA: Eve; Herod; Herodians; Herodias; Judith; Mark; Miriam; Pilate; Salome; Tamar (Gen 38); Tamar (2 Sam 13); Tomb of Jesus; Tree of Life; Trial of Jesus; Zipporah
- Rifaat Ebied, University of Sydney, Australia: Bar Hebraeus; Damian; Dionysius bar Salibi; Peter of Callinicus; Timothy II Aelurus; Tritheism

- Mark J. Edwards, Christ Church College, University of Oxford, UK: Constantine; Eusebius of Caesarea
- William H. Edwards, University of South Australia: Ancestors, Australian Aboriginal View; Anthropology, Australian Aboriginal View; Australian Aboriginal Traditions; Family, Australian View
- Leonard H. Ehrlich, University of Massachusetts, USA: Jaspers
- Nancy L. Eiesland, Emory University, USA: Disability
- Martin Elbel, Palacký University, Czech Republic: Czech Republic; Slovak Republic
- J. Harold Ellens, University of Michigan, USA: Ideological Studies; Ideology
- Stephen Ellingson, Hamilton College, USA: Megachurches in North America
- Marvin M. Ellison, Bangor Theological Seminary, USA: Family, Nonheterosexual
- Robert Ellsberg, Orbis Books, USA: De Foucauld
- Jean Bethke Elshtain, University of Chicago, USA: Addams
- Eldon Jay Epp, Case Western Reserve University and Harvard University, USA: Junia
- Peter C. Erb, Wilfrid Laurier University in Waterloo, Canada: Arndt; Boehme; Ephrata Cloister; Ephrata Community; Gladstone; Keble; Manning; Newman; Oxford Movement; Pusey; Schwenkfeld von Ossig; Ultramontaniam; Wilberforce
- Tassilo Erhardt, Roosevelt Academy, The Netherlands: Handel; Messiah, Handel's; Mozart; Palestrina
- Maria Erling, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Gettysburg, USA: Lutheran Churches in USA; Muhlenberg
- Noel Leo Erskine, Emory University, USA: Caribbean Islands, Theologies; Christologies, Caribbean View; God, Caribbean View; Gospel and Culture, Caribbean View; Justice, Caribbean View; Liberation Theologies, Caribbean View; Poverty, Caribbean View
- Gillian R. Evans, University of Cambridge, UK: Bernard of Clairvaux; Anselm of Canterbury; Gregory I; Peter Lombard
- Virginia Fabella, MM, Institute of Formation and Religious Studies, Philippines: Women's Religious Orders in Asia
- Michael A. Fahey, SJ, Marquette University, USA: Baptism, RC View; RC in USA; Sacramental Theology; Sacraments in Western Churches
- Edward Farley, Vanderbilt University, USA: Fundamentalism
- Margaret A. Farley, Yale Divinity School, USA: Health, Healing, Feminist View; Health and Healing Theologies; Medical Ethics
- Wendy Farley, Emory University, USA: Desire; Suffering
- Robert Fastiggi, Sacred Heart Major Seminary, USA: Consecration; Holy Office; Ordination; Priesthood; Roman Catechism
- Seena Fazel, University of Oxford, UK: Baha'i Faith, Baha'i Perspective
- Duncan S. Ferguson, Director, Committee on Higher Education, Presbyterian Church (USA); Eckerd College, USA: Education as Christian Service; Educational Practices in USA; New Age Spirituality; Sunday School

- Helwar Figueroa, Florida International University, USA: Church and State in Colombia
- Paul Corby Finney, University of Missouri, USA: Jesus, Images of; Jesus, Images of, European View
- Kyriaki Karidoyanes FitzGerald, St. Catherine's Vision, USA: Ecumenical Patriarchate; Laity, Orthodox View; Women's Ordination and the Orthodox Church
- Thomas E. FitzGerald, Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology, USA: Ecumenical Patriarchate; Greek Orthodox Church in America; Orthodox Churches in USA
- John R. Fitzmier, Claremont School of Theology, USA: Dwight
- Marie Therese Flanagan, Queen's University Belfast, UK: Celtic Christianity
- Sabina Flanagan, University of Adelaide, Australia: Gertrude; Hildegard of Bingen
- Claude Flipo, SJ, Centre Sèvres, France: Ignatius of Loyola; Jesuits; Spiritual Exercises
- Ronald B. Flowers, Texas Christian University, USA: Church and State in USA
- Carole Fontaine, Andover Newton Theological School, USA: Bible Interpretation, Feminist View
- David Ford, St. Tikhons Theological Seminary, USA: Marriage, Orthodox View; Martyrdom, Orthodox View; Saints; Saints, Devotion to, Orthodox View
- Mary Ford, St. Tikhons Theological Seminary, USA: Marriage, Orthodox View; Martyrdom, Orthodox View; Saints; Saints, Devotion to, Orthodox View
- Stephanie A. Ford, Earlham School of Religion, USA: Spirituality, North American View; Spirituality, Protestant View
- Jim Forest, Orthodox Peace Fellowship, USA: Catholic Worker; Day
- William Franke, Vanderbilt University, USA: Dante; Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite; Petrarch
- Robert M. Franklin, Emory University, USA: Family, African American View
- Ruth Franzén, Uppsala University, Sweden: Pietism in Scandinavia; Rouse
- Edward H. Friedman, Vanderbilt University, USA: Spanish Literature
- Samuel Frouisou, Lutheran Church, Cameroon; University of Natal, South Africa: Cameroon
- Lorelei F. Fuchs, SA, The Interchurch Center, New York, USA: Dialogue, Ecumenical
- Jojo M. Fung, SJ, Arrupe House, Malaysia: Shamanism
- Inger Furseth, KIFO Centre for Church Research, Norway: Aarflot
- Richard R. Gaillardetz, University of Toledo, USA: Laity
- Brandon Gallaher, University of Oxford, UK: Florovsky
- China Galland, Graduate Theological Union, USA: Black Madonna
- Mark Galli, "Christianity Today" Magazine, USA: Mott
- Ismael García, Austin Presbyterian Theological Seminary, USA: Justice, Latino/a View; Justification, Latino/a View; Kingdom of God, Latino/a View; Poverty Latino/a View

- Tharscisse Gatwa, Centre de Littérature Evangélique, Cameroon: Rwanda
- Jean-Marie Gaudeul, Secrétariat pour les Relations avec l'Islam, France: History of Christianity in North Africa; Islam in Western Europe
- Luis María Gavilanes del Castillo, Pontificia Universidad Católica, Ecuador: CEBs; Church in Ecuador; Ecuador; Mercedes de Jesús; Miguel, Brother; Narcisa de Jesús; Proaño
- Pavel L. Gavriluk, University of St. Thomas, St. Paul, USA: Patristic Thought
- Volney P. Gay, Vanderbilt University, USA: Paradox
- Metropolitan Athanasios Geevargis, Syrian Orthodox Patriarchate, Antioch, Syria: Syriac Orthodox Church
- Kondothra M. George, Orthodox Theological Seminary, India: Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church
- Mary Gerhart, Hobart and William Smith Colleges, USA: Analogical Imagination; Metaphor
- Simon Gikandi, Princeton University, USA: African Literature (Anglophone)
- Maurice Gilbert, SJ, Pontificio Istituto Biblico, Italy: Pontifical Biblical Commission
- Michael J. Gillgannon, Universidad Nacional de La Paz, Bolivia: Bolivia
- Verónica Giménez Beliveau, Universidad de Buenos Aires, Argentina: Bogarín Argaña; Church, Latin American View; Paraguay
- Terryl Givens, Richmond University, USA: Latter-Day Saints; Mormon, Book of; Mormon Worship; Smith; Young
- Beth Glazier-McDonald, Centre College, USA: Haggai; Malachi; Nahum; Zechariah
- Philip Gleason, University of Notre Dame, USA: Carroll
- Menghun Goh, Vanderbilt University, USA: Malaysia; Sung Shang-Jie
- Brian Golding, University of Southampton, UK: Gilbert of Sempringham
- Bishop Hilario M. Gomez, Jr., National Council of Churches, Philippines: Islam in Asia: The Philippines
- Michelle A. Gonzalez, Loyola Marymount University, USA: Christologies, Latino/a; God, Latino/a View
- Donald K. Gorrell, United Theological Seminary, Dayton, USA: Rauschenbusch; Social Gospel
- Roy Gottfried, Vanderbilt University, USA: American Literature
- Tamara Grdzeldze, World Council of Churches, Switzerland: Creation, Ecology, Orthodox View; Georgia; Orthodox Church of Georgia
- Joel B. Green, Asbury Theological Seminary, USA: Cross and Crucifixion
- Niels Henrik Gregersen, University of Copenhagen, Denmark: Science
- Cristina Grenholm, Member of the Editorial Board, Karlstad Universitët; Director, Theology and Ecumenical Relations, Church of Sweden: Autonomy; Folk Churches; Heteronomy; Justification, Feminist View; Motherhood; Relationality; Spiritual Criticism; Sweden; Women's Ordination in Europe
- Herbert Griffiths, University of Leeds, UK: Afro-Caribbean Christianity in UK
- Eric W. Gritsch, Lutheran Theological Seminary, USA: Müntzer

- Erich S. Gruen, University of California, Berkeley, USA: Diaspora
- Christoffer H. Grundmann, Valparaiso University, USA: Health, Healing in the West; Hospitals and Healing
- Paul H. Gundani, UNISA, South Africa: RC in Southern Africa; Zimbabwe
- Jon P. Gunnemann, Emory University, USA: Marxism
- Petre Guran, Princeton University, USA: Church and State in Eastern Europe; Olga; Vladimir
- Vidar L. Haanes, Det teologiske Menighetsfakultet, Norway: Olaf
- Jeremiah M. Hackett, University of South Carolina, USA: Bacon; Eckhart; Soul
- Getatchew Haile, Hill Monastic Manuscript Library, USA: Ethiopia; Frumentius
- Douglas John Hall, McGill University, Canada: Christologies, North American View; Eschatology and Apocalypticism, North American View; God, North American View; Gospel and Culture, North American View; Incarnation, North American View; Justification, North American View; Theologies as Human Undertaking, North Atlantic View
- Nicholas Hammond, University of Cambridge, UK: Pascal
- Daphne Hampson, University of St. Andrews, UK: Post-Christian Thought
- Jehu J. Hanciles, Fuller Seminary, USA: Sierra Leone
- Barry Hankins, Baylor University, USA: Southern Baptist Convention
- Jennifer Haraguchi, University of Chicago, USA: Cereta
- Stanley S. Harakas, Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology, USA: Ethics, Orthodox View; Justice, Orthodox View
- Anthony John Harding, University of Saskatchewan, Canada: Coleridge
- Conrad L. Harkins, OFM, Franciscan Institute, USA: Francis of Assisi; Franciscans
- J. William Harmless, SJ, Creighton University, USA: Antony; Apophthegmata Patrum; Cassian; Evagrius of Pontus; Pachomius
- Marjory Harper, University of Aberdeen, Scotland: Missions and Emigration/Colonization in North America
- Amir Harrak, University of Toronto, Canada: Syria; Syriac Catholic Church
- Joel F. Harrington, Vanderbilt University, USA: Marriage, in Western Churches
- Mark W. Harris, First Parish of Watertown, Mass., USA: Racovian Catechism; Socinus; Unitarianism
- Susan Ashbrook Harvey, Brown University, USA: Incense and Olfactory Experience in Worship
- Van A. Harvey, Stanford University, USA: Bultmann; Demythologization; Feuerbach
- R. Chris Hassel, Jr., Vanderbilt University, USA: Shakespeare
- Jione Havea, University of Melbourne, Australia: Biblical Interpretation in Oceania
- Daniel Hawk, Ashland Theological Seminary, USA: Joshua
- Diana L. Hayes, Georgetown University, USA: Spirituality, African American; Womanist and African American Theologies
- Leslie Hayes, University of Toronto, Canada: Women's Ordination, Earlier Periods

- Priscilla Hayner, International Center for Transitional Justice, USA: Truth and Reconciliation Commissions
- S. Mark Heim, Andover Newton Theological School, USA: Sacrifice
- Simo Heininen, University of Helsinki, Finland: Agricola
- Richard P. Heitzenrater, Duke University, USA: Wesley, John
- Eila Helander, Helsingfors Universitet, Finland: Finland
- David Hempton, Harvard University, USA: Methodism in UK
- Scott H. Hendrix, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Luther; Schmalkaldic Articles
- Jan-Olav Henriksen, Det teologiske Menighetsfakultet, Norway: Aulén; Creation Theology in Scandinavia; Existentialism and Christian Thought; Folk Churches; Lutheranism in the Nordic Countries
- Gina Hens-Piazza, Union Theological Seminary, USA: Samuel, 1 and 2
- Carter Heyward, Episcopal Divinity School, USA: Heterosexuality; Homosexuality; Sexuality
- Nicholas J. Higham, University of Manchester, UK: Bede; Patrick
- David Hilliard, Flinders University, Australia: Solomon Islands
- Norman A. Hjelm, Lutheran World Federation and Director of Faith and Order: Ecumenical Movement; Edinburgh Conference, 1937; Faith and Order; Lutheran World Federation
- Peter C. Hodgson, Vanderbilt University, USA: Baur; Eliot, George; Hegel; History as a Theological Concept; Liberalism in Theology
- Arthur Holder, Graduate Theological Union, USA: Spirituality
- M. Jan Holton, Vanderbilt University, USA: Families and Substitute Families in Squatter Camps
- Dwight N. Hopkins, University of Chicago, USA: Anthropology, African American View; Anthropology, European-American View; Anthropology, Western View
- Ronnie Po-chia Hsia, Pennsylvania State University, USA: Catholic Renewal; Mission, RC, in China; Trent, Council
- Po-Ho Huang, Dean, School of Theology, Chang Jung Christian University, Taiwan: Taiwan
- James Hudnut-Beumler, Dean, Vanderbilt Divinity School, USA: Church in North America; Economic Studies of Christianity in USA
- Jennifer S. Hughes, University of California, Riverside, USA: Patronato/Padroado; Portuguese Conquests, Missions; Spanish Conquests, Missions
- Leonard M. Hummel, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Gettysburg, USA: Pastoral Care
- Mary E. Hunt, Women's Alliance for Theology, Ethics and Ritual, USA: Women's Ordination and RC
- Laennec Hurbon, Université Quisqueya de Port-au-Prince, Haiti: Ancestors, Latin American and Caribbean View; Death, Caribbean View and Cult of the Dead; Dominican Republic; Guadeloupe; Haiti; Martinique; Vodou

- Mark Hutchinson, Southern Cross College, Australia: Charismatics in Australasia; Charismatics in South Pacific; Incarnation, South Pacific View; Racism in South Pacific
- Susan E. Hylen, Vanderbilt University, USA: NT Theology; Revelation
- Mary Beth Ingham, CSJ, Loyola Marymount University, USA: Bonaventure; Duns Scotus; Olivi
- H. Larry Ingle, University of Tennessee, Chattanooga, USA: Fox; Friends, Religious Society of; Grimké, Sarah and Angelina; Hick; Penn; Quaker Worship; Woolman
- Dale T. Irvin, New York Theological Seminary, USA: History of World Christianity
- Jon Isaak, Mennonite Brethren Biblical Seminary, USA: Hebrews
- Paul John Isaak, Wartburg Theological Seminary, USA: Death, African View; Namibia
- Ada María Isasi-Díaz, Drew University, USA: Feminist Theology, Mujerista
- Hans Raun Iversen, Københavns Universitet, Denmark: Culture Christianity; Denmark; Grundtvig; Hemmingsen; Laity, Scandinavian View
- Margaret C. Jacob, University of California, Los Angeles, USA: Freemasonry; Newton
- Arthur James, Gujranwala Theological Seminary; President, National Churches Council, Pakistan: Pakistan
- Maria Jansdotter-Samuelsson, Karlstad Universitët, Sweden: Ecology; Ecotheology
- David Jasper, University of Glasgow, UK: Gadamer; Hermeneutics
- Werner G. Jeanrond, University of Lund, Sweden: Love
- Renée Jeffery, LaTrobe University, Australia: Arminianism; Grotius; Remonstrance
- David Lyle Jeffrey, Baylor University, USA: Jesus Christ, Images of, in Literature
- Theodore W. Jennings, Jr., Chicago Theological Seminary, USA: Justice, Western View; Law
- David H. Jensen, Austin Presbyterian Seminary, USA: Labor
- Robin Margaret Jensen, Vanderbilt University, USA: Arts
- David Jobling, St. Andrews College, Canada: Bible Interpretation in North America
- Dale A. Johnson, Vanderbilt University, USA: Civil Constitution of the Clergy; History of Christianity in Western Europe; Nonconformists; Nonconformity and Theological Education; Popular Christian Practices; Popular Christianity in North America
- Elizabeth A. Johnson, Fordham University, USA: God, Feminist View; Incarnation, Feminist View; Mary; Saints, RC View
- Maxwell E. Johnson, University of Notre Dame, USA: Worship in Early Christianity; Liturgies, History of
- Sarah Johnson, Duke University, USA: Eddy; Jackson; Lee, Ann; McPherson; Palmer
- Mark D. Johnston, DePaul University, USA: Llull
- F. Stanley Jones, California State University, Long Beach, USA: Clementine Literature

- James William Jones, Rutgers University, USA: Psychology
- John R. Jones, La Sierra University, USA: Adventism; Branch Davidians; Seventh-day Adventist Worship; White
- Alissa Jones Nelson, University of St. Andrews, UK: Prosperity Theology and Liberation Theology
- Inge Jonsson, University of Stockholm, Sweden: Swedenborg
- Jan Joosten, Université des Sciences Humaines de Strasbourg, France: Diatessaron
- Elizabeth Judd, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México: Asbaje y Ramírez; Garcés; Gómez Morín; Hidalgo y Costilla; Jesús, Felipe de; Llaguno Farías; Martínez; Méndez Arceo; Miranda y Gómez; Morelos y Pavón; Munguía; Palafox y Mendoza; Pro Juárez, Miguel; Quiroga; Sahagún; Thomson; Velázquez; Zumárraga
- Mulambya Peggy Kabonde, United Church of Zambia: Water; Zambia
- Robert Kaggwa, Roehampton University, UK: Kitagana; Luwum; Mukasa; Njangali; Uganda
- Sylvester Kahakwa, Tumaini University, Tanzania: Ancestors, African View; Incarnation, African View; Justification, African View
- Isaac Kalimi, University of Chicago, USA: Chronicles
- Ogbu U. Kalu, McCormick Presbyterian Seminary, USA: Charismatic Movement, Studying; History of Christianity in Africa
- Eunice Kamaara, Moi University, Kenya: Family in Eastern Africa
- Wayne C. Kannaday, Newberry College, USA: Apologists; Clement of Alexandria; Scribes
- Musimbi Kanyoro, World YWCA, Switzerland: Justice, African View; YMCA; YWCA
- Veli-Matti Kärkkäinen, Fuller Theological Seminary, USA: Church; Church, Western View; Holy Spirit; Holy Spirit, European View; Holy Spirit, North American View; Inspiration
- Frank Kaufmann, Interreligious and International Federation for World Peace, USA: Unification Church
- Léon Nguapitshi Kayongo, Université Simon Kimbangu, Democratic Republic of the Congo: Kimbangu; Kimbanguism
- Richard Kearney, Boston College, USA: Aesthetics; Ricoeur
- Alice A. Keefe, University of Wisconsin-Stevens Point, USA: Hosea
- Ralph Keen, University of Iowa, USA: More
- Catherine Keller, Drew University, USA: Eschatology and Apocalypticism, Feminist
- Anthony J. Kelly, CSsR, Australian Catholic University, Australia: Eschatology; Hope; Liguori
- Karen Kennelly, CSJ, St. Catherine College, USA: Women's Orders in Europe and North America
- Kathi Lynn Kern, University of Kentucky, USA: Anthony, Susan B.; Stanton
- Fergus Kerr, OP, University of Edinburgh, UK: Aquinas; Thomism; Wittgenstein

- Edward Kessler, University of Cambridge, UK: Israel; Judaism and Christianity, Jewish Views; Judaism and Christianity in Western Europe
- George Kilcourse, Bellarmino University, USA: Merton
- Heup Young Kim, Kangnam University, Korea: Ancestors, Asian View; Daoism, Neo-Confucianism, Christianity in Korea
- Kim Sung-Hae, Sr., Sogang University, Korea: Daoism
- Kim Yong-Bock, Asia Pacific Graduate School for Study of Life, Korea: Death, Asian View; Minjung Theology
- Kim Yung Suk, Virginia Union University, USA: Korea, South
- Richard King, University of Glasgow, UK: Religion
- Thomas M. King, SJ, Georgetown University, USA: Teilhard de Chardin
- Robert M. Kingdon, University of Wisconsin-Madison, USA: Beza; Farel; Marriage in Calvin's Geneva
- Ross Kinsler, Latin America Biblical University, Costa Rica: Ministry/Ministries; Theological Education in Latin America
- Hans G. Kippenberg, Universität Erfurt, Germany: Weber
- Cheryl A. Kirk-Duggan, Shaw Divinity School, USA: Anthropology, Womanist View; Healing, African American View; Justice, Womanist View; Liberation Theologies, Womanist; Wells
- Clifton Kirkpatrick, President, World Alliance of Reformed Churches: World Alliance of Reformed Churches
- Leonid Kishkovsky, Orthodox Church of America, USA: Church, Orthodox View
- Nadieszda Kizenko, State University of New York, Albany, USA: Russian Orthodox Church
- Jeffrey Klaiber, SJ, Pontifical Catholic University, Peru: Human Rights in Latin America; Landázuri Ricketts, Juan; MacKay, John A.; Peru; RC in Peru; Rose, St., of Lima
- Hans-Josef Klauck, University of Chicago, USA: Apocryphal Books of NT; Apocryphal Gospels; Ebionites, Gospel; Hebrews, Gospel; Nazarenes, Gospel; Peter, Gospel; Philip, Gospel; Thomas, Gospel; Thomas, Infancy Gospel; Truth, Gospel
- Sidney Knight, University of Peradenya, Sri Lanka: Sri Lanka
- Samuel Kobia, General Secretary, World Council of Churches: World Council of Churches
- Robert Kolb, Concordia Seminary, USA: Augsburg Confession; Augsburg, Peace; Flacius; Gnesio-Lutherans
- Karla Ann Koll, Latin American Biblical University, Guatemala: Guatemala
- Heikki Kotila, Helsingfors Universitet, Finland: Thomas Mass
- Donald Kraybill, Elizabethtown College, USA: Amish; Anabaptist; Brethren; Hutterites; Peace Movements; Radical Reformation
- Philip D. W. Krey, Lutheran Theological Seminary at Philadelphia, USA: Nicholas of Lyra

- Yves Krumenacker, Université Jean Moulin, Institut Universitaire de France: Chardon; Merici; Thérèse of Lisieux
- Jeffrey Kah-Jin Kuan, Pacific School of Religion, USA: Bible Interpretation in Asia
- Simanga R. Kumalo, University of Natal, South Africa: Church and State in South Africa
- Peter Kuzmic, Evangelical Theological Seminary, Croatia: Charismatics and Pentecostals in Eastern Europe; Croatia; Mission in Eastern Europe
- Simon Shui-Man Kwan, Chinese University of Hong Kong, China: Asian Theology; Confucianism in Hong Kong; Congress of Asian Theologians; Hong Kong; Programme for Theology and Cultures in Asia
- Kwok Pui-lan, Member of the Editorial Board; Episcopal Divinity School, USA: Bible Interpretation by Asian Women; Chinese Women; Feminist Theology in Asia
- André LaCocque, Chicago Theological Seminary, USA: Daniel; Esther; Genesis; Israel, People of; Jerusalem; Jonah; People of God; Promised Land; Song of Songs
- Stephen E. Lahey, University of Nebraska, Lincoln, USA: Darby; Dispensationalism; Hus; Jerome of Prague; Pecoek; Wyclif
- John Tsz Pang Lai, Chinese University of Hong Kong, China: Chinese Literature
- Emiel Lamberts, Katholieke Universiteit Leuven, Belgium: Belgium; Cardijn; Worker-Priests; Young Christian Workers
- Armando Lampe, Universidad de Quintana Roo, Mexico: Caribbean Islands; Church and State in Cuba, Catholicism and Communism in Cuba; Cuba; Guyana; Jamaica; Rastafari; Trinidad and Tobago
- Craig Lampe, Bible Museum, USA: Bible, English Translations
- Beverly J. Lanzetta, University of Arizona, USA: Wisdom
- Eve LaPlante, American Society of Journalists and Authors, USA: Hutchinson
- Lizette Larson-Miller, Church Divinity School of the Pacific, USA: Burial; Dead, Prayers for; Laying on of Hands; Sick, Visitation and Anointing
- Ariel Bybee Laughton, Duke University, USA: Marcella
- Leonard Lawlor, University of Memphis, USA: Bergson; Berengarius of Tours; Phenomenology
- Bentley Layton, Yale University, USA: Shenoute
- Robin A. Leaver, Rider University, USA: Bach; Passions (Music)
- Karen Lebacqz, Pacific School of Religion, USA: Bio-Medical Ethics; Justice, North American View
- Archie Chi Chung Lee, Member of the Editorial Board; Chung Chi College, Chinese University of Hong Kong, China: Lamentations
- Marilyn J. Legge, University of Toronto, Canada: Grace, Feminist View
- Hervé LeGrand, Institut Catholique de Paris, France: RC in France
- D. L. LeMahieu, Lake Forest College, USA: Paley
- Raymond Lemieux, Université Laval, Canada: Guyard; Quebec
- Bill J. Leonard, Wake Forest University, USA: Baptist Churches; Baptist Churches in North America; Baptist Worship

- Ellen M. Leonard, CSJ, University of Toronto, Canada: Modernism, RC; Petre; Underhill; von Hügel
- Outi Leppä, University of Helsinki, Finland: Colossians
- Jean Lesaulnier, Société des Amis de Port-Royal, France: Arnauld, Antoine; Jansen; Jansenism
- Nantawan Boonprasat Lewis, Metropolitan State University, St. Paul, USA: Thailand
- Henrietta Leyser, University of Oxford, UK: Christina of Markyate
- Alexei Lidov, Research Center for Eastern Christian Culture, Moscow: Hierotopy; Jesus Christ in Byzantine Iconography; Mary, Theotokos, in Byzantine Iconography
- Bernard Lightman, York University, Canada: Huxley
- Paul Chang-Ha Lim, Vanderbilt University, USA: Amyraut; Bunyan; Cyril of Jerusalem; John of the Cross; Kuyper; Las Casas, Bartolomé de; Laud
- Carter Lindberg, Boston University, USA: Reformation
- Mark R. Lindsay, University of Melbourne, Australia: Barmen Declaration; Barth, Karl; Church Struggle in Germany; Confession Church; Crisis Theology; Dialectical Theology; German Christians; Niemöller
- James R. Linville, University of Lethbridge, Canada: Deuteronomistic History; Kings, 1–2
- James C. Livingston, College of William and Mary, USA: Butler; Enlightenment; Enlightenment in North America; Möhler; Tyrrell
- Ann Loades, University of Durham, UK: Feminist Theology in Western Europe; Sayers; Women's Christian Practices in the West
- David Loades, University of Sheffield, UK: Elizabeth I; Foxe
- Jean-Claude Loba-Mkole, United Bible Societies, Kenya: Bible Translations, History; Bokeleale; Congo, Democratic Republic of; Kimbangu; Malula
- Lo Lung Kwong, Chinese University of Hong Kong, China: Ancestors in China
- Wati Longchar, Eastern Theological College, India: Land and Indigenous Peoples' Views
- Eleazar López, Centro Nacional de Ayuda a Misiones Indígenas, Mexico: Gospel and Culture, Mexican View
- David W. Lotz, Union Theological Seminary, USA: Ritschl
- Andrew Louth, Durham University, UK: Byzantine Theology; Cabasilas; Gregory Palamas; John of Damascus; Staniloae
- Robin W. Lovin, Southern Methodist University, USA: Niebuhr, Reinhold; Political Studies; Political Theology; Social Ethics
- William Luis, Vanderbilt University, USA: Caribbean Literature
- Frank D. Macchia, Vanguard University, USA: Baptism in the Holy Spirit; Charismatics/Pentecostals in North America; Charismatics/Pentecostals in Europe; Health, Healing, Pentecostal/Charismatic View
- Diarmaid N. J. MacCulloch, University of Oxford, UK: Common Prayer, Book of; Cranmer; Henry VIII; Mary Tudor
- Kirk R. MacGregor, Radford University, USA: Word-Faith Movement

- Marjory A. MacLean, Depute Clerk, General Assembly, Church of Scotland: Scotland, Church of
- Donald MacLeod, Free Church College, UK: Scotland, Free Church; Westminster Catechisms and Confession
- Tomas S. Maddela, Saint Andrew's Seminary, Philippines: Episcopal Church in Philippines
- Inge Mager, Universität Hamburg, Germany: Germany; Mission in Germany; Theological Education in Germany; Women, Christian Practices in Germany
- Laurenti Magesa, Tangaza College, Kenya: African Religion: Christian Perspective; Ethics, African View; Inculturation, Eastern African View; Tanzania
- David G. Maillu, Kenyata University, Kenya: African Religion: African Religious Perspective
- Fortunato Mallimaci, Centro de Estudios e Investigaciones Laborales, Argentina: Argentina
- Philip Mamalakis, Holy Cross Orthodox Seminary, USA: Family, Orthodox View
- Kä Mana, Institut Supérieur de Pédagogie, Cameroon: Gospel and Culture, African View; Prosperity Theology, African View
- Ukachukwu Chris Manus, Obafemi Awolowo University, Nigeria: Bible Interpretation in Africa; Christologies in Africa; Health, Healing, African View
- Herbert Robinson Marbury, Vanderbilt University, USA: Ezra and Nehemiah
- Reuel Norman Marigza, Silliman University, Philippines: Philippines; United Church of Christ in the Philippines
- Jacqueline Mariña, Purdue University, USA: Kant; Schleiermacher
- Antti Marjanen, University of Helsinki, Finland: Judas, Gospel; Judas, Iscariot; Mary, Gospel; Mary, Magdalene; Pistis Sophia
- Luiz C. L. Marques, University of Bologna, Spain: Arns; Câmara
- Madipoane Masenya (ngwan'a Mphahlele), University of South Africa, South Africa: Feminist Theologies in Africa; Women's Practices in African Independent and Charismatic Churches
- Caleb J. D. Maskell, Yale Divinity School, USA: Civil War, USA; Congregationalism; Franklin; Great Awakening; Revival, Revivalism; Whitefield
- Steve Mason, York University, Canada: Hegesippus; Josephus
- Thomas Massaro, SJ, Weston Jesuit School of Theology, USA: Baltimore, Councils; Christian Socialism; Social Encyclicals
- Fernando Matamoros Ponce, Benemérita Universidad Autónoma de Puebla, Mexico: Popular Christian Practices in Mexico
- András Máté-Tóth, University of Szeged, Hungary: Hungary
- Odair Pedroso Mateus, Ecumenical Institute, Switzerland: Reformed Churches
- Dinis Matsolo, Secretary General, Christian Council of Mozambique: Mozambique
- Fumitaka Matsuoka, Pacific School of Theology, USA: Asian American Theology
- John D'Arcy May, University of Dublin, Ireland: Buddhism: Christian Perspective; Buddhist Scriptures

- Yelena Mazour-Matusevich, University of Alaska, USA: Gerson
- Theodore Mbazumutima, Carlile College, Kenya: Burundi
- John S. McClure, Vanderbilt University, USA: Reception Studies of Preaching
- Christian McConnell, Saint John's University, USA: Liturgies, History of Worship in Early Christianity
- Lee Martin McDonald, Acadia Divinity College, Canada: OT, Its Canonization
- Gary B. McGee, Assemblies of God Theological Seminary, USA: Seymour
- Thomas McGowan, Diocese of Oakland, USA: Cabrini
- Alister E. McGrath, University of Oxford, UK: Incarnation, Western View; Protestantism
- Richard J. McGregor, Vanderbilt University, USA: Myth
- John A. McGuckin, Columbia University, New York, USA: Cyril of Alexandria; Iconography; Monasticism in the Byzantine Empire; Spirituality, Orthodox View; Transfiguration
- Maud Burnett McInerney, Haverford College, USA: Joan of Arc; Virgin Martyrs
- Elsie Anne McKee, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Calvin
- Mary B. McKinley, University of Virginia, USA: Dentière
- James F. McMillan, University of Edinburgh, UK: France; Lourdes
- Ernan McMullin, University of Notre Dame, USA: Copernicus; Galilei, Galileo
- Kathleen E. McVey, Member of the Editorial Board; Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Bar Sauma; Bar Sauma of Nisibis; Church of the East or Assyrian Church; Ephesus, First Council of; History of Christianity in the Middle East; Jacob of Serug/Sarug; John of Ephesus; Melkites; Miaphysite; Monasticism, Russian; Monasticism, Syriac; Symeon; Synod of Jerusalem, 1672
- M. Douglas Meeks, Vanderbilt University, USA: Economic Ethics; Economic Studies; Methodist Churches; Methodist Worship; Poverty, Protestant View; Wealth
- Monica Jyotsna Melanchthon, Gurukul Lutheran Theological College, India: Grace, Asian View; Justification, Asian View; Women's Practices in Asia
- Ilie Melniciuc-Puica, University in Iasi, Romania: Moldova Republic
- Everett Mendoza, Silliman University, Philippines: Justice, Asian View
- Raymond A. Mentzer, University of Iowa, USA: Bartholomew's Day; Camisards; Du Plessis-Mornay; Durand, Marie; Huguenots
- William W. Menzies, Assemblies of God Theological Seminary, USA: Assemblies of God
- Ina Merdjanova, Sofia University, Bulgaria: Albania; Bosnia-Herzegovina; Bulgaria; History of Christianity in the Balkans; Islam in Southeast Europe; Slovenia; Yugoslavia
- Franziska Metzger, Universität Freiburg, Germany: Racism in Europe; Switzerland
- Constant J. Mews, Monash University, Australia: Abelard; Rupert of Deutz; Scholasticism
- Marvin Meyer, Chapman University, USA: Mithraism; Mystery Religions; Schweitzer

Carol Meyers, Duke University, USA: Exodus

Vasile Mihoc, Member of the Editorial Board; Facultatea de Teologie Andrei Saguna, Romania: Bible Interpretation in Eastern Orthodoxy; Romania; Romanian Orthodox Church; Theological Education in Eastern Europe

Gunner Bjerg Mikkelsen, Aarhus Universitet, Denmark: Mani, Manichaeism; Paulicians

Maria Inêz de Castro Millen, Centro de Ensino Superior de Juiz de Fora, Brasil: Women's Practices in Brazil

Clyde Lee Miller, Stony Brook University, USA: Nicholas of Cusa

Bonnie J. Miller-McLemore, Vanderbilt University, USA: Children; Family, Feminist View; Family for Western Churches

Alexander Mirkovic, McNeese State University, USA: Abgar

Paul Misner, Marquette University, USA: Christian Democratic Parties; Church and State in Europe: RC and Politics

Nozomu Miyahira, Seinan Gakuin University, Japan: Buraku Liberation; Japan; Kagawa; Kirishitans and Hidden Christians in Japan; Xavier

R. W. L. Moberly, University of Durham, UK: Abraham in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam

Gerald Moede, Winchester Academy, USA: Consultation on Church Union

Aloo Osotsi Mojola, United Bible Society, Kenya: Bible Translation in Africa

Sunanda Mongia, Mahatma Gandhi Kashi Vidyapeeth University, India: Indian Literature

Rebeca Montemayor, Centro de Estudios Ecuménicos, Mexico: Charismatics and Pentecostals in Mexico; Protestantism in Mexico; Women's Practices in Mexico

James Moore, Open University, UK: Creationism; Darwin; Evolution

Roger E. Moore, Vanderbilt University, USA: Blake; Milton

Craig E. Morrison O.Carm, Pontifical Biblical Institute, Italy: Bible, Early Translations; Bible, Manuscripts; Peshitta

Jeffrey H. Morrison, Regent University, USA: Washington, George; Witherspoon

Keith Morrison, Lincoln University, New Zealand: Kingdom of God and Wilderness, Orthodox View

Wilson J. Moses, Pennsylvania State University, USA: Crummell; Douglass; Garvey; Washington, Booker T.

Tefetso Henry Mothibe, National University of Lesotho: Lesotho

Mokgethi Motlhabi, University of South Africa, South Africa: Dwane; Huddleston; Hurley; Mahabane; Mokone; Naude; South Africa

Fulata Moyo, World Council of Churches; Coordinator, Circle of Concerned African Women Theologians, Malawi: Holy Spirit in Africa; Spirituality, in Africa

Henry Mugabe, Baptist Theological Seminary of Zimbabwe: Protestantism in Southern Africa

Jesse Ndwiga Kanyua Mugambi, Member of the Editorial Board; University of Nairobi, Kenya: Anglicanism in Eastern and Western Africa; Berlin Conference;

- Charismatic Movement in Southern Africa; Church, Ecclesiastical Structures; Culture and Christianity; Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians; Kenya; Krapf; Liberia; Racism in Africa; Rebmann; Reconstruction, African Theologies of; Theological Education in Africa
- Peggy Mulambya-Kabonde, United Church of Zambia: Water, African Perspective; Zambia
- Robert Bruce Mullin, General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church, USA: Anglican Church in North America; Bushnell; Denominationalism
- Pamela Mullins Reaves, University of North Carolina, USA: Perpetua and Felicitas
- Saskia Murk Jansen, Robinson College, UK: Beguine Spirituality; Hadewijch; Marie D'Oignies; Mechtild of Magdeburg
- Heleen L. Murre-Van den Berg, Leiden University, Netherlands: Islam in Lebanon; Jordan; Kazakhstan; Kyrgyzstan; Lebanon; Saudi Arabia; Turkey
- Augustine Musopole, Malawi Council of Churches: Church and State in Central Africa; Eschatology and Apocalypticism, African View; Kingdom of God, African View; Millennialism, African View
- Isaac M. T. Mwase, Tuskegee University, USA: Protestantism in Southern Africa
- Philomena Mwaura, Kenyatta University, Kenya: African Instituted Churches in Eastern Africa; Charismatic Movement in Eastern Africa; Family in African Instituted Churches; Spirituality in African Instituted Churches
- Cecilia Nahnfeldt, Karlstads Universit t, Sweden: Vocation
- Anne Nasimiyy Wasike, Kenyatta University, Kenya: Christology, African View; Polygamy
- Carma na Navia Velasco, Universidad del Valle, Colombia: Latin American Literature (Spanish)
- Thulani Ndlazi, Church Land Program, South Africa: Land, African View
- Alexander Negrov, St. Petersburg Christian University, Russia: Protestantism in Russia
- James B. Nelson, United Theological Seminary of the Twin Cities, USA: Alcoholics Anonymous
- David G. Newcombe, University of Cambridge, UK: Hooper
- Carol Newsom, Emory University, USA: Job
- Helen J. Nicholson, Cardiff University, UK: Crusades; Hospitallers; Military Orders; Teutonic Knights
- George W. E. Nickelsburg, University of Iowa, USA: Enoch; Essenes; Judaism, NT, and Early Christianity; Pharisees; Qumran; Sadducees
- Tatyana Nikolskaya, St. Petersburg Christian University, Russia: Protestantism in Russia
- Damayanthi M. A. Niles, Eden Theological Seminary, USA: Contextualization; Niles, D.T.; Thomas, M. M.
- Bertil Nilsson, Uppsala Universit t, Sweden: Ansgar
- Nyambura Njoroge, World Council of Churches: Sexuality, African View; Women's Ordination in Africa

- Fidelis Nkomazana, University of Botswana: Botswana
- Mary Beth Norton, Cornell University, USA: Witchcraft Trials in North America
- Christian Nottmeier, Evangelisches Institut für Kirchenrecht, Universität Potsdam, Germany: Harnack
- Sonene Nyawo, Akrofi-Christaller Memorial Center, Swaziland: Swaziland
- Anthère Nzabatsinda, Vanderbilt University, USA: African Literature (Francophone)
- Edward T. Oakes, SJ, University of St. Mary of the Lake, USA: von Balthasar
- Gerald O'Collins, SJ, Pontifical Gregorian University, Italy: Biblical Theology; Redemption; Roman Catholic Church; Tradition, Post-Vatican II RC Perspective; Vatican Council II
- Daniel O'Connell, University of South Carolina, USA: Mind
- David W. Odell-Scott, Kent State University, USA: Metaphysics; Ockham
- Mercy Amba Oduyoye, Institute of Women, Religion and Culture, Ghana: Theology as Human Undertaking: African Women Theologians Doing Theology
- Kathleen O'Grady, Concordia University, Canada: Death, Western Feminist View
- Oyeronke Olajubu, University of Ilorin, Nigeria: Church and State in Western Africa
- Thomas O'Loughlin, University of Wales Lampeter, UK: Celtic Christianity
- Dennis T. Olson, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Numbers
- J. Steven O'Malley, Asbury Theological Seminary, USA: Bengel; Blumhardt; Francke; Holiness Movement; Labadists; Pietism; Spener
- Cephas N. Omenyo, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Charismatics in Western Africa; Protestantism in Western Africa
- Muriel Oreillo-Montenegro, Silliman University, Philippines: Christologies, Asian Women's Views
- César Augusto Ornellas Ramos, Uni LaSalle, Institutos Superiores de Ensigno Rio de Janeiro, Brasil: RC in Brazil
- Agbonkhanmeghe E. Orobator, SJ, Hekima College, Jesuit School of Theology, Nairobi, Kenya: RC in Western Africa
- Kenan B. Osborne, OFM, Franciscan School of Theology, Graduate Theological Union, USA: Deacon, Diaconate
- Carolyn Osiek, Brite Divinity School, USA: Acts of Martyrs; Basilina; Deaconess; Flavia Vitalia; Hermas, Shepherd of; Justina; Lampadion; Leta; Marthana; Olympias; Philemon; Phoebe; Sabiniana; Sophia, Second Phoebe
- Javier Otaola Montagne, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México: Educational Practices in Mexico; Eschatology and Apocalypticism in Mexico
- Douglas F. Ottati, Union Theological Seminary and Presbyterian School of Christian Education, USA: Niebuhr, H. Richard
- Anna May Say Pa, Director, Association for Theological Education in South East Asia; Myanmar Institute of Christian Theology: Myanmar (Burma)
- Irina Paert, University of Wales, Bangor, UK: Eschatology and Apocalypticism, Orthodox European View; Old Believers

- Jerry G. Pankhurst, Wittenberg University, USA: Belarus; Bulgaria
- Aristotle Papanikolaou, Fordham University, USA: Apophaticism; Grace, Orthodox View; Incarnation, Orthodox View; Lossky; Trinity, Orthodox View
- Samuele F. Pardini, Vanderbilt University, USA: Italian Literature
- Stefano Parenti, Pontificio Ateneo S. Anselmo, Italy: Chrysostom, Liturgy; James, Liturgy; Mark, Liturgy; Sacramental Theology, Orthodox View; Sacraments, Orthodox View
- Peter Paris, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Poverty, African American View
- Sung Bae Park, Stony Brook University, USA: Buddhism: Buddhist Perspective
- Cristián G. Parker, Universidad de Santiago de Chile: Charismatics in Chile; Chile; Church and State in Chile; RC in Chile; Syncretism
- Raquel Pastor, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México: Human Rights in Mexico; Lay Catholics in Mexico
- Joseph Pathrapankal, CMI, Dharmaram Vidya Kshetrom, India: Malabar Christians
- Daniel Patte, General Editor; Vanderbilt University, USA: Anger of God; Atonement; Authority; Beatitudes; Calendars; Catholicity; Christian; Conversion; Conviction; Discipleship; Dogma; Doubt; Easter; Eighteen Benedictions; Election; Esdras; Ethics; Faith; Fall; Grace, Western; Heresy; House Churches; Imitation of Christ; Immortality; James; John; John the Baptist; Jubilee, Year of; Judaizers; Kenosis; Kingdom of God in NT; Maccabees; Manassas; Mercy; Messiah; Moses; Mystery; Neighbor; New Covenant; Parable; Paul; Peter, Apocalypse of; Pilate, Acts of; Reception Studies of Scripture; Reductions; Romans; Salvation; Sanhedrin; Scriptural Criticism; Scripture; Semiotics; Sermon on the Mount; Servant or Slave; Son of God in NT; Son of Man; Synoptic Gospels; Temple; Twelve Apostles; Universalism
- W. Brown Patterson, University of the South, USA: James I of England
- Clive Pearson, United Theological College, USA: Christologies in South Pacific
- Keith F. Pecklers, SJ, Pontifical Gregorian University, Italy: All Saints' Day; Compline; Culture and Worship; Divine Office; Eucharist Congresses; Eucharist Fast; Eucharistic Prayer; Eucharist in the West; Lauds; Liturgical Movement; Liturgy of the Hours; Mass, RC; Nuptial Mass; Requiem Mass; Vespers; Votive Mass
- Nancy Cardoso Pereira, Director, Comissão Pastoral da Terra, Brasil: Land, Latin American View; Water
- David Horace Perkins, Vanderbilt University, USA: Praise and Worship
- PHEME PERKINS, Boston College, USA: Ephesians; Jude; Peter
- Edward N. Peters, Sacred Heart Major Seminary, USA: Codex Iuris Canonici; Excommunication; Latin, Ecclesiastical; Marriage Annulment in RC; Seal of Confession
- Rebecca Todd Peters, Elon University, USA: Abortion; Birth Control; Pregnancy
- Bishop Yeznik Petrossian, Holy See of Etchmiadzin, Armenia: Armenian Apostolic Church; Eucharist, Oriental Orthodox View; Oriental Orthodox Churches
- Raymond Pfister, European Institute for Conciliation and Reconciliation Studies, Birmingham, UK: Gypsies, Charismatic

- Peter C. Phan, Georgetown University, USA: Anthropology, Asian View; Christologies, Asian View; Dialogue, Interfaith; Incarnation, Asian View; Inculturation; Inculturation in Asia; Kingdom of God, Asian View; Mission, Western and Asian Views; Mission in Asia; Rahner; Vietnam
- Isabel Apawo Phiri, Member of the Editorial Board; University of KwaZulu-Natal, South Africa: Circle of Concerned African Women Theologians; Education in Africa; Family, Southern African View; Health, Healing, African View: Dealing with AIDS; Inculturation, Central and Southern African Views; Malawi
- William S. F. Pickering, British Centre for Durkheimian Studies, UK: Durkheim; Theodicy
- Derrick G. Pitard, Slippery Rock University, USA: Lollardy
- William Elvis Plata, Universidad de San Buenaventura Bogotá, Colombia: Acosta de Samper; RC in Colombia
- Zlatko Plese, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, USA: Hermetic Writings
- John Plummer, Vanderbilt University, USA: Chaucer; Donne; English Literature
- James Newton Poling, Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary, USA: Abuse; Violence
- Ronald Popivchak, St. Peter and Paul Ukrainian Catholic Church, USA: Dositheos; Mohila
- Andrew Porter, King's College London, UK: Mission and Imperialism
- Ute Possekkel, Center for Theological Inquiry, Princeton USA: Bardaisan of Edessa; Edessa; Ephrem the Syrian; Eusebius of Emesa; Jacob of Edessa; Nisibis
- James M. Powell, Syracuse University, USA: Averroes; Gennadios II; Innocent III; Louis IX; Urban II
- Enos Das Pradhan, General Secretary of the Church of North India: North India, Church of
- Devadasan Premnath, St. Bernard's School of Theology, USA: Amos; Micah
- Jaime Adrián Prieto Valladares, Universidad Bíblica Latinoamericana, Costa Rica: Costa Rica; Protestantism in Central America
- Anne Primavesi, Centre for the Interdisciplinary Study of Religion, Birkbeck College, UK: Ecofeminist Theology
- Randall Prior, Ormond College, Australia: Holy Spirit, South Pacific View; Liberation Theologies, South Pacific
- María Alicia Puente Lutteroth, Universidad Autónoma del Estado de Morelos, Mexico: Asbaje y Ramírez; Church and State in Mexico; Garcés; Gómez Morín; Hidalgo y Costilla; Jesús, Felipe de; Llaguno Farías; Martínez; Mary, Virgin of Guadalupe; Méndez Arceo; Méndez Medina; Mexico; Miranda y Gómez; Palafox y Mendoza
- Eduardo Guzmão Quadros, Universidade Estadual de Goiás, Brasil: Protestantism in Brazil
- Albert Rabil, Jr., University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, USA: Erasmus; Humanism; Renaissance

- Laurent William Ramambason, Fiangonan'i Jesoa Kristy eto Madagasikara Ambatonakanga Faculty of Theology, Madagascar: Anthropology, African View
- Apolonio M. Ranche, St. Andrew's Theological Seminary, Philippines: Philippine Independent Church
- Vololona Randriamanantena Andriamitandrina, Église de Jésus-Christ, Madagascar: Madagascar
- Lawrence R. Rast, Jr., Concordia Theological Seminary, USA: Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod
- Paul L. Redditt, Georgetown College, USA: Habakkuk; Zephaniah
- Adele Reinhartz, University of Ottawa, Canada: Jesus, Images of, in Movies; John, Gospel
- Rolf Rendtorff, University of Heidelberg, Germany: Leviticus
- Pål Repstad, Agder University College, Norway: Norway
- James N. Rhodes, Saint Michael's College, USA: Barnabas
- John K. Riches, University of Glasgow, UK: Bible Interpretation, History of; Bible Interpretation in Western Europe
- Joerg Rieger, Southern Methodist University, USA: Decolonizing Theology; Postmodernism and Liberation Theologies
- Sharon H. Ringe, Wesley Theological Seminary, USA: Inclusive Language
- Sandra Rios, Florida International University: Protestantism in Colombia
- Tyler Roberts, Grinnell College, USA: Nietzsche
- David M. Robinson, Oregon State University, USA: Emerson; Transcendentalism
- James M. Robinson, Claremont Graduate University, USA: Q, Sayings Ascribed to Jesus
- Joanne Maguire Robinson, University of North Carolina at Charlotte, USA: Porete
- Richard A. H. Robinson, University of Birmingham, UK: Fátima; Father (Title); Portugal; RC in Portugal
- Roy R. Robson, University of the Sciences in Philadelphia, USA: Avvakum; Boris and Gleb; Men, Alexander; Nikon; Russia; Sergius of Radonezh; Sorsky; Tikhon
- Jack B. Rogers, Moderator, General Assembly, Presbyterian Church (USA): Presbyterian Churches
- Maria Roginska, Polish Academy of Sciences, Poland: Brest-Litovsk, Union of
- Sidney Rooy, Universidad Bíblica Latinoamericana, Costa Rica: El Salvador; Honduras; Nicaragua; Panama; Protestantism in Latin America
- Rev. Garnett Roper, Sunday Herald, Jamaica: Racism in Caribbean
- Maria José Fontelas Rosado-Nunes, Pontifícia Universidade Católica de São Paulo, Brasil: Sexuality in Latin America
- Andrew C. Ross, University of Edinburgh, UK: Livingston; Missions and Race
- Stefan Rossbach, University of Kent, UK: Cold War
- François Rossier, International Marian Research Institute, USA: Côte D'Ivoire
- John D. Roth, Goshen College, USA: Mennonites; Mennonite Worship

- John K. Roth, Claremont McKenna College, USA: Holocaust, Jewish; Judaism, Christian Views; Judaism and Christianity in North America
- Phillip Rothwell, Rutgers University, USA: African Literature (Lusophone)
- Richard E. Rubenstein, George Mason University, USA: Aristotle
- Rosemary Radford Ruether, Pacific School of Religion, USA: Anti-Semitism; Patriarchy; Woman, Theological Views About
- Markku Ruotsila, University of Tampere, Finland: Catholic Apostolic Church
- John E. Rybolt, CM, DePaul University, USA: De Marillac; Paul, Vincent de
- Risto Saarinen, University of Helsinki, Finland: Porvoo Declaration
- John Saillant, Western Michigan University, USA: African American Literature; Haynes
- Juan Sanchez, Florida International University, USA: Contemplation; Feminist Theology in Latin America; History of Christianity in Latin America
- Wagner Lopes Sanchez, São Luís College, Brasil: RC in Brazil
- Hugo N. Santos, Instituto Universitario, Argentina: Family, Latin American View
- Gerhard Sauter, Universität Bonn, Germany: Revelation
- Gloria L. Schaab, Fordham University, USA: God, Feminist View; Incarnation, Feminist View; Mary; Saints, Devotion to, in RC
- Sandra M. Schneiders, IHM, Jesuit School of Theology, USA: Religious Life
- Quentin J. Schultze, Calvin College, USA: Media; Media and Worship; Televangelism
- Fernando F. Segovia, Vanderbilt University, USA: Biblical Interpretation, Latino/a
- Turid Karlsen Seim, University of Oslo, Norway: Luke
- Carsten Selch Jensen, University of Copenhagen, Denmark: Tausen
- Alan P. F. Sell, Union Theological Seminary, Wales, UK: Locke
- Frank C. Senn, Immanuel Lutheran Church, Evanston, USA: Communion; Lutheran Worship
- Kent Davis Sensenig, Fuller Theological Seminary, USA: Pacifism
- Damían Setton, Centro de Estudios e Investigaciones Laborales, Argentina: Paraguay; Protestantism in Argentina; RC in Argentina
- Bal Krishna Sharma, Nepal Theological College Kathmandu: Nepal
- Carolyn J. Sharp, Yale Divinity School, USA: Jeremiah
- Thomas Sheehan, Stanford University, USA: Heidegger
- N. Gerald Shenk, Eastern Mennonite University, USA: Reconciliation
- Christian Sheppard, University of Chicago, USA: Symbolism
- Charles Sherlock, University of Melbourne, Australia: God, Australian View; Gospel and Culture, Australian View; Justification, Australian View
- Tabona Shoko, University of Zimbabwe: African Instituted Churches in Southern Africa; Church, African Instituted Churches' View
- Walter B. Shurden, Mercer University, USA: Baptism, Protestant View
- Marguerite Shuster, Fuller Theological Seminary, USA: Sin

- B. Mark Sietsema, Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America, USA: Patristic Thought, Orthodox View; Phyletism; Presanctified Liturgy
- Batara Sihombing, Abdi Sabda Theological Seminary, Indonesia: Batak Churches
- Neil Silberman, Ename Center for Public Archaeology, Belgium: David; Solomon
- Clodomiro Siller, Centro Nacional de Ayuda a Misiones Indígenas, Mexico: Missions, RC, in Mexico
- Samuel Silva-Gotay, University of Puerto Rico: Puerto Rico
- Heikki Silvet, Tartu Teoloogia Akadeemia Üliõpilaskond, Estonia: Estonia
- John K. Simmons, Western Illinois University, USA: Christian Science
- Hagith Sivan, University of Kansas, USA: Ten Commandments
- James C. Skedros, Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology, USA: Athos, Mount; Greece; Hesychasm; Macedonia; Macedonia, the Republic of; Orthodox Church in Greece
- Abraham Smith, Perkins School of Theology, USA: Thessalonians, 1 and 2
- Ashley A. Smith, United Theological College, University of the West Indies, Jamaica: Charismatics in Jamaica
- Ted A. Smith, Vanderbilt University, USA: Blackwell, Antoinette Brown; Finney
- Daud Soesilo, United Bible Society, Timor Leste: Timor Leste
- Pia Søltoft, Søren Kierkegaard Research Centre, Denmark: Kierkegaard
- Choan-Seng (C. S.) Song, Pacific School of Religion, USA: Spirituality, Asian View
- Kathryn Spink, Authorized Biographer, UK: Taizé Community; Teresa of Calcutta
- Bryan Spinks, Yale University, USA: Hooker
- Eric O. Springsted, President of the Simone Weil Society, USA: Rationalism; Weil
- Nicolas Standaert, University of Leuven, Belgium: Ricci
- Brian Stanley, University of Edinburgh, UK: Baptist Missionary Society; Missions and Anti-slavery
- Glen H. Stassen, Fuller Theological Seminary, USA: Militarism; Pacifism
- Karel Steenbrink, Utrecht University, Netherlands: Indonesia; Islam; Islam in Indonesia; Qur'an
- Stephen J. Stein, Indiana University, USA: Apocalypticism; Shaker
- Andrea Sterk, University of Florida, USA: Diodore; John Chrysostom
- Gregory E. Sterling, University of Notre Dame, USA: Philo
- Columba Stewart, OSB, St. John's Abbey, Minnesota, USA: Benedictine Order; Cenobitic Monasticism; Eremitic Monasticism; Monastic Vow; Monasticism in the West
- Jacques Stewart, President, Fédération Protestante de France; President, Cimade: Barot; Cimade; Protestantism in France; Refugees
- Robert B. Stewart, New Orleans Baptist Theological Seminary, USA: Resurrection of Jesus
- Cynthia Stokes Brown, Dominican University of California, USA: Clark, Septima Poinsette
- Ken Stone, Chicago Theological Seminary, USA: Bible Interpretation, Queer

- Anne Stott, Open University, UK: More, Hannah; Women's Practices in the UK
- Elizabeth Stuart, University of Winchester, UK: Gay and Lesbian Theologies
- Monya Stubbs, Austin Presbyterian Theological Seminary, USA: Indebtedness, Sense of; Lee, Jarena; Truth, Sojourner; Tubman
- Marjorie Hewitt Suchocki, Claremont School of Theology, USA: Evil; Pluralism
- David Kwang-sun Suh, Ewha Womans University, Seoul, Korea: Korea, North
- Scott W. Sunquist, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, USA: Ancestor Veneration, History
- Keith Suter, Wesley Mission, Sydney, Australia: Justice, South Pacific View; Poverty, South Pacific View
- Douglas Sweeney, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, USA: Evangelicals; Evangelicals in North America; New Haven Theology
- Charles H. Talbert, Baylor University, USA: Acts of the Apostles
- Shawqi N. Talia, Catholic University of America, USA: Addai and Mari, Liturgy; Chaldean Catholic Church; Iran; Iraq
- Elsa Tamez, Universidad Bíblica Latinoamericana, Costa Rica: Grace, Latin American View; James; Justification, Latin American View; Liberation and Theology; Oppression; Pastoral Epistles; Romero
- Joseph B. Tamney, Ball State University, USA: Conservatism, Sociological Perspective
- Jonathan Y. Tan, Xavier University, USA: Chinese Rites Controversy; Confucianism
- Yak-Hwee Tan, Trinity Theological College, Singapore: Singapore
- Kathryn Tanner, University of Chicago, USA: Creation; Culture and Theology
- Feiya Tao, Shanghai University, China: Millennialism in China; Popular Christianity in China
- Elizabeth S. Tapia, Union Theological Seminary, Philippines; Drew University, USA: Health, Healing, Asian View
- Aquiline Tarimo, Salvatorian Institute, Morogoro, Tanzania: Poverty, African View
- Claire Taylor, University of Nottingham, UK: Bogomilism; Cathars
- Mark Lewis Taylor, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Civil Disobedience; Colonialism and Imperialism; Death Penalty; Ethos; Postcolonialism; Racism and North American White Churches
- Bishop Abba Samuel Wolde Tekestebirhan, Assistant to the Patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church, Addis Ababa, Ethiopia: Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church
- Eugene TeSelle, Member of the Editorial Board; Vanderbilt University, USA: Africa, Roman; Alexandria; Anger of God; Anointing; Anthropomorphisms; Apollinaris; Arianism; Atonement; Augustine; Basil of Caesarea; Basil, Rule of; Berlin Conference; Boethius; Canonization of the NT; Cappadocians; Carolingian Renaissance; Catechesis; Celibacy; Chalcedon, Council of; Christology: History in the West; Church and State; Church Discipline; City; Civil Religion; Clerical Garb; Conciliarism; Conscientious Objection;

Constance, Council; Constantine; Creeds; Dance; Donatism; Dualism; Easter; Election; Ephesus, Councils; Faith; Fall; Filioque; Florence, Council; Free Will; Freedom; Gallicanism; God, Names for; Grace, Western View; Great Schism; Gregory VII; Gregory Nazianzen; Gregory of Nyssa; Heidelberg Catechism; Heresy; Holy Roman Empire; House Churches; Human Rights; Iconoclasm; Ignatius of Antioch; Image of God; Immortality; Indulgence; Infallibility; Inquisition; Irenaeus; Irene; Joachim of Fiore; Julian the Apostate; Justin Martyr; Justinian/Justinian, Code of; Kenosis; Kingdom of God, Western View; Kingdom/Reign of Christ; Lay Piety Movement; Lamennais; Langton; Loisy; Macrina; Marcion; Marsilius; Martyrdom; Maximus the Confessor; Mercersburg Theology; Methodius of Olympus; Miracles; Monothelitism; Nantes, Edict of; Natural Law; Nestorius; Nicaea, Council; Omnipotence; Omnipresence; Omniscience; Ontological Argument; Ontology; Origen; Original Sin; Patristics; Paul of Samosata; Pelagius; Penance; Persecutions; Person; Philosophy; Pilgrim; Polity; Positive Theology, Positive Law, Positivism; Presence of Christ; Priscillianism; Property; Protestantism in Germany; Reason; Relics; Sanctification; Singing in Worship; Temple; Theodicy; Tertullian; Time; Trinity, Western View; Truth; Universalism; Universals; Universities; Vernacular; Word of God; World

M. Thomas Thangaraj, Emory University, USA: Holy Spirit, Asian View; Popular Christianity in Asia

David R. Thomas, University of Birmingham, UK: Islam in the Middle East

Andrew Thornley, Pacific History Association, Australia: Fiji

Scott Thumma, Hartford Seminary, USA: Internet Technology; Megachurches

Marcelo Timotheo da Costa, Faculdade São Bento do Rio de Janeiro, Brasil: Brazil; Human Rights in Brazil; Leme; Lima

George E. “Tink” Tinker, Iliff School of Theology, USA: Liberation Theology: A Native American Critical Perspective; Missionary Conquest in North America; Native American Traditions

Ola Tjørhom, University of Agder, Kristiansand, Norway: Apostolicity and Apostolic Succession

Karen Jo Torjesen, Claremont Graduate University, USA: Women’s Ordination

Iain R. Torrance, Princeton Theological Seminary, USA: Severus, of Antioch

Fernando Torres-Londoño, Pontifícia Universidade Católica de São Paulo, Brasil: Missions, Catholic, in Brazil; RC in Brazil

Archbishop Demetrios [Trakatellis], Greek Orthodox Church of America, USA: Anthropology, Eastern Orthodox View; Divine Liturgy; Eastern Orthodox Churches; Greek Orthodox Church

Marit Trelstad, Pacific Lutheran University, USA: Christologies, Feminist and Womanist Views

Christine Trevett, Cardiff University, Wales: Montanism; Fell

Phyllis Tribble, Wake Forest University, USA: Hagar; Isaac; Ishmael; Sarah

Johannes Tromp, Leiden University, Netherlands: Abraham, Testament of; Assumption of Moses; Baruch, Syriac Apocalypse of; Fourth Ezra; Isaiah,

- Ascension of; Jubilees, Book of; Life of Adam and Eve; Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament; Pseudo-Philo; Sibylline Oracles; Solomon, Odes of; Solomon, Psalms of; Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs
- Paul Turner, North American Academy of Liturgy, USA: Confirmation
- Robert G. Tuttle, Jr., Asbury Theological Seminary, Orlando, USA: Evangelism/Evangelization
- Archbishop Desmond Tutu, Cape Town; Anglican Church of Southern Africa: Reconciliation as a Christian Praxis
- Peter Tyler, Sarum College, UK: Carmelites; Cloud of Unknowing; Luis of Granada; Molinos; Spirituality, RC Mystical
- Anders Tyrberg, Karlstads Universitet, Sweden: Scandinavian Literature
- Justin Ukpogon, Veritas University Abuja, Nigeria: African Religion: Cultural Interactions; Nigeria
- Javier Ulloa, Seminario Bautista de México, Mexico: Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Mexico
- Camillus Umoh, Catholic Institute of West Africa, Nigeria: Ekandem
- Kristi Upson-Saia, Occidental College, USA: Eustochium; Paula
- Martina Urban, Vanderbilt University, USA: Buber
- Monica Uribe, Universidad Iberoamericana, Mexico: Anglicanism in Mexico; Church and State in Mexico; Orthodox Churches in Mexico; Religious Orders in Mexico
- Elochukwu Eugene Uzukwu, CSSp., Milltown Institute, Ireland: Congo-Brazzaville; Exorcism; Health, Healing, African View; Inculturation, Western African View
- Richard Vaggione, Holy Cross Priory, Canada: Arianism; Arius; Eunomius
- Gabriel Vahanian, University of Strasbourg, France: Atheism; Death of God; God, Western Views; Iconoclasm; Technology; Tillich
- Paul Valliere, Butler University, USA; Berdyaev; Bulgakov; Soloviev
- T. J. Van Bavel, OSA, Augustijns Historisch Instituut, Belgium: Augustinian Hermits or Friars; Augustinian Rule; Religious Orders, History
- Steven Vanderputten, Ghent University, Belgium: Charlemagne
- Peter Van der Veer, Utrecht University, The Netherlands: Nationalism
- Huib Van de Sandt, Tilburg Theological Faculty, The Netherlands: Didache
- Louis Van Tongeren, Tilburg Theological Faculty, The Netherlands: Liturgical Year
- Luke A. Veronis, St. Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary, USA: Culture and Christianity, Orthodox View; Mission, Orthodox View
- Noel Villalba, United Church of Christ, Davao City, Philippines: Human Rights, The Philippines
- Ramón Vinke, Rector, Universidad Simón Bolívar; Secretary for Ecumenism, Archdiocese of Caracas, Venezuela: Venezuela
- Tim Vivian, California State University, Bakersfield, USA: Syncretica
- David Voas, Institute for Social Change, University of Manchester, UK: Jehovah's Witnesses; Russell

- Elena Volkova, Moscow State University, Russia: Dostoevsky; Holy Fool; Russian Literature; Tolstoy
- Katharina von Kellenbach, St. Mary's College of Maryland, USA: Family under Genocide and Wars; Forgiveness
- Elina Vuola, University of Helsinki, Finland: Folk Churches in Nordic Countries
- Timothy Wadkins, Canisius College, USA: Megachurches in El Salvador
- Elaine M. Wainwright, University of Auckland, New Zealand: Feminist Theology in South Pacific; Matthew; Women's Practices in Australia
- Randi Jones Walker, Pacific School of Religion, USA: United Church of Christ
- Dewey D. Wallace, Jr., George Washington University, USA: Marprelate Tracts; Perkins; Puritans
- Jerry Walls, Asbury Seminary, USA: Lewis, C. S.
- Michael J. Walsh, Heythrop College, UK: Benedict XV; Boniface VII; John XXIII; John Paul II; Leo I; Leo XIII; Opus Dei; Paul VI; Pius IX; Pius X; Pius XI; Pius XII; Popes, RC; Siricius
- Philip Walters, Keston Institute, UK; Editor "Religion, State & Society": History of Christianity in Eastern Europe; Latvia; Lithuania
- Janet Walton, Union Theological Seminary, New York: Hymn; Music in/as Worship; Women's Practices in USA
- Jonathan L. Walton, University of California, Riverside, USA: Prosperity and Economic Empowerment Gospel, African American Churches
- Wang Xiaochao, Tsing Hua University, Beijing, China: Church and State in China
- Patricia A. Ward, Vanderbilt University, USA: Bossuet; Chateaubriand; Fénelon; French Literature; Guyon; Marguerite of Navarre; Maritain; Prayer of the Heart; Quietism
- David Harrington Watt, Temple University, USA: Fosdick; Machen; Scopes Trial
- Herold D. Weiss, Saint Mary's College, USA: Death, Latin American View
- Laurence L. Welborn, Fordham University, USA: Corinthians, 1 and 2; History, Concepts of; Inculturation in the Greco-Roman World
- Sharon D. Welch, Meadville Lombard Theological School, USA: Ethic of Risk and Womanist Ethics
- Timothy Wengert, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, USA: Melancthon
- Traci C. West, Drew School of Theology, USA: Androcentrism; Sexism
- Merold Westphal, Fordham University, USA: Levinas
- David Wetherell, Deakin University, Australia: Papua New Guinea
- Barbara Wheeler, Auburn Theological Seminary, USA: Theological Education, Concepts of; Theological Education in North America
- Caroline White, University of Oxford, UK: Friendship; Jerome; Martin of Tours; Paulinus
- Jean-Paul Wiest, Hong Kong University, China: RC in China
- Frans Wijzen, Radboud University Nijmegen, The Netherlands: Luxembourg; Netherlands

- Terry L. Wilder, Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, USA: Apostle; Pseudonymity; Wisdom of Solomon
- Felix Wilfred, University of Madras, India: Church, Asian View; Gospel and Culture, Asian View; India; Indian Christian Theologies; Theological Education in Asia
- Rebecca Wilkin, Indiana University, USA: Descartes
- Daniel H. Williams, Baylor University, USA: Ambrose; Tradition in NT and Early Church; Tradition and Reformation's Scripture Principle
- D. Newell Williams, Brite Divinity School, USA: Campbell; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Restoration Movement; Stone
- Michael A. Williams, University of Washington, USA: Gnosticism; John, Apocryphon of; Nag Hammadi
- Vincent L. Wimbush, Claremont Graduate University, USA: African Americans and the Bible
- Gabriele Winkler, Universität Tübingen, Germany: Basil, Liturgy
- Anders Winroth, Yale University, USA: Canon Law; Gratian
- Lauri Emílio Wirth, Universidade Metodista de São Paulo, Brasil: Protestantism in Brazil
- James A. Wiseman, OSB, The Catholic University of America, USA: Mysticism; Ruusbroec
- Ebba Witt-Brattström, Södertörns högskola, Sweden: Birgitta
- Teofil Wojciechowski, Jagiellonian University in Krakow, Poland: Poland
- John Wolffe, The Open University, UK: Evangelicals in UK; RC in UK; United Kingdom
- Kenman L. Wong, Seattle Pacific University, USA: Business Ethics
- Wong Wai Ching (Angela), Chinese University of Hong Kong, China: Cultural Studies; History of Christianity in Asia
- Linda Woodhead, Lancaster University, UK: Sociological Studies
- Wendy M. Wright, Creighton University, USA: Discipline (RC); Francis de Sales; Jane Frances de Chantal; Spirituality, RC View
- Rose Wu, Hong Kong Christian Institute, China: Sexuality, Asian View
- Keith E. Yandell, University of Wisconsin-Madison, USA: Hume; Natural Theology; Spinoza
- Gale A. Yee, Episcopal Divinity School, USA: Judges; Ruth
- Viktor Yelensky, National Academy of Sciences of Ukraine: Ukraine
- Yeo Khiok-Khng, Garrett Theological Seminary, USA; Peking University, China: Confucian Classics and the Bible; Culture and Biblical Studies
- Gustav K. K. Yeung, Chinese University of Hong Kong, China: Education in Asia
- Angela Yiu, Sophia University, Tokyo, Japan: Japanese Literature
- Amos Yong, Regent University, USA: Charismatic Movement in Asia
- Yong Ting Jin, Coordinator of Asian Women's Resource Centre, Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia: Asian Women's Resource Centre

You Bin, Central University of Nationalities in Beijing, China: Chinese Ethnic Minorities

Youhanna Nessim Youssef, Australian Catholic University, Australia: Egypt; Coptic Orthodox Church

Eliana Yunes, Pontifícia Universidade Católica do Rio de Janeiro, Brasil: Brazilian Literature

Robert Michael Zaller, Drexel University, USA: Cromwell

Valarie H. Ziegler, DePauw University, USA: Howe

Barbara Brown Zikmund, Doshisha University, Japan; Wesley Theological Seminary, USA: Women's Ordination in North America

Joyce Ann Zimmerman, CppS, Institute for Liturgical Ministry, USA: Blessing of Children; Blood; Bread as Symbol; Marriage, in Western Churches; Wine

Aurora Zlotnik, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México: Popular Christian Practices in Mexico

Zhuo Xinping, Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, China: China

PREFACE

What is Christianity? This is the question that The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity addresses. But do not look for the answer in an article entitled “Christianity.” It is provided by the entire Dictionary in its more than 3,500 articles and entries.

Why is it necessary to devote an entire dictionary to this question? It is a matter not only of academic integrity, but also of ecumenical openness and sensitivity and of ethical accountability.

Academic integrity requires us to acknowledge that Christianity cannot be reduced to a set of correct beliefs, an orthodoxy*,¹ or a set of correct practices, an orthopraxy*. Indeed, churches often define themselves in this way, but in the process they exclude as heterodox or heretical* many believers who think of themselves as followers of Jesus Christ and thus as Christians. But an academic study of Christianity cannot exclude them. We must consider as Christians not only Roman Catholics (c1 billion in 2000) but also Protestants (c340 million), Eastern and Oriental Orthodox (c215 million), and Anglicans (c80 million), all of whom are in some ways heterodox, heretic, or schismatic from a Roman Catholic perspective. Furthermore, there is no reason to exclude the fastest-growing group, “independent Christians” (c385 million in 2000, projected to be c581 million by 2025), many of whom are Charismatic* and are found in the Two-thirds World. In addition, so-called marginal Christians (c26 million) must also be included.

As these approximate statistics (from The World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001)² dramatize, an academic study, in contrast to a confessional study, must begin with the broadest definition of Christianity: a Christian is anyone who claims to be a follower of Jesus Christ. In order to be academically responsible, a study of Christianity must account for the fact that, throughout its history, this religious movement has been highly diversified and remains so today.

The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity includes articles on all sizable Christian churches, denominations, and movements. But in order to serve as an authoritative reference guide that enables its users to reflect critically on all aspects of Christianity, it does not adopt a specific confessional perspective. No Christian tradition, however well established, should be viewed as a benchmark to determine what is or is not truly Christian.

¹ An asterisk (*) here and in the main body of the Dictionary indicates that a term so marked (or a related form thereof) refers to an entry in the Dictionary. In the case of a compound term or phrase, the asterisk specifies which of the terms is alphabetized.

² David B. Barrett, George T. Kurian, and Todd M. Johnson, The World Christian Encyclopedia: A Comparative Survey of Churches and Religions in the Modern World, Vol. 1: The World by Countries: Religionists, Churches, Ministries, 2d ed. (New York: Oxford University Press, 2001). Much of the statistical information in the Dictionary is taken from this encyclopedia. Following the advice of George T. Kurian, we urged the contributors of articles on Christianity in given nations to keep in mind that these statistics are often extrapolated from earlier data, and thus to check the statistics of The World Christian Encyclopedia against other sources, such as a recent census, when available.

This means, for example, that the Dictionary avoids the use of the qualifier “saint*” to designate any Christian believer as an “exemplary Christian.” A “saint” beatified in one church may have been a persecutor of “heretics,” members of another church who, in turn, view this beatified person as a “heretic”! Yet the term “saint” is so common in several traditions that it is impossible to eliminate its use completely. Thus two exceptions are made: first, the Dictionary keeps the appellation “saint” when it is part of the name of an institution, e.g. St. Andrew’s Theological Seminary, or of a document, e.g. Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom; second, the appellation is maintained when the presentation of a topic requires it and makes clear that the person being referred to is a “saint” from the perspective of a particular church. Similarly, the Dictionary minimizes the use of the qualifier “heretic*,” except when it is clear who considers a given person or group heretical; obviously the members of a church, e.g. the Waldenses*, do not think of themselves as heretics, even if they are seen as such by another church, e.g. the Roman Catholic Church – and this example can be reversed (to their dismay, Roman Catholics are viewed as heretics by many Christians of other churches).

In a more positive vein, the Dictionary adopts an approach marked by ecumenical openness and sensitivity. Since no confessional perspective is a benchmark, each Christian tradition, movement, or church presents its beliefs and practices from its own perspective, in the expectation that they will be considered by members of other Christian traditions and non-Christians with respect and that these presentations will foster genuine ecumenical and interfaith dialogue*.

In the quest for academic integrity and for ecumenical openness and sensitivity, the editorial board and the general editor, following the example of anthropologists and, more generally, of specialists in social and cultural studies, have sought to make the presentation of Christianity in the Dictionary ethically accountable. The general editor emphasized this point to each of the contributors from the outset. When presenting the beliefs and practices of others, especially those of people within other cultural contexts (e.g. members of an African Instituted Church), scholars are often tempted to portray them as inferior, uneducated, ignorant, or “subaltern” (Gayatri Spivak’s term). The demeaning of others and their faith obviously occurs when one represents them as heretics, as members of a syncretistic* cult*, or the like; this amounts to “speaking to” them – teaching them what they should believe by dismissing what they do believe before even listening to them and trying to understand the religious and cultural “logic” of their beliefs and practices. But this ethically problematic attitude often takes more subtle forms. As Spivak points out, the superiors also commonly “speak for” the subalterns, demeaning them as people who are unable to express themselves appropriately, a common attitude toward members of what the superiors, explicitly or implicitly, view as inferior groups or cultures, e.g. Dalit*, tribal*, or mestizo*. How can scholars avoid these attitudes? As Spivak suggested, and as anthropologists and specialists of cultural studies regularly do, it is simply a matter of allowing others to speak for themselves. Then the appropriate role of scholars is to enter into dialogue with others, to listen to them, to learn from them; through their empathic presentations, scholars can foster further dialogue among their readers. In The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity, people are allowed to speak for themselves, so that users of the Dictionary are exposed to the ideas of these Christian believers of other historical or present-day cultural contexts, and can learn from them.

Academic integrity, ecumenical openness and sensitivity, and ethical responsibility are thus tightly interwoven, for all are essential in a dictionary that offers, along with brief definitions of key terms, a concise and accurate presentation of the history of Christianity; an up-to-date overview of the status of Christianity in the world at the beginning of the 21st century; a sensitive presentation of churches, denominations, and groups; and well-balanced explanations of Christian theological concepts and religious and social practices.

ACADEMIC INQUIRIES: CHRISTIANITY THROUGHOUT HISTORY

As long recognized in other encyclopedic dictionaries, academic integrity requires that Christianity with its long history in many cultural, political, and religious contexts be presented in scores of articles by historians specializing in particular periods of Christianity in specific geographic areas. The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity includes hundreds of such historical articles by leading scholars. The major articles about the history of Christianity are found in a “cluster” of 11 articles located under “History of Christianity”:

History of World Christianity: A Survey
--

Followed by

History of Christianity in Africa and North Africa	Asia	Europe: • Balkans • Eastern Europe • Western Europe	Latin America and the Caribbean Islands	Middle East	North America	South Pacific and Australia

These articles about the history of Christianity in regions or continents include cross-references to many of the articles about the history of Christianity in 134 nations – those nations with more than approximately 500,000 Christians. A perusal of these articles shows that some are much longer than others. This is by design. The length of an article on a given nation reflects the approximate number of Christians who reside in that country today. Thus a list of the longest “national articles” – those for nations with 10 million (M) Christians or more (according to The World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001), presented here in order of decreasing length – provides a snapshot of Christianity at the beginning of the 21st century.

Christians in the World
United States 235.7 M	Brazil 155.5 M	Mexico 95.2 M	China 89 M	Russia 84.3 M
Philippines 68.1 M	India 62.3 M	Germany 62 M	Nigeria 51.1 M	Democratic Republic of Congo 49.5 M
United Kingdom 48.5 M	Italy 47 M	Ukraine 41.9 M	France 41.8 M	Colombia 40 M
Poland 38 M	Spain 37.1 M	Ethiopia 36 M	Argentina 34 M	South Africa 33.6 M
Indonesia 27.8 M	Peru 25 M	Canada 24.7 M	Kenya 23.9 M	Venezuela 22.9 M
Romania 19.8 M	South Korea 19 M	Uganda 19 M	Tanzania 16.9 M	Australia 15 M
Chile 13.6 M	Netherlands 12.7 M	Ecuador 12.3 M	Angola 12 M	Ghana 11.2 M
Guatemala 11.1 M	Egypt 10.3 M	Greece 10 M

The distribution of Christians around the world in the early 21st century, compared with that at the beginning of the 20th century, is rather surprising. The often heard claim that the center of gravity of Christianity has shifted to the South is further confirmed by the location of the 95 nations with fewer than 10 million Christians; often these are nations with smaller overall populations but with a large percentage of Christians.

These 11 regional and 134 national historical articles in turn cross-reference hundreds of articles about men and women church leaders, their beliefs and practices, the documents they produced, and events emblematic of Christianity in given periods and geographic locations. These other historical articles have been written by scholars who are foremost in these fields, as their publications (listed in the Web-based bibliography) attest, and who graciously accepted our invitation to contribute to the Dictionary.

ACADEMIC INQUIRIES: CHRISTIANITY TODAY

The regional and national historical articles trace Christianity from its introduction in a geographic area until the early 21st century and have been prepared by scholars who have both a solid academic knowledge of the history and firsthand knowledge of early-21st-century Christianity in the given cultural contexts. The decision to elicit articles from such scholars was made during a weeklong meeting of the Editorial Board of The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity, a senior editor at Cambridge University Press, and the general editor of the Dictionary. Academic integrity required that these articles be written by scholars who could identify with each cultural context.

Two centuries of scholarly research on historiography* and hermeneutics* have shown that historians cannot avoid cultural and religious pre-understandings in their studies. This means that no absolutely objective historical study is possible. Of course, accuracy about facts, events, dates, and the like is possible; the accuracy of factual information in the Dictionary has been confirmed by the best sources available and top scholars on each topic. But beyond the issue of accuracy, when preparing a report, a historian must make a choice between what is most significant, and should be included, and what is less significant, and could be omitted – an unavoidable choice for the historian, especially when composing a concise article, such as those in The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity. Cultural and religious pre-understandings play a substantial role in such choices. As anthropologists have repeatedly exemplified, the description of the behavior or belief of people in a culture from an insider's perspective (an "emic" description) is quite different from the description from an outsider's perspective (an "etic" description). The general advantage of an insider's description is that it provides insights into aspects of a culture that outsiders often completely miss. This advantage is even greater in the study of Christianity in countries where mission and colonialism were (and often still are) closely associated, and where missionaries and their authoritative North Atlantic knowledge commonly silenced indigenous Christians as "subalterns" who were told what they should believe and experience. In such situations, a report written by a North Atlantic scholar of Christianity in a region of, e.g., Africa, Asia, or Latin America commonly either ignores "inculturated*" aspects of Christianity in the given cultural context or presents them as syncretistic* aberrations, because the form Christianity takes in that context is different from the Christianity in North Atlantic cultures, as if the latter were not inculturated. By contrast, insiders' descriptions clarify the distinctive features of Christianity in these countries.

Unlike strongly "West-centered" presentations of the history of Christianity – common until the late 20th century – formulated by scholars based exclusively in the academic institutions of Western Europe and North America, The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity has benefited from the publication of scholarly studies of global Christianity, such as the nine-volume set of The Cambridge History of Christianity and the History of the World Christian Movement (Dale Irvin and Scott Sunquist), and, during the past generation, from the development around the world of research centers on local histories of Christianity. The members of the international Editorial Board of The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity provided direct access to the work of these research centers.

Most of the articles on Christianity in the Latin American and Caribbean nations were written by members of CEHILA (Comisión de Estudios de Historia de la Iglesia en Latinoamérica), an organization of Latin American scholars devoted for more than 35 years to the study, from their insiders' perspectives, of the history of the church in all parts of the Latin American continent. These contributors were nominated and encouraged to write entries by two members of the Editorial Board: Enrique Dussel, who founded CEHILA in 1973, and Ana María Bidegain, one of its leaders. African scholars who wrote the articles on the history of Christianity in different parts of Africa were nominated by two members of the Editorial Board. Jesse Ndwiga Kanyua Mugambi, who in 1992 founded Acton Publishers, a press in Kenya dedicated to African scholarship, readily drew up the list of articles needed for a balanced presentation of Christianity in Africa and nominated many authors for these, including authors of books published with Acton Publishers and African members of the Ecumenical* Association of Third World Theologians, the inaugural meeting of which he attended and facilitated at Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, in August 1976. In addition, Isabel Apawo Phiri, who coordinated the Circle* of Concerned African Women Theologians from 2002 to 2008, identified African scholars among the members of the Circle, as well as scholars in academic institutions in Southern Africa. Similarly, through their extensive scholarly networks, other members of the Editorial Board identified contributors for articles about the history of Christianity in other parts of the world: Asian scholars were identified by Kwok Pui-lan and Archie Chi Chung Lee, Eastern European and Middle East scholars by Vasile Mihoc and Kathleen E. McVey, and Western European and North American scholars by Cristina Grenholm and Eugene TeSelle.

ECUMENICAL INQUIRIES: CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, DENOMINATIONS, AND MOVEMENTS TODAY AND THROUGHOUT HISTORY

In addition to the historical entries, The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity includes articles on all major Christian churches, denominations*, movements, groups, religious* orders, and parachurch* organizations. All of these “denominational articles,” usually complemented by parallel historical articles (e.g. on nations), are written by insiders. In this case, the authors are not “cultural insiders” but “religious insiders,” i.e. scholars whose voices are acknowledged as authoritative within their churches or groups and who agreed to write about their respective churches or groups for an academic audience. The list of “Churches* and Denominations” provides many relevant cross-references, ranging from Adventism* to Waldenses* and the Word*-Faith Movement.

A few examples will suffice to clarify the way churches and denominations are presented. Kimbanguism*, the theology and practices of the “Church of Jesus Christ on Earth by the Prophet Simon Kimbangu” (with c15 million members in Congo* DRC and Congo* Brazzaville), is presented by Professor Léon Nguapitshi Kayongo, a member of the Church who, after teaching in Switzerland, was called back to head the main Kimbanguist seminary in Congo; his article, which sketches the internal history of Kimbanguism, its main theological tenets, and its religious practices, is complemented by the historical articles by Jean-Claude Loba-Mkole (on Congo DRC) and Elochukwu Eugene Uzukwu (on Congo Brazzaville).

The much larger churches are presented in the same way, although often by groups of scholars. The Eastern Orthodox* churches are presented by Archbishop Demetrios (Trakatellis), while each autocephalous* Orthodox Church is presented by an Orthodox scholar teaching in one of the Orthodox seminaries or at other universities. Thus a cluster of entries on Eastern Orthodoxy includes, beyond the introductory entries:

Orthodox Church, Eastern: In
Georgia	Greece	Romania	Russia	Ukraine	Mexico	United States

Similarly, Bishop Yeznik Petrossian, head of the Armenian Apostolic Church, wrote the introductory entry for the cluster of entries on Oriental* Orthodox churches, and authorities from each of these churches wrote an article on each of them.

Orthodox Churches, Oriental
Armenian Apostolic	Coptic Orthodox	Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo	Malankara Orthodox Syrian	Syriac Orthodox Church, Universal

All of these entries on Orthodoxy are complemented by the historical entries on Christianity in specific nations.

Similarly, the much larger Roman Catholic Church is presented by a group of insiders discussing various aspects of the Church: Jesuit scholars of the Pontifical Gregorian University (Rome), as well as members of other orders (e.g. Augustinian, Benedictine, Dominican, Franciscan, Sisters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, Sisters of St. Joseph), each writing about her or his own order or related topics (e.g. monasticism*). In addition, it is important to recognize the contextualized character of the Roman Catholic Church in various nations. Thus there is a cluster of entries on “Roman Catholicism” in a sampling of geographic areas (all complemented by corresponding national entries), following the introductory entry, “The Roman Catholic Church and Its Theology.”

Roman Catholicism in
Southern Africa	Western Africa	China	Philippines	France	Germany
Italy	Portugal	Spain	United Kingdom	Argentina	Brazil
Chile	Colombia	Mexico	Paraguay	Peru	Uruguay
Canada	United States	South Pacific and Australia

The presentations of Protestantism* and Anglicanism* similarly include articles related to diverse cultural and geographic locations. In each case, the articles are grouped in a cluster with an introductory entry by a respected voice in the tradition (for Protestantism Alister E. McGrath, who published The Blackwell Companion to Protestantism, and for Anglicanism Bishop Colin O. Buchanan, author of the Historical Dictionary of Anglicanism), followed by a sampling of contextualized manifestations of Protestantism and Anglicanism around the world (showing the growing importance and distinctive character of the churches in Africa, Asia, and Latin America in both traditions).

Regarding the highly decentralized Charismatic* and Pentecostal movements, the 15 entries of the cluster are introduced by a historical survey of these movements by Stanley M. Burgess (editor of the Encyclopedia of Pentecostal and Charismatic Christianity), preceded by a significant article by Ogbu U. Kalu (a Nigerian scholar, member of the Society for Pentecostal Studies, author of African Pentecostalism) on the study of these movements. In it Kalu outlines a critical method necessary for an academic study that would account for this complex and vibrant movement in Africa, Asia, and Latin America without denigrating its members, as proponents of classical North Atlantic methods tend to do. From this perspective, one can appreciate the “inculturated” character of the Charismatic Movement in 13 different contexts.

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Eastern Africa	Southern Africa	Western Africa	Asia	Australasia	Eastern Europe	Western Europe
Brazil	Central America	Chile	Jamaica	Mexico	North America

All of these articles on churches, denominations, movements, groups, religious orders, and parachurch organizations (e.g. the Salvation* Army, YMCA*, YWCA*) and global church organizations (e.g. World* Council of Churches, by Samuel Kobia, its president; World Alliance of Reformed Churches, by Clifton Kirkpatrick, its president; and Lutheran World Federation, by Norman A. Hjelm, one of its leaders) show the differences among them with respect to theological issues and religious practices, as well as ethical issues.

CROSS-CULTURAL INQUIRIES: DYNAMICS OF CHRISTIAN THEOLOGIES AND PRACTICES

Together these academic and ecumenical inquiries exemplify and demonstrate that there exist several understandings of a given Christian theological concept (e.g. atonement*, Christ*), of a given Christian view of the religious life (e.g. conception of the church* and of ecclesiastical structures), and of a given Christian practice (e.g. conception of Christians’ life in society, of ethics*, of justice*, of poverty*). Beyond these descriptions, the Dictionary clarifies the plurality of understandings of the main theological concepts and Christian practices, first by explaining why there is such a plurality.

The question “Why is there a plurality of understandings of any given theological concept or Christian practice?” reflects a longing for orthodoxy and/or for orthopraxy. It would be comforting to be able to identify a single, true understanding of a theological point or of what Christians should do in a specific situation. Yet throughout history and across denominations and cultures today, the plurality of understandings is simply a reality. Furthermore, it is hard to imagine that it could be otherwise when one recognizes that, implicitly or explicitly, each understanding of a given theological concept or of a Christian practice is the result of an interpretive process through which three variable components are interpreted in terms of each other: (1) a tradition or passage of Scripture that the interpreters view as authoritative (e.g. a biblical story, a creed, a teaching by Augustine); (2) certain religious experiences (or lack of such experiences) that the interpreters share with a community in a particular culture; and (3) pragmatic concerns that the interpreters have for people's needs in specific life contexts. The Dictionary presents many examples of each of these components, of the methodologies that have been devised by scholars to study them (see Methodologies for the Studies of Christianity, a list of relevant entries), and of the ways these three components interpret each other in the process of formulating particular understandings of given theological concepts and of Christian practices.

1. Scripture, Authoritative Tradition, and Believers' Lives. When they say that a text is Scripture – e.g. that the Gospel of Mark is Scripture – Christian believers mean that this text is a “Word-to-live-by.” (The same is true of traditions* or other texts, e.g. creeds*, that Christians view as authoritative.) This means that the meaning of a scriptural text is not contained in the book; rather it is found in the way the book and its teaching interact with specific aspects of believers' lives. The common metaphors describing the Bible as Scripture – such as lamp to my feet, rule of the community (canon), good news, book of the covenant, prophecy (corrective lenses), empowering word, Holy Bible – refer to different ways in which believers relate a scriptural text to their lives (see Scripture). The recognition that Scripture is a Word-to-live-by for believers is the basis of a methodology for the critical study of the interpretations of Scripture by believers: scriptural criticism, itself based on a series of methodologies presented in the following articles and clusters:

Scripture, Tradition, and Believers
Scriptural Criticism	Bible Interpretation Cluster (in various religious and cultural contexts; 13 articles)	Bible Translations Cluster	Hermeneutics (and the numerous articles about various hermeneutic theories)	Reception Studies of Preaching; Reception Studies of Scripture	Semiotics and the Study of Christianity

Biblical scholars have long sought to clarify through the use of redaction* criticism and other methods (e.g. form criticism) the way in which biblical texts (e.g. the Gospel of Mark*) are themselves the product of the interpretation by the author of an authoritative tradition (e.g. about Jesus) as a Word-to-live-by for believers in a specific religious and sociopolitical life context (e.g. in the case of Mark, most likely the turbulent period of the Judean war against the Romans in the late 60s). The articles in The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity about each of the books of the Bible and many other texts (e.g. Apocrypha*, Pseudepigrapha*, creeds) emphasize this aspect of biblical scholarship. These brief articles strive to show that each book was the product of the interpretation of a received tradition by a believer or a community in a specific context and, in addition, briefly mention how this book was received as a Word-to-live-by in later situations. (See all the articles on the books of the Bible, from Genesis to Revelation.)

2. Christian Religious Experiences, Their Theological Formulations, and Culture. The formulation of theological or ethical views by believers is based not only on their specific appropriation of authoritative traditions or scriptures, but also on their religious experiences (or lack of such experiences) and the positive or negative relation of these to the culture that believers share with a community. Thus various Christian religious experiences are presented in a series of articles and clusters:

Christian Religious Experiences
Worship Cluster (22 entries)	Spirituality Cluster (11 entries)	Prayer (and related entries)	Mysticism; Monasticism Cluster (7 entries)	Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster (15 entries)

These examples of Christian worship and religious experience illustrate the denominational differences among, e.g., Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Charismatics. They also illustrate how deeply “inculturated” Christian worship and religious experiences are. As can be expected, religious experiences are shaped by the Christian religious contexts in which they take place, e.g. a monastic community; the Roman Catholic Divine* Office; the Mass* with a large community; the Orthodox Divine* Liturgy; Protestant worship services; Charismatic services; revivalist* meetings; prayer meetings; or individual devotion, prayer, or contemplation. But they are shaped as well by broader religious and cultural contexts (including nonreligious, secularized contexts). As the 6 entries of the Inculturation Cluster and the 11 entries of the Popular Christian Practices Cluster show, Christianity and Christian religious experience have always been inculturated, whether in Palestinian Judaism as the earliest church was or, beginning with Paul*, in the Greco-Roman world, or throughout the centuries in all cultures of Africa, Asia, Australia, and Latin America, as well as of Eastern and Western Europe, in which Christianity was introduced at different times. Of course, Christianity distinguishes itself from existing religions (or secular cultures), rejecting them, often destroying their temples; but in each context, Christian religious experience and worship are nevertheless shaped by these existing religions. This is most apparent in the case of “accommodations” – e.g. when Christian worship is celebrated at the sacred places of an existing religion (e.g. see Mary, the Virgin, of Guadalupe; this was also the case for many European cathedrals) or when Christian worship is deliberately shaped by its secularized* culture (as in Thomas* Mass in Finland* and Scandinavia*). But this is also true when a Christian community so systematically rejects another religion (or secularized culture) that it becomes an inverted image of that religion, and indeed its mirror image (as happens with certain fundamentalist* communities). For Christians who forget or deny the inculturated character of their own religious experiences and worship – as Western Christians often do – those forms of Christian religious experience and worship that have been inculturated in other contexts are labeled syncretistic*. Yet for others, Christianity is necessarily deeply inculturated, because it is, by definition, “an incarnate faith” (see Incarnation Cluster; Popular Christian Practices Cluster: In Eastern Orthodoxy).

To clarify the characteristics of Christian religious experience, The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity shows how Christianity is and was interrelated with other religions. Along with articles on specific religions (including those in the distant past), a series of clusters enhances these interrelations by including at minimum an article describing how Christianity is perceived from the perspective of the other religion (usually presented by a member of that religion) and an article describing how this other religion is perceived by Christians. The Judaism and Christianity Cluster seeks to reflect the long and often tragic interaction of Christianity with Judaism (including the Holocaust*); the Islam and Christianity Cluster provides, beyond a history of this relationship, eight entries on their interactions in different parts of Africa, Asia, Europe, and the Middle East.

Religions and Christianity (in single entries or clusters)
African Religion	Ancestor Veneration	Australian Aboriginal Traditions	Baha’i	Buddhism	Civil Religion
Confucianism	Daoism	Freemasonry	Hellenistic Religious Traditions	Hinduism	Islam
Judaism	Mithraism	Mystery Religions	Native American Traditions	New Age Spirituality	Shamanism
Shinto	Sikhism	Vodou

In addition to having direct interactions with other religions, Christianity and Christian religious experiences are “inculturated” in their broader cultures, as the six entries of the Culture Cluster demonstrate. This becomes apparent both in the arts, especially in artistic “images of Jesus,” and in literature. Thus in the Jesus, Images of, Cluster the Dictionary includes:

Jesus, Images of, in
Byzantine Iconography	Latino/a Depictions	Literature	Movies	Western European Arts

A greater diversity of contexts is emphasized in the articles on literature and Christianity in the following cultures (found under the culture’s name) as well as in the many articles on the main authors discussed in these articles.

Literature and Christianity (in the following cultures)
African American	African-Anglophone	African-Francophone	African-Lusophone	American	Brazilian
Caribbean	Chinese	English	French	German	Indian
Italian	Japanese	Latin American	Portuguese	Russian	Scandinavian Spanish

The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity also examines the ways in which these inculturated expressions of Christian religious experiences are studied and critically assessed. The most relevant methodological approaches are presented in the following articles (which refer to other articles):

Methodologies
Aesthetics and Theology	Hierotopy, the Creation of Christian Sacred Spaces	Iconography	Myth and the Study of Christianity	Philosophy and Christian Theology
Philosophy of Religion	Postmodernism and Theology	Religion as a Concept and Christianity	Structural Studies of Christianity	Symbolism

For Christian believers and theologians, doing theology involves making sense of their inculturated religious experiences in terms of the traditions and Scriptures they hold to be authoritative and, conversely, making sense of their particular way of relating these traditions and scriptures to their lives as a Word-to-live-by in terms of their religious experiences.

3. Contextual Concerns for People's Needs and Christian Ethics. For Christian believers, an inculturated theology that accounts for their religious experiences and for their appeals to authoritative traditions and Scripture still leaves out their daily life in socioeconomic and political contexts, where they and their neighbors* have concrete needs. Such pragmatic concerns also shape Christian believers' views of Scripture and traditions as well as their religious experiences and theological understandings, even as they more directly define their moral life and their ethics. Guided by the member of the Editorial Board who specializes in ethics, Beverly W. Harrison, The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity addresses the ethical issues that Christian believers encounter in society and describes the ways in which Christians have sought to confront these issues.

Since morality is a matter of relationships with other people in life contexts, the Ethics and Christianity Cluster illustrates how Christian ethics is shaped in very different ways in distinctive religious and socioeconomic contexts and refers to entries and clusters of entries dealing with various relationships, such as the following (which in turn refer to other articles):

Ethics
Business Ethics	Church and State Relations Cluster	Economy and Christianity Cluster	Family Cluster	Global Ethics
Biomedical Ethics; Medical Ethics	Political Studies of Christianity	Political Theology	Sexuality, Issues of, Cluster	Social Ethics

The Dictionary describes the ways in which Christians in various contexts have sought to address ethical issues in each sector of life, emphasizing the plurality of perspectives on what many contemporary Christian theologians and ethicists view as crisis points, including the following:

Ethical Issues
Abortion	Birth Control	Colonialism and Imperialism	Ecology Cluster	Oppression
Patriarchalism	Poverty Cluster	Racism Cluster; Slavery Cluster; Anti-Semitism	Refugees and Marginalized	War

In its descriptive way, the Dictionary does not hide, and indeed exposes in the articles by scholars from many contexts around the world, that despite their ongoing concern for ethics and morality, Christians have been responsible for much historical and contemporary evil. Christians commonly condone and indeed promote systemic sin and systemic evil* – often doing so by passively participating in societies or cultures that contribute to them; decrying anti-Semitism only after it engendered the Holocaust*; decrying the Crusades* and the Inquisition*, yet constantly being on the watch for heretics* or marginalizing* members of other religions; decrying poverty* while not addressing the economic and colonialist issues in which cries for justice* are ignored; decrying oppression of all kinds, yet readily supporting states that do not respect human* rights or social institutions (including churches) that marginalize people on the basis of race, gender, sexual orientation, or (ability) disability*.

Various articles also discuss the ways in which these contextualized expressions of Christian practices are studied and critically assessed. In addition to entries on ethics, the most relevant methodological approaches are presented in the Anthropology Cluster (whose entries emphasize human limitations) and the articles on ideological* and sociological* studies of Christianity, as well as the entries on psychology*, science*, and technology*.

CONTEXTUAL CHRISTIAN THEOLOGIES AND PRACTICES

Through its academic, ecumenical, and cross-cultural inquiries into Christianity throughout history and across contemporary cultures, The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity clarifies and illustrates by numerous examples that all Christian theologies – whether those of Origen*, Basil* of Caesarea, Thomas Aquinas*, Anselm* of Canterbury, Karl Barth*, or Georges Florovsky* – or all ethical teachings are as contextual as the contemporary theologies that readily identify themselves by their contexts, among which are the following:

Contextual Theologies
African American Theologies	Asian Theology	Asian American Theologies	Black Theology	Buraku Liberation in Japan	Dalit Theology
Decolonizing Theology	Disability and Christianity	Feminist Theology Cluster	Gay and Lesbian Theologies	Indian Christian Theologies	Latin American Theologies
Latino/a Theologies	Liberation Theologies Cluster	Minjung Theology	Palestinian Theological Liberation	Reconstruction, African Theologies of

More generally, because each theological concept and each Christian practice is the result of the interpretation of authoritative traditions or Scriptures in terms of certain inculturated religious experiences and pragmatic concerns for people’s needs in specific life contexts, it necessarily has several contextual definitions. For instance, as is well known, there are three different understandings of atonement, emphasizing (1) ransom and redemption from bondage or healing, (2) honor and juridical satisfaction, or (3) moral transformation. Each has been historically associated with distinct ecclesial and social contexts, while being solidly rooted in Scriptures and traditions, and associated with Christian religious experiences. Thus like many other works published since Gustaf Aulén’s Christus Victor: An Historical Study of the Three Main Types of the Idea of the Atonement (1930; English, 1957), The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity presents these three views of atonement, while emphasizing that, as contextual interpretations, they are equally legitimate. Christian theologians have a choice. Following the same principle, in its conceptual and practical articles the Dictionary presents a plurality of understandings of each theological concept or Christian practice (when this was not possible, rather than an article, there is a brief definition). Several contextual interpretations could usually be combined in a single article. Yet, in 44 cases, it soon became clear that the plurality of contextual interpretations required several authors from different contemporary contexts and thus a cluster of entries. None of the clusters pretend to be comprehensive; they simply provide a sampling of different (and often divergent) understandings from a diversity of historical and contemporary contexts (in the following tabulation, the number of contexts is given after the abbreviated title of each cluster).

Clusters of Contextual Understandings of Theological Concepts or Christian Practices (with number of entries)
Ancestor Veneration (6)	Anthropology (theological) (10)	Apocalypticism (3)	Baptism (4)	Bible Interpretation (13)
Bible Translations (4)	Christologies (13)	Church, Concept of (13)	Church and State relations (17)	Death (8)
Ecology (4)	Educational Practices as Christian Practices (5)	Eschatology (6)	Ethics (4)	Eucharist (3)
Family (15)	God (12)	Gospel and Culture (8)	Grace of God (5)	Health, Healing (12)
Holy Spirit (9)	Human Rights (6)	Incarnation (9)	Justice (9)	Justification (9)
Kingdom of God (6)	Laity (6)	Land (4)	Marriage (6)	Mary, the Virgin (8)
Millennialism (4)	Mission (16)	Monasticism (7)	Poverty (9)	Racism (8)
Sexuality (4)	Slavery (4)	Spirituality (11)	Theological Education (9)	Tradition (4)
Violence (3)	Women's Christian Practices (11)	Women's Ordination (7)

THE CAMBRIDGE DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIANITY AS PEDAGOGICAL TOOL

The preceding table and the other tables in this Preface provide bird's-eye views of some aspects of the more than 3,500 articles and entries in this Dictionary, suggesting several of its possible pedagogical uses. It can be used for most courses dealing with Christianity, be they from a historical perspective or from a theological or ethical perspective; or be they courses on global Christianity, mission, comparative religion, or a specific theological topic.

As the general editor, I had access to the Dictionary (before copyediting began) for a full year prior to its publication as I was teaching in my own discipline – New Testament and early Christianity – courses on the Gospels and on Paul's letters, in which my students read relevant scholarly books on the topics at hand. During this last year, I also asked them to read, each time we encountered a theological term in the biblical text (e.g. faith*, sin*, atonement*, salvation*, evil*, kingdom*, discipleship*, mission*), the corresponding article or cluster of articles from the Dictionary. With the plurality of contextual understandings of this theological concept before them, I asked them to tell me which of these understandings was closest to the one they presupposed in their initial reading of the biblical text and which was the closest to the one presupposed by the scholarly interpretation(s) they were studying. A debate over which understanding was the most appropriate and why ensued each time. Methodological issues were discussed (with the help of other articles from the Dictionary). When I forgot to provide the students with a relevant article (or cluster), they began asking for it. My classes had been transformed into laboratories for critical studies of the New Testament, as the students actively participated in the discussions with a clear vision that the choices of interpretation had important moral implications, and therefore that any biblical interpretation must be carefully assessed. Indeed, the Dictionary will now be a requirement for each of my courses.

Obviously, as the general editor who has read this volume at least three times, I am partial. Other teachers have other pedagogical goals, and the courses they teach cover very different topics related to Christianity. Yet as a dictionary, this volume is an extremely versatile tool, one that is also very helpful for personal use.

I myself have learned much from reading the Dictionary. The expertise of the 828 contributors and their insightful presentations are astounding. Dealing with so many contributors could have been drudgery. Instead, their gracious acceptance of an invitation to contribute articles, and their patience when I asked them to explain technical points that were foreign to me, an outsider to their fields, turned out to be a rewarding and enriching experience. I trust the readers of The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity will have the same experience.

Daniel Patte
Editor
January 2010

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Obviously, a dictionary with more than 3,500 articles and entries and 828 contributors would not exist were it not for the help of many people. Retelling the story of how the Dictionary came into being is the most appropriate way of acknowledging and thanking all those who contributed to it.

When I was approached in July 2001 by Cambridge University Press to be the general editor of a dictionary that would provide a global presentation of Christianity, I was able to respond relatively quickly because I immediately received the support of several colleagues with whom I had the privilege to be associated in various ways: Cristina Grenholm, Eugene TeSelle, Jesse Ndwiga Kanyua Mugambi, Enrique Dussel, Archie Chi Chung Lee, and Vasile Mihoc, who were soon joined on the Editorial Board by Kwok Pui-lan, Kathleen E. McVey, and Beverly W. Harrison, and by Isabel Apawo Phiri and Ana María Bidegain.

Since 1998 Cristina Grenholm, Eugene TeSelle, and I had been involved in a program of the Society of Biblical Literature devoted to the study of the reception through the centuries of Paul's Epistle to the Romans*. It brought into dialogue (and still does) scholars from three main disciplines of the study of Christianity: New Testament studies, church history, and theology. The first years became an intense quest for a way of truly working together (rather than "across" disciplines) in a collective research project with equal contributions from everyone involved. When a methodological model emerged from these discussions, Cristina Grenholm and I formulated it and named it "scriptural criticism" in the "Overture" of Reading Israel: Legitimacy and Plausibility of Divergent Interpretations (2000; the first of a 10-volume series, Romans Through History and Cultures, T&T Clark/Continuum; with more than 100 contributors). From the perspective of this interdisciplinary scholarly model, in July 2001 I could readily envision the broad outlines of The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity as a collective project in which writers representing all the disciplines involved in the study of Christianity would cooperate and support each other. Would Cristina Grenholm and Eugene TeSelle be interested in participating in such a project? They enthusiastically responded affirmatively.

Jesse Ndwiga Kanyua Mugambi and I met at an eye-opening "Conference on African Hermeneutics," a pan-African gathering of African theologians and biblical scholars in Hammanskraal, South Africa (1999), where he was the keynote speaker. We began to envision how to prolong this conference, contemplating a collective volume that would bring into dialogue African scholars and North Atlantic scholars. When I mentioned to him the possibility of The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity, he quickly saw it as one way of bringing about what he had envisioned in Hammanskraal.

Archie Chi Chung Lee (Hong Kong), one of the associate editors of a Global Bible Commentary (then in progress; published in 2005), and Vasile Mihoc (Romania; a contributor to this commentary), as well as Enrique Dussel (Mexico; founder of CEHILA, who had been a visiting professor at Vanderbilt University), readily agreed to help develop The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity. Similarly, although I had not had the privilege of working with them directly, Kwok Pui-lan and Kathleen E. McVey quickly responded positively and were soon joined by Beverly Harrison. With the support of these scholars, and knowing the range of their scholarship, I was able to accept the offer from Cambridge University Press to draft a formal proposal for such a dictionary. In October 2002, Jesse Mugambi joined me for several weeks at Vanderbilt University (where he was guest professor), helping me pull together this proposal, which was reviewed and revised by members of the Editorial Board.

Even though Cambridge University Press honored us by accepting the proposal, and I had started finalizing it following advice from formal reviewers, the question of the feasibility of this project remained an issue. Extraordinary and ongoing support from the chair of Vanderbilt's Department of Religious Studies, Volney Gay, and from the successive deans of the College of Arts and Science, Richard McCarty (now provost) and Carolyn Dever, made it feasible. A reduced teaching load for several years gave me the most precious of commodities: time. The Center for the Study of Religion and Culture at Vanderbilt (Volney Gay and Douglas Knight, directors) awarded a generous research conference grant to the project; this award was then complemented by a no less generous grant from the Louisville Institute and the Lilly Foundation. Money was available for a week-long meeting of the Editorial Board (Vanderbilt, July 2003) without which the implementation of the Dictionary would not have been possible.

The editorial meeting was preceded by much groundwork. A first draft of the head list of more than 2,000 articles and entries was prepared by Eugene TeSelle, then revised by the general editor and the other members of the editorial board. A Web site was created by Revelation Velunta (later updated by Yung Suk Kim) (http://www.vanderbilt.edu/AnS/religious_studies/CDC/) to make available the information about the Dictionary needed by the members of the editorial board, and subsequently by the growing number of area editors and advisors, and still later by the contributors around the world. By June 2003, the Web pages included tentative templates for 10 kinds of articles and the basic statistics about the number and type of Christians around the world (in order to determine the length of national entries). A large portfolio of about 200 pages was also prepared for the members of the Editorial Board. These would not have been ready on time without the help of Ph.D. candidates in the Graduate Department of Religion at Vanderbilt University, who greatly facilitated the Editorial Board meeting in all kinds of ways. Special thanks for their contributions to this vital first stage of the preparation of the Dictionary are due to Revelation Velunta, Monya Stubbs, James Metzger, Chul Heum Han, Ruben Munoz, and Yung Suk Kim.

Before the editorial meeting, we had an overall vision of the topics that were to be covered by the Dictionary. By the end of that meeting (July 2003), we had a detailed outline of the ways we wanted these topics to be presented. Each day we dealt with 2 of the 10 types of articles. While graduate students were taking minutes of the proceedings, nine members of the Editorial Board (Jesse Mugambi could not come a second time in less than a year; Justin Ukpong, Nigeria, an area editor for Western Africa, played an essential role in representing Africa), Andy Beck, humanities development editor of Cambridge University Press, and the general editor were joined by colleagues from Vanderbilt University who had agreed to contribute to the discussion of the articles related to their fields and what they needed to emphasize; some bravely sent (if they were out of town) or presented samples of articles that were deconstructed and reconstructed along with the drafts of the corresponding templates. Thus Victor Anderson (ethics), Lewis V. Baldwin (African American church history), James P. Byrd (US church history), Paul Conkin (US history), Dennis C. Dickerson (African American history), Edward Farley (theology), Joel F. Harrington (Reformation history), Peter C. Hodgson (theology), Leonard M. Hummel (pastoral care), Dale A. Johnson (church history), M. Douglas Meeks (Methodism, economics, and theology), Bonnie J. Miller-McLemore (pastoral care), and Patricia A. Ward (French literature) contributed most directly to the shaping of the Dictionary.

At this meeting, we decided that many of the topics should be insiders' presentations. The concept of "cluster of entries" was adopted, multiplying the number of articles. Essential topics were added (the head list of 2,000 articles grew to more than 3,500), including a series of entries on Christianity and literature (promoted by Patricia Ward, who became the area editor) and on Christianity and other religions. A new set of templates (50 of them!) had to be prepared. Yet it was necessary to maintain the maximum of 1 million words. Each article or entry was assigned a specific number of words; each was to be not only accurate but also concise. With all this, the envisioned number of contributors multiplied by four.

But the task I faced as general editor, while time-consuming, was never daunting, because help came in many ways. First, Eugene TeSelle, who had recently retired, drafted hundreds and hundreds of short entries defining technical terms in a few lines, or briefly identifying historical events or figures. (Most of the short entries without signatures were elaborated on the basis of these drafts as they were cross-referenced with longer signed articles.) He also wrote a large number of articles in his field (Western historical theology); he then reviewed with me the entire copyedited manuscript and was always ready to discuss editorial matters. Second, each of the members of the Editorial Board – joined by Isabel Apawo Phiri (Malawi and South Africa) and Ana María Bidegain (Colombia and Florida) – identified hundreds of specialized contributors. Yet authors in many areas still needed to be identified and the way to present certain issues still had to be clarified. Thirty area editors and advisors (see the list of their names and areas of expertise), each an authoritative voice in a specific field, stepped in, playing an essential role in helping us shape the Dictionary and identifying top scholars in their fields.

The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity was becoming an actual possibility. Jennifer Bird and I drafted most of the additional templates needed for the clusters. Personal letters had to be sent to hundreds of nominated scholars, explaining to them what we were trying to accomplish with the Dictionary, who had nominated them, and what specifically we hoped they could contribute on the basis of their particular research or responsibilities. There were hundreds of letters to write. This process was begun by the graduate assistants who helped with the editorial meeting, but the bulk of the letter writing took place over several years with the help of Jason Jones, Sejong Chun, and Jennifer Bird. Without their help, this task would have been impossible. The gracious and often enthusiastic responses of most of the remarkable scholars to whom we wrote were overwhelming; and several who could not participate because of ill health or for other reasons nominated others. The names of the members of the Editorial Board and of the area editors or advisors clearly carried great weight among other scholars. Our conception of the Dictionary resonated well with the scholarship they had often developed over years of research.

Yet a steady flow of articles arriving from all over the world, often from contributors for whom English was not their mother tongue, needed to go through a first round of copyediting and to be collated with articles on similar topics. Articles also arrived in Spanish, French, Italian, German, and Polish; I wish to express my gratitude to Gloria Kinsler for her translation of four of the numerous Spanish articles, to William Franke for his translation of an Italian article, to Eugene TeSelle for his translation of a German article, and to Richard A. Rehl for his translation of a Polish article. I also express my gratitude to Kwok Pui-lan and Archie Chi Chung Lee, who reviewed all the transliterations from the Chinese. Ensuring that the articles were not too long was a constant struggle. Yes, in these concise articles and entries, we needed all the insightful information these specialists viewed as essential to each topic. But no, we could not go over the word limit calculated for the article; doing so for each article would mean going over the limit of the single-volume dictionary we envisioned. Jennifer Bird and I shared the task of copyediting and shortening articles during this round until she completed her Ph.D. and accepted a teaching position at Greensboro College.

Finally, I want to thank the very professional staff at Cambridge University Press who produced this volume, and especially Mary Becker, who during a second round of copyediting transformed this multi-voiced and multi-accented manuscript into a harmonious melody that Curious Georgia (Kwok Pui-lan's name for our ideal reader, a sharp undergraduate without any special knowledge of Christianity) would enjoy and fully appreciate.

In the meantime, Chul Heum Han, Rohun Park, Yung Suk Kim, Sejong Chun, Menghun Goh, and Sung Uk Lim also helped gather bibliographies (available on the Web) for most of the signed articles. And throughout these years, Betsy Cagle, the administrative assistant of the Department of Religious Studies, went out of her way to help produce this volume.

By naming all those who contributed for eight years to the production of this volume – I hope I did not exclude anyone – and by referring to the 30 area editors and advisors and the 828 contributors who are listed in the opening pages – I express how greatly I am indebted to each of them; without each of their contributions and help, the Dictionary would not be what it is. They have all my gratitude. Finally this volume would not exist if it were not for the patient support of Aline, my wife. Too many long walks were postponed or sacrificed because I needed to work on The Cambridge Dictionary of Christianity.

Daniel Patte
Editor
January 2010

ABBREVIATIONS

GENERAL ABBREVIATIONS

b	Born (b378)
BCE	Before the Common Era
c.	Century (20 th c.)
c	Circa (c815)
CE	Common Era
d	Died (d1566)
Fr.	Father (a priest in the Roman Catholic Church)
Gk	Greek
HB	Hebrew Bible (as Jewish and Christian Scripture)
Heb	Hebrew
Lat	Latin
LXX	Septuagint
Msgr.	Monsignor, bishop
MT	Masoretic Text
NAB	The New American Bible (official translation of the Roman Catholic Church)
NRSV	The New Revised Standard Version
NT	New Testament (as Christian Scripture)
OT	Old Testament (as Christian Scripture)
par.	(after a reference to one of the Gospels): “and parallels passages in the other Gospels”
Sr.	Sister (a nun in the Roman Catholic Church)

ABBREVIATIONS OF BIBLICAL BOOKS

Hebrew Bible, Old Testament

Gen	Genesis
Exod	Exodus
Lev	Leviticus
Num	Numbers
Deut	Deuteronomy
Josh	Joshua
Judg	Judges
Ruth	Ruth
1–2 Sam	1–2 Samuel
1–2 Kgs	1–2 Kings
1–2 Chr	1–2 Chronicles
Ezra	Ezra
Neh	Nehemiah
Esth	Esther
Job	Job

ABBREVIATIONS

Ps/Pss	Psalms
Prov	Proverbs
Ecccl	Ecclesiastes (or Qoheleth)
Song	Song of Songs (Song of Solomon, or Canticles)
Isa	Isaiah
Jer	Jeremiah
Lam	Lamentations
Ezek	Ezekiel
Dan	Daniel
Hos	Hosea
Joel	Joel
Amos	Amos
Obad	Obadiah
Jonah	Jonah
Mic	Micah
Nah	Nahum
Hab	Habakkuk
Zeph	Zephaniah
Hag	Haggai
Zech	Zechariah
Ma	Malachi

New Testament

Matt	Matthew
Mark	Mark
Luke	Luke
John	John
Acts	Acts
Rom	Romans
1–2 Cor	1–2 Corinthians
Gal	Galatians
Eph	Ephesians
Phil	Philippians
Col	Colossians
1–2 Thess	1–2 Thessalonians
1–2 Tim	1–2 Timothy
Titus	Titus
Phlm	Philemon
Heb	Hebrews
Jas	James
1–2 Pet	1–2 Peter
1–2–3 John	1–2–3 John
Jude	Jude
Rev	Revelation

APOCRYPHA, SEPTUAGINT, AND OTHER ANCIENT TEXTS

1–2 Esd	1–2 Esdras
Jdt	Judith
1–2 Macc	1–2 Maccabees
3–4 Macc	3–4 Maccabees
Sir	Sirach/Ecclesiasticus

ABBREVIATIONS

Tob	Tobit
Wis	Wisdom of Solomon
Adv. haer.	Irenaeus's Adversus Haereses, Against Heresies
De princ.	Origen's book, De principiis (On first principles)
Ep.	Epistula , Epistle (plural, Epp. Epistulae , Epistles), a common title referring to the letter(s) of the named author
Flacc.	Philo, In Flaccum (Flaccus)
Leg.	Philo, Legum allegoria (Allegorical interpretation)
Spec. leg.	Philo, De specialibus legibus (On special laws)
Orat.	Oration(s), a common title referring to the recorded sermons of the named author
Sent.	a common title referring to "Sentences" of the named author; e.g. Peter Lombard, III Sent. , d. 6 refer to Third Book of Sentences, distinction 6
Vat. Reg. Lat.	Latin Registry of the Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana
Vis.	Vision, the different parts of the Shepherd of Hermas*

ROMAN CATHOLIC ORDERS

CM Congregation of Priests of the Mission (Vincentians or Lazarists)
CMI Carmelites of Mary Immaculate
CPPS Missionaries of the Precious Blood (Congregatio Missionariorum Pretiosissimi Sanguinis Domini Nostri Iesu Christi) and Sisters of the Most Precious Blood
CSC Congregation of the Holy Cross (Holy Cross Fathers)
CSJ Sisters of St. Joseph
CSSp Congregation of the Holy Spirit (Holy Ghost Fathers or Spiritans)
CSSR Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (Congregatio Sanctissimi Redemptoris) (Redemptorist)
IHM Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary
MM Maryknoll Sisters
O.Carm. Carmelite (Order of Our Lady of Mt. Carmel)
OFM Order of Friars Minor (Franciscans)
OMI Oblates of Mary Immaculate (Missionary Oblates)
OP Order of Preachers (Ordo Praedicatorum) (Dominicans; also called "Blackfriars," especially in England)
OSA Order of St. Augustine (Augustinians)
OSB Order of Saint Benedict (Benedictines)
OSF Franciscan Brothers or Sisters
SA Society of the Atonement (Franciscan Sisters/Brothers of the Atonement)
SJ Society of Jesus (Societatis Iesu) (Jesuits)
SVD Society of the Divine Word (Verbites)

THE
CAMBRIDGE
DICTIONARY
OF
CHRISTIANITY

A

Aarflot, Berthe Canutte (1795–1859), author, speaker, leader, counselor. Born in Sunnmøre, Norway; married in 1817; six children. She wrote several collections of religious poetry, published in numerous editions, and a religious autobiography (1860); her collected writings were published in five volumes (1853–54, new ed. 1868–70). She was the best known woman in the Hauge Movement, a lay Pietist* movement led by Hans Nielsen Hauge (1771–1824). Her religious writings contributed to the diffusion of Pietism to a broader population and helped turn Pietism away from legalistic tendencies and more in the direction of Evangelicalism. She recruited her husband and turned her home into a religious and cultural center.

INGER FURSETH

Aaron, the older brother of Moses. Aaron speaks on Moses' behalf (Exod 4, 7, 8). When Moses is on Mount Sinai, Aaron yields to the people's request and makes the golden calf (Exod 32). The priesthood came to be limited to the descendants of Aaron, the first high priest; among them, a special role was assigned to the descendants of Zadok*. Hebrews* 5:4 emphasizes Aaron's calling by God, but his priesthood is superseded by that of Melchizedek*, who has no genealogy and foreshadows Christ, himself a descendant of Judah rather than of Aaron (Heb 7:11–14). Aaron later became a model for the Christian bishop*.

Abba, Amma, Aramaic terms for "father" and "mother." Jesus called God "Abba." Title of the male or female superior of a monastic* community.

Abbacy, the office, or term of office, of an abbot.

Abbess, Abbot, English designation (from Greek and Latin forms) for the female or male superior of a monastic* community. See also BENEDICT, RULE OF; HIGUMEN.

Abel, second son of Adam and Eve (Gen 4:1–16), killed by his brother Cain* because Abel's sacrifice as a shepherd was more satisfactory than that of Cain, a tiller of the soil. In the NT, Abel is the first of many righteous persons (Matt 23:35 = Luke 11:51; Heb 11:4); for the church, he foreshadows Christ or is the first citizen of the city* of God.

Abelard, Peter (1079–1142), philosopher, theologian, poet. Born in Brittany, Abelard studied logic in Anjou under Roscelin of Compiègne (d1120/25) and in Paris under William of Champeaux (d1122), and briefly theology in Laon under Anselm* (d1117). Abelard relates the controversy he provoked by arguing with teachers, and through his love affair with Heloise (1115–17), in his Historia calamitatum (1132/33). In his logical writings, Abelard promoted a nominalist* understanding of linguistic terms. After Heloise gave birth to Astrolabe and ostensibly secretly married Abelard, Abelard was castrated at her uncle's behest. While she became a nun at Argenteuil, Abelard became a monk at St. Denis and started writing about the Trinity*, combining his linguistic interests with an understanding of God as the supreme good glimpsed by prophets and philosophers alike. Having escaped from St. Denis (1122), he constructed an oratory dedicated to the Paraclete*, taken over by Heloise and her nuns in 1129. In the 1130s, he corresponded much with Heloise, while reestablishing himself as a teacher in Paris. He emphasized intention in his ethics and Christ's redeeming example in commenting on Paul (see Atonement #3). His theological writing was condemned at Soissons (1121) and Sens (1141) at the instigation of Bernard* of Clairvaux.

CONSTANT J. MEWS

Abercius (2nd c.), bishop of Hieropolis in Phrygia, whose epitaph, written in cryptic language, tells of his journey to Rome, as well as his travels through Syria as far as Nisibis*, with Paul as his companion, finding a faith shared with people everywhere.

Abgar, a historic ruler (13–50 CE) of Edessa*, a city-state between the Roman and Persian Empires. He allegedly wrote a letter inviting Jesus to continue his ministry in Mesopotamia. Eusebius* preserved Jesus' answer, promising an apostolic mission. Considered spurious in the West, the correspondence played a significant role in the East. The Syriac text Doctrine of Addai (c400) described the apostle Thaddeus's mission in Edessa. In the Syriac and Armenian* churches, Thaddeus* (or Addai in Syriac) became the basis of apostolic succession, much as Peter did in Rome. The correspondence mentions a portrait of Jesus painted on Abgar's request.

ALEXANDER MIRKOVIC

Abjuration, the formal renunciation of formerly held beliefs, usually under pressure. In Roman Catholic usage, the formal renunciation of heretical ideas, persons, or practices. Abjuration could also mean the renunciation of the "true faith" in order to avoid persecution, as the lapsed* did during the Decian* and other persecutions*. The term also refers to the renunciation of the devil* and the powers of evil as part of baptism* in the early church and today in some Protestant churches.

Ablution, ceremonial washing of the hands for purification, especially by the priest after celebrating Communion*.

Abortion refers to human action intentionally aimed at terminating a pregnancy*. Historically, women had three means of termination: intentional blows to the abdomen to induce miscarriage, the administration of an abortifacient herbal mixture, or surgical removal. Scripture does not directly address abortion, and Christian statements about it are fragmentary until the 19th c. They reflect concerns for the fetus's ontological* status, sexuality*, and the pregnant woman's health.

In the rare references in Scripture and tradition, the moral status of a fetus is different from that of an existing human. In Exod 21:22–23, the punishment for causing a woman to miscarry is a compensatory payment to the woman's husband for his lost "property." This was consonant with Greco-Roman attitudes. In medieval penitentials, the penance for abortion was similar to that for stealing an ox, rather than that for homicide. Furthermore, a distinction was made between "unformed" fetuses and "formed" fetuses believed to possess a "soul*." Abortion was usually condemned only after a fetus was formed (Augustine*, Aquinas*). Aquinas (following Aristotle) established this date as 40 days (for males) or 90 days (for females) after conception.

Attitudes toward abortion and birth* control were closely associated with attitudes toward sexual immorality. Poor women desiring abortion for economic reasons were considered less sinful than women attempting to conceal immoral sexual behavior. Until the 20th c., Christian theologians who believed procreation to be the unique purpose of sexuality* condemned abortion and birth control, which they associated with prostitutes and adulterers. Yet in popular practice, concerns for the pregnant woman's health and well-being (particularly in life-threatening situations) often moderated official attitudes.

While contemporary Christian debates about abortion continue to hinge on the question of "ensoulment" (when life begins), the debate broadened beyond the morality of abortion to its legality. Historically, access to abortifacients and women's control over revealing early pregnancies meant that many women obtained abortions within a certain veil of privacy. The medicalization of pregnancy, birth control, and abortion led to more public scrutiny of women's moral agency in reproductive decision making. Many mainline Protestant denominations in the USA (United Church of Christ, Presbyterian Church [USA], Methodist, Episcopal) affirm a woman's legal and moral right to make reproductive decisions. The Roman Catholic Church dropped the distinction between formed and unformed fetuses in 1869 (First Vatican* Council). In 1965 official Catholic teaching shifted the concern over abortion from the concealment of sexual sin to the protection of life. Regardless of official church positions, evidence indicates that Christian women obtain abortions at the same rate as women in the general population.

REBECCA TODD PETERS

Abraham (in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam). The significance of Abraham can perhaps be summed up by two statements in the Hebrew Scriptures. Abraham is the "friend of God" (Isa 41:8) and the "ancestor of a multitude of nations" (Gen 17:4). In fact, the world's two largest faiths, Christianity and Islam*, together with Judaism*, out of which they grew, are often called "the Abrahamic religions." Abraham is a foundational figure in all three. That he is the friend of God is cited with approval in the NT (Jas 2:23) and in Islam, where he is called Khalil Allah, "Friend of God."

The story of Abraham is told in Gen 12–25. What kind of material is this? First, these narratives were written many centuries later than the events they depict, whose setting appears to be the second millennium BCE. Even on the traditional assumption that Moses was the author, he would have been writing many generations later (Gen 15:13; 16:1–16 indicates a lengthy time between Abraham and the Exodus); thus, the earliest modern pentateuchal criticism in the 18th c. attempted to detect within Genesis the sources that Moses used. Since then, Gunkel, Van Seters, and Whybray have shown that, in all likelihood, the material was initially passed on orally and was subsequently written by several different hands, all long after the death of Moses, though dates and details cannot be established with precision.

Second, von Rad and Moberly have shown that the stories presuppose aspects of Israel's own history, which has been compressed into single episodes of depth and resonance, somewhat as the stories of Robin Hood compress the history and ideals of several centuries of English experience into a fixed cast of characters and a single historical context. The portrayal of Abraham is inseparable from the impact he continued to have in Israel.

The famous story of the near sacrifice of Isaac* (Gen 22:1–19; see Sacrifice of Isaac: The Aqedah) illustrates these points. Its distinctive character is marked by God's requirement that Abraham sacrifice his son, an action prohibited elsewhere (Jer 7:31). Yet God's requirement has clearly been interpreted with language that elsewhere characterizes Torah*: God's command is a test (Gen 22:1) whose purpose is to establish that Abraham fears God (22:12), terms that recur in a prime interpretation of the purpose of God's giving the Ten Commandments to Israel (Exod 20:20). Moreover, the site of the sacrifice is Moriah (Gen 22:2), elsewhere the site of the Jerusalem Temple (2 Chr 3:1); similarly the "mountain of YHWH" (Gen 22:14b) sounds like Jerusalem (Isa 2:3). This suggests that Abraham has been construed as a model for Israel's appropriate responsiveness to God; his costly relinquishment of Isaac interprets the meaning of Israel's Torah obedience and sacrificial worship.

The NT sees Abraham's action as that right responsiveness to God that Christians depict as faith* (Heb 11:17–19; Jas 2:18–24), as Paul*, Clement* of Rome, Ambrose*, and Augustine* also emphasize, though Paul distances Abraham's faith from Torah obedience (obeying the Law*; Gal 3; Rom 4).

The Qur'an* (37:83–113) sees Abraham as modeling surrender and obedience to God, Islam's key concept, and retells the story in a way that led Muslims to identify the son with Ishmael* and the place with Mecca.

Thus in each Abrahamic religion, Abraham has been understood according to the categories characteristic of that religion: Torah, faith, or surrender and obedience. Though it is sometimes proposed that Abraham could be an "ecumenical" or "normative" figure for the differing traditions (Kuschel), there simply is no "neutral" Abraham independent of the contours of each tradition (Levenson). Any attempt to reach behind Genesis to an "original" Abraham leads not to firm ground but only to unverifiable speculations. The significant Abraham is the Abraham of particular traditions.

R. W. L. MOBERLY

Abraham, Testament of, OT pseudepigraphon recording how Abraham* repeatedly manages to postpone the moment of his death, until he is finally outsmarted by God and the angels. In a sequence of heavenly journeys, Abraham is enlightened about humanity's sinfulness* and God's justice*, compassion*, and mercy*. Owing to unsolved text-critical problems, questions of date and provenance remain unanswered. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHA OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

JOHANNES TROMP

Abram (Heb "the father is exalted") was in Gen 12–25 the original name of Abraham*, "the father of a multitude" (Gen 17:5). The giving of a new name to the Patriarch as part of the covenant confirmed God's control even as it marked a new stage in Abraham's story.

Absalom, third son of David*. While he was attempting to usurp his father's throne, his long hair became entangled in an oak tree and he was killed by David's soldiers, despite David's instructions. David's mourning for Absalom became legendary (2 Sam 18:33–19:8).

Absolution, the remission of sins* by a priest or bishop on the basis of Christ's promise (John 20:23), especially in connection with penance*. Originally a prayer, it has been declaratory since the Fourth Lateran* Council.

Abstinence, refraining from certain things or actions (1) because they are regarded as sinful* or harmful, (2) as penance*, or (3) for the sake of self-discipline*. Fasting* is a refusal of food more complete than abstinence.

Abuse as Pastoral Care Issue. "Abuse" (from old English, French, and Latin) means to "abuse," i.e. "mis-use" or "mis-treat" someone or something so as to cause harm. In the legal area, "to abuse" means to mistreat persons in violation of their human* rights as defined by a particular culture*. In the moral sense, it means to threaten the life and health of someone in violation of religious law or tradition and to cause harm, including emotional trauma, physical injury, or death. In these definitions, "abuse" describes the attitude of the one abusing, i.e. intent to harm or reckless endangerment, as well as the consequences for the victim of abuse, the harm caused.

In theology, the word "abuse" became prominent (mid-20th c.) in the development of three theologies: Liberation* theologies arose from concern for the abuse of the poor through systemic violence (see Poverty Cluster); Black* and Womanist* theologies arose from concern for abuse during slavery* and afterward, especially the sexual abuse of female slaves, and ongoing racism*; Feminist* theologies arose from concern for the abuse of women in sexual and domestic violence. Biblically, these theologies consider the abuse and death of Jesus as an innocent victim to be the basis for Christian empathy for all victims of abuse.

Pastoral care theory gradually shifted because of these theological trends. Pastoral caregivers began to expand their horizon beyond individual sin* as the primary cause of all human suffering to include a focus on care for the victims of abusive agents and systems. Persons and families seek care from churches not only because of personal sin, but also because of oppression in the form of family* violence*, poverty, sexism*, racism, and other ideological* and socioeconomic systems.

Pastoral care practices shifted along with this change in theological perspective. Pastoral caregivers have to sort out the internal and external causes of human suffering. For victims, pastoral caregivers must develop a plan to cope with abusive systems, help victims to mourn the losses they have sustained because of abuse, and encourage them to reorganize a new life of liberation from abuse. This three-stage healing process is based on a model of empowerment of victims of abuse rather than of confession*, repentance*, and penance*, which were characteristic of previous models. For abusers, pastoral care requires sorting out the factors of sin, abusive attitudes, and behavior (inevitably part of persons' histories) and helping victims develop another way of relating to persons nonviolently. To exercise power over victims, abusers rely on deception, claim authority, and often maintain impunity afterward – issues difficult to resolve in pastoral care and counseling.

JAMES NEWTON POLING

Acacian Schism, the break of communion (see Schism) between Rome and Constantinople (482–519) because of the emperor Zeno's *Heno-ticon. During this time, the popes became more independent of Constantinople, capital of the Byzantine Roman Empire; in 494 Gelasius differentiated the spiritual "authority" of the papacy and the temporal "power" of the Empire.

Accra Confession, a critique of the "neoliberal economics*" that has accompanied globalization*, issued by the World* Alliance of Reformed Churches in Accra, Ghana (2004), with statements beginning "We believe" and "We condemn" (cf. the Barmen Declaration). It condemns the spirit of competition, deregulation, and privatization that subordinates social obligations and the environment to capital accumulation and economic growth.

Acculturation, the process of adopting the behavior patterns of the culture in which one lives and/or the shared knowledge and values of a society; the assimilation of new ideas into one's culture; and ultimately, alienation from one's original culture (contrast with Inculturation).

Acœmetæ (Lat "Sleepless Ones"), name given to a monastery outside Constantinople that specialized in perpetual doxology and prayer, a forerunner in the organized monastic performance of laus perennis (perpetual prayer). Perhaps inspired by Syrian models, it was founded c410 near the Euphrates by an itinerant monk, Alexander, who was banished as a Messalian* (427) because of his rigorous emphasis on prayer and poverty. Reformed under its third leader, Marcellus, the monastery provided rules and leaders for subsequent foundations (e.g. the Studios* Monastery) and became renowned for its library and staunch defense of the Council of Chalcedon*.

DANIEL F. CANER

Acosta de Samper, Soledad (1833–1913, Colombia*), historian, novelist, journalist. She traveled extensively in Europe and the Americas while receiving a high level of education, especially for a woman of that time. An active and devoted Roman Catholic, she married José María Samper, a liberal politician, and had three daughters. One of the most important and prolific 19th-c. Colombian writers, she published travel journals, romantic novels, plays, cultural studies, critical literary essays, and biographies, as well as letters and articles for six magazines (each of which she edited for a time).

In all of her publications, she attempted to reconcile her Catholic faith with her quest for a more active role for women*.

WILLIAM ELVIS PLATA

Acts of the Apostles, Volume 2 of Luke-Acts, an anonymous narrative written post-70 and probably directed to Greek-speaking Christians throughout the Mediterranean world, telling of a Jewish sect's expansion from Jerusalem to Rome within the context of Roman imperial society (see Luke, Gospel of). Imperial values of order and stability, in a world with many ethnic, cultural, and religious differences, aimed to unite the world under one justice system. Religious traditions' fortunes depended on their compatibility with imperial norms.

The portrait of Acts' hero, Paul* (Acts 7:58–28:31), emerges in a period after his death when his legacy was contested. Was he a legitimate apostle, the apostle, or an apostle alongside the Twelve? Was he inferior or superior to them? Did Paul favor the established orders of society, like marriage, or was he a sexual ascetic who destabilized the social order? Did Paul renounce Judaism*, or was he a faithful Jew still? Acts portrays Paul as a faithful Jew, an apostle alongside but subordinate to Peter*, James*, and the Twelve*, who lived within the established social order, appealing to Roman justice and his Roman citizenship. He is depicted in a positive light to people with imperial values as a man of high status. He is a decisive man of action, with no mention being made of the letters he wrote.

Paul functioned as a model for Christians in his cordial relations with both Jewish and Gentile Christians, friendliness to authorities, willingness to appeal to Roman justice for protection, courage in the face of difficulty, and unwavering zeal for spreading the message of Christ to the ends of the earth.

Although split off from the Gospel of Luke when the fourfold collection of the Gospels was made, Acts joined the NT as the introduction to the "Apostles" section of the canon. Its story of the Twelve and Paul provided lenses for reading Paul's letters and the other epistles.

CHARLES H. TALBERT

Acts of Martyrs. This literary genre, highly popular in the 3rd and 4th c., was based on historical events, enhanced especially by christological typology*; it was intended to reinforce memory, to provide encouragement, and to facilitate spiritual formation.

The prototype was the account of the martyrdom of Eleazar and of the mother and her seven sons in 2 Macc 6–7, who withstood all threats and torture, and died bravely rather than allow themselves to be compromised by evil rulers. Some of the earliest Christian accounts were written in the style of simple courtroom trials (Justin*, c155; the Scillitan martyrs, 180). Others introduced the literary and theological embellishment that was to characterize later accounts (Polycarp*, c165; the martyrs of Lyon and Vienne, c170). The most popular 3rd-c. acts were those of Perpetua* and Felicitas in Carthage (c203) and of Cyprian* (257).

While according to more objective historical accounts most magistrates who tried Christians were not sadists, there are overtones in the martyr accounts of combating not political but demonic* power. The martyrs do battle with evil in the form of magistrates and opponents. Only the power of God, acting through the martyrs, can overcome such evil power. Family*, too, is sometimes part of the demonic power posed against them (e.g. Perpetua and Felicitas).

The power of God acting through martyrs is demonstrated in several ways. The process of martyrdom conforms to the Passion of Christ (the Christ typology, as is the case in the presentations of the martyrdom of Polycarp and of Blandina among the martyrs of Lyon). The power of the Holy* Spirit is demonstrated in prophecy and unusual courage (Perpetua and Felicitas). The courage of the martyrs often converts others on the spot (Perpetua and Felicitas, 2 Apology of Justin). The beginnings of a cult of the martyrs can be seen in the gathering and preservation of Polycarp's remains. The serious question of perseverance is addressed; e.g. Quintus the Phrygian in the Acts of Polycarp at first puts himself forward, then apostasizes*; Blandina's mistress fears that her slave Blandina will not persevere, but she becomes the rallying point of the whole group.

By the 4th c., the cult of the martyrs was in full swing; every catacomb* in Rome had its own martyrs, and other martyrdom accounts were produced, becoming more and more legendary. While these later accounts were written in times of peace to entertain and edify, the earlier accounts were written while the possibility of violent death for the faith was still real.

See also MARTYRDOM.

CAROLYN OSIEK

Acts of Philip. See PHILIP, ACTS OF.

Acts of Supremacy. See SUPREMACY, ACTS OF.

Adam and Eve (Heb for “man” and “life”), the first man and woman (Gen 2–3), thus the progenitors of the entire human race. Their eating of the fruit is said to have been the cause of later hardships (Gen 3:16–19) and of human sin* (Rom 5:12–14). Throughout Christian history, some emphasized that Eve, who alone had contact with the tempting serpent, was first led astray (1 Tim 2:14); yet even patriarchal interpretation affirmed that Adam, the decision maker, bore the chief responsibility. Both were affirmed to have been made in the image* of God (Gen 1:27), and Paul asserted that there is no difference between male and female “in Christ” (1 Cor 11:11–12; Gal 3:28). Later Adam was often viewed as foreshadowing Christ, and Eve as foreshadowing the church. Tatian* (late 2nd c.) was criticized for denying the salvation of Adam and Eve. During the Pelagian* controversy, it was debated whether their sin spread to others through imitation (Pelagianism) or through generation (see Original Sin). Since the Enlightenment*, many theologians have preferred to speak of “the first human beings,” without proper names, and to ask what features of the human condition might give rise to sin.

Adams, John (1735–1826), second president of the USA. Adams initially considered going into the ministry, but instead studied law. He maintained lifelong beliefs in a ruling God, morality, and an afterlife of reward or punishment. For Adams, a Deist*, traditional Christianity perverted Jesus’ moral teachings by turning them into confused doctrines about his divinity. Adams believed religion* was crucial because it reinforced the morality that a free nation required. He called the Bible “the most Republican Book in the World,” containing “the most profound philosophy” and “the most perfect Morality” ever, and yet he felt that misinterpretations of Scripture* had created tyrants and inspired unjust wars. JAMES P. BYRD

Addai and Mari, Liturgy of, the liturgical rite of the Church* of the East (in classical Syriac) used by the Chaldean*, Syriac*, and Malabar* churches. It is linked to the apostolic age through the Syriac legend (c400) “Doctrine of Addai” (Addai is the Syriac name for Thaddeus, a 1st-c. disciple of the apostle Thomas*). Its independent prototype, as historical and liturgical evidence shows, is Edessan* (c120–30), not Antiochene* (as was believed), although it includes some Antiochene vestiges. The earliest commentaries are those of Aphrahat* (4th c.), Theodore* of Mopsuestia, and Narsai (5th c.). It was the uniform liturgy throughout Mesopotamia postulated by the Synod of Seleucia-Ctesiphon (410), yet was subjected to many reforms, especially that of Isho‘yahb III (647–57).

The Liturgy of Addai and Mari is distinguished by its primitive constitution and austere simplicity. Three anaphoras* (eucharistic prayers) are conventionally celebrated: the Anaphora of the Apostles Addai and Mari; the Hallowing of Mar Nestorius*; and the Hallowing of Theodore of Mopsuestia. The ecclesiastical “menology” (liturgical calendar) has nine liturgical propers (texts changing from service to service).

Its liturgical cachet includes cantillation (intoned liturgical recitation), a solemn doxology, and incensation*. Its euchological hymnal, To Thee, O Lord, uniquely integrates what other churches call “the words of eucharistic institution” into successive hymns of thanksgiving and praise, and in the intercession that precedes the *epiclesis – the prayer through which, from an Orthodox perspective, believers “ascend to” the consecration (a mysterious, eternal reality, the changing of the bread and the wine into the True Body and the True Blood of Christ, which Christ effected once and for all).

SHAWQI N. TALIA

Addams, Jane (1859–1935), US reformer, educator, pacifist, democratic theorist. A member of the first generation of college-educated women, Addams called women to lead meaningful lives based on a “certain renaissance” of Christianity. Hull House, the pioneering settlement that she and a co-worker founded (1889), aimed at “mitigating” and “ameliorating” – Addams’s terms – the social, economic, and political upheavals triggered by the arrival of millions of immigrants in the USA from 1880 to 1915. Based on hospitality*, charity*, and concern for the weak, poor, and stranger, Hull House was never denominational, yet a Christian undercurrent permeated its many activities, uniting women and men in a community life of service in a “congested immigrant quarter” in Chicago. Addams’s loosely Quaker background helps to explain her later pacifism* as the stance most consistent with the teachings of Jesus, the great moral teacher. (Addams doubted the Incarnation.) For Addams, democracy encompasses social justice and civic peace, as well as individual rights, although she did not neglect ethical duties and obligations. Addams envisioned a providential role for the USA, as did Abraham Lincoln, who noted that “God’s purposes are not our own,” even for Americans, “the almost chosen people.” However, Addams’s sturdiest beliefs were in democracy, not in religious creeds.

JEAN BETHKE ELSHTAIN

Adiaphora, Adiaphorists. Adiaphorists hold some things or actions to be indifferent (Gk adiaphora), neither good nor evil in themselves. During the Reformation, however, some held that in a situation of confession (status confessionis*), acts that would otherwise be indifferent might constitute an erroneous witness* to the gospel*. The Pietists* typically held, against other Lutherans, that worldly pleasures, especially dancing and the theater, were intrinsically sinful rather than indifferent.

Adivasis, “original dwellers of the land” in India*, about 60–70 million indigenous people belonging to some 635 ethnocultural minority communities, which have been neither annihilated nor integrated into Indian society; subaltern communities called “tribal*” by the Indian administration. Most Christians in India are either Dalits* or Adivasis.

Adjuration, an urgent demand to do or stop doing something, rendered more solemn by being coupled with the name of God, e.g. the high priest saying to Jesus, “I adjure you by the living God, tell us if you are the Christ, the Son of God” (Matt 26:23) (contrast with Abjuration).

Adoptionism, a form of Adoptionism*, advocated in Spain and France in the 8th c., which Charlemagne* rejected as a heresy*.

Adoptionism, the term given by historians to any view that Jesus was a human being who was adopted as the Son of God at his baptism (cf. Mark 1:11), perhaps even at his resurrection (cf. Rom 1:4). The alternative understanding is that Jesus is the incarnation* of the second person of the Trinity*. See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER.

Adoration, worship* of God; veneration* of saints and of earthly authorities.

Advent (from Lat for “coming”). In the Western Church, the period of four Sundays before Christmas* or, in the Eastern Church, the period of six weeks also called “Nativity Fast.” The beginning of the church year, Advent is a time for commemorating Christ’s “first coming” and anticipating his “second* coming.” See also LITURGICAL YEAR.

Adventism (Lat Adventus, “coming; arrival”), a movement within Protestantism, arising particularly in mid-19th-c. North America, focusing on the imminent second coming of Jesus to destroy sin* and establish the everlasting Kingdom* of Heaven.

Emergence. Throughout its history, Christian thought has regularly included the prospect of the “second advent,” i.e. Jesus’ return to earth to establish the Kingdom* of God. This prospect has periodically erupted into renewed fervor in various Christian circles in connection with prophesied cataclysmic events or milestones. Such a resurgence marked the Second Great* Awakening, a revival in the northeastern USA and Great Britain in the 1800s. The emergence of this popular religious movement was based on Baptist and Methodist interpretations of the apocalyptic* books of Daniel* and Revelation*.

Central to the movement was William Miller* (1782–1849), a Baptist farmer and lay preacher in Low Hampton, New York. Miller and others calculated and preached Jesus’ return in 1843–44 to as many as 100,000 followers from various Protestant denominations. When their strongest prediction failed to materialize, in the “great disappointment” of October 22, 1844, most of their adherents left the movement. A nucleus of “Millerites” convened in Albany, New York, in 1845 to reaffirm their faith in an imminent, personal return of Jesus – an enduring central element in Adventist thought and teaching.

From this experience, the Adventist movement has evolved into several denominational groups, including the Advent Christian Church, the Church of God General Conference, and the Church of God (Seventh Day). The largest denomination is the Seventh-day Adventist Church (North America, 0.9 million [M] members; and 11.9 M in 204 other countries, especially in Central and South America [4.2 M], Africa [4.2 M], and Asia [2.4 M]). Formative in the history of this denomination were the speaking and writing of Ellen White*, a youthful follower of Miller whose lifelong guidance regarding the church’s teachings and organization derived from visionary experiences.

Adventists today embrace the core convictions of Christianity (although the non-trinitarian views of some early Adventists continue to be held by members of the Church of God General Conference). Characteristic beliefs, in addition to the emphasis on the second advent, typically include conditional immortality, according to which, at death, the individual abides in an unconscious condition until the eschatological resurrection. Most Adventists are Premillennialists*.

An early subcurrent within the Adventist movement was the observance of the seventh day of the week (Saturday) as symbolizing God's creatorship, the redemptive act at Calvary, and future re-creation. This Christian sabbatarian practice continues in the Church of God (Seventh Day) and the Seventh-day Adventist Church, and among non-Adventist Christians such as Seventh Day Baptists.

Seventh-day Adventist teachings uniquely emphasize a high-priestly ministry of Jesus in the heavenly sanctuary.

In keeping with their apocalyptic* heritage, Adventists tend to regard the world as declining spiritually. Their conviction concerning the "shortness of the time" (i.e. the end of time is near) translates into active evangelistic efforts to "warn" their fellow humans of all faiths about a soon-coming Judgment* and restoration of all things. While this has led to rapid membership growth, especially among Seventh-day Adventists, it has also in the past produced tension with fellow Christians. Recent decades have brought a more ecumenical spirit.

Adventists' pessimism regarding the fate of the present world does not deter them from engaging in social activism. Many early Millerites worked to end slavery* and, later, to foster educational programs for Americans of African descent. Liberation* theologians in South America recognize Seventh-day Adventist missionaries as their precursors in working on behalf of oppressed groups. Church-supported public health* programs and social work, as well as disaster relief and economic development projects, are common pursuits among Adventists in many countries. Church-affiliated educational institutions are disproportionately high among Adventists worldwide. These patterns derive from holistic attitudes that regard the human condition in its physical, mental, social, and spiritual dimensions as subject to the divine program of renewal already in this life.

Disagreements today focus more on the ordination of women* (favored in North America and Europe, opposed in South America, Africa, and the Confucian cultures).

Challenges. The Adventist experience sharpens the tension latent in all of Christianity, of living "between the times" – a challenge that grows with time. As Adventist groups move from sectarian to mainline church-type organizations, their eschatological thrust does not exempt them from the challenges of routinized corporate life. The question is then: how should the vitality of Millennialist fervor be transmuted into a more settled and mature spirituality? With the cultural diversity that accompanies mission outreach, Adventists are increasingly challenged to contextualize* thought and expression while maintaining essential unity in doctrine and polity worldwide. See also SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST WORSHIP; WHITE, ELLEN GOULD.

JOHN R. JONES

Advowson, the authority of a bishop to appoint a member of the clergy to a parish; or the authority of a layperson to "present" the nominee for appointment. See also PATRONAGE.

Aesthetics and Theology. The relationship between Christian theology and aesthetics has been creatively re-explored by a number of contemporary thinkers. Whereas traditional philosophical approaches to theology tended to privilege Western notions of knowledge (epistemology*), being (ontology*), or the good (ethics*), aesthetics opens Western theology to a more accessible domain of imagination and poetics. Whereas doctrinal theory tended to hierarchize and exclude, aesthetic experience tends to traverse and translate.

Though beauty was always considered one of the transcendental properties, going back to Thomas Aquinas* and medieval Scholasticism*, it was most emphatically in the 20th c. that an aesthetic renewal of Christian theology came to fruition. This took various forms. Within Catholic thought, one finds Hans Urs von* Balthasar's theological readings of literary and artistic works and Umberto Eco's retrieval of Thomistic poetics, in the wake of James Joyce. Within Jewish thinking, one witnesses a revival of mystical, Hasidic, and Kabbalistic writings on symbol, dream, and fable in such influential authors as Martin Buber*, Gershom Scholem, and Ernst Bloch (where the influence of German romanticism is also evident). Within the Orthodox tradition, one finds the mystical strains of Dostoyevsky's* poetics mixing with the semiotic musings of Julia Kristeva on the Virgin Mary and the Song of Songs or of John Zizioulas on messianism and eschatology. Finally, within the Protestant tradition of Bultmann* and Ricoeur*, one sees a more hermeneutic retrieval of the hidden existential meanings behind the great symbols, myths, and metaphors of the Christian narrative.

But it is doubtless in the so-called religious turn in contemporary Continental thought that we find one of the most robust debates on the relationship between aesthetics and theology. Here we encounter a curious blend of the traditions of mystical and patristic theology with sophisticated phenomenological analyses of icons*, images, poems, paintings, and liturgical acts. Perhaps the most influential figures to date are French thinkers like Jean-Luc Marion, Jean-Louis Chrétien, and Jean-Yves Lacoste, who seek – after Heidegger* and Derrida – to retrieve an aesthetics of religious intuition and presence within the biblical and theological traditions. And in the English-speaking world, we might also mention the work of David Tracy, John Manoussakis, Kevin Hart, and Richard Kearney, thinkers who attempt to explore the possibilities of a new poetics of religion in a post-modern age.

Aesthetics provides an opening up of the question of God* from a common space of experience, prior to issues of denominational doctrine and dogma*, systematic speculation, or Church dogmatics. As such it proposes a quasi-universal space where the Divine may present itself to peoples of very different cultures and religions. Thus it offers an ethic of interconfessional hospitality that readily accommodates non-Western perceptions of God and the sacred. The emergence of important work in comparative theology – notably by Christian scholars in dialogue with Hinduism (Francis Clooney) or Buddhism (Joseph O’Leary) – is promising in this regard. Where the traditional approach to Christian theology was characterized by explicitly Western notions of metaphysics and epistemology, the approach of a new poetics of God is more open to peoples of diverse religious persuasions and cultures. Where dogma divides, art reconciles. See also ARTS AND THEOLOGY; HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

RICHARD KEARNEY

Aeterni Patris. The encyclical of Leo* XIII (1879) encouraging the study of “Christian philosophy,” specifically that of Thomas Aquinas*, but not to the exclusion of other Christian thinkers, many of whom are named with appreciation.

Africa, Roman. Christianity came to Carthage and its region during the 2nd c.; there are written records of the Scillitan martyrs (c180) and Perpetua* (203). When Christians in Rome were still using Greek, the African Church began using Latin in its liturgy and produced the Old* Latin translation of the Bible. Early major figures include Tertullian* (c197–c220); Cyprian*, who dealt with moral and ecclesial issues raised by the first major persecution (250–58); and Arnobius and Lactantius* (3rd c.). Donatism* grew out of the persecution under Diocletian (303–5), creating a schism (formally ended in 411). Augustine* had a major influence on the Western Church’s understanding of the Trinity*, Christology*, evil*, and grace*. When the Vandals*, who were Arians*, invaded Africa (429), the Nicene Church continued, often under persecution. The reconquest of Africa under Justinian (534) brought the region back into contact with Constantinople; ironically, it became a center of opposition to the doctrinal policies of the emperors, first in the Three* Chapters controversy (543–53) and then in the monothelite* controversy (646–49). The Muslim Conquest (from 648) led to the end of the African Church, weakened by a succession of controversies. See also HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: NORTH AFRICA.

EUGENE TESELLE

AFRICAN AMERICAN CLUSTER

African American Churches and Their Theologies

African American Holiness

African American Literature and Christianity

African Americans and the Bible

African American Theologies

African American Churches and Their Theologies.

Neither formal confessional statements nor lengthy and learned treatises constituted the core of African American theologies. Rather the experience of slavery*, segregation, and other acts of involuntary servitude became the elements out of which black religious thought was forged. Although African Americans accepted Catholicism, joined various Protestant bodies, and developed their own separate denominations, the doctrines of these diverse religious organizations blended with foundational ideas that derived from their history as racially oppressed and economically marginalized peoples.

African Americans in the 18th to early 19th c. became Anglican, Dutch Reformed, Roman Catholic, Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational, and members of many other Christian movements. Each group promulgated particular doctrines that distinguished them from the others. Hence African American Baptists, like Euro-American Baptists, argued for immersion as the only mode of baptism*, just as African Methodists, like Wesleyan whites, stressed the sequential importance of salvation* and sanctification*. These allegiances, however, yielded to general Black theologies that transcended the denominational affiliations of African Americans.

Institutional Black religion before the Civil War existed mainly in the northeastern and midwestern areas of the USA. Though slavery had largely disappeared, African Americans in the North either had been slaves or experienced racial discrimination and violence outside of the South. Hence, their churches espoused liberationist* themes in their theological pronouncements. Henry Highland Garnet, a Presbyterian pastor in 1843, called on slaves to resist their masters and take their freedom. Frederick Douglass*, a onetime African* Methodist Episcopal (AME) Zion exhorter, similarly stressed the urgency of abolitionism. Christianity among slaves emphasized hermeneutic approaches to Scripture that affirmed the humanity of African Americans and expressed belief in divine deliverance from bondage.

The Civil War seemed a prophetic fulfillment as black chaplains served black troops in the Union army and black soldiers viewed their service as ordained by God. Theophilus G. Steward, an AME minister, best expressed the mindset of black church leaders who evangelized in the defeated Confederacy and collectively declared that "I seek my brethren." Some started churches and others simultaneously served as officeholders in Reconstruction governments. One AME congregation in Raleigh, North Carolina, explicitly espoused the freedom theme by calling itself the Lincoln Church because it possessed a statue of the martyred president and emancipator Abraham Lincoln. Black Millennialism* supplemented the liberationist thrust of black religious thinking in the late 19th c. The search for a glorious African past discovered in Scripture and biblical history provided evidence for contemporary claims of civic and human equality. These perspectives were persuasively presented in Benjamin T. Tanner's exploration The Color of Solomon – What? (1895), Henry M. Turner's declaration that "God is a Negro" (1898), and other Afrocentric texts.

Although 20th-c. African American churches pursued the salvation* of souls and developed Social* Gospel programs, black religious intellectuals mainly in the 1930s and 1940s in both campus and church settings articulated a theology that aimed morally to discredit legalized Jim Crow. Mordecai W. Johnson, Benjamin E. Mays, Howard Thurman*, William Stuart Nelson, George Kelsey, and other scholars advanced critiques arguing that racial segregation and discrimination were sinful and immoral. Their pastoral counterparts, William Holmes Borders, Archibald J. Carey, Jr., Vernon Johns, Adam Clayton Powell, Jr., and others in pulpits throughout the nation echoed the theme that US apartheid was morally wrong. Inspired by Mahatma Gandhi and the fight for India's independence from Great Britain, these black professors and preachers embraced satyagraha, or soul force, as a philosophical foundation for civil disobedience and nonviolent direct action. Martin Luther King*, Jr., James M. Lawson, and other activists in SCLC, CORE, SNCC, the NAACP and other groups drew from these ideas, and discredited and destroyed legalized racial segregation and discrimination. These African American Christian and Gandhian ideas, however, were engaged with the influential perspectives of the Nation of Islam, which rejected the "beloved community" as an objective for the civil rights movement and nonviolence as a tactic to achieve black equality.

The Black Theology Movement, which formally started in 1966 with the publication of James H. Cone's classic Black Theology and Black Power, challenged white churches and US society to recognize that authentic justice meant that the material condition of the disadvantaged had to be changed (see Black Theology). James Forman in The Black Manifesto of 1968 actually called on white churches to appropriate sizable sums to address the economic needs of impoverished poor and black communities.

DENNIS C. DICKERSON

African American Holiness emphasized the necessity of living a sinless life through the Holy* Spirit's empowerment – sanctification* being a “second blessing” occurring after salvation*. The Holiness Movement developed among black Christians (late 18th–early 19th c.) under the influence of Wesleyan theology (see Methodism Cluster: Methodist Churches and Their Theology). Richard Allen*, first bishop in the African* Methodist Episcopal Church (AME), alluded to this process in his autobiographical conversion narrative. Similarly, Jarena Lee*, whom Allen authorized to preach, discussed her anxious pursuit of sanctification and the holiness that proceeded from it. Holiness was also promoted by other 19th-c. black female preachers, including Sojourner* Truth, the abolitionist and women's rights advocate, and Amanda Berry Smith, an AME evangelist and transatlantic Holiness preacher (late 19th c.). The Zion Union Apostolic Church (1869) was the first organized group of Holiness blacks, but the movement occurred mainly within existing African American churches, including black Baptist churches. Other black ministers learned Holiness doctrine from predominantly white religious groups. William Seymour*, the movement's principal Pentecostal preacher, attended a Holiness Bible school and became affiliated with the Evening Light Saints.

Seymour started (1906) marathon worship services in Los Angeles, California, where pilgrims worldwide came to affirm their holiness and to receive the gift of glossolalia* (speaking in tongues). At Azusa* Street, Holiness blacks and whites experienced glossolalia and the Pentecostal fervor described in Acts 2, and Holiness ministers secured spiritual authority to establish innumerable new black and white denominations that institutionalized the Holiness Movement during the 20th c.

DENNIS C. DICKERSON

African American Literature and Christianity. The Bible was the subtext of most early African American literature (1760–1820). Early black authors were concerned about political and social events (especially slave* trade and slavery) in West Africa, England, and the Americas and also about 18th-c. theological debates, most significantly the Calvinist*–Arminian* controversy. Virtually all these authors were Calvinists, influenced by Jonathan Edwards* or the Countess of Huntingdon and her preachers, George Whitefield* and William Romaine. Africanist Calvinism was replaced by a free*-will Evangelicalism embodied in new black churches and denominations as well as in abolitionist literature (1820–65). Free-will Christianity (see Free Will, Freedom) provided metaphors and themes for uplift (1880–1920), Harlem Renaissance (1920–30), and civil* rights (1950–1970) literature. Beginning about 1960, black Christianity was criticized by the Nation of Islam. Today African American literary artists mine the Bible for language, but rarely delve into theological issues.

Early black authors chose Scriptures emphasizing divine providence* and God's care for the chosen people. Joseph* and the Israelites* in Egypt were prominent and Scriptures that corroborated the predestinarianism* of some West African religions and Islam. The Bible, for some, displaced the Qur'an as the archetypal sacred text, but some slaves practiced Islam in the New World. Africanist Calvinism was anti-slavery and pro-black. According to black Calvinists, God had ordained the slave trade and slavery much as he had commanded the Israelites' and Jesus' sufferings, but in the late 18th c. God's power and design were revealed in overruling the slavers' sins and inspiring the Christian North Atlantic world to eradicate the slave trade and slavery. Like Joseph in Gen 45:4–8, black Calvinists claimed insight into God's predestined design.

The birth of free-will Evangelicalism and the decline of Calvinism fostered

another approach to Scripture, deeply felt, pointedly abolitionist, yet more humanist than theological. Antebellum blacks emphasized Jesus' benevolence and concern for the lowly and the Israelites' escape from Egyptian slavery. Evolving uses of Scripture are evident in changes in approaches to Exodus*. Black Calvinists had emphasized the continuity with the Joseph story and God's power over Pharaoh and the divine determination to display glory through the Egyptians' suffering and the Israelites' escape. Antebellum black Evangelicals streamlined Exodus into the escape of the Israelites. Modern black literature (since 1865) often displays either a Christian-humanist use of Scripture to criticize racism* or an anti-Christian hostility to a religion that supposedly encourages the lowly in society to be meek and patient. See also ETHICS AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: ETHIC OF RISK AND WOMANIST ETHICS.

JOHN SAILLANT

African Americans and the Bible. See BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER: IN NORTH AMERICA: BY AFRICAN AMERICANS.

African American Theologies are as diverse as the histories and cultures that have produced them. "Under the bush arbor" meetings (outdoors worship services), slave* communities made sense of their oppression. In liturgies of praying, singing, admonishing, and preaching, they produced a slave theology. Among literate slaves and free persons, theology was usually biblical and evangelical. It emphasized conversion* and eschatological themes of freedom* and judgment*. It developed in journals, diaries, tracts, manifestos, and sermons that foregrounded divine justice* and liberation* for the oppressed and judgment against the evils of slavery. In historically black colleges and universities, academic theology was taught by New England educated whites whose theologies were biblical and evangelical. By the 20th c., African American theology was widely diffused among theological liberalism*, Boston Personalism, and the Social* Gospel. In the 1960s, during the Black Power Movement, a Black* theology of liberation emerged as a Northern urban reaction to white supremacy and the urban plight. While Process* theology has gained importance among some theologians, Black theology and its womanist* development remain a dominant influence in contemporary African American theological contexts. The best of contemporary constructive theology makes use of all these historical sources. See also BLACK THEOLOGY; WOMANIST AND AFRICAN AMERICAN THEOLOGIES.

VICTOR ANDERSON

African Christianity: Challenges. See THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION IN AFRICA: ISSUES IT FACES.

AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES CLUSTER

African Instituted Churches (AICs)
in Central Africa

African Instituted Churches (AICs)
in Eastern Africa

African Instituted Churches (AICs)
in Southern Africa

African Instituted Churches (AICs)
in West Africa

African Instituted Churches (AICs) in Central Africa. See KIMBANGUISM.

African Instituted Churches (AICs) in Eastern Africa date to the first decades of the 20th c., starting with the Nomiya Luo Mission in 1914. AICs are movements of renewal founded and led by charismatic men and women who derive their authority and legitimacy from their conviction of being called and guided by God. Varied in origin, history, theology, practice, and period of emergence, these Charismatic* churches are African responses to Christianity aimed at shaping Christian experience according to African cultures and under African leadership. Most numerous in Kenya – more than 6 million members in 700 denominations, 20% of Christians, but only 1.9% in Tanzania and 3.7% in Uganda – they draw the majority of their adherents from the rural and urban poor.

Despite their diversity, East African AICs have much in common in their theology and religious experience, which are contextual in nature – incorporating aspects of African culture and spirituality* – and rooted in the Bible following praxis-oriented interpretations. Like those of other churches, their theologies are centered on Christology*, pneumatology*, and ecclesiology*. AICs' practices include a strong missionary outreach across ethnic and national boundaries, a rigorous ethical code, concern for social and individual salvation revolving around healing rituals, a quest for holiness, a great sense of community, and innovative liturgy. They affirm women's leadership roles and a liberating experience of God for women, no longer fettered by limitations ascribed to them by culture, although women's functions are often limited to ceremonial roles as dictated by culture. AICs are liberating in that they provide their members with coping mechanisms to respond to the myriad challenges posed by a society in flux.

AICs' concern for holistic salvation* (or healing*) for both individual and society is a challenge for Western and African mainline churches with their emphasis on rationality, individualism, and a dualistic* conception of reality.

While traditional patterns of leadership tempered with borrowings from mainline church structures may promote church growth, and ensure group consolidation and means of solving conflicts, AICs are vulnerable to secessionist tendencies. Stress on pneumatic charismatic experiences has also rendered the movement vulnerable to numerous schisms. Though still vibrant, especially in rural and urban slums, AICs are threatened and challenged by the Western-influenced Charismatic churches and ministries that have invaded the religious landscape in Eastern Africa since the mid-1980s.

PHILOMENA N. MWAURA

African Instituted Churches (AICs) in Southern Africa. Since the 19th c., AICs have emerged from African initiatives fully or partially rooted in the Christian faith. They were founded by charismatic African leaders in a quest for independence from mainline churches, be it for political or racial, theological, or economic reasons. Scholars often refer to AICs as sectarian, separatist, heretical, or nativistic. Other scholars designate them as spiritual, Charismatic*, or Pentecostal* or by the names these churches use for themselves, such as Ethiopian, Zionist, and Apostolic. In 1995, South* Africa had more than 3,000 such churches, with an estimated 13 million adherents (a third of the population), the largest AIC being the Zion Christian Church. In addition to AICs that originated in South Africa, Zimbabwe* has sizable indigenous churches, especially the African Apostolic Church of Johane Maranke (almost 1 million members). In Botswana*, Zambia*, Malawi*, and Mozambique*, most AICs originated in South Africa and Zimbabwe. In both Zambia (less than 4% of the population) and Mozambique (c5% of the population), the numerous AICs are relatively small. But in Botswana, where AICs had become by 1995 the largest church group, and in Malawi (about 12% of the population), AICs have mushroomed at a tremendous rate since the 1970s, as they did in Southern Africa as a whole.

All the numerous and diverse AICs are "syncretistic*" (or, from another perspective, "inculturated*") and autonomous in relation to mission churches. They consider themselves Christians and view the OT and NT as normative and the main source of their teachings that most often bring together Christianity and African* Traditional Religion and culture.

The threefold thrust of AICs' theology is Christology*, pneumatology*, and ecclesiology*. Members confess the lordship of Jesus and how he meets African people at the point of their needs (often designating him by culture-loaded phrases like "our Ancestor*," the "African King," or "Healer of Heaven"). Their faith is centered on the Holy* Spirit; they practice prophetic healing* ministry and salvation because of their belief in evil powers and witchcraft. They operate as a community, where both women and men assume leadership roles. Their innovative liturgies combine African religious worldviews with Christianity, involve singing, hand clapping, dancing, praying, and making pilgrimages to shrines. Various organizations of AICs give them a sense of belonging, even as individual AICs represent for Africans a “place to feel at home,” unlike mainline Christianity, against which they protest.

TABONA SHOKO

African Instituted Churches (AICs) in West Africa belong to the global Charismatic* Movement. West African countries, particularly Nigeria*, have witnessed a great proliferation of AICs.

The Liberian William Wade Harris (1825–1929) was one of the earliest West African Christian prophets. His prophetic visions and preaching date from 1913 in Côte* d’Ivoire and 1914 in the Gold Coast (Ghana*). The Harrist Church grew rapidly, Harris preaching and healing throughout the region. In Ghana, the first AIC (1918), Church of the Twelve Apostles, was started by Harris’s converts Grace Tani and Kwesi John Nackabah; it had c200,000 adherents in 2000. The Harrist tradition motivated the emergence of several other churches in Côte d’Ivoire and Ghana.

In Western Nigeria, the Aladura Movement comprises a set of AICs of a common type but of diverse origins that arose among the Yoruba in 1918. The name “Aladura” (Yoruba for “one who prays”) is the Nigerian equivalent of “Zionism” in South* Africa. Aladura churches initially emerged as prayer groups in “mission churches.” They emphasize the power of God to protect, heal, and help believers in their lives; they view their leaders as prophets and practice Spirit possession in the forms of speaking in tongues* and visions as means of revelation; they stress personal holiness as the distinctive Christian style of life. “Holy water” and oil are extensively used as symbols of purification.

The Celestial Church of Christ (Église du Christianisme Céleste), founded in Porto-Novo (Dahomey, now Benin*) by Samuel Bilewu Joseph Oshoffa (1947), is the fastest-growing and most structured West African AIC, having increased from 254 to 2,316 parishes between 1976 and 1998.

AICs’ theologies and practices are deeply rooted in the Bible, with a strong sense of Christology*, pneumatology*, and Mariology* (specifically in Celestial churches). Their self-reliant ecclesiology* is liberating because it empowers women* and has an African style of worship, including contextual liturgical and ritualistic practices. Their missionary visions transcend ethnic barriers. Socially, they excel in their holistic approach to human needs, making each individual believer a whole person fully integrated into a community. However, AICs are constantly threatened from within by power struggles for leadership and from without by confrontations with Western Charismatic and mission churches.

The AICs’ ability to translate African spirituality and culture into a Christian ethos for underprivileged societies, where many struggle to find dignity and identity in the face of brutal exploitation, distinguishes them as a contextual Christianity that inaugurates what some call an “African Reformation.” See also NIGERIA.

VALENTIN DEDJI

African Literature (Anglophone) and Christianity. In colonial Africa, Christianity and literacy went hand in hand. The Bible was most influential in shaping African literature, its language, and its form.

Writing in Anglophone Africa was almost always centered around the Christian mission and the Bible – the ur-text of translation and conversion. Missionaries created, structured, and controlled the institutions responsible for the emergence of a culture of letters and for the reduction of African languages into writing by translating the Bible into hundreds of African languages. In the colonial landscape, the Bible as the book of God became associated with the authority of writing; for many writers, it was the most powerful model of imaginative literature.

West African literature, e.g. has its roots in the Church Missionary Society at Abeokuta, where, beginning in the late 1840s, repatriated slaves led by Bishop Samuel Ajayi Crowther* produced primers and a translation of the Bible.

In Southern Africa, the elite writers were based at the Scottish mission at Lovedale and the French mission at Morija. Sol Plaatje, whose novel Mhudi was one of the first works of fiction in English, was initially a translator of the Bible at Kimberley. These writers' works echo the biblical stories and their cadences. Even works that barely mention the Bible, such as the allegorical narratives of the Yoruba writers Daniel Fagunwa and Amos Tutuola, reflect the allegorical and providential language of the OT or Bunyan's* Pilgrim's Progress. Works by harsh critics of the Christian mission – e.g. Ngugi wa Thiong'o's The River Between and A Grain of Wheat – draw their primary metaphors and themes from the Bible. Chinua Achebe's classic novel, Things Fall Apart, is perhaps more suffused with biblical idiom than any other work of African literature, even though it associates Christianity with colonialism.

SIMON GIKANDI

African Literature (Francophone) and Christianity. With the Bible in one hand and a gun in the other, Europeans conquered African populations and proceeded to convert them, in the process changing not only their political and economic organizations, but also their traditional religious beliefs and practices. The introduction of writing, by Christian missionaries, in Francophone Africa affected the traditional oral literature (tales, epic, mythological, and panegyric narratives) and marked the beginnings of written literature in French.

Many of the Francophone writers depict Christianity as a theme of cultural and symbolic domination, a manifestation of mental alienation, a tool for European colonialism*, imperialism, and expansion. This critique appeared, e.g. in the novels of the Cameroonian Mongo Beti: Le pauvre Christ de Bomba (The poor Christ of Bomba, 1956). V. Y. Mudimbe from the Democratic Republic of Congo represented a similar critique in regard to Christian heritage. His novels Entre les eaux (1971; Between Tides, 1991) and L'Écart (1979; The Rift, 1993) illustrate a situation in which religion, politics, and intellectual divides of African ideas (including animism*, fetishism, and paganism*) are confronted by modernity that is carried through the written word and Christian teachings. Other writers underscored Africa's indebtedness to Christianity with regard to modernity, progress, and civilization. The Rwandan Alexis Kagame is an example. His La Divine pastorale (The divine pastoral, 1952) and La Naissance de l'univers (The birth of the universe, 1955) are biblical epic poems that draw on Rwandan pastoral poetry as they transpose biblical themes into African narratives: the hero they portray is God the creator surrounded by angels as taught in the Christian liturgy and the Bible.

While most African texts denounce the alienating effects linked to Christianity, a small portion of them point out the civilizing outcome of evangelization and praise the Africanization of the biblical teachings and symbols.

ANTHÈRE NZABATSINDA

African Literature (Lusophone) and Christianity. The first African texts written in Portuguese that overtly deal with Christianity are the letters of King Afonso of the Congo, sent to the kings of Portugal, Manuel I and João III (early 16th c.). Afonso, a devout convert to Christianity, was increasingly horrified by the discrepancy between Christian ideals and the slave-trading practices of the Portuguese priests sent to spread the gospel. In many ways, the tone of Afonso's texts is repeated throughout Lusophone African literary history by writers who highlight the hypocrisy of Catholic praxis in the Portuguese colonies. In 1940, the Portuguese dictator, Salazar, and the Vatican signed a concordat, effectively formalizing the Roman Catholic Church's support for Portuguese imperialism. Not surprisingly, the Church was disliked by those who struggled for independence, many of whom were part of the first generation of writers in the newly independent nations. Well-known examples include Agostinho Neto, the first president of Angola* and a formidable poet, and Amílcar Cabral, one of Lusophone Africa's most cultured intellectuals, who was assassinated shortly before the independence of Cape* Verde and Guinea-Bissau. Against this backdrop of distrust of the Catholic Church, Protestant missions had a key role, particularly in Mozambique* and Angola, in educating the future cultural and leadership elites. They undertook systematized research into local languages and translated the "Buku" (the Bible) into Bantu languages, rendering it both a literacy aid and a comprehensible instrument of proselytization. With regard to Christianity, modern Lusophone African literature generally follows two trends. Writers like the Angolan Pepetela and Abdulai Sila, from Guinea-Bissau, humorously attack the vestiges and resurgence of Christian hypocrisy in the equally hypocritical practices of malfunctioning Marxist states. Another current, led by the Angolan Ana Paula Tavares and the Mozambican Paulina Chiziane, owes a profound debt to the syncretic appropriation of Christianity by Lusophone Africa.

PHILLIP ROTHWELL

African Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church, though initiated in 1787 among African Americans in the newly organized Free African Society, bears the marks of Wesleyan theology and practice. The founder, Richard Allen* (1760–1831), a Delaware slave, embraced Christianity (1777) after hearing a Methodist circuit rider preach. Allen and other blacks adopted Methodism* and became enthusiastic practitioners and supporters. After his manumission from slavery (1783), he traveled and preached as a Methodist exhorter. Invited by St. George Church, Philadelphia, to minister to local blacks (1786), he drastically increased the number of black parishioners, making the dominant Wesleyan whites increasingly uncomfortable. The racial confrontation that moved Allen to establish a separate black congregation occurred either in 1787 or in the early 1790s (historians disagree). The dedication of Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church (1794) showed that institutional independence would become a pattern among African American Christians.

Extemporaneous sermons stressing sanctification* and salvation*, enthusiastic singing, and emotional displays that gave evidence of deep spirituality characterized Wesleyan worship experiences within both urban congregations and rural camp* meetings. Exposed to this version of Methodism in the Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania backcountry, Allen was dismayed that in Philadelphia and Baltimore Wesleyan whites had grown so formal that they showed the same signs of moribund Anglicanism from which John Wesley* had found escape. The rise of racial discrimination and equivocation on slavery* within Methodist institutions known for racial inclusiveness demonstrated, for Allen, a decline in the robust spirituality for which Methodists had been known. The creation of African Methodism became a twofold effort to renounce the racism* of Wesleyan whites and to associate blacks with a zealous Methodist evangelicalism.

This religious movement became institutionalized (1800–20) as Allen created an autonomous denomination through judicial enactment that included other congregations in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and New Jersey. Allen became the denomination's first bishop (1816). The AME Church spread throughout the non-slave areas of the USA and in Canada – with some inroads into Louisiana, Kentucky, Missouri, and (briefly) South Carolina. The denomination's defiance of Wesleyan whites added an emancipatory ethos* to its Methodist emphasis on evangelical preaching and saving the souls* of embattled free blacks and fugitives from slavery.

That day of "jubilee" seemed on the horizon as the nation moved toward civil war. Numerous AME Church ministers and members joined the Union army, some as chaplains who, during the Reconstruction period, pursued politics to safeguard the newly won rights of African Americans. They rapidly organized congregations throughout the former Confederacy. The denomination's membership rapidly grew to 400,000 by 1880. Already in Haiti* (1824), the AME Church expanded in the late 19th c. in the Caribbean – Dominican* Republic, British Guiana, Bermuda, and Cuba*. Bishop Henry M. Turner, a Civil War chaplain, Georgia legislator, and African emigrationist, took African Methodism to Liberia* and Sierra* Leone (1891) and to South* Africa (1896). Afrocentrism also affected the denomination's intellectual life. Three bishops, Benjamin W. Arnett, Benjamin T. Tanner, and Henry M. Turner, emphasized the African origins of Christianity, the color of Solomon, and the blackness of God.

During the 20th c., the massive migration of African Americans to Northern urban and industrial areas expanded denominational consciousness and participation in Social* Gospel ministries. Clergy such as Reverdy C. Ransom in Chicago and others in New York City inaugurated programs that addressed the effects of poverty*, unemployment, and various social pathologies. The civil* rights movement (1950s–1960s) laid the foundation for the activism of Rev. J. A. DeLaine of South Carolina and Rev. Oliver L. Brown of Kansas in a successful assault on public school segregation in the landmark Brown decision (1954). Moreover, the black power era gave birth to the Black* Theology Movement, which included such prominent proponents as James H. Cone, Cecil W. Cone, and Jacqueline Grant. They argued that God identified with the suffering and oppression of the disadvantaged and that Jesus Christ should be viewed as a liberator for the poor, persons of color, and women who battle gender bias. These theological explorations influenced the preaching and praxis of the AME Church and other religious bodies. Moreover, neo-Pentecostalism* (the Charismatic* Movement), which stressed the power and presence of the Holy* Spirit, motivated numerous pastors and parishioners to develop megachurches* in several US urban areas.

By 2000, the AME Church existed on four continents with 2.5 million members. Twenty bishops oversee 19 episcopal districts and an ecumenical office, and nine general officers administer the denominational departments. Expansion into new areas of Africa, which began during the 1990s, and growing pressure to include more persons outside the USA in denominational leadership represent unfinished tasks for the AME Church. See also AFRICAN AMERICAN CLUSTER: CHURCHES AND THEIR THEOLOGIES and AFRICAN AMERICAN HOLINESS.
DENNIS C. DICKERSON

African Missions, Society of (Societas Missionum ad Afros, SMA), a community of Roman Catholic missionaries, founded in 1856, has some 1,800 priests, brothers, and lay missionaries in 16 countries, serving the people of Africa and those of African descent, seeking to witness to the gospel while preserving the culture of African people.

AFRICAN RELIGION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

African Religion and Christianity: An African Religious Perspective

African Religion and Christianity: A Christian Perspective

African Religion and Christianity: Cultural Interactions

African Religion and Christianity: Reading the Bible from an African Religious Perspective

African Religion and Christianity: An African Religious Perspective. From the perspective of practitioners of African Religion (also called African Traditional Religion), although there are different customary interpretations of and practices within it, one must speak of African Religion in the singular, in the same way that one speaks of Christianity in the singular, although there are many denominational and cultural interpretations of and practices within it.

African Religion is not a religion of the book. A religion of life into which one is born and in which generations after generations flourish, it is disseminated, exercised, and restored orally, along with all other aspects of African culture, philosophy, medicine, law, and history – although, in the same way that storytelling gave rise to African* literature, in Eastern Africa, African religious traditions are being gathered into what the compilers (led by David Maillu) call a sacred book, “The Ka, Holy Book of Neter” (the soul of God).

African Religion is founded on the belief that there is a Universal Force behind creation, as is the case in Christianity. Thus when one compares the African stories of the creation and the biblical story of creation one finds many similarities, though striking differences appear (see Present Cluster: Reading the Bible from an African Religious Perspective). Since practitioners of African Religion think of God primarily as “force” or “energy,” conscious and purposeful, but not as a person, they find references to God as “Father” (or “Mother”), as in Christianity, surprising. Yet the most striking difference is that for African Religion there is no hell or heaven or paradise. African Religion does believe in the continuation of the human spirit after death. People are born innocent and sinless. Earthly sins are judged and punished during one’s life. Thus practitioners of African Religion find it difficult to comprehend the Christian conception that humans are born with original* sin for which they have to repent, along with the other sins they commit, and this in order to be “saved” from eternal punishment* in hell* and granted eternal life in paradise* or heaven*.

DAVID G. MAILLU

African Religion and Christianity: A Christian Perspective. As a distinctive way of viewing and structuring human relationships to sacred reality, African Religion is alive. Despite vigorous campaigns against it by Christianity, it survives on its own or underlies Christian religious beliefs and practices. This has been called “double or parallel religious consciousness,” in which African Religion and Christianity exist side by side, externally as systems and in psyches as convictions*, without deep mutual contact. People draw spiritual sustenance from one or the other as the occasion demands.

God*, featuring prominently in Christian belief, is present in African religious perceptions, but ancestors* are most frequently venerated and addressed in prayer. They are the immediate actors in human affairs; God is appealed to when everything else fails. Although ancestral shrines have largely disappeared in compounds, they remain in many hearts. In the etiology of blessings, as in that of suffering, ancestors appear foremost in personal or social consciousness.

Whereas Christianity recruits adherents in various ways, African Religion does not proselytize. People are born into it and individuals are generally free to follow other religions, provided that these serve to increase personal and social life forces.

Apart from traditions and customs of the community handed down through the ancestors and inculcated at initiation and during other rites of passage, there is no codified religious doctrine as there is in Christianity. The domain of religion is life in its entirety; everything is sacred or has sacred implications.

Christianity and African Religion differ in their perception of "salvation*," humanity's ultimate goal. There is no single savior figure in African Religion, and Jesus of Christianity is best understood to be the original or proto-ancestor who brings physical healing and spiritual deliverance to humanity. Death* is a transformation whose final state depends on how one has lived on earth, as in certain forms of Christianity. To live on after death is in African Religion to become an ancestor.

Unlike Christianity, African Religion does not view suffering* as a manifestation of "evil" in abstract terms, but ultimately as a result of human agency, seen most vividly in the acts of witches*. Maintaining harmonious relationships with fellow human beings and the rest of creation is the most important ethical requirement, because not doing so risks disturbing good order and bringing down disaster (i.e.

witchcraft). Morality and ethics* are communal, aiming at maximum attention to harmony.

LAURENTI MAGESA

African Religion and Christianity: Cultural Interactions. The arrival of Christianity (with its texts: the Bible, hymn books, prayer books, and catechism books) in tropical Africa with Western missionaries brought the encounter of a powerful literary culture with an oral culture*. In the African mind, culture and religion are not separated. African people could have been absorbed by the new reality; yet they struggled to stay afloat as Africans, using four strategies.

1. Total Rejection of Christianity. A small number of Africans rejected Christianity, embracing reconstituted forms of African Religion. Their rituals include animal sacrifice and worship in the form of invocation of God, the divinities, and the ancestors*. Their theologians compile the scriptures of these religions, comprising prayers, songs, rites, and observances, collected orally from practitioners (see present cluster: An African Religious Perspective, Discussion of "The Ka, Holy Book of Neter"). Goddianism (Nigeria) and Afrikanism (Ghana) are examples of reconstituted forms of African Religion.

Goddianism originated among the Igbo in Nigeria and is found in many parts of Africa (and also among Africans in Europe, Latin America, North America, and Asia). The name refers to the worship of God according to the beliefs and practices of African Religion. Goddianism originated in the context of political nationalist movements of resistance to colonial rule in Nigeria*. In 1949, the miners at the Enugu coal mine organized a demonstration to demand a pay raise. The colonial police killed nine demonstrators. As neither the Roman Catholic nor the Anglican Church in Enugu (led by white clergy) would permit the funeral service organized by the Miners' Union to be held on their premises, even though the dead were regular members of these churches, the Miners' Union held the funeral service in Aba, a nearby town, using traditional religious rites and songs, and invoking the ancestors, in defiance of the Christian churches' rejection of ancestor worship. A religious wing of one of the political parties became the National Church of Nigeria, renamed "Goddianism" in 1962 by its leader, Chief K. O. K. Onyioha.

Afrikania was founded in 1982 by Rev. Vincent Kwabena Dumuah, a former Roman Catholic priest of the Wasa Amanfi ethnic group in Ghana*. Dumuah defined Afrikania as a "refined African Religion." Emphasizing Afrocentrism, Afrikania asserts that to worship God authentically Africans must do so in their own way. After his ordination to the priesthood (1957), Dumuah studied at various universities in the USA (Ph.D. from Howard, 1971). After a successful career as a priest in Ghana, and a period of involvement in political activities, he left the Catholic Church and the priesthood (1982) and founded the Afrikania Mission, calling for a return to African beliefs, worship, and rituals.

2. Rejection of the Western Form of Christianity and Its Replacement by an African Form of Christianity. This is the strategy of the African* Instituted Churches. It originated when African Christians discovered in the Bible a Jesus somewhat different from that of the missionaries. In contrast to the missionaries' Jesus, who was interested only in the salvation* of souls*, they discovered a Jesus concerned about the material well-being of people: he healed the sick, fed the hungry, welcomed the outcast, and liberated the oppressed. They proclaimed this Jesus more relevant, focusing their ministry on the total well-being of people, materially and spiritually, communally and individually. They preached penance, fasting, confession of sins, and conversion of heart. They healed the sick and integrated politics, economics, and community, typically integrating African religious concerns into their teachings and practices.

3. "Syncretism" (in the Missiologist Sense). Africans who have accepted Christianity manage to stay religiously afloat by resorting to indigenous religious sacrifices and other rituals when their religious sensibilities are not satisfied in moments of crisis. This has continued in spite of persistent condemnation by the missionary churches, although syncretism* as a phenomenon is found throughout the history of the church and is often difficult to distinguish from "inculturation*."

4. "Inculturation." This has been a way of transforming missionary Christianity from within to make it adequately sensitive to African culture. The early Christian missionaries saw African Religion as incompatible with Christianity and did not allow any element of it in the church. However, African Christians found ways of circumventing this. Whenever they had a church assembly outside official church services and without a priest or minister, the songs they sang were not imported Western hymns but improvised and unwritten tunes that their local choir-masters, musicians, and group leaders composed from biblical texts or Christian teaching using indigenous music forbidden in the church. They carried this inculturated, grassroots Christianity to the marketplace and the fields. When this ongoing inculturation process was studied, African culture and African Religion came to be seen first as a preparation for the gospel (1970s, as Eusebius* and early Apologists* viewed Greek philosophy as preparing Hellenistic people to receive the gospel) and later as a veritable resource for Christian theology (from the 1980s).

Today, inculturation is a trademark of African Christianity as it seeks to develop an integrated African form of Christianity that would avoid the divided attitudes involved in syncretism and remain consonant with missionary Christianity.

JUSTIN UKPONG

African Religion and Christianity: Reading the Bible from an African Religious Perspective. To consider African Religion from the perspective of the Bible and to read the Bible from the perspective of African Religion is to continue a dialogue that started long ago. The people of ancient Israel did not live in isolation. They interacted with other nations, including ones in Africa (referred to as Cush in the HB). The question is: Are African religious traditions and the Bible exclusive of each other, as North Atlantic missionaries commonly viewed them? Or are they complementary in a quest for an African expression of Christianity that is necessary because, as Molefi Asante says, "If your God cannot speak to you in your language, then he is not your God"?

The existence of a creator* God* is taken for granted both in the Bible and in African Religion. In Gen 1:1 the creator God is called Elohim. Since in Semitic languages "El" generally refers to any god, "Elohim" means the sum total of the gods, or the supreme God, God of Gods. Beginning in Gen 2:4, God is called YHWH*, the name revealed to Moses (Exod 3:14; "I Am Who I Am," later abbreviated as "I Am"), possibly meaning the ever active God who was, is, and will be. In African Religion, the names of God are also important. For instance, among the Yoruba people of Nigeria, Olodumare is the supreme God, the God of Gods; Olorun refers to God as the owner of heaven; and Oluwa is the master.

In the Yoruba creation accounts, which are representative of African traditions, Olodumare created the earth in four days, then rested and worshipped on the fifth day, leaving to his deputy, Orisanla, the task of completing the creation by planting a primeval palm tree, silk, rubber, white wood, and dodo plants. After accomplishing this, Orisanla was assigned another job: molding human being from the dust of the earth. Then Olodumare, as the supreme God, gave it the breath of life. (In another version, Orisanla fails and is replaced by another deputy of Olodumare, but the tasks remain the same.)

The biblical and African views of God and creation are closely related. The main differences are as follows: in the African account, God has assistant(s) – thus humans have to interact with such intermediaries (e.g. ancestors*); there is no primeval chaos to overcome (in contrast to Gen 1:1) – evil powers are related to human agents (e.g. witches) and the evil spirits they manipulate; and the moon, sun, and stars are personified – a polytheistic perspective, although there is one supreme God.

In both the Bible and African Religion, religion is intricately related to all aspects of life, characterized by wholesome human relations, hospitality*, a sense of community life and of good human relations, respect for elders, a sense of the sacredness of life, and a sense of the power of language and thus of naming.

Two examples show what is at stake. Most commonly, North Atlantic missionaries demanded that, at baptism*, converts abandon their African "pagan" name and adopt a "Christian" name – usually a biblical name, which did not mean anything to them. Ironically, biblical names and African names have similar religious connotations. The most striking examples are theophoric names. The name Oluranti in Yoruba and Zachariah (the prophet's name) in Hebrew both mean "God remembers me" (see also 1 Chr 8:31, the name of the son of Gideon, Zechar, "remembrance"); in both cases, this name is a prayer that God should remember the one who bears the name and an expression of faith that God will do so. Similarly, the name Oluwayiopesi in Yoruba and the place called YHWH-yireh in Hebrew (Gen 22:14) both mean "God will provide," an expression of faith that God will do so. The same can be said about Oluremilekun, "God comfort me," and its Hebrew equivalent Nahum (the prophet), "comfort, consolation [from God]"; or Olumayowa, "God will bring happiness," often abbreviated Ayo, "happiness," which corresponds to the Hebrew Asher (Gen 30:13). Likewise, there is a similarity among gratitude or praise names, such as Oluwatobi and Tobi (God is great; like the Hebrew Geuel, Num 13:15), Opeyeoluwa and Ope (God is praiseworthy), Olaoluwa (God's honor), Oluwatosin (God is worthy of worship), Modupe or Dupe (I give thanks), and Temitope (Mine is thanksgiving).

These and many other similarities, together with the recognition of sacred powers, lead Africans, in keeping with their traditional religious perspective, to see the Bible (as an object) and its words as having sacred power. Hence a growing number of African theologians and communities (including African* Instituted Churches) readily emphasize the continuity between “preparatory” African traditions and the Bible, developing “African interpretations” of the Bible. DAVID TUESDAY ADAMO

African Theologies. See RECONSTRUCTION, AFRICAN THEOLOGIES OF; THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: ISSUES IT FACES; THEOLOGY AS HUMAN UNDERTAKING CLUSTER: AFRICAN WOMEN THEOLOGIANS DOING THEOLOGY BY MAKING CONNECTIONS.

Afrikania Mission, a movement founded in 1982 by Rev. Vincent Kwabena Dumuah to propagate a “refined African* Religion,” based on the ideology of Afrocentrism. See also AFRICAN RELIGION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: CULTURAL INTERACTIONS.

Afro-Caribbean Christianity in the United Kingdom emerged in the 1950s owing to the arrival of immigrants from the West Indies. Not welcomed by the established denominations, they developed Afro-Caribbean congregations of a Pentecostal* or Charismatic* type, although Afro-Caribbean worshippers can also be found in the historic churches, including Seventh-day Adventist, Methodist, Baptist, Anglican, and Roman Catholic churches. In 2000 there were approximately 4,000 Afro-Caribbean congregations with more than 400,000 members in every major city in Britain. Afro-Caribbean churches have been the fastest growing in the UK, with some of the largest congregations nationally. In London more than 50% of all attendees at Sunday services are from the Black community. In 1984 the West Indian Evangelical Alliance (now African and Caribbean Evangelical Alliance) was established as a national umbrella organization for Black Majority churches in the UK.

Their worship style is distinctive. Guitars, drums, and keyboards enhance their weekly worship services, which usually include prayers, hymns, testimonies, Scripture readings, and preaching. Their services are strongly Bible centered. Their spontaneous and energetic preaching often calls for responses from the congregation such as “Amen” or “Praise the Lord.” Each person in the worship service is encouraged by the leaders to fully participate. Twenty-first-century Afro-Caribbean Christianity goes beyond the confines of attending church worship; it encompasses reaching out to the local community. Many congregations that have their own building offer education and training to young people and adults, including nursery education, English classes, and basic computer training. Afro-Caribbean churches are also engaged in campaigns for social justice, and the advancement, development, and transformation of the wider community in Britain, as well as the promotion of unity, reconciliation, and understanding among the various cultural groups, local authority, government, voluntary agencies, and the wider church in the UK.

HERBERT GRIFFITHS

Afterlife. See ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER; HEAVEN; HELL; IMMORTALITY.

Agape. Greek term for “love” in the LXX and the NT. At times, agape is opposed to eros, love as desire* (see Nygren), although love-desire for God is precisely the relation mystics* affirmed. Agape was also applied in the early church to the meal associated with the Eucharist* (hence “Love Feast”). See also LOVE.

Agapetai (also Gk syneisaktōi; Lat subintroductae), couples living together in chastity, in a spiritual relationship as a substitute for marriage*. The practice might be reflected in Paul, who says it is better for a man not to marry a virgin but to “keep her as his virgin” (1 Cor 7:36–38). Spiritual marriage was practiced for several centuries to show that ascetics* need not deny sexuality but could control it. Some virgins in fact became pregnant (Cyprian, Ep. 61), and there were prurient comments and suspicions. The practice was forbidden by 4th-c. councils, and John* Chrysostom attacked it in his writings.

Aglipay, Gregorio; Aglipayan Movement. See PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENT CHURCH.

Agnosticism, a term coined by Thomas Henry Huxley*, in contrast to atheism* and Gnosticism*, to denote the position that it is impossible to know, on the basis of generally accessible evidence, God and whether or not God exists. Agnosticism, similar to the position held by Hume* and Kant*, is compatible with a religious emphasis on faith* and revelation* in contrast to reason and experience.

Agnus Dei (Lat for “Lamb of God”), a liturgical address to Christ in the Latin liturgy, based on John 1:29, said or sung before Communion.

Agricola, Michael (c1507–57), Lutheran Reformer, bishop of Turku, founder of Finnish literature. Son of a Swedish-speaking peasant, Agricola attended Luther's* and Melancthon's* lectures in Wittenberg (1536–39), acted as headmaster of the school in Turku, then bishop (1554). A member of the Swedish peace delegation to Moscow, he died on the return trip.

He wrote the ABC book (Abckiria), the first book in the Finnish language, printed in Stockholm (1543), a primer for reading that also contains a catechism, based mainly on Luther's Small Catechism. His prayer book (1544) is the largest (more than 600 prayers) of the Reformation Era. Agricola translated the NT "partly from Greek and partly from Latin, German, and Swedish books" (as he said), the Psalter, and a selection of the OT prophets, wrote a Finnish manual, and translated a missal (from the Swedish Reformer Olavus Petri's works). Agricola was a widely read humanist, an admirer of Erasmus, and, as a Bible translator, a follower of Luther.

SIMO HEININEN

Akron Architecture Plan, a church design featuring rooms opening onto the sanctuary, often a semicircular auditorium, with folding doors so that they can be enclosed for Sunday school classes or other meetings. See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Alb, white linen garment worn by the minister during Mass, derived from the common Roman and Greek tunic. It was used in Christian worship for a long time before being viewed as a liturgical vestment*.

Albania. Since the proclamation of Kosovo's independence in 2008, Albania is the only European country with a Muslim majority (70%); it also includes Orthodox Christians (20%) and Roman Catholics (10%), whose history can be traced to early missions from Rome and Constantinople. Contrary to the situation in most Slavic nations, religion has not been a dominant factor in the Albanian nationalist project. Interfaith unions for the defense of autonomy have been common throughout Albanian history.

With the end of Communism (1990) and its restrictions on religious freedom (Albania was the only country where religion was completely banned, in 1967; it was proclaimed "atheistic" in 1976), religious communities attempted to reconstruct their institutions and religious life. Encountering serious resource problems, they depended heavily on foreign aid.

Because of the Communist oppression, no Albanian Orthodox was in a position to be elected as head of the Church; thus a Greek, Archbishop Anastasios Yannoulatos, was elected. His numerous charitable and social activities in the spheres of health* care, education*, culture, and environment on behalf of all people, regardless of their religious or ethnic background, are quelling the debates about his non-Albanian citizenship. Under his skillful leadership, a Holy Synod was created (1998) and the Albanian Orthodox Church has been on the rise.

The majority of the Roman Catholics live in the northwestern part of the country. Albania restored its diplomatic relations with the Vatican (1991); Pope John* Paul II ordained four new bishops in the Albanian Church (1993); and the Jesuits received permission to return to Albania. The Catholic community engaged in energetic charitable work and many religious, educational, and social activities under the leadership of Archbishop Rok Mirdita.

One of the main religious debates concerns the inter-Muslim relationship between the Sunni and the Bektashi community, a Sufi order, the majority of whose members value independence from the Sunni. According to the 1998 Constitution, all religions are equal, yet the four predominant religious communities enjoy a de facto privileged social status. The relations between the various religious communities are generally relaxed, a tolerance reflecting the long history of multiconfessionalism, the Albanians' traditional pragmatic attitude toward religion, and the considerable secularization* of society.

See also ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: SOUTHEAST EUROPE.

Statistics: Population (2008): 3.6 million. Census on religion (1922): Christian, 30% (Orthodox, 20%; Roman Catholics, 10%); Sunni Muslims, 55%; Bektashi, 15%. The number of practicing believers is very low. (Note: The only existing data on religion are taken from the 1922 census, usually quoted owing to a lack of other sources, despite serious doubts about its present validity.)

INA MERDJANOVA

Albert the Great (Albertus Magnus) (1193 [or 1206]–1280), theologian, philosopher, scientist. He studied in Padua, entered the Dominican* order, studied theology in Cologne, and taught in Dominican houses in Germany. After teaching in Paris (c1240–48), where Thomas Aquinas* was one of his students, he returned to Cologne. In addition to writing on theological topics, introducing Aristotle's* ethics, metaphysics, and philosophical anthropology into Christian thought, he wrote commentaries on Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite and Scripture. Appointed bishop of Regensburg, he resigned after two years (1262). He defended Aquinas against charges of heresy* (1277). His most direct influence can be found in the Neoplatonic* tendency of several German Dominicans, recognized as the “Albertist” school.

Albert of Prussia (1490–1568), the last grand master of the Teutonic* Knights, who in 1525 adopted the Lutheran faith, ended celibacy in the order, secularized the order’s domains (East Prussia, Latvia, Estonia), and created the Duchy of Prussia. A member of the Hohenzollern family, he opened the way to the steady growth of its power in Germany.

Albigenses. See CATHARS, CATHARISM.

Alcoholics Anonymous (AA), a fellowship of recovering alcoholics helping each other stay sober and reaching out to other alcoholics, with more than 2 million members in 180 countries.

The movement began (1935) when “two hopeless drunks,” Bill Wilson (a stock speculator) and Bob Smith (a surgeon), discovered they could find sobriety by sharing their stories of alcoholism with each other and reaching out to others caught in the addiction. The collective programmatic book Alcoholics Anonymous (the “Big Book”) describes the illness of alcoholism and presents the “Twelve Steps” for recovery.

A lay-led coalition of autonomous local groups, with intermediate elected councils and a world headquarters (New York), AA supports itself through freewill contributions. Its spiritual program is not aligned with any particular religious group.

AA’s core ideas are: the hopelessness of alcoholism; the necessity of radical ego deflation (“hitting bottom”); conversion from destructive self-centeredness to a joyful “recovering life” (though one is never “cured”) through reliance on the “higher power” of one’s own understanding; living sober one day at a time; regular participation in AA’s spiritual fellowship of mutual support; and reaching out to those still suffering.

The founders discovered AA’s core ideas in the work of psychologists and medical doctors (Carl Jung, William James, and William Silkworth) and, with Rev. Samuel Shoemaker, through involvement in the Oxford* Group (or Moral* Re-armament). This nondenominational, Evangelical movement calling for “moral and spiritual rearmament” shaped AA through its emphasis on intense fellowship, a merciful God, and the life-changing results of confession, conversion, and mission. Yet AA soon moved away from the Oxford Group’s religious absolutism.

The understanding of alcoholism as a disease is a long-standing medical view (endorsed by leading 20th-c. medical associations), although its causes (genetic factors, the workings of the brain’s neurotransmitters) are not yet fully understood. Yet according to the “Big Book,” alcoholism is not simply an illness of the body; it is also a disease of the mind and spirit, marked by compulsive drinking, craving, denial, increasing physical tolerance to alcohol, and withdrawal symptoms. The first of the Twelve Steps describes the result: “We admitted we were powerless over alcohol – that our lives had become unmanageable.”

AA considers the effects of alcoholism to be “sin*,” but only when sin is understood to be a profound alienation from God, from the self, from others, and from the universe itself (rather than a moral failure) (for the view of “sin” as “disease,” see Anthropology Cluster: In Eastern Orthodox Christian Theology; Atonement #1; Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster: Introductory Entries). Because this addiction is so encompassing, AA believes that “sobriety” is always more than the cessation of drinking. It is the never-ending spiritual process of radical personality transformation through continuing reliance on God (as each one interprets the higher power), living with a relapse-prone disease but sober and grateful “one day at a time.”

AA’s Twelve Steps and its pattern of group meetings have been adapted for use with other substance addictions (e.g. narcotics and food) and with behavior addictions (e.g. emotions, gambling, and sex); it is also used by movements for the healing* and support of families and friends of addicted persons (see Abuse as Pastoral Care Issue). JAMES B. NELSON

Alcuin (c735/40–804). Born in Northumbria, educated in York in the tradition of Bede*, he became a key member of Charlemagne’s* court. His works on the liberal arts helped to shape medieval education*; his scholarship on the text of the Bible and his adaptations of the Roman liturgy influenced later practice.

Alexander of Alexandria, bishop from 312 to his death in 328, when he was succeeded by Athanasius*. His controversy with Arius*, one of his presbyters, whom he excommunicated, occasioned the Council of Nicaea* in 325.

Alexandria, Alexandrian Christianity and Its Theology. The city of Alexandria, at the mouth of the Nile, founded by Alexander the Great, became a major center of Greek learning and literature. Within its large Jewish community, the OT was translated into Greek (see Septuagint) and the Bible was interpreted along lines compatible with Greek philosophy (see Philo). The so-called Hellenists* in the early church were possibly influenced by this tradition.

When did Christianity come to Alexandria? It is uncertain, but the Alexandrian Church has been considered one of the apostolic churches because of its alleged founding by Mark*. By the 2nd c. it was a center of Gnosticism*; anti-Gnostic groups associated themselves with Rome and the incipient Catholic Church. Clement* of Alexandria and Origen* were influential throughout the Church. Two major doctrinal controversies, over the Trinity* and Christology*, originated in the city, exacerbated by rivalry between Alexandria, which developed the allegorical* interpretation of Scripture, and Antioch*, which adhered to a more literal and historical interpretation. After the Council of Chalcedon*, the bishops of Alexandria followed the Miaphysite*/Monophysite* doctrine, and any influence by the Empire in Constantinople came to an end with conquests by Persia (616) and the Arabs (642).

EUGENE TESELLE

Alienation, a loss of connection with one's self, property, fruit of labor, world, or God. Modern theology often speaks of sin* as alienation from God, self, and world. See also HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH; MARXISM AND CHRISTIANITY; PSYCHOLOGY AND THEOLOGY.

All Africa Conference of Churches (AACC) is an ecumenical fellowship of Christian churches in Africa, created in 1958, that accounts for more than 120 million Christian members of Protestant, Anglican, Orthodox, and African Instituted Churches across the continent.

Allegory, a method of interpretation developed among those who found the literal meaning of Homer or the Bible unsatisfactory and sought meanings more compatible with Platonist or Stoic philosophy. Philo* and Origen* were the chief allegorizers of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. In contrast to typology* – which views biblical figures (David) or events (Exodus) as referring to other figures (Christ) or events (the cross) – allegorization seeks theological meanings or references to invisible realities (divine attributes; the heavenly Jerusalem). An analogue in modern critical study is the judgment that a biblical passage must be interpreted theologically rather than historically.

Alleluia (Heb “Praise the Lord”), an expression of praise in worship found in a number of Psalms* and adopted in Christian worship.

Allen, Richard (1760–1831), born into slavery in Philadelphia; sold as a child along with his family to a farmer in Delaware. Founder of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. Allen was converted to Methodism by a circuit rider (1777). After manumission from slavery (1783), he received the authority to preach as a Methodist exhorter. Allen and Absalom Jones, another black preacher, joined other former slaves and Quaker philanthropists to form the religious association Free African Society (1787), a mutual aid society for “free Africans and their descendants.” Allen founded a more explicitly Methodist church for free Africans, the Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church (1794), which became a denomination (1816). Allen was its first bishop. See also AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL (AME) CHURCH; PROSPERITY AND ECONOMIC EMPOWERMENT GOSPEL AND AFRICAN AMERICAN CHURCHES.

DENNIS C. DICKERSON

All Saints' Day, celebrated on November 1, is a day of remembrance of all the Christian saints*, both known and unknown. It originated in 609 with the consecration of the Pantheon by Pope Boniface IV, when the church at Rome chose to consecrate this 1st-c. temple dedicated to all the gods as a Christian basilica in honor of “Saint Mary and the martyrs” (S. Mariae ad martyres). An early example of non-Christian elements being incorporated into the church but with a new interpretation, All Saints' Day was originally celebrated on May 13. The feast was changed to November 1 when Pope Gregory III (d741) dedicated a chapel to “all the saints” in the Vatican basilica. Pope Gregory IV (d844) established it as a feast for the whole church.

All Saints' Day reminds Christians that they share in the wider communion* of saints, that they are intimately linked with their forebears in the faith, and that all Christians are called to sanctity in their own lives. The Litany of the Saints often chanted on this day makes it evident: the names of saints are invoked as the assembly responds, "Pray for us." Recent developments in liturgical inculturation* (especially in Africa and Asia) draw attention to the importance of the communion of saints through reverence paid to the community's ancestors* during Christian worship. This is particularly evident in the "Roman Rite for the Dioceses of Zaire" (or "Congolese* Rite," approved in 1988), which always begins with the Litany of the Saints in the entrance procession.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

All Souls' Day, a Roman Catholic feast day, November 2, during which the church on earth prays for the souls of those in purgatory*.

Almsgiving (Gk eleemosyne), offering of assistance to the poor, motivated by mercy or pity. It has been regarded as essential for gaining forgiveness* and salvation* from God or as a service in response to salvation and grace – according to interpretations of NT texts (e.g. Matt 6:2–4).

Alpha and Omega, the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, used with reference to God (Rev 1:8; 11; 21:6) and to Christ (21:13) to denote "the first and the last" (Isa 48:12), the source prior to, and the goal beyond, the cosmos.

Alphonsus Liguori. See LIGUORI, ALPHONSUS.

Altar, the place of offering sacrifice* in ancient Israel. When the death of Christ was interpreted as a sacrifice, the altar was replaced by the cross (Heb 13:10–13); the "temple made with hands" was superseded (Mark 14:58, Heb 9:24), because worship of God was not limited by place (Rom 12:1, John 4:24, Col 3:1–3). In the 2nd c., Christians began to speak of the Communion table as an altar and the presbyters* as priests*.

Alternative Trading, direct contact between producers and consumers on a nonprofit or cooperative basis, bypassing commercial intermediaries. Organizations are now linked through the International Federation for Alternative Trade and the Fair Trade Federation. Although alternative trading represents only a small portion of global trade, it demonstrates solidarity on a worldwide scale, building experience in nonexploitative forms of trade and showing their economic viability.

The Mennonite Central Committee organized SelfHelp Crafts (1946), now called Ten Thousand Villages (since 1996). In addition to marketing, it sends volunteers to more than 50 countries to assist with agriculture, community development, health and nutrition, education, peace work, and crisis intervention. Similarly, the Church of the Brethren organized SERRV (in 1949) to assist in the economic recovery of refugees* and now also emphasizes the importing of crafts to provide income opportunities for people in the Third World.

A number of religious and nonreligious organizations market specific products (shade-grown coffee and nuts, organic foods) in ways that promote sustainable practices and return the profits to the workers themselves.

Ambrose, Aurelius (c338–97). Born into Roman high society, trained in law, and appointed provincial governor, Ambrose found himself elected bishop of Milan (374), though he had not been baptized, when he entered the basilica to quell disturbances over the succession of the Arian* bishop, Auxentius. Within a week, Ambrose was baptized and hurried through ranks of the clergy.

As bishop, Ambrose first ostensibly followed Valentinian I's neutral policies, preserving an uneasy peace between Arians and Nicaeans*. But by 378, in De fide he openly defended the Nicene faith and won the Emperor Gratian's support just before the Council of Aquileia convened (381). Yet Ambrose's On the Holy Spirit and On the Incarnation of the Lord (381/82) still debated with Homoian* opponents.

Ambrose's many exegetical works, on OT figures and books (e.g. On Joseph, On the Patriarchs, Isaiah, the Hexaemeron) and one NT book (Luke), followed Philo*, Origen*, and Basil* of Caesarea by affirming multiple meanings and demonstrating a preference for the allegorical*. Most of his works – dogmatic, ascetic, and exegetical – were sermons that Ambrose later edited for publication.

A master at orchestrating social and political resources, Ambrose effectively championed Nicene Christianity against opponents, including emperors (especially Theodosius*). His deep piety and influential commitment to ascetic* celibacy for men and women are exhibited in his many letters, three funeral orations, and a few hymns (among the oldest to survive in the West).

DANIEL H. WILLIAMS

Ambrosian (Milanese) Rite, the liturgical rite of Milan and environs, is one of the few

surviving non-Roman rites in the Catholic Latin liturgical family. Named for Ambrose*, the liturgy of Milan already had its own history when he introduced the Eastern practice of antiphonal singing of psalms and composed hymns. The rite developed from its indigenous roots and was influenced by the Roman Rite, the Eastern Church, and later an interplay with the Gallican* liturgy. The church of Milan successfully resisted several Roman attempts to suppress the rite completely. The Divine Office* of the Western Church, Mass*, and other rituals have been reformed in accord with the principles of Vatican* II.

The Ambrosian euchological* prayers often have a poetic literary style, distinct from the formal juridical language of the Roman Rite. Advent* lasts for six weeks. There is no Ash* Wednesday because Lent* begins on Sunday. The Sundays of Lent are named for the Scripture readings: Palm Sunday is "Sunday of Olives."

The Ambrosian Mass differs from the Roman Mass in the following ways: The offertory has no washing of the hands; the creed is said before the prayers over the gifts; there is a "proper" (adapted for the day) preface for each Mass; the eucharistic* prayer is a variant of the Roman canon; the fraction comes before the Our Father.

The revised Divine Office blends psalmody, readings, poetry, euchology, and song. Vespers opens with a procession, lighting of the candles, the use of incense, and the singing of hymns. This lucinarium (service of light) is the sole surviving example of a once almost universal practice in the early church (related to Jewish practices).

Recent liturgical reforms of the Divine Office, the Mass, and the ritual demonstrate the vitality of a rite that can claim an authenticity and legitimacy as strong as that of the Roman Rite.

EMMANUEL CUTRONE

Ambrosiaster, a name coined to refer to the author of the first Latin commentary on all of the Pauline Epistles, written in Rome during the pontificate of Damasus (366–84), wrongly attributed to Ambrose*. The same unknown author also wrote Questions on the Old and New Testaments, wrongly attributed to Augustine*.

Amen (Heb "truly," "let it be so"; connotes faithfulness*), a declaration used by Jews and then Christians to express agreement and faithful participation at the end of a prayer or a statement.

American Baptist Churches. See BAPTIST CHURCHES CLUSTER: IN NORTH AMERICA.

American Bible Society, nonprofit, interconfessional organization founded in 1816. Disclaiming any ecclesial function and claiming to avoid endorsing or advocating any doctrinal positions, it focuses on the translation and publication of Bibles and their distribution to as many people as possible. It is committed to making the Bible available to every person in a language and format (including that of media and communication technology) that each can understand and afford, "so all people may experience its life-changing message."

American Council of Christian Churches, fundamentalist* multidenominational organization in the USA founded (1941) in opposition to the Federal Council of Churches (now National* Council of Churches) that remained small in comparison with the National* Association of Evangelicals.

American Literature and Christianity. With the settlement of the North American continent, the connection between the new land and the promised one in Scripture* grounded much of early American literature in the Bible. Early works, such as the poems of Anne Bradstreet (1612–72) and Edward Taylor (1642–1729), were characterized by religious imagery and concerns. The model of self-examination and questions of divine judgment* in the writings of Cotton Mather (1663–1728) had a long-standing influence on American letters. Tracts and sermons expressly concerned with matters of belief, such as those of Jonathan Edwards* (1703–58) on predestination*, were widely influential in the New World. Even the claims for independence and self-government were sustained by a connection with religion, most notably in the references to God in the Declaration of Independence. Nathaniel Hawthorne (1804–64) returned to Puritan* concerns about election* in his brooding works set in New England, while his contemporary Herman Melville combined Miltonic* imagery and Calvinist* doctrine in the figure of Ahab in Moby Dick (1851). Responding to the challenge of the institution of slavery*, abolitionist sentiments found expression in the language of Christian sacrifice and redemption*, while slaveholders maintained that their rights of domination were founded in the Bible. Lincoln clearly drew on the Bible for both the language and the ethics of his most famous speeches.

The view of religious justice regarding slavery could be seen in the broad appeal of Harriet Beecher Stowe's* Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852). Increasingly, there were challenges to Calvinist doctrine; Emily Dickinson (1830–86) displayed such questions in many of her nearly 1,800 poems. A renewed revivalist religious fervor later yielded the most popular novel of the postwar years, Ben Hur (1880), historically set in Palestine of the Crucifixion, by Lew Wallace (a Union general in the war); this fictional account of an encounter with Jesus spawned many imitators. At the end of the 19th c., the influence of religion on letters was split between a view of piety in conflict with the material world, such as found in Harold Frederic's The Damnation of Theron Ware (1896), and the Social* Gospel concerned with the treatment of a growing society's poor, such as In His Steps (1896), by Charles M. Sheldon.

With the 20th c., realism and naturalism made their mark on the use of religious themes. Sinclair Lewis's Elmer Gantry (1927) explored a realistic and psychological approach to the figure of the tempted cleric. Ernest Hemingway (1899–1961) drew protagonists with a studied agnosticism* (although the author was willing to use a phrase from Ecclesiastes* as a title, The Sun also Rises). Robert Frost (1874–1962) intermittently used imagery from the Bible, although his imaginative thinking was often a challenge to orthodoxy. William Faulkner (1897–1962), of the deep Bible-based culture of the South, made use of biblical notions in the title of a work like Absalom, Absalom and through a Christ-like figure, Ike McCaslin, who appears in several novels. Flannery O'Connor (1925–64), a religious anomaly as a Southern Catholic, was deeply engaged in biblical themes and religious questions in novels that sketched a Southern Gothic. Modern poetry, such as that of Robert Lowell (1917–77) and Sylvia Plath (1932–63), engages a confessional mode that owes its focus, if not necessarily its vocabulary or imagery, to the sense of self-examination found in traditional religious Christian models. Some contemporary poets, notably Mark Jarman (1952–), make direct and meaningful use of biblical themes. Current and extensive sales of popular novels based on the Apocalypse* (the Left Behind series) demonstrate the long intertwining of Christianity, the Bible, and popular literature in the USA.

ROY GOTTFRIED

Amish (the) took their name from Jakob Ammann, a Swiss Anabaptist* leader who called for change, renewal, and greater purity in the church. They separated from Swiss Anabaptists (1693) before migrating to North America (18th c.). Living alongside non-Amish neighbors in small villages and farms in Ontario and 27 US states, they grew from about 5,000 (1900) to nearly 230,000 (2008).

Amish subgroups follow distinctive cultural patterns but most have the following in common: horse-and-buggy transportation, the use of horses for field work, plain dress, a beard (without mustache) for men, a prayer cap for women, a German or Swiss dialect, worship in homes, private schooling, the rejection of public utility electricity, and a taboo on television and computer ownership. Beyond this, the 1,800 local congregations (2008) interpret their own rules of behavior. Though fewer than 50% are farmers, Amish remain rural, working in Amish-owned shops, small businesses, and industries, and sometimes in outside-owned factories.

The community's welfare takes precedence over individual choice; members are expected to yield to the collective wisdom of the church, viewed as a redemptive community apart from the broader culture. Separation from the world is a key religious principle, encouraging Amish to avoid many of the values and practices of the larger society.

DONALD KRAYBILL

Amos, Book of, the first extensive collection of recorded prophecies associated with a prophet, in response to the context and issues of Israel and Judah in the 8th c. BCE, consisting primarily of judgment speeches aimed at targeted groups (1:1–2:3, foreign nations; 2:4–6:14, various groups within Judah and Israel) and vision reports (7–9), all shaped over a long period of time.

The 8th-c. oracles of Amos address with passion and specificity why the plight of the poor* deteriorated at a time when Israel and Judah enjoyed economic growth and prosperity under Jeroboam II in the north and Uzziah in the south. Amos uses the ancient tradition of the Day of YHWH in a way that shatters popular expectations. In popular belief, YHWH's coming meant deliverance for Israel. But for Amos, the purpose of YHWH's coming is not to rescue but to punish Israel. Acknowledging God's sovereignty involves doing what God desires. The policies and practices of Israelite leadership are taking the nation on a disastrous path.

Therefore, judgment is inevitable. The key issue is establishing justice*. Without a commitment to justice, religious observances are meaningless.

Amos's critique of social injustice is grounded in the reality of the suffering of the poor majority. Does every member of the community have just and equitable access to the economic base? Striving toward human liberation* entails struggle against oppression* and injustice.

DEVADASAN PREMNATH

Amyraut, Moïse (1596–1644), French moderate Calvinist theologian. After studying law at Poitiers and theology at the Protestant Academy of Saumur, Amyraut was ordained (1626), became pastor in Saumur, and taught theology at the Academy (principal from 1641).

His brief Traité de la prédestination catapulted Amyraut into the center of controversy over universal grace and the extent of atonement*. Amyraut formulated a moderate Calvinist view, equidistant between hyper-Calvinism (and the counter-Remonstrants*) and Arminianism*.

Tried for heresy because of his hypothetical universalism* (Synod of Alençon, 1637), he was acquitted. His La Morale chrétienne, posthumously published in 1652, is a key early text in Calvinist social ethic. PAUL CHANG-HA LIM

Anabaptist Movement (the) emerged in 1525 in Switzerland when a group of young adults baptized each other in a private home – an outrageous act of defiance against the Protestant Reformation*. These young Reformers were nicknamed “Anabaptists” (rebaptizers) by their opponents, because they had already been baptized as infants. Other clusters of Anabaptists soon emerged in South Germany, Austria, North Germany, and the Netherlands.

Today the word “Anabaptist” may refer to (1) these early Radical Reformers, (2) their theological heritage, or (3) members of contemporary churches, heirs of these Radical Reformers.

1. The Radical Reformers called for a cleaner break from Catholic traditions and a sharper separation of church* and state (anticipating the modern understandings of this separation). Apart from arguing that only adults who had made a voluntary decision to follow Jesus should be baptized, they raised questions about the Mass*, scorned the use of images, and criticized the morality of church officials. The Anabaptists' refusal to baptize infants (see Baptism Cluster), swear oaths of allegiance, and obey established tradition outraged both political and religious authorities. Declared heretics, thousands were cruelly killed (see the 1,200-Page Martyrs Mirror). Propelled by persecution and missionary zeal, the movement mushroomed throughout Europe. Anabaptists found refuge in Moravia, Alsace, the Palatinate, the Netherlands, Poland, and eventually the Ukraine and North America.

Early Anabaptism attracted people with diverse backgrounds, including peasants, scholars, and mystics. Some expected Christ's quick return and the end of the world, others not. Some were pacifists*, others anarchists willing to use violence. By 1550, many of the views held by contemporary Anabaptist communities began to solidify.

2. Most Anabaptists accepted the historic creeds*; they, like other Protestant Reformers, emphasized salvation by grace* through faith*, the priesthood* of all believers, and the ultimate authority of Scripture* and the Holy Spirit over that of government and church officials. They had only one sacrament*: the gathered church – a covenant* community with the authority to make binding moral decisions that were ratified in heaven (based on Matt 18). Underscoring the role of the Holy Spirit in interpreting Scripture, they emphasized orthopraxis* rather than orthodox doctrine and the authority of Christ's teaching for daily living, especially the Sermon on the Mount – thus their rejection of swearing oaths and of violence (see Peace Movements).
3. The heirs of the early Anabaptists eventually formed churches with different names in numerous countries. In North America, Anabaptists are found in four church groups: Hutterite*, Mennonite*, Amish*, and Brethren*.

DONALD KRAYBILL

Analogical Imagination. This term was first used by David Tracy (1981) as a complex strategy for enabling, encouraging, and augmenting a pluralist understanding of religions. His book The Analogical Imagination: Christian Theology and the Culture of Pluralism asks: What kind of public articulation and argument regarding religious meaning and truth is possible in a culture of religious pluralism? How can we best understand what it means to be authentically religious in this context? These questions arise in three public spheres – society, the academy, and the religious community – each with its own criteria and demands for appropriateness. In each case, neither resorting to superficial generalities nor privatizing religious beliefs and language is adequate for addressing these questions; the analogical imagination constitutes a suggestive alternative.

The analogical imagination is neither univocal nor equivocal. Instead, it is practiced in order to understand and negotiate similarities and differences. So informed, our conversations with other religions allow us not only to recognize the other as other and the different as different but also to recognize the other and the different as possible.

Tracy’s principal resource is a shared notion of “classic.” A classic (text, person, event) confronts and challenges one’s ordinary way of thinking, discloses something genuinely new, and demands that one risk an interpretation. Religious classics (see Scripture), like artistic, musical, and literary classics, lead to an intensification and transformation of ordinary life experience. As Tracy underscores, in the classics’ attempt to speak of limit-experiences, one is “caught up in some disclosure of the whole by the whole,” or one senses judgment and healing upon an experience of “finitude and estrangement” from the “powers of the whole.” The realities (God, self, world) give rise to both negations and affirmations of particular interpretations of the whole. For the analogical imagination, a classic both manifests and proclaims “the radical and gracious mystery* at the heart of human existence.”

Christian theology focuses on the meaning and truth of the classic event of Jesus* Christ* as it is creatively manifested, proclaimed, and performed in the contemporary situation. The dissimilarity as well as the similarity-in-difference of the other is primary in critical reflection, argument, and prophetic action. The analogical imagination corrects the shortcomings of both literal* understanding and uncritical pluralism. It searches for coherence and truth within the Christian vision as a whole and in relation to the whole.

MARY GERHART

Analogy, a description of God using terms derived from finite things, with the awareness that God is not totally like or totally unlike finite things. Analogical terms are applied to God “properly,” not merely metaphorically*. Chief among these, says Thomas* Aquinas, are the “absolute perfections,” whose definition does not imply any limitation and whose highest, original, and most proper application is to God. Since “being,” “wisdom,” and “goodness” are derived from God, their true meaning is found in God; yet since their meaning in human language is derived from finite things, we cannot fully understand their “mode of signification” when applied to God.

Anamnesis (Gk “remembrance”), in liturgy, remembrance of Christ’s death (cf. 1 Cor 11:25) in the eucharistic* service by reading the words of institution or including them in the prayer.

Anaphora (from the Gk for “carrying up”), the chief eucharistic* prayer. In the early church, the sanctification of bread* and wine* by blessing God, a function later filled by the words of institution* and the epiclesis. Orthodox churches often designate the entire liturgy by reference to its central part, the anaphora (e.g. the Anaphora [Liturgy] of St. Basil).

Anathema (Gk translation of Heb herem), originally, “devotion to God” by being destroyed (cf. Josh 1–12); subsequently, separation from the community (cf. 1 Cor 16:22; Gal 1:8–9). Starting in the 4th c., church councils pronounced anathema on those who were declared heretics*.

ANCESTOR VENERATION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity:
Overview

2) *A Sampling of Contextual Views
and Practices*

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity
in Aboriginal Australia

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity
in Africa

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity
in Asia

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity
in China

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity
in Latin America and the Caribbean

1) Introductory Entry

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity:

Overview. Ancestor veneration*, honoring the departed, must be distinguished from ancestor cult or worship* with specific rituals for caring for the dead. For many in East Asia, ancestors live in a spirit realm and have the power to help the living or, more often, to harm those who do not maintain their filial duties. Children, generally first sons, must honor the ancestors by providing gifts, burning joss sticks, and maintaining the burial site. In Africa, practices vary. In some regions, only special people “become” ancestors, who must be honored by the whole family. African ancestors also communicate with the living, but they are more likely to bless than to harm.

Ancestor veneration was common among the early Israelite tribes, in ancient China (from before 1500 BCE) and India, in Roman times, among Celtic and other European tribes, in Africa, and among the Inca and other Native American nations.

The Decalogue commands one to honor living parents, but Israelites like other ancient middle easterners honored departed ancestors. Early Christian practices of honoring the Christian dead – often martyrs* – developed into a cult of saints* that paralleled practices in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. When Roman Catholic missionaries followed Portuguese and Spanish expansion, the devotion to saints and ancestors was a point of dialogue. In China*, Vietnam*, and Japan*, both Christian and Asian practices were adapted. Ancestors were honored but not worshipped; they were remembered and given gifts of remembrance but not fed or paid, as was often the custom. This accommodating practice brought about the Chinese* rites controversy, resolved by the proscriptions of Pope Clement XI (1715) and Pope Benedict XIV (1742), which greatly reduced the development of Christianity in East Asia.

In Africa, ancestor veneration is not so much a matter of cultic worship as it is an ongoing communication and participation of the deceased with the family – one of the central beliefs of African* Religion.

Christianity has commonly developed in Africa as a continuation and renewal of traditional African religious practices and beliefs; local Christian practices at times incorporated ancestors and at other times rejected them as evil powers (calling them “demons”).

In Latin America, the Roman Catholic veneration of the saints adapted well both to the indigenous practices of ancestor veneration and to the African practices that accompanied slaves. In Latin America, but also in Asia (the Chinese Qing Ming Festival), Europe (Celtic* Christianity), and elsewhere (All* Saints’ Day), there is a special time of the year to honor ancestors. Christian practices travel the thin line dividing worship of the dead and respect and thanksgiving for saints who preceded us (Heb 11).

SCOTT W. SUNQUIST

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity in Aboriginal Australia.

The worldview of Australian* Aborigines, encapsulated in the concept of the Dreaming (tjukurpa), does not involve the veneration of ancestors, strictly speaking. Although there is a sense in which the Dreaming is conceived of as belonging to a past era, it is also a present reality – the everywhen (the anthropologist W. E. H. Stanner’s description). People in each generation live out the activities of the Dreaming as they participate in daily tasks and ritual life.

In Aboriginal societies, ancestor spirit beings are celebrated rather than human ancestors. Genealogies are not recorded, and relationship terms do not extend beyond grandparents. The spirit* kurunpa of deceased ancestors returns to the Dreaming spirit realm from which new persons are conceived (see Anthropology Cluster: Australian Aboriginal Theological Issues).

Reflecting an egalitarianism ethos, Aboriginal languages have no concepts for worship or veneration, but rather terms implying respect (walkuni) based on relationship (walytja). Aboriginal children, inculturated into the pattern of life enshrined in the Dreaming, are taught through example and story the expected behaviors based on relationship to others. A youth gives special respect to his mother's brother, who has an important role in his initiation.

When Christianity was introduced, Pitjantjatjara Christians were left on their own to relate the Dreaming traditions, as well as traditional forms of art and ritual, to Christian concepts of creation* and salvation*. The Aboriginal emphasis on relationships found resonance with the Christian concept of God as father* and Jesus as elder brother. Pitjantjatjara Christians emphasize the concept of belonging to a family*, referring to themselves as Jesuku walytja, relatives of Jesus. Since the Pitjantjatjara word tjukurpa is translated as both "dreaming" and "word," the translation of "The Word was God" links the traditional concept of the Dreaming with the introduced Christian concept of God.

The Dreaming stories provided the model for all aspects of life, including change. Thus dreams were significant in validating changes in mortuary rites when Christian burials replaced traditional practices in the 1970s. Previous fears of molestation by the spirit of the dead were replaced by a sense of hope in resurrection. See also ANTHROPOLOGY CLUSTER: AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINAL THEOLOGICAL ISSUES; AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINAL TRADITIONS AND CHRISTIANITY; HEALTH, HEALING, AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINAL SOCIETIES.

WILLIAM H. EDWARDS

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity in Africa. For Africans, ancestor veneration is an integral part of the ongoing relationship between ancestors and their descendants. As Mbiti underscored, theology that interprets African Christians' experience of God must include a theology of ancestors, "the living dead," whom one can call "parents who are resting."

Ancestors are past and present, active and not passive. Continuous communication between ancestors and their descendants is the sphere of ancestor veneration with roots in the conviction that the deep communion among family members is not broken by death.

Are ancestors venerated or worshipped? For the sociologist Herbert Spencer (1885), Africans "worship" their ancestors out of "fear" of them. Some theologians simply adopt this theory, although African scholars refuted it by emphasizing that for Africans (1) one does not worship out of fear, but out of love and respect; worshipping is adoring and honoring God; (2) the relationship between Africans and their ancestors is pietas, "reverence" (for Driberg), or "communion" (for Kenyatta and Rwehumbiza); (3) ancestral veneration is the descendants' expression of filial respect (Exod 20:12) beyond physical death; (4) ancestors are human beings in a parental role (thus with more power and knowledge than the descendants) but are not divinities to be worshipped; and (5) as the vernacular vocabulary shows, invocations and offerings to the departed are symbolic expressions of filial love and communion, not worship.

The proper question is therefore: Is ancestor veneration acceptable from a Christian point of view? Most missionaries and theologians, especially in the past, declared that ancestors (along with all spirits) are agents of Satan; their veneration should be eradicated. Consequently, Bibles in African vernaculars often translate "evil spirit" and "demon" by the vernacular word for "ancestor"! Debates of these views contribute to a better understanding of African worship of God. As in all other cultural and religious contexts, when Christianity is experienced by Africans within their frames of reference, it is "as if African Religion said a big YES to the gospel of Jesus Christ" (as Moila says). Without ancestor veneration, Christian faith and theology in Africa would have a hard time justifying its beliefs, as Roman Catholics and Lutherans have started to acknowledge. Thus a Lutheran World Federation consultation (Berlin 2006) called for the incorporation of some forms of ancestor veneration into a better understanding of Christian faith in Africa. Since Africans understand salvation* to be holistic (encompassing the whole community), salvation concerns the living, the departed, and the not yet born. Could not ancestor veneration (as a communion of saints) be an integral part of a holistic Christian conception of salvation?

SYLVESTER KAHAKWA

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity in Asia. Ancestor veneration has been and remains a significant cultural concern for Christians in Asia. The term “veneration” is used to differentiate this core cultural practice focusing on the attitude of reverence from ancestor “worship,” which is theologically problematic (idolatry*). Ancestor veneration was a crucial societal ritual to uphold patrilineal (agnatic) solidarity among family members by the commemoration of common parents so as to achieve harmony in society as a whole. In East Asia, it incorporated features of neo-Confucian* thought such as the virtue of filial piety (cf. “Honor thy Father and thy Mother”).

Violent persecutions against Roman Catholics took place in Korea* (about 10,000 martyred during 1791–1866) because their rejection of ancestor veneration was viewed as a subversive act that destroyed this backbone of society and so threatened the stability of the nation. Today, many in various denominations acknowledge that the crude dismissal of ancestor veneration as idolatry or superstition was a missiological mistake based on prejudice and ignorance about indigenous cultures and cultural imperialism by Western missionaries and their churches.

Since the Second Vatican Council, Roman Catholic churches in Asia have actively affirmed their appreciation of ancestor veneration through the theology of inculturation*. Although Protestant churches continue to frown on the use of ancestor tablets, food, incense, bowing, and the prayer for the dead, there is a growing trend toward a sympathetic reappraisal and constructive contextualization. Some argue that the Korean Protestant Church’s clear break from ancestor veneration made possible its extraordinary growth by promoting a clear Christian identity. In fact, Korean Protestant Christians observe quite faithfully this filial duty toward their deceased family members, though in various Christianized forms.

Many viewed ancestor veneration as an issue of “Christ and culture” (see Niebuhr*, H. Richard; Culture Cluster: Culture and Christianity). However, a deeper issue is soteriological. Ancestor veneration calls for a collective soteriology* related to the holistic notion of community. In the neo-Confucian vision of anthropocosmic community, ancestors (past), the living (present), and descendants (future) are always interrelated in a holistic community. Ancestor veneration signifies a ritualistic enactment of this transtemporal vision where past, present, and future members of the community come together (cf. the communion* of saints*). From this vantage point, a present-oriented, individual salvation* is partial and incomplete. Ancestor veneration calls Christians to an enlarged theological vision of salvation, as a holistic, community salvation encompassing the deceased and the not yet born in the communion of saints. HEUP YOUNG KIM Ancestor Veneration and Christianity in China.

The dispute over the veneration of ancestors in China expressed itself in the rites controversy (1615–1742). The main questions were: Are Christian converts permitted to continue practicing the ancestral cult and the veneration of Confucius? Is the rite religious in nature, as diffuse religion (Yang)? Or is it a cultural activity expressing filial piety, integrating the community, and enhancing morality in society and ethnic identity?

Pope Benedict XIV’s bull* (1742), Ex Quo Singulari, condemned the Chinese rites and imposed an oath on all Catholic missionaries in China to oppose them. Pope Pius XII in 1939 reversed the 1742 decision, authorizing Christians to take part in ceremonies honoring Confucius and ancestors.

Most of the participants in the three conferences of the Protestant missionaries of China (1877, 1890, 1907) condemned Chinese ancestral veneration/worship as an act of idolatry. However, it was also suggested that missionaries should learn how to differentiate the religious and non-religious elements involved in the rite and the connection of the rite with ethnic identity.

The debate among missionaries was also reflected among Chinese converts. The requirement to destroy the family ancestor tablets as a prerequisite for baptism had attracted attention, strong reaction, and persecution from Chinese society. Many of its anti-Christian publications condemn Christianity as an immoral religion because it does not honor parents and ancestors.

Although the understanding of the rite as an expression of filial piety was accepted by some Chinese Christians, the stance of missionaries that the rite is heretic* idolatry still prevails among many. Yet surveys conducted in Hong Kong and Taiwan in the 1980s reveal that most Chinese who participated in ancestral veneration/worship were motivated not by religious concern but rather by filial piety and social and moral reasons.

LO LUNG KWONG

Ancestor Veneration and Christianity in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Wherever slavery* existed in the Americas, slaves invested with their own views the Christianity that was imposed on them and transformed it into an instrument of liberation* and a framework in which they could express their human rights. The practitioners of Candomblé and Umbanda in Brazil* and of Santería in Cuba* do not feel any contradiction in identifying themselves as Catholics, while also worshipping African divinities through their veneration of the Virgin* and the saints*. Black communities had great difficulty abandoning entirely the memory of their origins, even as they made themselves at home in Christianity. In Venezuela*, the veneration of María Lionza is a good example of the veneration of ancestors that combines features of Christianity (devotion to the Virgin) with a rich mythology combining Amerindian and African ritual elements – beliefs in protective spirits (associated with rivers and mountains), spirit possession, and ecstatic experiences – and Spiritism* as the veneration of the ancestors' spirits.

The veneration of ancestors is even more central for the Garífuna, also called Black Caribs – people of African and Amerindian origin who live in the Atlantic coastal regions of Central America, from Belize to Nicaragua. The veneration of ancestors, which guarantees the success of healing* practices, takes the form of dances, songs, and festivities aimed at enticing the spirits of the ancestors to protect the community. Similarly, Mahikari, a movement with Japanese origins, was very successful during the 1980s in the French West Indies, in Puerto Rico, and somewhat in the Dominican* Republic, because its principal objective was to revitalize the belief in the ancestors, who, if they are properly acknowledged, are supposed to guarantee the believer's protection, while misfortune will befall believers and their community if they forget the ancestors. See also DEATH, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER: IN THE CARIBBEAN AND THE CULT OF THE DEAD.

LAËNNEC HURBON

Anchorite Life, withdrawal from the world (Gk anachorein) for contemplation and prayer. The term came to be applied specifically to persons (anchorites and anchoresses) enclosed in individual cells.

Andrew, Acts of. See APOCRYPHA CLUSTER: APOCRYPHAL ACTS OF APOSTLES.

Androcentrism, male-centered language, traditions, and practices. In the official teachings of most Christian traditions, maleness exclusively symbolizes the gender of God. Male characters in Scripture carry the most authority. Male authors of theology are considered the classical interpreters of Christian faith. The preaching and leadership style of ordained men set the standards. In the late 20th c., Christian feminist* scholars and church leaders vigorously challenged these assertions.

Androcentrism reinforces patriarchy* and provides its moral underpinning. In Christian patriarchal beliefs, the "headship" of the husband requires obedience to his power and authority. Maleness, not behavior or moral quality, entitles the husband to assume this role. He may physically assault his wife, sexually abuse his daughter, or do neither, but the recognition of a heterosexual male as the head upholds the definition of a patriarchal Christian family.

Cultural factors such as racial or ethnic identity and racism* inform the expression of Christian androcentrism. In the USA, for example, the prevalence of white supremacy has meant that white maleness is assumed to be most appropriate for images of God and Jesus* in artistic or media representations, for authoritative Christian theologians, and for model heads of Christian families. See also SEXISM AND CHRISTIANITY. TRACI C. WEST

Angela of Foligno (1248–1307). Visionary* mystic devoted to Jesus' humanity, she is known for her screams and trances in imitation* of Christ and Francis* during her mystical experiences. She was born in Foligno (near Assisi) and eventually married (1270?); following the death of her family members (1288?), she professed in the Third Order of St. Clare* (1291). In her Memoriale, dictated to and edited by "Brother A" (1292–96), Angela depicts a 30-step conversion and mystical process. In Instructions (c1300), she describes her interaction with Spiritual Franciscans* and Ubertino da Casale* as their "spiritual mother," as Lachance documents. Angela records repeated visionary experiences of Christ's human body, especially during his Passion, which resulted from intense meditation on the life and death of Christ. She experienced both extreme sweetness and severe suffering during her interactions with God, but focused her devotional practice on surpassing the sufferings of Christ, seeking extreme ways to chastise her body and wishing for a terrible death. Despite her emphasis on the body and emotions, which leads scholars to classify her as a cataphatic* mystic*, Angela ends the Memoriale by describing mystical experiences that alternate between the darkness of negative theology and the intense physicality of Passion mysticism.

JESSICA A. BOON

Angelelli, Bishop Enrique (1923–76), general vicar of Cordoba, then bishop of the Rioja, Argentina. He enrolled in the Catholic Integrist* Movement and eventually became an adviser of the Young* Christian Workers and of the comparable movement among students. He attended Vatican* II; becoming one of its champions, he led polemics against the Argentine Catholic hierarchy. As a result, he temporarily lost his leadership position in the Church. But once he was installed as bishop of La Rioja (1968), he strongly promoted the option* for the poor, thus confronting the military governments. After several threats, he died in an "accident" shortly after the 1976 coup d'état.

LUIS MIGUEL DONATELLO

Angels (Gk angelos, "messenger"), spiritual beings that serve God. Early Christianity inherited the long-evolving Jewish views of spirits, primarily from the intertestamental period (see Enoch, Books of). In Scripture, angels serve in the court of God as adversaries or challengers of human beings and as messengers. The devil* and his rebellious angels are said to have fallen from heaven*, becoming demons.

Angels mediate between God and humanity. They announce important events such as the Incarnation* (Matt 1:20–21; Luke 1:26–38) and the birth of Jesus (Luke 2:8–14). The 5th-c. Neoplatonic work of Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite posits nine orders of angels, in three groups of three: seraphim, cherubim, thrones; dominions, virtues, powers; and principalities, archangels, and angels. Each order passes divine truths to the orders beneath; the final two orders, archangels and angels, relay messages to human beings. Contemplation of the angelic hierarchy serves as a ladder leading from human concerns to union with the Divine.

Most theological traditions consider angels to be an order of being distinct from human souls*. The Scholastic theologians (see Scholasticism) of the High Middle Ages explored questions of angelic nature and psychology. They argued that angels were naturally bodiless, although they could assume bodies in order to interact with human beings. Angelic perception was defined as intellectual, directly apprehending spiritual, not sensory, truths. The persevering angels had possessed free will* in choosing whether to rebel but were now confirmed as wholly good. These treatments were concerned with integrating angels into Aristotelian* understandings of the cosmos and remained largely unchanged into the early modern period.

Portrayals of angels often reflect their characteristic benevolence. "Guardian" angels serve as protectors of human beings and their communities, especially in depictions of children and in children's literature. As symbols of the afterlife, angels appear in memorial artwork (including at the site of Ground Zero, where the World Trade Center once stood in New York). Likewise, angels protect human souls from demons at death or at Judgment*, reflecting the human need for defense against hostile forces. Archangel Michael’s expulsion of the devil from heaven (Rev 12:7–12) is one example of such contests between angels and demons. These many understandings of angels demonstrate their ongoing power as symbols of communication between the earthly and spiritual worlds.

THOMAS DE MAYO

Anger or Wrath of God. Anger or wrath is an emotion often ascribed to God* in the Bible, as God’s reaction to human sin*, especially disobedience to God’s commands or neglect of God’s promises. God is ready to destroy Israel (Exod 32:10) but is dissuaded from doing so by Moses, so that God “repents” of the evil that had been intended (Exod 32:14).

Wrath is often attributed to the “God of the Old Testament” and love or forgiveness to the “God of the New Testament.” But the NT also speaks of God’s wrath against sin, both in the present (Rom 1:18; 1 Thess 2:16) and at the time of Judgment* (1 Thess 1:10; Rom 2:5; Rev 6:16–17).

In Greco-Roman culture, anger (Gk thumos; Lat ira) was one of the natural inclinations of the soul*. “Be angry but do not sin; do not let the sun go down on your wrath,” says Eph 4:26, probably following the Stoic view that anger hardens into hatred. Forgiveness has been described as the limiting of anger or resentment, the forswearing of revenge.

Questions were often raised about biblical passages that spoke of God’s wrath, on at least two grounds. Morally and psychologically, it suggested a deity without reflectiveness or self-control, displaying some of the worst features of human beings. Metaphysically, theologians traditionally asserted that God is “impassible,” not affected by events in the world (see Impassibility). On this theory, God’s wrath had to be explained away as merely a human way of speaking; the effects of God’s actions had to be described by a metaphor drawn from human experience. Modern theologians have been more willing than their predecessors to ascribe feelings and emotions to God (see Anthropomorphisms).

At one point, however, God’s judgment and wrath against sin were given a central place in traditional theology. One classic answer to the question of why God became incarnate and suffered on the cross has been that the cross was morally necessary for satisfaction* (see Atonement #2). Especially as Calvin* stated it, the wrath of God the Father was satisfied, absorbed, or canceled by the death of Christ the Son; only then could sinful human beings be justified. This interpretation of atonement has been criticized, however, for giving free rein to the human desire for vengeance and projecting on God a kind of “divine child abuse.” This stern justice* is often replaced in modern theology by an emphasis on divine forbearance and forgiveness.

In the understanding of atonement as redemption (see Atonement #1) – emphasized in Eastern Orthodox churches, Liberation theologies, and many non-Western Charismatic churches – the wrath of God is not something to be appeased. Indeed, it is directed not so much against guilty individuals as against the injustices and evil powers that oppress and keep all humans in bondage whom God wants to redeem – and eventually against individuals who promote such injustices. God’s wrath is for the sake of liberation*. To speak of the wrath of God and of the Judgment* is primarily to say, “Not all is well in the world; God’s interventions are needed,” and in fact God does intervene and will intervene decisively in the future (the present and future wrathful judgment; cf. John 3:17–21) to bring about the “new* creation” in which God’s justice and love will prevail. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRIES.

EUGENE TESELLE and DANIEL PATTE

ANGLICANISM CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Anglicanism: Anglican Communion and Its Theology

Anglicanism: Anglican Worship and Liturgies

2) *A Sampling of Contextual Views
and Practices*

Anglicanism in Africa: Eastern and Western Africa

Anglicanism in Africa: Southern Africa

Anglicanism in Asia: Episcopal Church in the Philippines

Anglicanism in Asia: India

Anglicanism in Australia and the South Pacific

Anglicanism in Europe: The United Kingdom

Anglicanism in Latin America: Mexico

Anglicanism in North America

1) Introductory Entries

Anglicanism: Anglican Communion and Its Theology.

The Anglican Communion is a fellowship of autonomous provinces* (or churches), each springing from the 16th-c. Reformation* in England and Ireland, and each declaring itself in communion with the See* of Canterbury. In 2000 the total membership was between 70 and 90 million in 38 provinces – including four churches from the Indian subcontinent (originally formed by a union of Anglicans with non-Episcopal churches, but invited “back” into the Communion) – and some individual extraprovincial dioceses* under the metropolitan care of the archbishop* of Canterbury. Each church maintains the threefold order of ministers (bishop*, presbyter*, deacon*), derived from the English and Irish bishops of the Reformation, who traced their origins to early Christianity. Some churches or provinces prefer the title “Episcopal” to “Anglican.”

The role of the archbishop of Canterbury has been decisive in forming and strengthening the bonds between these churches. Though the archbishop has no “primatial” or similar powers, he presides over the formally constituted Anglican Consultative Council (formed 1971) and convenes the regular meeting of primates*, and the once-per-decade Lambeth* Conferences have sprung from the personal initiative of successive archbishops.

The Church of England gained a distinct identity during the 16th-c. Reformation. After King Henry* VIII’s largely political severance from Rome, Edward VI’s reign (1547–53) ushered in a radical doctrinal change that has determined much of the character of the Church of England and Anglicanism since.

While Reformation church leaders conserved inherited church structures (which gave them their positions), they nevertheless propounded the supreme authority of the Scriptures* over any historic traditions. This was exemplified in the early restoration of the Communion cup to the people, in accordance with Jesus’ instructions, countering the Roman Catholic withdrawal of it nearly three centuries earlier. Scriptural authority was given formal shape in Article 8 of the Thirty-nine* Articles of 1571: the creeds themselves were to be received and believed, not because they stemmed from ecumenical* councils and had been universally believed for 1,000 years, but because they could be “proved by most sure warrants of holy Scripture.” This supremacy of Scripture* (amply reinforced in, e.g., the ordination rites of 1550 and 1552) placed the Church of England firmly on the Protestant side of the divide throughout Western Europe.

In the 16th c., the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion (1571), the Book of Common* Prayer, and the Ordinal* helped to define what the supremacy of Scripture meant in practice. The Prayer Book, enforced by successive Acts of Uniformity (1549, 1552, 1559), gave a fixed scriptural shape and content to worship, not only enshrining vernacular* language and a “receptionist” doctrine of the Eucharist*, but also excluding the intercession of the saints*, petitions for the departed, private masses*, mass vestments, and much of the previous ceremonial. The Articles established a normative Anglican position in relation to most historic doctrines of the church, with particular focus on Reformation divisions and asserting reformed doctrines of justification* and the sacraments*. It is uncertain to what extent the Articles gave the Church of England a confessional basis. The Ordinal retained the historic threefold orders of ordained ministry, thereby sustaining episcopacy* in the Reformed Church and re-creating a pastoral role for ministers that was shaped by the knowledge of Scripture and to which administering the Word with the sacraments was a normal accompaniment.

Until 1975 English ministers assented to the Articles, Prayer Book, and Ordinal as expressing their own beliefs and as “agreeable to the Word of God,” at ordination and at their licensing to new appointments. Since 1975 the Declaration of Assent has declared, "My belief in the faith which is revealed in the Holy Scriptures and set forth in the catholic creeds and to which the historic formularies of the Church of England bear witness...." Thus the Articles, Prayer Book, and Ordinal have become historic witnesses to Anglican belief rather than the basis of the subscribing ministers' own living faith. Anglicanism lives by a corporate life as well as by the confession of a creed.

In 1689, the Episcopal Church of Scotland took on an independent life, leading to constitutionally autonomous provinces throughout the world, often corresponding to national political boundaries. The second of these was the Protestant Episcopal Church in the USA (1785), where the Thirty-nine Articles were entrenched, but in a slightly reduced form (e.g. excising all reference to royal supremacy). Later provinces have referred to secondary standards in different ways: first to the creeds* (at least the Apostles'* Creed and the Nicene* Creed), then to the Articles, Prayer Book, and Ordinal, while still retaining the power to revise their text or alter their status. The rise of Anglo-Catholicism in the 19th c. somewhat affected the view of these reforms, as this strand of Anglicans stressed the doctrines of episcopacy and the sacraments*, played down the role of the Articles, and emphasized the early fathers and the traditions of the church. These shifts are sometimes embodied in the formularies of provinces that took their origin from evangelism and church-planting affected by Anglo-Catholic missionaries.

The independence of the 38 autonomous provinces has always carried a threat of divergence, division, and even schism among them. However, other forces have exerted pressure on them to profess the same faith and strengthen common bonds. Thus the first Lambeth* Conference (1867), precipitated by the threat of schism in South* Africa (see Colenso, John William), began a mutual bonding. The third Lambeth Conference (1888) affirmed a common Anglican stance in the "Lambeth* Quadrilateral" as the minimum standard Anglicans held when entering a corporate union with another ecclesiastical body.

In addition to these conferences, more specialized commissions have worked at retaining common doctrinal standards during liturgical experimentation, internal doctrinal divisions, and tension between provinces and in a changing ecumenical context. The following are examples of such spheres of work:

1. International bodies working jointly with comparable bodies of other world denominations to clarify and demonstrate as far as possible what doctrinal positions they hold in common. Foremost have been the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (1970–82; 1983–2005), the Anglican–Orthodox conversations, various Anglican–Lutheran conversations drawn together in 2000 as the Anglican-Lutheran International Working Group, and conversations since 1979 with the World* Reformed Alliance (leading to the report God's Reign and Our Unity, 1984).
2. The Anglican Communion's own commission, the Inter-Anglican Theological and Doctrinal Commission. This produced a report in 1986, For the Sake of the Kingdom. Then, reconstituted and renamed the "Eames Commission," it produced the Virginia Report on the nature of the Anglican Communion (1997), a major resource for the 1998 Lambeth Conference. It was reconstituted under its original title after 1998.
3. Further common declarations of faith and life have been proposed to the member churches of the Anglican Communion. After the consecration of a homosexually* active bishop in the USA in 2003, an action that threatened to divide the Communion irreparably, the Lambeth Commission on Communion was established, and its report, The Windsor Report (2004), proposed an "Anglican Covenant," creating a bond among the 38 provinces, each voluntarily pledging itself to the others on the basis of a common document. The draft was more than 2,000 words long, with detailed clauses on relationships and mutual commitment, making a strong ecclesiological statement. Its future in the Communion is not yet clarified.

There remains some truth in the conventional aphorism that the Anglican churches are strong on central doctrines, weak on discipline, and totally indistinct at the boundaries.

BISHOP COLIN O. BUCHANAN

Anglicanism: Anglican Worship and Liturgies. The first Church of England Book of Common* Prayer (the 1549 BCP), after minor revisions until 1662 (the 1662 BCP), remained so uniform that as late as 1908 the Lambeth* Conference passed resolutions about it (and about its revision) as though there were but a single Prayer Book throughout the whole Anglican Communion. There was an American BCP, with a slightly revised Communion service, a "Scottish Communion Office," and a Church of Ireland BCP, very close to the 1662 BCP. Yet the presupposition of a single Prayer Book and a single Anglican liturgical ethos remained virtually intact. Further revised Prayer Books (e.g. in Scotland and Canada, early 20th c.) and the compilation of new provincial or diocesan eucharistic rites (e.g. in Zanzibar, South Africa, and Sri Lanka) may have hinted at the likely end of "uniformity," but the long reign of the 1662 BCP was only marginally disturbed. The 1948 Lambeth Conference, ignoring recensions, still believed that "the" Prayer Book continued to serve as a great bond of unity of the whole Communion and any revisions should be done with great care for that unity.

From 1950 onward, the dominance of the 1662 BCP began to decline. The 1958 Lambeth Conference agreed on principles for liturgical revision; various churches (e.g. in England and the USA) changed their canons* to allow experimental alternative rites to exist alongside the authorized texts; rubrics were loosened to allow for more freedom within the rites; and the active participation of the people was encouraged by responsive and congregational material, the greeting of peace, and a growing eucharistic ethos. The Continental Liturgical* Movement had contributed to this, as had the Roman Catholic Second Vatican Council (1962–65). A far-reaching further change came when, between 1967 and 1970, the whole culture of addressing God as "thou" in English-language liturgy began to collapse. Addressing God as "you" ushered in a completely new language of prayer, often differing among provinces, but always in tangible discontinuity with the culture of the 1662 BCP. Experimental booklets flourished for a generation; Lambeth Conferences and the International Anglican Liturgical Consultations encouraged local inculturation*, but after 1979 provinces began to return to official (often hardback) books. These gave congregations a great choice of material and scope for creativity within a given liturgical framework, but the sheer variety meant that a common Anglican ethos, let alone a clear dynastic descent from the 1662 BCP, became ever harder to discern.

BISHOP COLIN O. BUCHANAN

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Anglicanism in Africa: Eastern and Western Africa. In Eastern Africa today, there are six Anglican provinces: Kenya*, Uganda*, Tanzania*, Sudan*, Rwanda*, and Burundi*. These provinces are held together by historical events that brought the entire region under the British imperial sphere of influence after World War I. Although French was the imperial language in Rwanda, Burundi, and Eastern Congo during the colonial period, Kiswahili became the medium of communication in trade and culture from the Indian Ocean to the Atlantic. These six provinces began as one missionary outpost under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury. Over time, African clergy were trained, some of whom were consecrated as bishops and a few enthroned as archbishops. The Conference of Anglican Provinces in Africa brings together all the Anglican provinces of Africa into a consultative forum, with its secretariat in Nairobi, Kenya.

1. Anglican Christianity in Eastern Africa. The establishment of Anglican Christianity in this region can be traced to 1844, when the German missionary Dr. Johann Ludwig Krapf* was sent from Ethiopia* to open a new initiative for the evangelization of local peoples, having failed to win converts among the Oromo of Southern Ethiopia. He was joined in 1846 by another German, Johannes Rebmann*. The two missionaries established a mission station at Rabai, a few miles inland from the coastal town of Mombasa.

Christianity had not been established earlier, because the east coast of Africa was dotted with Arab settlements – trading outposts – that had been present since the 7th c. and had remained distinct from the local African populations farther inland. Although the Portuguese had arrived in 1498 (Vasco da Gama visited Mombasa en route to India) and settled at Mombasa and Malindi during the 16th and 17th c., they were interested more in trade (or plunder) than in Christian mission and had been driven out of East Africa by the Arabs (1693), who established a sultanate until the colonization of East Africa by Britain (late 19th c.).

David Livingstone* (1812–73), coming from the south into Central Africa, made a name for himself when he campaigned for “legitimate commerce” (cash-crop agriculture) under British rule in opposition to “illegitimate commerce” in slaves under Arab control. The Christian missionary enterprise, as envisaged by Livingstone, was to lead tropical Africa along the path of this new economy, in which Africans would produce raw materials for factories in Britain and consume manufactured goods from British industrial centers such as London, Birmingham, Manchester, Bristol, and Liverpool. For this purpose, Anglican mission stations became the nuclei for the new African elite – complete with schools, dispensaries, vocational training centers, chapels, and catechism classes.

The modern Christian missionary enterprise in tropical Africa became intertwined with the European “scramble for the African continent” after the Berlin* Conference in 1885, where Livingstone’s memory was misused. The Germans exerted their influence in Tanganyika (now the main part of Tanzania), while the British dominated Kenya and Uganda. The Belgians had the Congo* Basin as their sphere of imperial influence, particularly under the rule of King Leopold II. Uganda became a theater of absurd competition between the British Anglicans, French Catholics, Arab Muslims, and traditional Africans.

2. Anglican Christianity in Western Africa. Anglican Christianity was introduced earlier in Western than in Eastern Africa, namely in 1752 in Ghana* by missionaries from England. Eventually, Anglican Christianity was spread across the British colonies of Western Africa (now Ghana, Nigeria*, Sierra* Leone, and Gambia), primarily through the work of the Church Missionary Society, with the missionaries Henry Townsend and Samuel Ajayi Crowther* (a former slave) arriving in Nigeria from Sierra Leone in 1842. Crowther was consecrated bishop of Lagos (1864) – the first African bishop – at a time when the Anglican mission was in its infancy in East Africa.

The Church of the Province of West Africa was formed in 1951, which at that time included the dioceses of Ghana, Nigeria, and Sierra Leone. In 1979 the Diocese of Nigeria became a separate province; it is the largest Anglican province in Africa, with its head office in Lagos. The other dioceses within the province of West Africa remained under the See of Accra, and to it were added the Diocese of Liberia* (1982), followed by the Diocese of Gambia (1985). The province supports four theological seminaries (two in Ghana, one in Liberia, and one in Sierra Leone) and a lay training center in Ghana.

Cameroon* became a missionary diocese in 2003. But Ghana, together with 8 of the 15 dioceses in the Church of the Province of West Africa, is in the process of becoming an autonomous province in accordance with the requirements and guidelines of the Anglican Communion.

3. Anglican Christianity and the Multilingual and Multicultural Situation in Eastern and Western Africa. English is the official language and the medium of instruction within institutions of higher learning in Kenya, Uganda, and Tanzania, as well as in the Anglican provinces of West Africa and Nigeria. French enjoys a similar status in Rwanda and Burundi. Arabic is the official language in Sudan, although English is taught and used, particularly in South Sudan. Kiswahili is the common language used for commerce in Eastern and Southern Africa from the Indian Ocean to the Atlantic, transcending these imperial languages (see Krapf, Johann Ludwig). In addition, hundreds of African languages are spoken in these regions. Throughout tropical Africa, the Bible is available in African languages, and the liturgy is conducted in these languages. Pastoral and theological training is conducted mainly in the respective foreign languages (English, French, and Arabic), while the pastors are expected to serve their congregations in the respective African languages. The exception is in urban centers, where the multiethnic congregations of the schooled elite have to use foreign languages for convenience, relevance, and applicability. One of the greatest challenges for theological and pastoral training in tropical Africa and elsewhere on this continent is to ensure that the language of liturgy in the congregations is also the language of training and ordination. Christianity will not become fully rooted in African cultures until theological articulations and liturgical expressions are conducted in the languages used by the congregations and in training.

4. Anglican Christianity in Eastern and Western Africa and Its Theological Perspectives. Most of Eastern and Western Africa was introduced to Anglicanism through the Church Missionary Society (CMS), an agency that was from the beginning closely associated with the 19th-c. Evangelical* revivals in Britain. Since the late 1920s, the East African Revival Movement has become widespread throughout the region, which has led to a great extension of the Anglican Church in Eastern Africa, even though part of this movement separated from the Anglican Communion. Yet in the coastal region of Tanzania and in Zanzibar, Anglicanism was brought by missionaries under the auspices of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa, an agency that was largely Anglo-Catholic, i.e. a mission society operated by the High Church faction of the Anglican Church. Thus Anglicanism in Tanzania has both Anglo-Catholic and Evangelical expressions in liturgy and ritual. Since the 1960s, there have been efforts to harmonize both strands of Anglicanism. The CMS has recently reconstituted itself into autonomous but related fraternal agencies, freeing the British "parent" society from the burden of funding missionary outreach outside of Britain. The implications of this shift are profound, anticipating the possibility of the re-evangelization of Europe and North America by the mission agencies from Africa and Asia, where Anglicanism is more dynamic and vibrant.

In Western Africa, Anglicanism is more homogeneous, as the constitution of the Church of the Province of West Africa (1951) shows. Its Article I states, "In conformity with Christian principles, the Church of this Province proclaims that all men have equal rights, value and dignity in the sight of God and while mindful to provide for the special needs of different people committed to its charge, it shall not allow any discrimination in the membership and government of the Church." The constitution further indicates that the primary mission of the province is to witness for Jesus Christ through its life and work in all aspects of the lives of people in the various countries, in order to achieve the abundant and holistic life envisaged in the gospel. The method of achieving this mission is evangelism* through teaching, preaching, and other pastoral services. The chief objective is to bring into submission to Jesus Christ the members of the church and those with whom they come into contact. That includes proclamation of the gospel, living a common life, and striving to create a just and fair society, through evangelistic, educational, agricultural, medical, and pastoral programs.

The core of the teaching of the Church of the Province of West Africa is the life and resurrection of Jesus Christ, as reflected in its catechism*, which includes the following articles:

- Jesus Christ is fully human and fully God. He died and was resurrected from the dead.
- Jesus provides the way of eternal life for those who believe.
- The Old and New Testaments of the Bible were written by people “under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit”. The Apocrypha are additional books that are used in Christian worship, but not for the formation of doctrine.
- The two great and necessary sacraments are Holy Baptism* and Holy Eucharist*.
- Other sacramental rites are confirmation*, ordination*, marriage*, reconciliation* of a penitent, and unction*.
- Belief in heaven, hell, and Jesus’ return in glory.

The threefold sources of authority in Anglicanism are Scripture*, tradition*, and reason*. These three sources uphold and critique each other in a dynamic way. This balanced perspective is traced to the work of Richard Hooker*, a 16th-c. apologist, for whom Scripture is the primary means of arriving at doctrine and things stated plainly in Scripture are accepted as true. Issues that are ambiguous are clarified by tradition*, which is checked by reason*.

5. Anglican Christianity in Africa and the Anglican Communion. A rather unique and awkward situation emerged after the 1998 Lambeth Conference, in which some of the bishops in this region were invited to exercise jurisdiction over priests in North America who could not bear canonical obedience to the bishops in their respective parishes. This oddity was the result of the failure of the Lambeth Conference and the Anglican Consultative Council to reach consensus on matters of marriage and sexuality. The fact of African bishops having jurisdiction over priests in North America has opened new questions concerning the polity* and hierarchical structure of the Anglican Communion. During the colonial period, it was considered “normal” for bishops to have jurisdiction over priests in another region. With the shift in the numerical strength of Anglicanism from the North Atlantic to Africa, it is likely that more African bishops will have jurisdiction over priests in North America, Britain, Europe, Australia, and New Zealand.

The Anglican Communion holds together all the Anglican provinces worldwide, with between 70 and 90 million members. One of the unresolved questions is: What do Anglicans from various cultures and nations have in common other than an imperial history? The Anglican Consultative Council is mandated to deliberate this issue, while the Lambeth Conference symbolically and ritually convenes every 10 years to reaffirm Anglican unity. The crisis in the Lambeth Conferences of 1998 and 2008 over marriage* and sexuality* is one manifestation of the difficulty of affirming one faith in Jesus Christ in the context of diverse cultural identities. During his term as honorary general secretary of the Church Missionary Society (1841–73), Henry Venn formulated the goal of Christian missionary outreach as the establishment of self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating churches abroad. In practice, the relationship between the older and the younger provinces of the Anglican Communion has tended to be that of tutelage and condescension, with the older ones claiming more power and authority on the basis of wealth and history rather than of doctrinal and scriptural authenticity. The symptoms of this unhealthy relationship became manifest in the Lambeth Conferences of 1998 and 2008, although the issue has simmered since the first Lambeth Conference (1867; see Colenso, John William).

The 20th-c. ecumenical* movement was intended to affirm the one faith as bequeathed to the church through the Apostles’ and the Nicene Creeds. Yet in the early 21st c., the World* Council of Churches has been overshadowed by the “World Christian Communions” (international organizations of churches of the same tradition or confession), of which the Anglican Communion is a prominent example. Should Christians across cultures affirm their denominational allegiance or their Christian unity? While Christian doctrine teaches us to uphold Christian unity, denominational history demands that we choose denominational allegiance, irrespective of the scandalous consequences for Christian mission. Anglicanism in Eastern and Western Africa is an interesting illustration of these tensions over doctrine, ecclesial structure, biblical hermeneutics, and theological reflection.

JESSE NDWIGA KANYUA MUGAMBI

Anglicanism in Africa: Southern Africa.

The Church of the Province of Southern Africa, a part of the Anglican Communion, comprises dioceses in Angola*, Lesotho*, Mozambique*, Namibia*, Saint Helena, South* Africa, and Swaziland*, and is predominantly of High Church tradition. It is the most liberal province on matters pertaining to women's* ordination and homosexuality*. The primate is the archbishop of Cape Town.

Although the roots of Anglicanism in Southern Africa can be traced back to the 17th c., the Anglican Church's official establishment began with the appointment of Robert Gray as the first bishop in Cape Town (1848). He laid solid foundations for the expansion of the Church from Cape Town to Natal (1853), Orange Free State and Transvaal (1863), then to Lesotho (1876), Swaziland, Zimbabwe (1891), Mozambique (1893), Angola, Namibia, and Botswana.

Throughout its history, Anglicanism upheld the policy of equality of races. During the apartheid* era, the Anglican Church played a pivotal role in the struggle against apartheid, following the leadership of Bishops Geoffrey Clayton, Ambrose Reeves, and Trevor Huddleston and Archbishop Desmond Tutu. The Anglican Church has also contributed to the socioeconomic development of the people through the establishment of schools, colleges, and clinics.

The Church takes into account the importance of African culture in worship, church practice, spirituality, and church polity*. The 1986 election of Bishop Tutu as the archbishop of the province, the first black African in this position, was the culmination of many years of the Africanization of the Church in rank and file. As archbishop, he was able to speak with great authority on behalf of the churches not only in Southern Africa but in Africa as a whole.

JAMES N. AMANZE

Anglicanism in Asia: Episcopal Church in the Philippines.

The Episcopal Church in the Philippines is a province of the Worldwide Anglican Communion. It upholds and safeguards the historic faith and order as contained in the Book of Common Prayer. Established as a missionary district of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the USA with Charles Henry Brent as its first bishop (1901), it was renamed the Philippine Episcopal Church (1937), became a missionary diocese (1965), but remained under the wing of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the USA. It named its first Filipino bishop, Benito Cabanban (1967); three dioceses were formed (1971), and it became an autonomous province of the Anglican Communion (1990), officially called the Episcopal Church in the Philippines. By 2000 it had six dioceses (about 120,000 members), with a mission statement declaring that the Church exists to promote with integrity the fulfillment of God's mission in this world by proclaiming the good news of the Kingdom of God, both by baptizing, teaching, and nurturing new believers and by responding to human needs with loving service, seeking to transform unjust structures of society, and safeguarding the integrity of God's creation. See also PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENT CHURCH; PHILIPPINES.

TOMAS S. MADDELA

Anglicanism in Asia: India. See NORTH INDIA, CHURCH OF; SOUTH INDIA, CHURCH OF.

Anglicanism in Australia and the South Pacific.

The largest denomination in Australia* until recently, Anglicanism reflected the status, imperial vision, and differences of the parent body. The presence of the Anglican Church moved beyond convict chaplaincy to become an important influence in a free nation. The early establishment of a synodal polity* enabled dioceses to interact fruitfully with a democratic community in which there was no established church or religious tests, but significant financial aid for stipends, buildings, and education. Though that had ended by 1900, Anglicans made major contributions to the construction of a Christian society, despite secular crosscurrents. Many believed that God ordained Australia to Christianize the peoples of the north. With a few exceptions, Anglicans believed Aborigines were a dying race; they did little to remedy manifest injustice and devoted few resources to evangelization until the early 1900s. In Papua, however, the work of Anglican missions led to a strong church by the time of Papua's independence (1976). Anglican bishops and clergy significantly shaped public opinion, upheld the British heritage, and offered care for the needy and isolated through the Brotherhood of St Laurence and the Bush Brotherhoods. Women played almost no part in governance until the late 20th c. A long struggle led to women's* ordination to the priesthood (1992) and women's consecration as bishops (2008). Gradually an Aboriginal Church also emerged; its first bishop was consecrated in 1985. Torres Strait Islanders had been ordained in the 1920s.

Traditional religious and social priorities were increasingly questioned starting in the 1960s. The vision of a multicultural society emerged in response to massive immigration that began in 1945. The White Australia Policy was dismantled. Now Anglicans are adjusting to the substantial presence of other world religions, at the same time that their own institutional strength is in decline. International involvement, liturgical renewal, and an increasingly important General Synod have not overcome divisions between Sydney Evangelicals and other dioceses, but Anglicans still make a vital contribution to Christian witness. IAN BREWARD

Anglicanism in Europe: The United Kingdom.

See PRESENT CLUSTER: ANGLICAN COMMUNION AND ITS THEOLOGY; UNITED KINGDOM.

Anglicanism in Latin America: Mexico. In the mid-19th c., new indigenous religious movements developed with Protestant influence, among them the Church of the Militant Jesus in the Land (Iglesia de Jesús Militante en la Tierra), known in short as the Church of Jesus. This occurred while the migration of Europeans and North Americans to Mexico aided the development of the Episcopal Church (of the United States), including the creation of an Episcopal missionary diocese. In 1904 the (Episcopal) Missionary District for Mexico was established. In 1906 the Church of Jesus, which viewed itself as the Mexican Episcopal Church, asked for admission to the Missionary District, uniting the English- and Spanish-speaking Episcopalians. In 1958 the (Episcopal) Diocese of Mexico was created. As its legal existence was recognized by the government, the Episcopal Church took the name Anglican Church of Mexico, which since 1995 has been an autonomous province of the Anglican Communion. MONICA URIBE

Anglicanism in North America. A number of churches trace their origins from the transplanting of the Church of England into North America, but the two principal ones are the Episcopal Church and the Anglican Church of Canada. Anglicanism permanently entered what is now the USA in 1607 and during the colonial period was legally established in all or part of six colonies. After the American Revolution, the Episcopal Church organized itself, secured bishops (absent during the colonial period), and modified the Book of Common* Prayer. The Church is governed by a general convention consisting of a house of deputies (clergy and laity) and a house of bishops.

Anglicanism was introduced in Canada* in 1713. In 1787 Charles Inglis was appointed bishop of British North America by the British crown. Until the mid-19th c., Canadian Anglicans viewed their church as an extension of the Church of England and as legally established (though this claim was contested). During the late 19th c., the Church became increasingly self-governing.

Both churches over the years have adapted to changes in theology and practice, and these changes have in turn led to splinter groups. In the mid-19th c., US Episcopalians (and to a lesser extent Canadian Anglicans) responded favorably to the catholicizing principles associated with the Oxford* Movement. In protest, a number of congregations broke away to form the Reformed Episcopal Church (1873). In the late 20th c., both churches moved in a liberal direction concerning Prayer Book revision (USA, 1979; Canada, 1988), the ordination* of women (Canada, 1975; USA, 1976), and the full inclusion of gay and lesbian persons (see Homosexuality). This movement resulted in a number of conservative splinter groups, and at present threatens an even greater division both within the two churches and in the relationship of the two churches to the wider Anglican Communion. See also CANADA; UNITED STATES.

ROBERT BRUCE MULLIN

Angola. Christianity arrived in what is now Angola with Portuguese colonization; as elsewhere in Africa, the appropriation of natural resources and land was justified by the three-fold project of Christianization, civilization, and commerce. The Portuguese assimilado system (even worse than the South* African apartheid) divided the African population into indigenas and assimilados ("second-class whites," speaking and reading Portuguese and adopting a Portuguese way of life). The church (90% of the population is nominally Christian) has emerged through centuries of this harsh colonialism and decades of brutal civil war into a new freedom and a great opportunity to serve society.

The first Portuguese settlers arrived in Soyo (1482, at the estuary of the river Congo, now a rich oil field), followed by Roman Catholic missionaries (1491) while the kingdom of Congo was under the rule of King Nzinga-a-Nkuvu (1491–1506), who converted (baptized João I) and with his successor, Afonso I (1506–42), established the Roman Catholic Church in the capital, Mbanza (renamed São Salvador, in the north of present-day Angola) (see Congo, Democratic Republic of). Christianity also spread farther south among the Kimbundu people in the kingdom of Ngola (including the region from Luanda to the Malanje highland in the east). (The name "Angola" is derived from the royal title "Ngola.") But the spread of the Roman Catholic Church was halted and soon declined owing first to the slave* trade that poisoned the Angolan soil in the 15th–16th c. and later to the rubber trade, which totally disrupted the lives of Angolans: all the men were forced to travel with long caravans to carry rubber from deep inland to the coast, while women remained in the villages to work in the fields and grow food for their families.

The planting of Christianity in Angola in the last quarter of the 19th century coincided with the scramble for Africa (see Berlin Conference), as European powers clashed at the estuary of the Congo River. Rivalries between French and Portuguese missionaries impeded the work of Catholic missions. Religious tensions between British Protestant and Portuguese Catholic missionaries were exacerbated by the colonial rivalries between Portugal and Great Britain. In the south (border of Angola with Southwestern Africa, now Namibia*), the tensions between Lutheran and Catholic missions reflected the conflict between Germany and Portugal. In addition, the African kings and chiefs, although they did not control vast territories, wielded sufficient power to permit or impede the establishment of missions in their areas. In the late 19th c., the king of the Congo exercised strong power over the Catholic and Protestant churches in the north; in the center of the country, the Ovimbundu Confederation, although decentralized, supported the church through strong kings such as Ekuikui II of Bailundo and Ndunduma of Bié; in the south, the Kwanyama kings frustrated the Catholic missionary efforts for many years.

The church was nevertheless planted in a social soil that varied according to the various ethnolinguistic groups. In the north, the Congo/Bakongo ethnolinguistic groups (13% of the population) were the first to be Christianized, and both Catholic and Protestant churches were established in their ancient capital, Mbanza. Immediately to their south, the Kimbundu/Mbundu ethnolinguistic groups (25% of the population) were largely "assimilated," long associated with the Portuguese colonial rule, and thus largely Catholics. The Umbundu/Ovimbundu ethnolinguistic group, the largest group (37% of the population), which spread from the central highlands (Huambo, Benguela, and Bié) to every province of Angola, was fertile soil for the planting of the church because of its homogeneity and because the people lived in large villages. It is among Umbundu that Christianity has been most in contact with African* Religion, because the Umbundu kings were high priests for their peoples (the spirits of the king's ancestors* were the principal communal religious authorities). Smaller ethnolinguistic groups (22% of the population, including the Ganguela, 7%) have distinctive characteristics and ways of relating to Christianity.

The Catholic Church, closely associated with Portugal, largely promoted "assimilation" (assimilado) until the country's independence (1975), although individual Angolan Catholic priests took the side of the liberation movements during the long war of independence (starting in 1961) and were imprisoned along with ABCFM (Congregational), Baptist, and Methodist missionaries while numerous Angolan pastors and teachers were killed by Portuguese soldiers (all Protestants were suspected of being revolutionaries). With the new secular constitution (and ongoing civil disturbance), the Catholic Church (now promoting an "authentically African" church) lost its privileged status despite its size, becoming one of the officially approved churches – beside diverse Protestant churches, Pentecostal and Charismatic churches, and African* Instituted Churches, including Kimbanguist* and Tokoist churches.

When missionaries arrived in the 1870s and 1880s, they dismissed the African* Religion as superstition because it lacked the main features of the Western religion: doctrinal statements, ecclesiastical structures, and scriptures. For a long time, Christianity remained the "whites' religion." However, by learning local languages and working with local people, missionaries entered the world of African Religion. Recognizing that African deities were not inconsistent with the Christian view of God, they employed the names for God in common use in each ethnolinguistic group: especially Nzambi (Kikongo, Kimbundu, and Chokwe), Suku (Umbundu), Kalunga (Ambo), Nzambi-Kalunga (Herero), and Huku (Nyaneka-Humbe). In each case God can be described in Christian theological terms (omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent) but is best understood by entrance into the world of African Religion through its proverbs regarding God and the various rituals in response to the actions of the spirits (see God, Christian Views of, Cluster: In Africa; God, Christian Views of, Cluster: Names for God in the Bible and Church Tradition). This Africanization of Christianity also needs to account for the importance in African Religion of the kimbanda, healer or exorcist* who invokes the protection of benevolent spirits or exorcizes evil spirits. It is common for a well-educated person to go to church on Sunday and to the kimbanda when he or she wants, for instance, a professional promotion. Thus it is not surprising that with emphasis on healing and exorcism and on the prosperity* gospel, the Christian Charismatic* Movement progresses rapidly. But despite everything befalling the churches in Angola, the Church of Jesus Christ is one, with two natures: divine and human; the body of Christ that announces the coming of the Kingdom* of God and an African people or community.

Statistics: Population (2000): 12.8 million (M). Christians, 12.1 M, 94% (Roman Catholics, 8 M; Protestants, 2 M; members of African Instituted Churches and other independents, 0.9 M); African Religionists, 0.6 M, 5% (though many Christians also practice African Religion); non-religious, 0.12 M, 1.0%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

LUCIANO CHIANEQUE

Anhypostasia, in Christology*, Christ's lack of independent human life. See also ENHYPOSTASIA.

Animism, a belief that some or all inanimate things and natural phenomena – things that are independent of human life yet have an impact on it – have life, consciousness, or intention, and thus must be propitiated*, prayed to, or outwitted.

Annulment. See MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER: IN WESTERN CHURCHES: MARRIAGE ANNULMENT IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Annunciation, the angel Gabriel's* announcement to Mary* (Luke 1:26–38); also, the feast day (March 25) commemorating it, nine months before Christmas*.

Anointing, the application of oil for the consecration of kings in ancient Israel; the practice was later extended to the high priest. The hoped-for deliverer of Israel was called the Anointed or Messiah (Gk Christos); Jesus was given this title, and he is sometimes said to have been anointed by the Holy Spirit (Luke 4:18; Acts 4:27, 10:38; Heb 1:9).

In the NT there is mention of anointing the sick to heal body and soul (Mark 6:13, Jas 5:14–15); this did not become an ecclesial ritual for several centuries (ultimately becoming “final unction”; see Sick, Visitation and Anointing of). The church also began (late 2nd c.) to anoint with oil in connection with baptism*, as a sign of the imparting of the Holy* Spirit. After confirmation* was differentiated from baptism in the Western Church, the “oil of catechumens” was applied before baptism, and “chrism*” immediately following baptism (also in confirmation and ordination).

The anointing of rulers is found in Byzantium*, in Visigoth Spain*, and in Ireland*, where it is linked with the claims of the O’Neill kings to rule large areas of the island. When the pope replaced the Merovingian with the Carolingian* dynasty (751), Pippin* was anointed by the Frankish bishops. From then on, the popes appropriated the power to anoint rulers, thereby building alliances and creating new obligations on the part of rulers. Anointing, by giving rulers a sacral status, encouraged them to interfere in the affairs of the church. As a counterbalance, bishops were anointed at ordination* (beginning 9th c.).

The churches of the Reformation criticized the practice of anointing as superstitious; the anointing of the sick had originally been used to speed recovery, not in the context of last rites. Rulers continued to be anointed, however, in several countries of the Reformation (England*, Denmark*, and Sweden*). The Oxford* Movement led to the revival of anointing in the Anglican Communion, first informally and then, by vote of the bishops of each national church, as part of the official ceremonies, usually optional. In contemporary cultures where the use of oils on the body is common, anointing has become more readily accepted in Protestant and Anglican worship and pastoral care.

EUGENE TESELLE

Anomoians. See HOMOOUSIANS, HOMOIOUSIANS, HOMOIANS, ANOMOIANS.

Anonymous Christians, Karl Rahner’s* designation for persons who, without having heard the Christian message, have responded to the grace* of God and thus are Christians in fact but not in name. See also UNIQUENESS OF CHRIST.

Anselm of Canterbury (c1033–1109), theologian, abbot of Bec, archbishop of Canterbury;

born in Aosta in Lombardy. He traveled as a wandering student throughout France (1056–59), arriving eventually at the monastic school at Bec where Lanfranc was teaching. After some uncertainty, he became a monk at Bec (1060) and then prior (1063), taking over the school from Lanfranc. He became abbot of Bec (1078) and then archbishop of Canterbury (1093).

His time as archbishop was marked by painful disputes with successive kings of England during a period when the respective jurisdictions of church and state were being redefined. Twice he went into exile (1098 and 1103–7) to seek papal support for his attempts to defend the rights of the church. In 1098 he was asked by Pope Urban II at the Council of Bari to resolve the disagreements that underlay the schism of 1054 between Greek and Latin Christians. He continued to live the simple life of a monk to the extent that he could, in the community of St. Augustine at Canterbury and was still active as a theologian at the end of his life, eager to live long enough to solve the problem of the origin of the soul*.

Anselm lived during the earliest days of the emergence of the types of schools that were to evolve in a century into the first universities, but he remained primarily a monastic scholar. He was drawn into controversy about the Trinity* and the Incarnation* by Roscelin of Compiègne and about the relationship of church* and state by his quarrels with the English kings. But he preferred the quiet process of teaching and writing about a series of major theological issues.

Anselm is best known for his formulation of the ontological argument for the existence of God* (Chapter 2 of the Proslogion, 1077–78) and for his book Why God Became Man (Cur Deus homo, 1094–98), but he covered most of the topics of Christian theology, from the nature of God to the Trinity, Incarnation, and redemption*, to the relationship of human free will* to divine foreknowledge, predestination* and grace*, and the sacraments. Anselm also wrote a groundbreaking series of prayers and meditations for private devotional use.

Anselm’s approach was essentially Platonic*, although he had a knowledge of Aristotelian* logic, which was then becoming fashionable. His leading idea was that reasoning was capable of showing the truth of orthodox Christian belief, so that faith* need never be in tension with reason*. Anselm’s motto was “faith seeking understanding” (fides quaerens intellectum).

GILLIAN R. EVANS

Ansgar (c801–65), “Apostle of the North,” (arch)bishop, saint; a Benedictine* monk, first in Corbie, France, then (from 815) in Corvey, Germany, where he taught. Emperor Louis* I, the Pious, sent Ansgar as a missionary to Hedeby, Denmark* (826–28); he became the first missionary in Sweden* (829–30) in the commercial town of Birka. The leader of the Nordic mission as bishop (831), then archbishop, of Hamburg-Bremen (848), he made a second visit to Birka and Denmark (851–52). An ascetic* monk, according to The Life of Ansgar (Vita Ansgarii) by Archbishop Rimbert, his successor, he was also a purposeful church politician.

BERTIL NILSSON

Anthem, Anglicized form of “antiphon”*; more generally, choral music used in worship.

Anthony, Susan B. (1820–1906), suffragist, abolitionist, temperance* advocate, longtime president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association.

Born in Adams, Massachusetts, and raised in the Quaker faith, Anthony believed in the “inner light,” and that through quiet and careful listening, an individual could have a direct experience of God’s message (see Quaker Worship). Aspects of Quakerism, especially its critique of church hierarchy and of an elevated clergy, informed Anthony’s women’s rights perspective throughout her career as a reformer (see Friends, Religious Society of). She decried the hypocrisy she witnessed among clergy who tolerated merchants of alcohol within their congregations or failed to endorse women’s equality.

Believing that women’s political liberty must precede their religious emancipation, Anthony declined to participate in Elizabeth Cady Stanton’s* radical project, The Woman’s Bible (1895), a feminist interpretation of Scripture. Yet Anthony defended Stanton publicly, when The Woman’s Bible came under attack by reformers and Christian clergy. As she aged, Anthony became increasingly skeptical of all religious traditions, joining at age 73 the Rochester, New York, Unitarian* Church. Her primary spiritual commitment was to “convert” women to the suffrage cause. She championed religious tolerance and endeavored to create a broad-based suffrage movement in which agnostics, evangelicals, Catholics, and Jews were all welcome.

KATHI LYNN KERN

Anthony the Great (254–356). See ANTONY.

ANTHROPOLOGY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Anthropology in Eastern Orthodox Christian Theology

Anthropology in Western Christian Theology

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Anthropology: African American Theological Issues

Anthropology: African Theological Issues

Anthropology: Asian Theological Issues

Anthropology: Australian Aboriginal Theological Issues

Anthropology: European-American Theological Issues

Anthropology: Feminist Theological Issues

Anthropology: Latin American Theological Issues

Anthropology: Womanist Theological Issues

1) Introductory Entries

Anthropology in Eastern Orthodox Christian Theology. The Orthodox understanding of the human condition differs markedly from Western conceptions (including the Western emphasis on atonement* and justification*). The salvific effects of the Incarnation* extend not just to fallen humanity, but also to the entire cosmos. Original* sin is not understood as sharing in the guilt of Adam’s fall but as the inheritance of his corrupted mortal nature. Humans are seen more as victims of the devil’s deception than as criminals to be condemned by divine justice. Death* is understood not as God’s curse on the creation, but as God’s enemy and the inevitable consequence of separation from life with God. Sin* is viewed in terms of a disease of the soul more than as individual acts of lawbreaking. The human person is regarded as a psychosomatic unity that sin afflicts in its entirety, leading to all the sufferings of soul* and body of the present life.

Orthodox theology is markedly apophatic* in character, starting from the premise that human words and concepts are inadequate for conceiving of God, who in essence is unknowable. The idea of a mysterion (Gk “mystery*”) is quintessentially Orthodox: the Trinity*, the Incarnation*, the Church* and its sacraments* are all referred to as “mysteries,” which cannot be grasped intellectually and yet may be known through personal participation. Humanity can experience God in God’s uncreated energies, attributes of divinity in which humans participate by the cooperation of their free will with God’s energies. God is known always as philanthropos, “loving humankind.” Responding fully to divine love leads a person to union with God, known as *theosis.

Salvation* is thus defined not merely as forgiveness*, but even more as liberation* of the human mind from delusion and the renewal of human nature by union with the God-man Christ, whose healing presence is experienced through the Church and its sacramental mysteries*. These include baptism*, chrismation*, Communion*, confession*, unction*, matrimony*, and ordination*. The Divine* Liturgy is the high point of sacramental life. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRIES.

ARCHBISHOP DEMETRIOS (TRAKATELLIS)

Anthropology in Western Christian Theology. Theological anthropology is the study of human beings in conversation with a particular religious tradition. In Christian theology, anthropology concerns such issues as the origin of humanity; human ontological constitution, body* and spirit* (soul*, reason*); sin*; evil* and oppression; grace* and redemption* or liberation* – all as related to God.

European Christian theological anthropology begins with the Bible, as a plan according to which God creates human beings in a balanced and equal relationship within the self, with the neighbor, and toward nature. Decisively, human purpose is contingent on following God’s supreme intent for human history. However, humans chose to “fall” by seeking to know all that God knew (see Fall). This disruption in the divine goal led to hierarchy, gender antagonism, anxiety, oppression* and exploitation, the destruction of nature, and human estrangement from God. God remained faithful to the sovereign plan by sending Jesus to save humanity’s body and spirit, men and women. Through Jesus, God’s intent becomes equality, liberation*, and just relations among beings, especially the marginalized.

The Roman Catholic Church (from the early church to the 16th c.) and the Protestant Reformation (16th c.) espoused a salvation* history, with humans fitting into God’s plan. Drawing more on Greek philosophy, Roman Catholic scholastic* theology separated the spirit from the body of the human person. Yet it also pointed to community, in contrast to the advocacy of individual direct connection to God prevalent in mainline “orthodox” Protestant Churches. The latter fostered a theological anthropology of individualism and capitalism. The stirring of capitalist individualism and freedom of individual wealth owners versus the rigid hierarchy of feudal landlords helped set the conditions for the respective Protestant versus Roman Catholic debates over the definition of humanity.

Roman Catholic scholastic and orthodox Protestant theological anthropologies taught the supremacy of divine salvation history and God’s preordained purpose for humanity. The European Enlightenment* (late 17th and 18th c.) produced a radical shift of focus, away from God toward humanity. Reason*, scientific discoveries, global voyages, and the consolidation of capitalism accented the power and freedom of humans. God’s supremacy was questioned. Reason and science* fit God into the human plan. Liberal* theological anthropology marks this period. The purpose of humanity is to use its own reason to bring about social* reforms and ultimately bring in God’s “Kingdom*.”

The human evils* of World Wars I and II challenged liberal theological anthropology’s (often implicit) claim of human superiority over God’s plan. How could human reason bring in God's "Kingdom" when human nature tends toward death and destruction? The purpose of humans became to wait on the salvation coming only from God's direction, a unidirection salvation. A strict hierarchy ensued, with every human attempt to reach God considered blasphemy*. Neo-orthodox* theological anthropology underscores this period of "Let God be God all by God's self."

DWIGHT N. HOPKINS

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Anthropology: African American Theological Issues. North American Black theological anthropology flows out of the 1950s and 1960s Civil* Rights and Black Power movements and as a critique of the dominating white theology in divinity schools, seminaries, and churches. Because Jesus Christ is a liberator of structurally oppressed humanity and individual broken persons, the human purpose is to follow Jesus. To be human (and a Christian), one goes with Jesus. Some define humanity as a radical engagement of liberation* with the marginalized by any means necessary. Others perceive the Black Church as the hub of a black revolution in the broader society and establishing a separate black nation. Some link African American human identity to liberation, balanced by reconciliation* with white Christian supremacists. Others demand a reconnection to African spirituality*, ancestors*, and the all-powerful African God (see African Religion and Christianity Cluster).

Black theological anthropology has an international reach. Black humanity succeeds when the poor* in the USA connect with the full humanity of the poor throughout the world, particularly darker-skinned peoples. Anchored in Christianity, Black theological anthropology works with all spiritualities and religions of the global poor through the paradigm of "liberation of the oppressed." Because African American people's humanity is also shaped by their social and economic location in history's most powerful economic, political, and military country, to be human means to assume the responsibility of sharing the wealth of the USA with Third World peoples.

Black theology links the racial dimensions of the black self to ownership of wealth (see Property). How is it that the humanity of most African Americans has been defined by poverty* and working-class status? What does it mean to lack wealth or income? How is this human status amplified by the feminization of poverty (see Womanist and African American Theologies)? To be human, here, is to give substance to the eschatological thrust of Christian anthropology. The human goal is to co-labor with God to realize a healed individual self and a common wealth on earth.

Black male theological anthropology re-envisions maleness in conversation with Womanist theologians. Male anthropology is undergoing a self-examination and redefinition by learning wholeness – political and cultural, liberation and survival/quality of life, vulnerability and guardedness, economics* and the emotional, and the academy and church together. All bodies of knowledge that foster an integrated male identity are used for individual transformation.

Being human today entails a closer working relation between the history of ideas of the academy and the wisdom of the church. Black theologians have defined their humanity as a composite of both social locations, woven together by a compassion for the wounded and for the least in all societies.

DWIGHT N. HOPKINS

Anthropology: African Theological Issues. African anthropology is an "anthropology of the whole." Africans (especially the Malagasy, inhabitants of Madagascar*) enjoy the concreteness and wholeness of things, whereas the heirs of Greek and Latin ancient cultures like abstractions. While the latter attempt to comprehend the mechanism of things, Africans try to understand their meaning. Indeed, Dubois* claimed that instead of being inclined to dominate and domesticate the world, as the heirs of the Greek and Latin cultures do, Africans tend to enjoy living out the mystique of the universe.

Holism, not dualism, is pertinent for traditional Africans. There is not much of a divide between the living and the dead. The "living dead," the ancestors*, are present together with the living; a person is, of course, both mind and body, both flesh and spirit, but there is no dichotomy. The terms "mind," "body," "flesh," and "spirit" are metonymic, each referring to the whole person.

Similarly, individuals cannot be envisioned apart from the community in which they flourish and which transcends them. "Alive, we live in the same house; dead, we dwell in the same tomb," says a Malagasy proverb.

While the foregoing observations have been made by sociocultural anthropologists, the Christian theological engagement with African anthropology involves wrestling with the dehumanizing forces that have shaped the modern and contemporary history of Africans. Slavery*, colonialism*, natural disasters, conflicts, and the scourge of HIV/AIDS, among others, constitute human woes of biblical proportion, which threaten the holism of life in Africa. From this standpoint, African history may well parallel biblical history as a history of rise and fall, death and resurrection. A senior anthropologist wrote, "Africa is the future . . . Africa appears to be running just slightly ahead of the history of the rest of the globe. . . . Lagos is not catching up with us. Rather we may be catching up with Lagos. Africa . . . appears to be previewing a planetary future. For good or for ill. Or both." (Weiss)

Christian "mission-doers" are those who are active in transforming African history and its future into a biblical history with its prophecy. The most indigenous Christian "mission-doers" are the agents of the so-called African* Instituted Churches. These African Christian leaders take care of the whole of human needs. They are active in prayer and celebration, but also in evangelization, in healing*, deliverance, socioeconomic production, and holistic education.

LAURENT WILLIAM RAMAMBASON

Anthropology: Asian Theological Issues. Anthropology in Christian theology concerns the origin of humanity, creation*; human ontological constitution, body and soul*; sin*; and grace* and redemption* by God in Christ and by the power of the Holy Spirit. Expressing these anthropological Christian doctrines in terms congenial to Asian cultures and religions is extremely difficult; often there are no equivalent terms and concepts.

Creation. Most Asian cultures and religions have cosmogonic myths (e.g. the Chinese Sanwu Liji, the Vedic Rig Veda, and the Tibetan* Bön religion), but none contains the belief in a creation ex nihilo, i.e. a bringing of all things into being by the transcendent deity without any preexisting material and with a divinely ordained purpose. For most Asian cosmogonic myths, both deities (gods and goddesses) and the elements of the material universe are manifestations of the Absolute, within a cyclical rather than a linear (purposeful) sense of time. Thus the Christian doctrines of divine immanence*, mystical union* with God, and cosmic order find a strong resonance in Asia.

Body and Soul. The diverse Asian views of the ontological constitution of the human person are distinct from the Christian concept of the human person as the unity of perishable matter (body) and immortal spirit (soul). In Hinduism* and Buddhism*, matter is an illusion; soul-spirit is the only real reality. In Theravada Buddhism, there is no "soul" (anatman), i.e. no substantial, unchanging, enduring self. In Daoism*, there is a great sense of harmony between humans and the material world. Christian anthropology can help Asians achieve a greater appreciation of the body and the individuality of the human person; Christians will learn from Asian insights into the contingency ("impermanence") of the human person and its intimate unity with the cosmos (ecology*).

Sin. While in Christianity sin is primarily a deliberate betrayal of a relationship with a loving personal God (but see Anthropology Cluster: Eastern Orthodox Christian Theology), in Asia “sin” is the infringement of a cosmic and/or moral order (dharma) concretized in moral and legal codes and religious observances. In Hinduism, a set of duties is prescribed for each person according to one’s place (caste*) in society and stage of life. In Buddhism, the dharma is embodied in the “Three Jewels” (triratna; Buddha, teaching, and community) and in the moral rules for monks or laity. Confucianism* emphasizes the reciprocal duties in four relationships: ruler–subject, husband–wife, parent–child, and sibling–sibling. Generally, a failure to preserve the cosmic and moral order produces shame* (more so than guilt*). Despite the absence of any notion of “original sin” or of the betrayal of a loving personal God, much in this Asian understanding of “sin” echoes Christian understandings.

Redemption and Grace. The popular understanding of karma and rebirth (samsara) often stresses the merit of one’s deeds and ignores the gratuitousness of final liberation or salvation. Yet the notion of faith* and grace is central in Pure Land Buddhism; one can attain rebirth (“salvation”) in the Pure Land of the Buddha Amida either through a good life or through invocation of and faith in the Buddha Amida. Christian soteriology* in Asia can insist both on personal responsibility and on faith in the gracious God who saves us in Christ and by the power of the Holy Spirit.

PETER C. PHAN

Anthropology: Australian Aboriginal Theological Issues. For Australian* Aboriginal societies, humans are a part of an interrelated world, imbued with the same spiritual essence. For the Pitjantjatjara people of South Australia, our example here, in the timeless Dreaming (tjukurpa), spirit beings (kurunitja) emerged from a preexistent substance to roam the land. They metamorphosed or left imprints to form features of the environment. Spiritual essence remains within these features. These beings were the ancestors* of people, animals, and plant species. Humans share relationship, rights, and responsibilities with other species. Aborigines attribute the conception of human life to the entry of a spirit into the woman’s body. The role of the male is to facilitate this entry. Death ensues when the spirit leaves the body.

Aboriginal societies emphasize social roles and obligations rather than individual rights. Reciprocity is a key principle in determining the interaction between individuals and groups, with social balance maintained as all fulfilled their responsibilities. In such an egalitarian ethos, older men and women have authority as repositories of the most sacred knowledge and control of the stories and rituals associated with the Dreaming.

The concept of a universal creator* God, which Aborigines did not have, and the story of Jesus as redeemer* were introduced by missionaries, with little understanding of or sensitivity to traditional beliefs, which were viewed as pagan*. Greater openness and translation of the Bible made it possible for Aboriginal Christians to relate aspects of their culture to Christianity, finding resonance between aspects of their hunter-gatherer lifestyle and that of biblical nomads.

Dreaming stories provide neither a model of perfection nor a concept of sin*; rather, they point toward the need for balance and provide opportunities for people to reflect on appropriate actions in specific contexts. The traditional role of a person (ngalkilpa) who intercedes or takes on punishment for another points toward Jesus’ redeeming work.

Thus the struggle for justice* and equality became a central issue for Aborigines influenced by Christianity. Despite restrictions imposed by racial theories, government policies, and limited education, effective leaders in this struggle included David Unaipon, Douglas Nicholls, Blind Moses, Alan Mungulu, Miriam-Rose Ungunmerr-Baumann, and Djiniyini Gondarra. The influential Charismatic Arnhem Land Revival and Aboriginal Evangelical Fellowship (1970s–1980s) led to increased Aboriginal leadership. Thus theological reflection on the environment and reconciliation brought together traditional views of spiritual presence throughout the universe and their Christian Charismatic experiences. WILLIAM H. EDWARDS

Anthropology: European-American Theological Issues. European-American theological anthropology developed in response to the European Enlightenment*. Is it possible to believe in God in the Age of Reason*? It focuses on the nonbeliever and secular* culture. One wing embraces secular culture by forging a dialogue between Christian themes and philosophical theories. Another wing calls on the church to take care of its own internal demands.

The first wing sees the theologian's vocation as the application of philosophy and theory derived from broader university disciplines. Humans dare to think about and accept the latest bodies of knowledge from secular academies. No dualism exists between church or seminary and university (see Theological Education Cluster: In North America; Theological Education Cluster: In Western Europe: Germany). Correlating the nonbeliever's questions with Christian answers indicates the ongoing relevancy of Jesus Christ for a secular age. The mutual critical interaction of the Christian witness of faith and human existence is subject to the criteria of objectivity, appropriateness, credibility, pragmatic usefulness, and coherence – the same criteria faced by human and social sciences. In addition, human beings are free* subjects (independent thinkers with the power of self-transcendence), always in process (see Process Theology), impacting and being impacted by God. Taking seriously human evil, anxiety, and uncertainty, this wing still affirms humanity and its striving for justice* in human history.

The second wing of European-American theological anthropology sees Scripture* (and God and Christian witness) absorbing the world and not the opposite. The Christian “dwells in the Bible” rather than interpreting it for those outside the biblical world. The Christian is immersed in the uniqueness of the Christian language and culture, and confronts and changes the non-Christian world (“Christ against culture”; see Culture Cluster: Culture and Christianity). This anthropology calls on believers to learn their own native tongue, i.e. to entrench themselves thoroughly in the grammar of Christian speech rather than secular speech. Perhaps this will lead to Christianizing secular culture or helping the two cultures to better define themselves and separately pursue their respective vocations. DWIGHT N. HOPKINS

Anthropology: Feminist Theological Issues. Theological anthropology speaks of the human person in relation to God. This discourse is shaped both by an analysis of the various roles that sex and gender play in views of the human person and by a commitment to the full humanity of women. It notes the exclusion of women's voices in shaping dominant culture and, therefore, in defining what it means to be human. Throughout much of Christianity, men have been seen as normative, while women have been considered inferior. This is apparent in several doctrines, including that of creation*, as some traditional views hold that men are created in the image* of God, while women only partially or derivatively reflect the Creator; that of sin*, where women are often portrayed as inherently sinful temptresses; and that of ecclesiology* (see Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: Feminist Perspectives), where women are sometimes barred from ordination* and leadership positions.

Feminist theological anthropology emerged as a field of study in the context of the modern Western fascination with the human subject. Feminists in Europe and the USA analyze and criticize the modern view of the human person as a rational, individual, autonomous, free subject. Such modern anthropology reinscribes dualisms* that privilege the mind over the body*, the spirit over the flesh. It supports views of humanity in which men are connected with such characteristics as reason, will, aggression, and dominance, while women are linked with the body, nature, emotion, and submission. Feminists challenge these dualistic patterns, as well as the gender essentialism that claims women and men are hardwired with distinctive traits. Many feminists discuss how the self, including gender and sexual identity, develops over time in community through social construction.

While feminists contest ways in which men universalize their own experiences as normative of humanity, the oppressive pattern of universalizing has been unwittingly repeated. As white women of privilege describe what it is to be a woman, the differences among women, including those of class, race, and sexuality, are sometimes obscured. The burgeoning of Feminist theologies around the globe, now done in conversation with Womanist* and Mujerista* theologies, has changed Feminist theology into an inherently multiple conversation. Contemporary feminist theological anthropology exists within the tension between claiming a common womanhood for ethical and political purposes, and honoring the many differences among women that destabilize the very category of "woman." Resources such as doctrines of the Trinity* and eschatology* are used in articulating such anthropologies. SHANNON CRAIGO-SNELL

Anthropology: Latin American Theological Issues. For Liberation* theology, anthropology is more than a branch of systematic theology about the human condition in relation to diverse aspects of life in history. Certainly the Bible refers to topics of theological anthropology (creation*, human in the image* of God, sin*, grace* as the gift of God), but it also includes much that does not fit into "systematic theology." Thus anthropology in Latin American theology of liberation is interdisciplinary, including history, sociology, political science, economy, social psychology, cultural studies, ethnography, and ecology.

Latin American theology is interested in speaking about the human being not as an individual, self-contained subject, but as a person who belongs to a community and is in relationship with nature. Its methodological goal is to "de-privatize" faith and theology. Therefore, it studies the historical (natural and social) process of human liberation and the struggles to build a society where, with the dignity of children of God, people can live in an environment of justice, peace, and a balanced relationship with nature.

G. Gutiérrez, in Theology of Liberation, proposed a helpful distinction between three levels of liberation, which are also three aspects of theological anthropology:

1. Liberation as collective: the aspiration of people in classes or sectors of society that are oppressed because of historical conflicts and their social, political, and economic ramifications.
2. Liberation as a historical process through which humans assume their own destiny, free themselves, and build an enduring new humanity.
3. Liberation as a process that leads to the biblical sources that inspire this new humanity in daily life, as it moves from the old to the new* creation, from sin* to grace*, from slavery to sin to freedom. Christ frees us from sin, from egotistical self-centeredness, the root of all separation from God, from God's life project, and from others. Thus Christ frees us to love, serve, and live in communion with God, the basis for any true human community.

Latin American theologies of liberation always underscored the original correlation of God with life, and its confrontation with a globalized system of domination with an "anti-life" logic: bringing death to the despised of the world and to the creation and its integrity (destruction of the ecosystems). The primordial will of the God of Life and God-self are broken by and for the sin of the world, a manifestation of the mystery of sin (mysterium iniquitatis).

The creator God is, above all, a living God who gives and defends life. Life, God's main gift, is also the most vulnerable and threatened reality. The gift of life cannot be separated from its necessary material basis: work, health, housing, rest, and food. As Irenaeus* said, "Gloria Dei, vivens homo," "The glory of God is the living human being." Monsignor Romero*, bishop-martyr of El* Salvador, added concreteness to this truth: "Gloria Dei, vivens pauper,” “The glory of God is the living poor.”

VICTORIO ARAYA GUILLÉN

Anthropology: Womanist Theological Issues. Womanist* anthropology is the comprehensive study of humanity (across time, amid the intersections of biological, linguistic, and sociocultural systems) as Black women unapologetically experience communal life holistically, cognizant of how systems of sexism*, heterosexism, classism, racism*, and ageism oppress*. Such epistemology reconstructs the notion of God* and womanhood*. Womanist anthropology exposes ignorant, oppressive ideology* that subscribes to the images of Black women as mammy, whore, Sapphire, Jezebel, asexual Aunt Jemima, castrating matriarch, superwoman, and (as Zora Neale Hurston says) “the mules of the earth.” These insidious stereotypes are deceptive. Black women had to be tough, self-reliant, and supportive of family, community, and strangers, loving all people; but ironically, this tenacity distorts Black women’s gift of overcoming obstacles, surviving, and flourishing. By contrast, womanists reconstruct knowledge and make room for the “least of these,” the excluded Black women of the world; they move to an anthropological paradigm of liberation* and survival that excavates the lives of poor Black women, by acknowledging the impact on them of everyday lived experiences contextualized by capitalistic, political economies and how this global economy shapes access, decision making, and action. Womanist anthropology affirms the God-given lives and gifts of global Black women.

CHERYL A. KIRK-DUGGAN

Anthropomorphisms, words that attribute human form, actions, or feelings to God. These three understandings of anthropomorphism are found in many religions, but also in Christianity.

God has often been envisioned in iconography and art* as an old man with white hair. This image was probably suggested by the Bible, where God is called the “Ancient of Days” (Dan 7:22) seated on a throne (Isa 6:1; Ps 11:4, 47:8; Rev 4–5, 20:11), a symbol of God’s power and authority. Christ is said to sit at God’s right hand, sharing God’s authority (Ps 110:1, frequently cited in the NT).

Some Christians take such anthropomorphisms literally, but most take them as symbolic*. Augustine* tells how he was gradually freed from a literal understanding by envisioning God as being like the human spirit; later, he found the closest analogue to the Trinity* in the self-relatedness of the human mind. The “anthropomorphite controversy” in Egypt (c400) set the literalist monks against the enlightened Origenists*. During the controversies of the Reformation period, Lutherans retained images in their houses of worship and tolerated imagining God as an old man so long as it was not taken literally; the Reformed attacked this as idolatry and insisted that God be understood spiritually (cf. John 4:24).

God’s actions are also described in human terms in the Bible: e.g. walking in the garden (Gen 3:8) or acting with a powerful “right hand” (Exod 15:12). The emphasis on actions may explain the anthropomorphisms of the first type. The modern philosophy of action insists that our notions of causality and action begin from our own experiences as embodied agents and that these are then used to imagine God as an agent.

“Anthropopathisms” are words that, following the Bible, describe God as having human feelings such as surprise, delight, disappointment, frustration, pain and suffering, wrath, and compassion. In the doctrinal tradition, the predominant view was that God is immutable and therefore “impassible*,” i.e. without “passion,” including emotions: the world is related to God, but God is not related to the world; God influences without being influenced. Thus passages about God’s wrath or joy were taken to be metaphors, ways of evaluating events in terms of human emotions that are not appropriate to God.

In recent centuries this view has been challenged; relatedness is a perfection, not a weakness. While this has been accepted in many contexts with respect to compassion and mercy, there has been more reluctance to ascribe wrath* to God; similarly, God’s pain or frustration over events in human life is much debated.

EUGENE TESELLE

Antichrist, a term (from Jewish apocalypticism*) used in the NT only in 1 John 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 John 7 (once in the plural). These passages are often combined with images of the lawless man who claims to be God (2 Thess 2:3–4), the beast from the abyss (Rev 13), the whore of Babylon (Rev 17), and Gog and Magog (Rev 20).

"Antichrist" can refer to a false but attractive version of the Christian message (heresy*, unbelief) or to someone falsely claiming to be the Messiah – "one who assuming the guise of Christ opposes Christ" (Westcott). Medieval exegesis collated many apocalyptic passages to construct a detailed "life" of the Antichrist. Most significantly, there was a steady increase of attempts to "name the Antichrist," attaching the title to contemporaneous persons, institutions, or movements: Emperor Frederick II or Pope Boniface* VIII; the papacy*; the Enlightenment*, free thought, and Modernism*. Colonized people readily apply it to the imperial powers that held them in subjection even while preaching the gospel. In the USA, some Millennialist* beliefs have indicted as the Antichrist all movements of social reform, because these movements attempt to bring about what only the return of Christ can accomplish, namely a united, peaceful humanity. Thus these Millennialists target as Antichrist socialism, the United Nations, the World* Council of Churches, movements for international peace and justice, feminism, environmentalism, and the like.

Anticlericalism, the name given to movements, originating with Voltaire and the French Revolution, criticizing the clergy and opposing support for Roman Catholicism as the state* church and religion. The term sometimes also applied to moderate forms of separation* of church and state. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER; LAICIZATION; SECULARISM AND SECULARIZATION.

Anti-Jewish, Anti-Judaism. Often a synonym of "anti-Semitism," "anti-Judaism" refers to forms of opposition to and denigration of Jews or their religion that do not involve issues of race. See also ANTI-SEMITISM; SUPERSESIONISM.

Antinomianism, a belief that the Law* (the Decalogue* and other moral commands in the Bible) is not binding on Christians because they live under grace*. Usually based on statements made by Paul (esp. Gal 3–5; Rom 2–5), it is found in various forms in Marcionism*, Gnosticism*, the medieval Brethren of the Free* Spirit, and several movements during the Reformation* and the Puritan* interregnum. The term is often extended to Christians who do not follow biblical commands in a strict or literal fashion.

Antioch, Council of (341), a council of Eastern bishops that met during the dedication of the "golden basilica." It came to be associated with two influential texts: one comprising 25 canons* concerning the deposition of bishops and one consisting of four creeds. The canons may have been adopted a few years earlier (after Constantine's* death, 337) to oppose the return of Athanasius* to Alexandria*, and some of the creeds may have been formulated in other gatherings of bishops. The creeds did not replace the Nicene* Creed but supplemented it, emphasizing God's threeness. While Arianism* was condemned, the Council said little about God's unity; in this sense it authorized both the Homoian* position of the Councils of Ariminum* and Seleucia (359) and Constantinople (360), and the alternative Homoiousian* position, which cited the second creed of Antioch.

Antioch, Its Theological Tradition. With its long tradition as a center of learning, especially of Greek philosophy and rhetoric, the See of Antioch established in the early 3rd c. a school of theology and biblical interpretation, which was flourishing by the time of Lucian* (martyred in 312). Influenced by Aristotle*, it stressed textual criticism and the literal* exegesis (in the sense of nonallegorical interpretation) of the Scriptures*. Regarding theology, Antioch focused on the idea that the humanity of Jesus must be complete if Christ* is to represent the new human who replaces the sinful human. Thus while the rival school of Alexandria* was concerned primarily with the divine Word (Logos*), which would be singly conjoined to a human nature, Antioch was concerned with the complete human assumed by the Word. Where Alexandria was concerned with guaranteeing the bond of unity between the divine and human in Christ, Antioch wished to ensure that Christ's humanity was completely intact. The 4th- and 5th-c. representatives of the school of Antioch included the exegete Diodore* of Tarsus, Theodore* of Mopsuestia, John* Chrysostom, and Theodoret* of Cyrrhus, before the school joined the school of Edessa* and finally moved to Nisibis*.

As a consequence of the ecumenical Council of Chalcedon* (451), which condemned Eutyches's* Monophysitism, the patriarchate was split into three communities. One supported the Council and was subsequently called Melkite* (the king's party), found in hellenized cities along the Mediterranean coast. The second, namely, the Syriac Orthodox* (whose members were polemically nicknamed “Jacobites,” after Jacob* Baradai), rejected the Council. Ironically, the Syrians in the cities of the hinterland of the Antiochian Patriarchate, who would have been expected to welcome Chalcedon’s teaching, ended up accepting Miaphysitism*, championed by the Alexandrians. The third community, the Maronite* monastery and community, which lived alongside the Syriac Church, accepted the Chalcedonian doctrine.

By the 7th c., there were three patriarchates of Antioch: the Melkite, or Greek; the Syriac; and the Maronite. By the 10th c., the Melkites had transferred to the Byzantine liturgy and influence, and subsequently followed Constantinople during the great* schism (1417). With the unions with Rome (17th and 18th c.) of some of the Greek Orthodox and of the Syrians, there were now five patriarchates of Antioch: the Melkite, Greek* Orthodox, Syriac* Catholic, Syriac* Orthodox, and Maronite*. While differences regarding doctrine and papal authority played a major part in producing this diversity, certainly political and cultural differences have also been significant factors. See also BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER: HISTORY OF.

CHORBISHOP SEELY BEGGIANI

Antiphon (Gk antiphonon, “sounding against”), a response, usually sung, to a psalm or another part of a religious service; also a sacred text sung alternately by two choirs.

Anti-Semitism refers to the projection of stereotypes on the Jewish people as a whole that portray them as essentially evil. The negative attributes projected on them are typically built on dualistic dichotomies, such as materialistic (not spiritual), deceitful (not truthful), and hypocritical (not honest). Some forms of anti-Semitism developed in ancient polytheistic culture, primarily as a reaction against the resistance of some sectors of the Jewish people to subjugation and assimilation into the Greco-Roman Empire. But the prime source of anti-Semitism in European culture has been Christianity.

Christianity developed a diatribe against the Jewish people as a religious community starting in NT times, rooted in a rivalry between the Christian affirmation that Jesus was the Messiah expected in the Jewish tradition and the rejection of this faith by the established Jewish leaders. A bitter diatribe was directed particularly against the Pharisees*, who were leading rabbinic reformers in the earliest days of Christianity. The Pharisees are stereotyped in the Gospel of Matthew*, particularly as “blind guides and hypocrites,” petty legalists who were strict in superficial matters and neglected the “weightier matters of the law, justice, mercy, and faith” (Matt 23:23). They are described as “sons of those who murdered the prophets,” “serpents, a brood of vipers, deserving of hell” (Matt 23:31–33) and, in the Gospel of John (8:44), as children of the devil.

This polemic directed against Jews as a religious-ethnic people hardened into fixed patterns in the patristic* writings (2nd–6th c.), expressed particularly in the adversus Iudaeos literature (patristic writings directed against the Jews). These writings claim that the Christian Church is the true heir of God’s election* of a people of God, while the Jews are the heirs of those who have always been apostate, killed the prophets, and, as the culminating perfidy, killed God’s Messiah. Because of this apostasy, God is said to have cast off the Jews, condemning them to be homeless wanderers subjugated to other people (the Christians, who now identify with the Roman Empire).

When Christianity became the established religion of the Roman Empire, this polemic was translated into legal disabilities against the Jewish people. They were forbidden to proselytize, to hold slaves (eliminating them from the larger spheres of agriculture and business), and to hold political office. Rioters, often led by monks, destroyed synagogues.

This pattern of polemic as well as legal disabilities was passed on to medieval and early modern Christendom, being renewed in the 12th c. Jews were segregated in special sections of cities, forced to wear identifying garb, and forbidden the normal range of economic activities, but were allowed to function in areas forbidden to Christians, such as money lending. Stereotypes having to do with usurious practices were thus added to negative religious images. During the Crusades*, the Christian armies, on their way to fight the Muslims in the Middle East, sometimes stopped to sack Jewish communities.

Although this Christian polemic was murderous, it was not genocidal. There remained a place for Jews as a religious community in Christian society, as an object of polemic against whom Christians contrasted themselves, but also of hope for an eventual capitulation and conversion of the Jews to Christianity. This conversion was projected onto Christian eschatology*, becoming a part of the “last things” that signaled the return of Christ and final redemption*.

This ambiguity changed during the modern period as religious anti-Judaism was translated into a racial anti-Semitism. Negative characteristics thus became attributed to Jews as a race, as a matter of “blood.” Jews were thus seen as people who could not truly convert or assimilate to Christian culture, but must be eliminated altogether. In 19th- and early-20th-c. Europe, Jews became the scapegoats for modernizing and secularizing* trends that challenged Christian hegemony in society. These culminated in Nazism*, which passed laws that segregated Jews, confiscated their property, expelled them, and finally physically annihilated them (see Holocaust, Jewish [or Shoah]).

Christianity bears a heavy burden of responsibility for this terrible legacy of anti-Semitism in Western society. Christians need not only to reject the negative racial and religious stereotypes of Jews and Judaism*, but also to probe their religious roots based on a rejection of Judaism as an autonomous, valid way of relating to God. Christians have to confront the question of whether it is possible to affirm that Jesus is the Messiah without, implicitly or explicitly, damning Judaism, which does not accept this claim.

Unfortunately in the late 20th and early 21st c., further confusion has arisen as a result of the political equation of anti-Semitism with criticism of the policies of the state of Israel*. This has led some people, bitter about these policies, to carry out random attacks on Jewish synagogues or social centers. It is imperative for Christians (and all people) to reject anti-Semitism, root and branch, while also separating it from legitimate criticism of particular unjust policies of the state of Israel.

ROSEMARY RADFORD RUETHER

Antony (c254–356), Egyptian hermit; inaccurately described as “the founder of Christian monasticism.” His fame derives largely from the biography by Athanasius*, Vita Antonii, written in Greek (c358), which owes much to Athanasius’s theological and political agenda. It portrays Antony as a pioneer of desert monasticism who interrupts his solitude to instruct disciples, debate pagans, work miracles, denounce heretics*, and disarm demons. The Vita influenced the form of all later written works on the lives of the saints. Antony’s sayings and stories also appear in the Apophthegmata Patrum*. Recent research focuses on seven letters attributed to Antony, preserved in ancient Georgian. See also EGYPT; MONASTICISM CLUSTER; RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC,

CLUSTER: COMMUNITIES: THEIR HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT IN WESTERN EUROPE.

J. WILLIAM HARMLESS, SJ

Anxious Bench, in revivalism* (since the 18th c.), a specific place for persons convinced of their sinfulness and seeking conversion* and assurance* of salvation*, utilized most notably by Charles G. Finney*.

Aphrahat (4th c.; Persian Empire), one of the oldest representatives of the Syriac spiritual tradition. His 23 homilies, Demonstrations (336–45; soon translated into Armenian, Arabic, Georgian, and Ethiopic), represent Syriac Christianity in its purest form, uncontaminated by Greek influence. They deal with faith*, love*, fasting*, prayer*, humility*, purity of heart, and other themes. Aphrahat expresses concerns about the temptation to adopt Jewish practices and at times addresses the contemporary pre-monastic “Sons and Daughters of the Covenant,” whom he calls to a new covenant, “circumcision of the heart.” Aphrahat, perhaps the earliest Christian to have written a study on prayer in general, had a large influence on Syriac spirituality in succeeding centuries.

CHORBISHOP SEELY BEGGIANI

Apocalypse (Gk apokalypsis, “revelation”), (1) a revelation of what will happen in the end-time; (2) the original title of the NT book commonly called “Revelation*” in English; (3) any apocryphal book with apocalyptic* teachings, such as the Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch* and the Apocalypse of Peter*. See also APOCALYPTICISM CLUSTER.

APOCALYPTICISM CLUSTER

Apocalypticism: Beginnings in Judaism and Christianity
Apocalypticism: Extension in Western History and Culture
Apocalypticism: Prolongation in the Modern Period

Apocalypticism: Beginnings in Judaism and Christianity. “Apocalypse” is derived from the Greek apokalypsis (revelation). “Apocalypticism” is the worldview exemplified in the Book of Revelation*. “Apocalypses” usually take the form of visions explained by an angel. There are two main types of apocalypse: (1) historical apocalypses survey the course of history, often divided into periods, and end with cosmic catastrophe and the eschatological Judgment; (2) otherworldly journey apocalypses describe tours of the heavens or nether regions. Both types include the Judgment* of the dead, and this distinguishes apocalypticism from biblical prophecy. Both types are attested in Judaism, beginning in the 2nd c. BCE, in the books of Daniel* and Enoch*. (All Jewish apocalypses are attributed pseudonymously to famous ancient figures.) The visions of Dan 7–12 stand in the tradition of symbolic visions in the Hebrew prophets (e.g. Zechariah*). Enoch, however, seems to be modeled on the legendary Babylonian king Enmeduranki, who was taken up to heaven and shown the tablets of destiny. There are Akkadian models for the extended ex eventu (after the fact) prophecies in the apocalypses. There was also a tradition of similar literature in Persia, but the dating is problematic.

The apocalyptic worldview, in which the world is considered the arena of supernatural forces subject to eschatological Judgment, is also reflected in many texts that are not in the form of revelations. The Dead* Sea Scrolls anticipate a final battle between the forces of light* and darkness, a motif borrowed from Persian dualism*. A major cluster of Jewish apocalypses (4 Ezra*, 2 Bar*, 3 Bar, Apocalypse of Abraham) dates from the time after the destruction of Jerusalem (70–100 CE).

The historical type of apocalypticism was a major factor in early Christianity. Whether Jesus* was an apocalyptic prophet is disputed, but he is so depicted in the Gospels. The most explicit predictions attributed to him concern the Second* Coming (Mark 13 par.) and may reflect the beliefs of the early church. Paul taught that the resurrection of Christ was the first fruit of the general resurrection (1 Cor 15) and expected that some of his contemporaries would still be alive when Christ returned (1 Thess 4). The classic expression of Christian apocalypticism is found in the Book of Revelation, written toward the end of the 1st c. CE, which predicts the downfall of Rome and the imminent return of Christ as divine warrior from heaven. See also ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER.

JOHN J. COLLINS

Apocalypticism: Extension in Western History and Culture.

From 400 to 1500 CE, apocalyptic movements identified contemporary events with biblical or other prophecies of the last days, applying new circumstances to a more or less unchanging Christian prophetic structure. Although Western apocalyptic movements sometimes advanced radical policies of social, ecclesiastical, or political reform, apocalyptic rhetoric was just as likely to be part of the dominant discourse of church and kingdom.

The Apocalypse of John (Revelation*), along with its antecedents among traditional Jewish apocalypses, provided the foundation for Christian interpretations of “last things.” Western apocalypticism and its beliefs in various prophecies that offered detailed predictions of the end were kept at bay by the thought of Augustine* of Hippo (354–430), who rejected correlations between apocalyptic scripture and current historical events. Augustine’s influence was significant enough to dampen overt speculation in the West about the millennium until the 11th c. After the year 1000, Western apocalypticism became linked to debates about ecclesiastical reform, playing a role in the polemics of mainstream reformers such as Gregory* VII (1073–85) and Hildegard* of Bingen (1098–1179). Among the most significant apocalypticists of the High Middle Ages was Joachim* of Fiore (c1130/35–1202), who created a new system of scriptural exegesis and apocalyptic prediction based on his theory of the three “states” (OT, NT, and end of time), although without assigning precise dates to apocalyptic events. Joachite apocalypticism became important for a number of late medieval movements, including the Franciscan* Spirituals, the Beguines*, and the Fraticelli*, whose members often espoused radical social or political ideologies. Opponents of these movements within the ecclesiastical hierarchy, however, also used eschatological rhetoric in their arguments. In the 14th c., Christians interpreted disasters such as the plague and the Hundred Years' War in light of their apocalyptic beliefs, but the century saw little in the way of prophetic innovation. Fifteenth-century reformers such as Girolamo Savonarola* and Jan Hus* stirred eschatological fears and hopes in Florence and Hussite Bohemia, while well-known Renaissance figures, including Michelangelo and Christopher Columbus, drew inspiration from traditional apocalyptic texts and images.

While modern attention has focused on the years 1000 and 2000 as crucial episodes in apocalyptic fervor, premodern Christians experienced a fairly constant state of heightened apocalyptic expectation. Such apocalypticism was both pessimistic, inasmuch as it predicted a cataclysmic end to contemporary society, and optimistic, since it envisioned a better world that would form in its wake. See also ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER.

LEAH DEVUN

Apocalypticism: Prolongation in the Modern Period. Apocalypticism continues to focus on the prospect of an imminent end to the present order (eschatology*) and to draw on the Book of Revelation*. But among contemporary Christians, there have been diverse viewpoints on the interpretation and application of apocalypticism, which is highly adaptable to differing religious and social circumstances.

Some constructions of the impending end are optimistic and imply for believers a glorious conclusion to present realities. This perspective is often associated with the notion that human effort can create a better world and bring about the Kingdom* of God on earth. The positive impact of modern science* and technology* has fueled this spiritual optimism among some Christians who have experienced prosperity and the prospect of continuing good times (e.g. Social* Gospel advocates, including Walter Rauschenbusch*; the Federal* Council of Churches).

More often, apocalypticism has powerfully appealed to religious groups who presently suffer and face a dismal future, including masses of Christians in independent* churches of the Two-thirds World. Communities that experience a pessimistic outlook have repeatedly turned to scriptural texts for encouragement and for details on the prospect of divine intervention, often reading Scripture* in a literal way (e.g. the literal* interpretation of the Bible by Seventh-day* Adventists; Pentecostals*; many in the worldwide Charismatic* Movement). Many (e.g. Millerites*, Dispensationalists*, John Nelson Darby*) cling to the hope of an imminent physical return of Christ to the earth accompanied by the defeat of the forces of evil. Some (e.g. Jehovah's* Witnesses, Branch* Davidians) project a cosmic struggle on that occasion. Sometimes apocalypticism has persuaded the hopeless to follow religious leaders offering radical political or social programs, or to look for miraculous signs or wondrous phenomena (e.g. Marshall Herff Applewhite and Heaven's Gate).

These two basic alternative perspectives on apocalypticism differ on the efficacy of human efforts to solve ultimate problems. Christian movements among the dispossessed – economically, socially, or otherwise – are fertile seedbeds for this second form of apocalypticism, in which hope for better times lies in divine intervention (e.g. Nat Turner*, Latter-day* Saints, the worldwide Charismatic Movement). But the modern appropriation of apocalypticism is even more complex. Religious groups enjoying prosperity and cultural power (e.g. late-20th-c. American Evangelical Fundamentalists*) celebrate the prospect of an apocalyptic conclusion involving a literal, physical Second Coming of Christ, which, they affirm, will vindicate the righteousness* of their political and social views (e.g. variations of Dispensationalism* in Hal Lindsey's writings and the popular fictional series Left Behind). See also ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER.

STEPHEN J. STEIN

APOCRYPHA CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Apocrypha
Apocrypha of the New Testament

2) A Sampling of Apocrypha

Apocryphal Acts of Apostles
Apocryphal Gospels
Apocryphon of John

1) Introductory Entries

Apocrypha (from Gk for “hidden books”), most broadly, any books whose authorship or authority is doubtful; specifically, the books included in the Septuagint* but not part of the Jewish Scriptures. During the Reformation*, all of the non-Hebrew books were translated into the vernacular* but were printed in a separate section, between the OT and NT, usually in the following order: 1 Esdras, 2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, Additions to Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Wisdom* of Ben Sira (or Ecclesiasticus or Sirach), Baruch, Letter of Jeremiah, Prayer of Azariah, Song of the Three Youths, Susannah, Bel and the Dragon, Prayer of Manassas*, 1 Maccabees, 2 Maccabees. The Council of Trent* affirmed the canonical status of the Apocrypha, but placed the Prayer of Manassas, 3 Esdras*, and 4 Esdras* in an appendix. While the Apocrypha were translated in the Authorized* Version, the English Puritans* opposed any use of them that would imply doctrinal or moral authority. They have been omitted from most English translations published by Bible* societies since c1800. See also BIBLE, CANON OF.

Apocrypha of the New Testament. In modern usage, “apocryphal books” is used to distinguish certain early Christian texts from the “canonical” Gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John and the “canonical” Acts of the Apostles (see Present Cluster: Apocryphal Acts of Apostles and Apocryphal Gospels). The use of the concepts “apocryphal” and “canonical” for texts earlier than the 4th c. is anachronistic, because the NT canon* was not yet defined. Nevertheless, we cannot quite do without these terms. In the case of the Gospels, Irenaeus* clearly differentiated (c180) the four “canonical” Gospels of the church from all the others he knew, though he did not yet use the terms “apocryphal” and “canonical.”

The literal meaning of the Greek apokryphos is “concealed, hidden.” It seems to have been first applied to secret revelations that, in the eyes of particular groups, were more relevant than the doctrines professed in the public life of the church. The adherents of nascent orthodoxy reacted by equating “apocryphal” with “falsified, unreliable.” But not all apocryphal Gospels and Acts were always and everywhere thought to be heretical. The Protevangelium of James, for example, is used in Eastern liturgies to this day.

HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

2) A Sampling of Apocrypha

Apocryphal Acts of Apostles were written primarily in the 2nd and 3rd c. The Acts of Philip and the Martyrdom of Matthew were written later (probably 4th c.). Each of these texts honors a single apostle, e.g. Andrew, John, Peter, Paul, or Thomas. The model was not Luke’s Acts* of the Apostles (which presents several witnesses and excludes the narration of Peter’s or Paul’s martyrdom) but the gospel story centered on one principal hero and his destiny, and ending with his martyrdom. Although all belong to the same literary genre, these Acts of the Apostles did not originate in the same milieu.

Some, like the Acts of Peter and the Acts of Paul, are products of a popular form of early Catholicism; others, like the Acts of Andrew and the Acts of John, were engendered from a more intellectual environment of dissenting Christianity. The geographical origin of the Acts varies: the Acts of Thomas* reflects Eastern Syriac Christianity; the Acts of John and the Acts of Philip*, Asia Minor; the Acts of Peter, Western Syria; the Acts of Paul, Greece. Some of these works are composite, and their ethical or theological orientations can differ from one part of the text to another (e.g. the divergences concerning encratism* [extreme asceticism*] and Christology* in the different parts of the Acts of John).

These works do not present a unified doctrine, even if some textbooks propose such generalizations. For example, it is erroneous to say that the apocryphal Acts of Apostles as a whole are encratite or that they proclaim a docetic* Christology (the divine Christ's humanity is only apparent). Recent scholarship insists on the need to treat independently each apocryphal Acts of the Apostles.

While they differ in length, tone, and orientation, all the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles present a series of travel narratives and always include preaching and healing by the respective apostle. Each of the texts also records a developing hostility toward the apostle and finally tells, at length, a martyrdom story (or the peaceful death of the hero, as in the exceptional case of the Acts of John). Not uncommon among the Acts is a specific description of the rage of an enemy of the apostle, e.g. the jealousy of a husband, a Roman governor, a king, or an emperor.

The fate of the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles is important for understanding the history of the NT canon. While Manichaeans* read and venerated these books, possibly creating a collection of the five most ancient, Catholic leaders and theologians gradually rejected them. As early as the 4th c., certain eloquent bishops, e.g. Eusebius* of Caesarea and Augustine* of Hippo, and several councils and synods from the eastern or western parts of the Roman Empire, pronounced severe condemnations of these books. But the absence of criticism of these works in their earlier reception and a need for apostolic memories contributed to their survival. Some of the apocryphal Acts of the Apostles were rewritten according to an orthodox perspective (see the Life of Saint Andrew by Gregory* of Tours), or parts of them were detached and used as reading on the feast day of the apostle. New Acts of the Apostles were composed with different characteristics: the new documents had to be in harmony with the canonical Acts of the Apostles, and the apostles had to travel in pairs in order to respect Jesus' missionary speech. These more recent Acts of the Apostles were also related to local traditions and devotion (e.g. the Acts of John by Pseudo-Prochoros, closely associated with the island of Patmos), particularly at the tomb of the apostle (e.g. the Passio Petri by Pseudo-Linus related to Rome).

FRANÇOIS BOVON

Apocryphal Gospels. The corpus of "apocryphal" Gospels in modern scholarship consists of the following: (1) narrative texts that share some affinities to the canonical Gospels and often fill gaps at their beginning (birth and childhood of Mary and Jesus) or end (Passion and Resurrection); (2) texts that carry the designation "Gospel"; (3) fragments that are derived from Gospels according to the church fathers.

The Gelasian Decree (possibly as early as 382) lists apocryphal Gospels under the names of Matthias, Barnabas, James the Younger, Peter*, Thomas*, Bartholomew, and Andrew, forgeries by Lucian* and Hesychius, and probably two infancy Gospels. Not included are the Jewish-Christian Gospels (according to the Hebrews*, of the Ebionites*, of the Nazarenes*), the Gospel of the Egyptians quoted by Clement* of Alexandria, the much later Gospel of Nicodemus, the Gospel of Judas* Iscariot, and texts barely known, e.g. the Gospels of Eve, of the Twelve, of the Seventy, and of Cerinthus.

The 1945 Nag* Hammadi discovery in Upper Egypt included another Gospel of the Egyptians, the full text of the Gospel of Thomas*, a Gospel of Philip*, a Gospel* of Truth, and a group of dialogues with the risen or earthly Jesus (Sophia Jesu Christi, Apocryphon of John*, Book of Thomas, Dialogue of the Savior, and the Gospel of Mary* Magdalene).

The importance of this corpus of "apocryphal" texts for our knowledge of the history of Christianity, for liturgical praxis and personal piety, and for art and literature can hardly be overestimated.

HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

Apocryphon of John. See JOHN, APOCRYPHON OF.

Apollinaris, Apollinarius (c310–c390), bishop of Laodicea, born in Berytus, the son of a grammarian of the same name. When Julian* expelled Christians from the schools, the father and son paraphrased many parts of the Bible in classical forms in order to teach poetry and rhetoric. Apollinaris, a champion of the Nicene* doctrine of the Trinity*, was closely associated with Athanasius*. Like Athanasius, he taught a “Word*-flesh” Christology. When the Apollinarians spoke of “the man” (kyriakos anthrospos or dominicus homo), they meant the Word in flesh, with the Word replacing a human soul.

Controversy became overt after 360, perhaps after a debate between Apollinaris and Diodore* of Tarsus. Epiphanius* reports that some of Apollinaris’s followers spoke as though Christ brought his body from heaven. If Apollinaris was in fact involved, he would have meant that the flesh, being the flesh of the Word, was heavenly in its principle of animation. At the Council of Alexandria* (362), the christological problem was addressed, since those in attendance included representatives of both Apollinaris and Paulinus*, who insisted on the complete humanity of Christ. The Council’s Tome to the Antiochenes* uses ambiguous language (Chap. 7), affirming that Christ did not have a body without soul or sense or mind; this double negative was compatible with both a Word*-flesh and a Word*-man Christology.

The dispute broke out again in Antioch, where there were already three rival bishops, when Apollinaris consecrated Vitalis, who shared his Word-flesh Christology, as a fourth bishop of Antioch (376/77). This political move prompted Epiphanius and then Basil* to gain a condemnation from Pope Damasus (377). Apollinaris and his Word-flesh Christology was further condemned by councils in Alexandria (378) and Antioch (379), probably at the Council of Constantinople* (381), and again in Rome (382). The theological answer was given during these years by Gregory* Nazianzen. EUGENE TESELLE fully instructed in Ephesus (Acts 18:24–28). He was viewed as a leader by the church in Corinth (1 Cor. 1:12, 3:4). Many have supposed him to be the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews*.

Apollos, a learned Jew from Alexandria who already had Christian loyalties but was more

Apologetics (from Gk apologia, “a defense”), defense of Christian beliefs with the aid of arguments thought to be convincing to the surrounding culture*.

Apologists refers in a wide Christian context to those throughout the history of the church who on the basis of reason* or other contemporary rhetorical strategies strove to defend Christian faith or practices from persecution or intellectual assault. For example, Thomas Aquinas* (1226–74) and C. S. Lewis* (1898–1963) were apologists of their respective eras.

Most commonly, scholars refer to “Apologists” as those earliest Christian thinkers who labored between the mid-2nd c. and 312 (when Constantine* ascended to power) to defend nascent Christianity from assault by both polemical criticism and violent persecution.

Early critics of Christianity, such as Celsus*, Lucian of Samasota, and Porphyry*, denounced the movement as an inferior philosophy and a “depraved and excessive superstition*,” vilified Jesus as a deranged sorcerer, and characterized his followers as uneducated members of the lower class possessing, in the words of the Roman historian Tacitus, “the hatred of the human race.” Beginning in mid 2nd c., however, Christian thinkers – including Quadratus, Aristides, Justin* Martyr, Tatian*, Athenagoras, Theophilus* of Antioch, Melito, Clement* of Alexandria, Tertullian*, Minucius Felix, and Origen* – began to employ the rhetorical conventions of the day to fashion thoughtful, reasoned responses to the misunderstandings, rumors, and condemnations that were leveled against early adherents of the faith. For example, in response to those who labeled Christianity an inferior philosophy, Justin Martyr described it as the most sublime of them all. Where despisers of the faith, perhaps under mistaken assumptions about sacramental practices, accused Christians of cannibalism and orgiastic behavior, Athenagoras defended Christian behavior as chaste and moral. In answer to the charge that Christians posed a threat to the Roman Empire, Tertullian insisted that the Empire prospered in direct correlation to the prayers of pious Christians.

WAYNE C. KANNADAY

Apophaticism, otherwise known as “negative theology,” is a form of Christian theology that simultaneously attempts to express the transcendence* and immanence* of God. Regarding God’s transcendence, apophaticism affirms the inadequacy of reason* or language* as a definitive means of knowing God; regarding God’s immanence, apophaticism defines knowledge of God in terms of mystical* union. The differences notwithstanding, there are evident affinities between early Christian apophaticism and the speculative philosophies of Neoplatonism* and of the Jewish philosopher Philo* of Alexandria. Although aspects of apophatic thinking exist in Scripture and throughout early Christian literature, especially Gregory* of Nyssa’s Life of Moses, its most sophisticated form is attributed to the 5th- to 6th-c. anonymous Christian thinker Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite. The God–world relation, for Dionysius, is best understood in term of an exitus/reditus model. God’s outpouring of Godself in creation (exitus) is the basis for cataphatic (positive, descriptive) statements about God; the return of all in union with God (reditus) requires apophasis, or the negation of all positive statements about God. Union with God is the result of a double negation, since God is beyond the opposition of positive and negative statements. Dionysius’s apophaticism was influential in the medieval West through John* Scotus Eriugena’s translation and is especially evident in the thought of Meister Eckhart*. In the 20th c, the Dionysian apophaticism is most evident in the work of the Eastern Orthodox theologian Vladimir Lossky* and the Roman Catholic theologian Jean-Luc Marion. See also BUDDHISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; CONVICTION; DAOISM CLUSTER; METAPHOR; MYSTICISM, MYSTICS; PARADOX; SYMBOLISM.

ARISTOTLE PAPANIKOLAOU

Apophthegmata Patrum (Sayings of the fathers), a late-5th-c. anthology of aphorisms and anecdotes from the earliest monks of Egypt, the so-called desert fathers; considered a classic of Christian spirituality* for its wisdom on prayer*, asceticism*, and virtue. Originally in Greek, it survives in alphabetical and systematic forms. The alphabetical gathers c1,000 sayings under the names of 130 “abbas” (monks); the systematic arranges the same sayings under 21 thematic headings (e.g. humility, discernment). The systematic was translated into Latin during the 6th c. by Roman clerics and influenced medieval monasticism*. Ancient versions exist in Syriac, Coptic, Armenian, and Ethiopic.

J. WILLIAM HARMLESS, SJ

Apostasy, defection or revolt, specifically the abandonment of God, Christianity, or the true church.

Apostle (Gk “one sent forth”), an envoy or delegate; a messenger. In the NT, the term most often refers to the Twelve* and Paul* as “apostles of Jesus Christ” who have “seen” the risen Lord and have been directly commissioned by him to preach the gospel (1 Cor 15:3–11; Gal 1:15–16). Not everyone agreed with this largely Pauline definition. For example, the selection of Matthias (Acts 1:21–23) posited that one of the criteria for apostleship was having accompanied Jesus throughout his earthly ministry – possibly a source of much opposition to Paul (Gal. 1:1, 11–12 suggests that his opponents claimed that he did not have the proper credentials of an apostle, although Paul clearly saw himself as meeting all the necessary requirements, albeit in a special way). According to these NT passages about the Twelve and Paul, the “apostles of Jesus Christ” were men who, as Christ’s representatives, authoritatively explained the revelation of God and exercised high authority in the church.

Yet the word “apostle” is used in other ways in the NT, e.g. when Paul refers twice to “apostles of the churches” (2 Cor. 8:23; Phil. 2:25) and when Hebrews mentions Jesus as “the apostle” whom we confess (3:1). In such cases (including Paul’s dispute with the false “apostles” in 2 Cor 11–12), “apostle” is understood to entail a less specific church-leadership role. This includes the reference to both Andronicus and Junia* as “outstanding among the apostles” (Rom 16:7) that, for many contemporary scholars, points to women as apostles. (Other scholars, keeping with traditional interpretations, deny these interpretations by underscoring the possibility that the name “Junia” is an endearing diminutive for Junianus, a man’s name, or that the phrase “outstanding among the apostles” might mean “outstanding in the eyes of the apostles”; see Junia.)

Throughout the history of the church, the term “apostle” has been used in a broader sense for missionaries who first brought the gospel to a region or a country, e.g. Ansgar*, the “Apostle of the North”; and Cyril* and Melodius, “Apostles of the Slavs,” or for the founders of churches, such as the “African Apostles” Simon Kimbangu* in Congo* (both DRC and Congo-Brazzaville) and

John Maranke in Zimbabwe*. But most often, the title “apostle” is reserved for the Twelve and Paul. Missionaries or Christian leaders were sometimes recognized as “equal to the apostles,” as Constantine* was; similarly, Nino* was recognized as “equal to the apostles and the enlightener of Georgia*.” See also TWELVE APOSTLES. TERRY L. WILDER

Apostles’ Creed, an early statement of the Christian faith, developed from the three questions that catechumens* were asked before baptism*: “Do you believe in God the Father almighty?... Do you believe in Jesus Christ?... Do you believe in the Holy Spirit?” (Apostolic* Tradition, c215, probably by Hippolytus* of Rome). The present text of the creed, based on the old Roman baptismal creed (3rd–4th c.), is the one spread during the time of Charlemagne* (8th c.) and adopted by the Western Church (c11th c.). Most Protestant churches use the Apostles’ Creed as the earliest confessional* statement.

Apostolic Church Order, a compilation of regulations governing church practice and discipline, ascribed to various apostles but actually originating in Egypt (c300).

Apostolic Constitution, the highest kind of decree issued by the pope of the Roman Catholic Church.

Apostolic Constitutions, a late-4th-c. eight-book compilation of canons* governing the clergy* and laity*, along with guidance for worship on various occasions. While claimed to have come from the apostles*, they are based largely on the Didache*, Papias*, and Hippolytus*, and have Arian* tendencies. See also CHURCH ORDERS.

Apostolicae Curae, the bull issued by Pope Leo XIII in 1896 declaring Anglican orders* to be null and void.

Apostolic Fathers, the title given to Clement* of Rome, Ignatius*, Hermas*, Polycarp*, Papias*, and the authors of the Epistle of Barnabas*, the Epistle to Diogenes*, 2 Clement*, and the Didache*.

Apostolicity and Apostolic Succession are clearly interconnected but not identical. “Apostolicity” denotes the continuity of the whole church with the apostles’ witness to Christ. “Apostolic succession” refers to a specific sign or expression of such continuity.

Apostolicity is, according to the Nicene* Creed – “we believe in one holy catholic and apostolic church” – one of the fundamental marks* of the church, with a focus on continuity with the apostolic gospel lived out in the fullness of apostolic life. Apostolicity has four key dimensions: (1) “continuity” in faith* (traditio); (2) “succession” in ministries and structures (successio); (3) “incorporation” across time and space into the college of those who exercise (episcopal) oversight (communio); and (4) “mission” in joint service in the world (missio).

Apostolic succession relates primarily to succession in ministries and incorporation, although it also requires continuity in faith, apostolic life, and mission.

The NT presents the apostles (Peter*, James*, also the Twelve*) as eyewitnesses to Jesus’ work, commissioned by the risen Christ, and leaders of the church. Paul’s apostolic calling, while different in origin and character, had in practice the same purpose. The ministry of the apostles was unique, but their service had to be continued in the church.

Apostolicity took shape primarily during the first two centuries. Ignatius*, Tertullian*, Hege-sippus*, and Irenaeus* played vital roles. Struggling largely against Gnostics* and their claims to special revelations, Irenaeus emphasized continuity with the apostles and their witness. Then apostolicity was attached mainly to the role of bishops in unbroken succession, a view generally upheld during the Middle Ages.

During the Reformation, there was in most cases a break in apostolic succession by the Protestants. Despite a commitment to doctrinal continuity and to the office of bishop, a crisis occurred when Roman Catholic bishops declined to ordain pastors for Protestant congregations. Later on a “pipeline theory” emphasizing the historic episcopate was developed within Anglicanism*.

Today, most agree that apostolicity is an essential mark of the church, yet Christian traditions diverge on the contents and role of episcopal succession. For the Roman Catholic Church, apostolicity requires not only historic continuity, but also communion with the bishop of Rome. Within Orthodoxy, historic continuity is coupled with an apostolicity of the church as a whole. Reformation and post-Reformation churches are concerned primarily with continuity in faith and doctrine. In parts of the neo-Charismatic* Movement, “pragmatism” may appear to undermine such continuity.

Ecumenical dialogue manifests possibilities of convergence on apostolicity and apostolic succession. For such dialogue, the following convictions are essential: apostolicity is, at its core, living continuity with the apostolic witness to Christ and, thus, with Christ; it is a mark of the church in its totality, which relates to its faith and life as a whole; it requires visualization through outward signs, but can also be maintained in periods when some of its signs have been lost; while avoiding juridical approaches, each church should be open to embracing as many signs of apostolic continuity as possible; and apostolicity is best expressed in and through Communion*.

OLA TJØRHO

Apostolic Tradition, an early church order with directives for appointment to the ministry, the reception of converts, community meals, and prayer. Often ascribed to Hippolytus* of Rome (c215), it is probably a composite work, developed from the 2nd to the 4th c. See also CHURCH ORDERS.

Aqedah. See SACRIFICE OF ISAAC: THE AQEDAH.

Aquila, a Jew, born in Pontus, who with his wife, Priscilla*, lived for a time in Rome but left for Corinth when Claudius required all Jews to depart (Acts 18; cf. 1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:3).

Aquila, Version of, Greek translation of the HB (completed c140) by a native of Pontus, first a convert to Christianity and then a proselyte* to Judaism. It was very literal so as to counteract Christian proof texts based on the Septuagint*.

Aquinas, Thomas (1226–74), theologian. Born in the kingdom of Naples into minor aristocracy, he was enrolled at the age of 5 in the school at the great Benedictine monastery of Monte Cassino. At 13 he went to the University of Naples, one of the earliest centers of Aristotelian* philosophy and an outpost of the polyglot culture at the court of the Hohenstaufen emperor Frederick II. There he met and joined the Dominican* friars, recently founded chiefly to cope with the form of Gnostic* dualism* characteristic of the Albigensians or Catharists*, who were widespread in the church, especially in France and Northern Italy. He studied first in Paris, then in Cologne, where he was taught principally by Albert* the Great (1193 [or 1206]–1280), the German Dominican friar who was among the first to introduce Aristotle's ethics, metaphysics, and philosophical anthropology into Christian thought. Aquinas lectured in Paris (1252–59; again in 1269–72), returning to Italy between these two periods to administer courses for student friars, first in Rome, then in Naples, and to act as theological consultant to Pope Urban IV and later to Pope Clement IV. Throughout his career, he composed commentaries on Scripture, Aristotle*, and Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite, and wrote his Summa contra Gentiles and his Summa Theologiae. The latter he left unfinished as a result of the experience he had on December 6, 1273: "All that I have written seems to me like straw compared to what has now been revealed to me." Though fit enough to obey a summons to attend the Second Council of Lyon due to begin on May 7, 1274, he fell ill on the way and died on March 7, 1274.

While often regarded as an "Aristotelian," positively by some, negatively by others (such as Luther*), Aquinas seems to have been more concerned, especially in his second spell in Paris, to mediate between colleagues who looked to Augustine* as their master and some of the hot-heads in the arts faculty (themselves, of course, clergy) who were carried away by enthusiasm for what they took to be the self-sufficient wisdom* of the ancient Greeks. The "Augustinians" were not comforted by the knowledge that Aristotle was coming to the church after centuries in which his works had been studied and commented on by Islamic scholars.

In 1277 (after Aquinas's death) a composite list of 219 theses was condemned by the bishop and theologians in Paris as prejudicial to the faith. While directed chiefly against "Averroists" in the arts faculty (those who allegedly read Aristotle* in the light of the commentaries of the Islamic* philosopher Abu'l-Walid Ibn Rushd [1126–98], Averroes* in Latin), some of Aquinas's views (perhaps as many as 16 of the theses) were included, as his contemporaries realized. These bear, one way or another, chiefly on Aquinas's proposal that (1) since matter is pure potentiality having no act of its own whatsoever and (2) since matter is the radical principle of individuation and multiplication in a species, there is only one substantial form in every composite. This arcane-sounding doctrine implies that the corporeal, vegetative, sensitive, and intellectual forms predicated of the human being exist simultaneously in time in the embryo. In this way, the idea that the embryo becomes "intellectual" or "rational" and therefore "human" at a late stage is excluded. More worryingly still, Aquinas's view seemed to mean that the body of Christ in the tomb, separated from the soul*, would not be divine: there was no corporeal form antecedent to the other forms that would ensure the identity of Christ's body on the cross and in the tomb.

During his lifetime, Aquinas faced this objection many times in his works: for him the dead body of Christ remained hypostatically united to the divine person of the Word and therefore the "same body." However, adopting Aristotle's doctrine of substantial form obviously had controversial implications.

The Summa contra Gentiles (probably not his title), composed in 1259–64, is Aquinas's most accessible comprehensive exposition of Christian doctrine. A large part exists in his own handwriting, with his cancellations, revisions, and corrections. It was not taught in the classroom, nor did it originate there. Rather, it reads as the mature theologian's most personal attempt to expound Christian doctrine: Books I–III deal with truths about God that can be known by human reason*; Book IV with truths about divine things that can be known only by revelation*. If not entirely "against the Gentiles," Aquinas is nevertheless concerned to argue against the theological errors (as he thinks) of "the Mohammedans and the pagans," but since they accept neither the OT nor the NT "we must have recourse to natural reason, to which all are forced to give their assent" (I, 2). The first three books frequently cite Aristotle and, less explicitly, the Persian Islamic philosopher Avicenna* (Ibn Sina, c980–1037). Aquinas suspects some Muslim and pagan thinkers of denying that creatures have an active role in the production of natural effects, as if God did everything: far from glorifying God, this denial of real agency in creatures only detracts from the perfection of divine power (III, 69). Aquinas is deeply concerned to exclude the idea that the same effect may be "attributed to a natural cause and to divine power in such a way that it is partly done by God, and partly by the natural agent" – as if divine causality and human freedom were somehow in competition (III, 70).

The Summa Theologiae (again not his title), his most famous work, begun in 1266 when he was teaching young friars in Rome and left unfinished, was composed explicitly for "the training of beginners" (for their instructors, perhaps, more than for them personally) to put an end to the "boredom and muddle in their thinking" by which they were afflicted (Prologue). The first 43 questions of the first part deal with God, one nature and three persons; the remaining 75 with creation*, including angels*, human beings, and how the world is governed. The second part deals with the moral and spiritual life of the human being, including emotion, virtue, sin*, law*, and grace*, and, in detail, the three theological virtues* of faith*, hope*, and charity [love*], then the four cardinal virtues of prudence, justice*, courage, and temperance. The first 59 questions of the third part extend from the doctrine of the Incarnation* to the Resurrection*; the remaining 30 deal with sacrament*, baptism*, Eucharist*, and penance*.

The first part includes the famous "Five Ways" (question 2), Aquinas's "proofs of the existence of God*," followed by the much lengthier and more complicated exposition of the doctrine of God in the light of God's self-revelation as "I Am" (Exod 3:14).

Aquinas, it is now generally thought, regarded the second part as the center and most original element of the whole project: an attempt to replace the existing confessors' manuals – lists of sins based on the Ten Commandments – with a far more sophisticated portrait of the moral life. The third part, the "consummation of the whole project," deals with Christ the Savior, who "showed us in Himself the way of truth by which it is possible for us to come through by resurrection to the blessedness of immortal life" (Prologue). FERGUS KERR, OP

Aramaic, the language of the Aramaeans (late 11th c. BCE), then of the Assyrians (from the 8th c. BCE), became a lingua franca of the Middle East (7th–6th c. BCE), surviving especially in Palestine and Syria even into Greek and Roman times. Aramaic had replaced Hebrew as the language of common Jewish people (from the 6th c. BCE). Thus parts of Daniel* and Ezra* are written in Aramaic, as are the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds. Jesus and his followers probably spoke Aramaic. Syriac* is an Aramaic dialect written with a different script.

Archbishop, a bishop with jurisdiction over a province*, equivalent to a "metropolitan*." At the time of Justinian*, "archbishop" was synonymous with "patriarch*," a bishop with jurisdiction over a larger region.

Archdeacon, the chief deacon, appointed by the bishop and carrying out specified tasks in the whole or part of a diocese.

Archdiocese, the diocese over which the archbishop* of a province* exercises jurisdiction.

Archimandrite, in the Greek Church, the superior over a monastery or over several monasteries (abbot* in the West).

Architecture, Church. See HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Archpriest, chief priest* of a diocese*, often acting in the place of the bishop in his absence.

Argentina

Colonial Time. Christianity arrived in Argentina with European explorers (1516) and colonization by Spain (1580, in Buenos Aires). During this period, the challenge for Roman Catholics was the conversion* of the "Indians" and the appropriation of territory over which the Roman Catholic Church would have exclusive authority. Native people were nomadic and dispersed in lands without mineral deposits.

Without specific directions, the Jesuits* established in the northwest special kinds of "reductions*" – egalitarian settlements where numerous natives lived with Jesuit clergy following strict rules of Christian life (but no forced labor). In the Jesuit reductions, the Tupi and Guarani people received a training unique on the continent, combining religious, social, economic, and military training. The Franciscans, with their more festive Christianity, consolidated the development of the church in the northeast. The expulsion of the Jesuits from the continent (1768) shattered an important part of colonial Christianity in Argentina. The Argentine dioceses were viewed as "marginal and miserable," as compared with those in Mexico* or Peru*. Thus the exploitation of "Indians" by Christians and the defense of Indians' rights by other Christians were in tension from the beginning and remained a fundamental contradiction through the centuries.

The 19th-c. pro-independence intellectual revolution, headed by local leaders and priests who opposed Spanish Christendom, rejected bishops and superiors of religious orders (who were often imprisoned or expelled). The revolution sought to create a Christianity without ties to Spain or the Vatican, and with very limited relations to local political authorities. In 1813 the "revolution" destroyed the instruments of torture, freed black slaves, ended the Inquisition*, and gave new meanings to Christian symbols, putting them at the service of the "revolutionary cause." The local Virgins became patronesses of the patriotic armies. With numerous priests as representatives at the Assembly, the "Southern United Provinces" proclaimed their independence (1816).

Secularization, understood to be the limitation of ecclesiastical power, continued with the 1821–22 reforms that closed convents, established norms for the designation of monastic authorities, fixed a minimum number of years for initiation into the monastic life (to avoid coercion into monastic life), and expropriated the Roman Catholic Church's economic resources, transferring them to the government. The autonomy of the Church was emphasized in worship services. Laws tolerating Protestants were passed (1825). Years later Rome sent a diplomatic mission to establish relations with the developing confederation. The end of colonial Christendom* was therefore marked by religious orders without authorized superiors, priests occupied with political responsibilities, and a growing differentiation between religious and secular spheres of life.

The Rise of the Republic of Argentina. The struggle for independence slowly gave birth to new states in the old viceroyalty of Rio de la Plata, although their borders and status were often imprecise. Christianity faced a new challenge as it contributed to building these nations, developing and affirming a national identity that gave people in each nation a sense of ownership and united them. Consequently, colonial Christianity was replaced by multiple national Christianities that in each case embodied a "credible" and "faithful" tension between strengthening its symbolic ties with the new nations and supporting a community that, beyond national borders, has a universal mission.

The immigration between 1870 and 1930 diversified Christianity. While the "Latin" majority (Spanish, Italian, and French) identified themselves with Roman Catholicism, immigrants from other nations (English, German, Russian, Ukrainian, Norwegian, Swedish, Polish, etc.) established numerous Protestant congregations, some Orthodox ones, as well as Jewish communities.

In the 1880s, the Argentine liberal state strove to "build a Christian nation," even as it weakened the Catholic institutions by relegating them to the "private domain." The civil registries (births, marriages, deaths) and cemeteries had been controlled by the Roman Catholic Church; now, the state nationalized them. The numerous religious schools became a massive public school system where education was free and religion was taught outside the regular class schedule. To "modernize" the teaching, the state created numerous teachers' colleges and brought Protestant teachers from North America to help develop and implement innovative Christian educational practices (see Lancasterian Schools).

The vision of unlimited progress gave the state the freedom to extend to all the rights of citizenship, including universal and obligatory secret ballot in all elections (1912). In 1916, the liberal opposition (Unión Cívica Radical) won the presidential election (for the first time since 1880). But the impact of the Great War on the population of European immigrants – many thousands of male immigrants returned to their respective countries to enroll in national armies – resulted in pervasive disillusionment. A deep spiritual quest in the midst of so much death and desolation spread broadly through Christianity at the very time the Argentine state was trying to slow down the institutional growth of the Roman Catholic Church; e.g. the apostolic nuncio was expelled (1924–30, as had happened in 1884–1900).

Christianity, Nation, and Catholic Argentina.

An extraordinary capitalist expansion took place between 1880 and 1930. Liberalism promised a new heaven and a new earth. In Buenos Aires, booming urbanization concentrated almost a third of all Argentines around the capital. The 1929–30 economic crisis struck at the heart of the capitalist model of the accumulation of wealth and threatened the governability and civic life of the nation. The first coup d'état (September 6, 1930) marked the beginning of the militarization of Argentina. Until almost the end of the 20th c., the Argentine Armed Forces dominated religious, cultural, social, and political life and maintained discrete links with the conservative clergy, including Father Julio Meinvielle*.

This collapse of liberalism and its promises opened the doors to its critics, including an emerging Catholic movement that sought to integrate national identity and Catholicism; to support an interventionist state; to model social justice along the lines of the church's social teachings; to reinforce social harmony; to collaborate in anti-communist and anti-liberal campaigns, because of its suspicion of democracy and of "corrupt" political leadership; and to promote the message of traditionalist Integrist* Catholicism. This vision of "Argentine Catholicism" progressively emerged and became the accepted Catholic culture for most of civil and political society.

This Integrist movement went through a long process of cultural impregnation without a direct relation to institutional Catholicism (attendance at Mass was never more than 10%). Yet it achieved a slow but steady catholicization of society and of its public spaces, at the same time that they were nationalized, or even militarized. Catholicism was an enduring but active "symbolic capital" available for use as needed from time to time, so much so that, since 1930, one could speak of Argentine society as in "natural continuity" with the "true Catholic tradition of the nation." Accordingly, Catholicism was an integral part of the "native values" and the "Argentine nationality" that was not to be contaminated by "foreign" ideologies.

This Catholic hegemony influenced other religious communities. Jews, Protestants, Muslims, and Spiritualists acknowledged the privileged legal status of the Catholic Church in the state, even as they affirmed their pluralistic views of the religious situation and advocated the separation of religion and state.

Argentine Christian groups can be understood only in their multiple relations with other social and political segments. They are not the entire focus of Argentine social history, but ignoring them would lead to major misinterpretations. Many Catholics "formed in" Integrist Catholicism occupy (and will occupy?) leadership positions and have important responsibilities in the state, the government and its departments, the universities, the unions, and sociopolitical movements, as happened in the wake of the 1930 military, religious, and business coup of General Uriburu.

Populist Christianity, promoted by the Peronist culture (1940s–1950s), with broad popular support, challenged institutionalized and clerical Integrist Catholicism. The clash between these two conceptions of Catholicism reached a critical point in 1955 when military airplanes (in rebellion against Peron) bombarded the center of the city of Buenos Aires, killing more than 300 people, with bombs inscribed "Christ Conquers"; that night, in retaliation, Peronists desecrated and set on fire the richest Catholic churches of Buenos Aires. The civil, military, and religious coup that deposed President Peron (1955) opened a new period of conflict. Both the military proclamations and those of the opposition cited papal encyclicals, church documents, and/or biblical texts. The government (1966–70) of the devout Catholic General Onganía with his project of moral reconstruction of the Christian world received radical criticism from the Roman Catholic Church, as did the Movement of Priests for the Third World, as well as the ISAL (Iglesia y Sociedad en America Latina) and its networks in slums, factories, schools, and universities. The Christian reforms of the 1960s and 1970s were shaped by memories of primitive Christianity, institutional changes, the Cuban Revolution, and the presence of acknowledged militants such as Margarita Moyano* Llerena among the “faithful and oppressed people.” Even the military political radicalism of the 1960s and 1970s was partly rooted in affinities between Christianity and revolution, between Christian ethics and the spirit of guerrilla warfare.

During the 1976 dictatorship, in which 30,000 persons were arrested and disappeared, others were persecuted and exiled, and all lived in a culture of fear, there were bishops, priests, and Christian leaders who supported the terrorism of the state. The state controlled religious activities by registering worship services of all religions (less so for Catholic Masses), by offering scholarships to seminarians, and by subsidizing Catholic bishops. Meanwhile numerous Christians were murdered, tortured, or detained, “disappeared,” or fled into exile, because of their religious, political, and social commitments. The murder of Catholic Bishop Angelelli* (1976), resulting from a conflict with the military and the ensuing silence of the episcopate, exemplifies the different positions. Other Christians joined the Ecumenical Movement for Human* Rights and the Permanent Assembly for Human Rights, making public the experiences and suffering of the victims.

For instance, the 1980 Nobel Peace Prize was given to Adolfo Pérez Esquivel, an Argentine Christian, for his struggle in defense of human rights and his denunciation of the crimes of military dictatorships throughout the continent. An architect, he became a pacifist in the early 1970s, founding the Ecumenical Movement for Peace and Justice (1973). He was imprisoned and tortured by the Argentine dictatorial government (1976–78) but continued his effort to develop humanitarian organizations, becoming a member of the Service for Peace and Justice and of the UN Permanent Assembly for Human Rights.

Christianity, Democracy, Deregulation, and the “Religious Market.” The military defeat following the attempt to gain control of the Falklands Islands (1982) led to a removal of the military from political power and to the consolidation of democracy (1983). As part of the process to rebuild a more just society, the crimes of the dictators were denounced by many Christian leaders (including Pastor Bonino), and those responsible for the repression were judged and given prison sentences.

José Míguez Bonino (b1924), a Methodist theologian and pastor, the only Protestant Latin American observer at Vatican* II, and president of the World* Council of Churches (1975), participated in the struggle to defend human rights and contributed to the creation of the Comisión Nacional sobre la Desaparición de Personas (National Commission on the Disappearance of Persons), which was responsible for denouncing the crimes of the military dictatorship of 1976–83. He taught at the most prestigious universities around the world and received a doctorate honoris causa from the Free University of Amsterdam (1980).

In 1989, for the first time in its history, Argentina changed the government’s ruling party by democratic means. But the shift in economic models brought about privatization, deregulation, a crisis of the middle class, indebtedness, and the transformation of the welfare state into a penal state, resulting in massive poverty and urban unemployment unprecedented in the 20th c.

Christianity was transformed along with the social and political life of the country. Because widespread poverty* was and is the primary concern both in the world of the poor and in civil society, a Christianity of action (especially in Catholicism) that looked to the state and to the upper classes to address social problems became a Christianity of action that sought to create social and spiritual popular movements that would “proclaim the Kingdom* of God.” On the other hand, religion underwent a process of “emotionalization”: the emotional community has taken precedence over the dogmatic community. Very diverse renewal movements emphasize healing, addressing spiritual issues (the care* of souls), speaking in tongues (glossolalia*), spontaneous dancing during worship, entering trances, seeking a direct relation with the sacred with little or no institutional mediation, together with a modern use of media*. All of these contribute to renewing the “enthusiasm” of thousands of people who participate in Charismatic* Christian groups, often several at the same time.

Other Christian groups, which emphasize the reaffirmation of Christian identity, struggle in the public sphere with (and against) the state and civil society for the symbolic control of private life (against the use of condoms, against laws concerning reproductive health, and against teaching about sexuality in the schools). They present their conception of "Christian morality" as what should be the morality of society as a whole. To their nationalism, they add preaching against corrupt political leadership. The creation of a three-way "Argentine dialogue" among the government, the UN Development Program, and the Catholic Church in early 2002 "in order to save the nation from decadence" shows the long-standing conceptual and political ties between religious and political powers.

There is a blend of complementarity and competition between Christianity and civil society and the state (see Church and State Relations Cluster: In Latin America: Argentina). In a time of Christian pluralism and religious change, accompanied by a process of Catholic deregulation, many Christians do not become members of the church they attend or hold strong personal beliefs. In this context, Christian institutions gain credibility through intense social activity, presenting themselves as "civil society," the "third sector" (le tiers état) engaged in social volunteerism. Recent surveys show that the Catholic Church is the most credible institution in Argentina, even as Pentecostals*, Charismatics*, and Protestants strive for space among the people. The Pentecostals do not ask for separation of church and state; they want the same privileges as the Catholics. Meanwhile, other Protestant churches advocate a clear separation of church and state in a democratic and just civil society, as well as broader human rights, including laws guaranteeing freedom of religion (which still do not exist in Argentina).

In contrast with the situation in other Latin American countries, in Argentina Christian political parties have not prospered; e.g. Christian Democracy and Pentecostal political parties have failed to become a significant political force.

Statistics: Population (2000): 37 million (M). Christians, 34.4 M, 92.9% (Roman Catholics, 33.7 M; Protestants, 2.3 M; Pentecostals/Charismatics, 2 M); nonreligious, 1.1 M, 3.1%; Muslims, 0.7 M, 2.0%; Jews, 0.5 M, 1.3%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

FORTUNATO MALLIMACI

Arianism, term applied in the 4th c. to any view denying the Nicene* doctrine that the second person of the Trinity* is of the same essence or substance as the Father (homoousios). Some scholars refer to this movement as "non-Nicene." For Arians generally (including Arius*), the One incarnate in Jesus was the Creator/Logos in person, unimpeded by a human soul (since Jesus did not have a human soul*, as Apollinaris* also taught later).

Since the Nicene doctrine seemed to make the persons identical, the alternative was to emphasize God's threeness, but in significantly different ways.

1. Arius* held that the Father alone is "God" in the proper sense. The only begotten Son is the "God" and creator of everything else, but was himself "created out of nothing" by the Father's will. This extreme Arianism emphasized that the Son is "unlike" the Father in essence, as Eunomius* further underscored.
2. A moderate "Homoian"* form of Arianism, more widespread during the 4th c., denied that the Son is "created from nothing," asserted that the Son is "like" (homoios) the Father, but refused to say that they are "of the same essence."
3. The "Homoiousian*" position labeled "Semi-Arian" by Epiphanius* affirmed that the Son is "like in essence" (but not the same as) the Father, in order to affirm God's threeness; this view became one component of the "orthodox" view of the Trinity.

While Arianism is usually described theologically, it had political overtones from the start. When Constantine gained power in the East (324), he found the church divided over the Trinity and thus convened the Council of Nicaea* (325). Although the Nicene* Creed became the official doctrine of the Roman Empire, its opponents, including Arius, were tolerated. At the Council of Antioch* (341), the Eastern bishops, without denying the Nicene doctrine, produced other creeds. After Constantius became sole emperor in 353, Arianism in its moderate Homoian form gained official approval at a series of councils culminating in the Council of Constantinople* in 360. Ulfila*, the bishop of the Goths*, was present at this council and adopted its moderate Arian doctrine; as a result, the Goths and other peoples (including Lombards* and Vandals*) influenced by them, who became a major influence in North African and European politics, were Arian for several centuries.

In protest against Emperor Constantius, the Homoiousians, or “Semi-Arians,” kept the Eastern emphasis on threeness but were willing to say that the three were “like in essence.” The death of Constantius and the rise of Julian* the Apostate, who removed all doctrinal sanctions, made a resolution possible. At the Council of Alexandria* in 362, the Nicene party made peace with the Semi-Arians, and the position developed by the Cappadocians* owes something to both.

The Eastern emperor Valens championed Arianism until he was killed in the battle of Adrianople (378), ironically by the Arian Goths. His successor, Theodosius*, imposed the Nicene doctrine throughout his realm, and the Council of Constantinople* (381) adopted the Niceno*-Constantinopolitan Creed, which became the standard of orthodoxy. Arian sympathies continued in the court in Milan, where Justina was regent for the young Valentinian II; yet the bishop Ambrose* was victorious in a dispute with the Arians over their use of one of the basilicas. In Constantinople, however, Gothic mercenaries were permitted to use several churches, because they were an important guarantee of stability.

After the Gothic invasions of Western Europe, Arians ruled in Italy, Gaul, Spain, and North Africa; thus Arians converted other Germanic tribes, especially the Franks, Burgundians, and Lombards. The Gothic Bible and liturgy were central to their culture; a magnificent Gothic codex containing half of the Gospels is preserved in Uppsala. In Ravenna, Arian architecture includes the baptistery and the Church of San Apollinare Nuovo.

Gothic rulers usually permitted Latin speakers to maintain their own Bible, liturgy, and doctrine. It was also assumed that they would follow Roman law while the Germanic peoples would follow their own traditions, which were soon written down in Latin. As the invaders began to speak the vernacular Latin of the time and assimilated various Roman customs, they became more susceptible to conversion from Arianism to Catholicism.

The role of queens in converting their husbands to Christianity and then to Catholicism (Nicene* Christianity) should not be overlooked. Going into new lands because of their marriages, these women took their chaplains with them and instructed their children and others, even when the kings maintained older customs. Clovis* the Frank converted to Catholicism (in this case from polytheism) under the influence of Clotilde (496); he was followed by Reccared* in Spain (587). The Vandals in North Africa remained Arian until the Byzantine Conquest (534). The Lombards, who invaded Italy (late 6th c.), gradually became Catholic over the next hundred years. After this, Arianism had no institutional continuity.

During centuries of Roman Catholic orthodoxy, the term “Arian” was used to condemn various deviations from the usual views of the Trinity and Christ. In the 17th and 18th c., it was applied to any number of views that denied the full divinity of Jesus Christ, including those of Milton*, Newton*, and Clarke. With the growth of Unitarianism* as a movement, “Arianism” became the standard designation for non-Trinitarian Christianity. See also GOTHs; HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: NORTH AFRICA; ITALY; LOMBARDS; SPAIN; VANDALS.

EUGENE TESELLE and RICHARD VAGGIONE

Ariminum and Seleucia, Councils of, the Western and Eastern synods called by Constantius (359) to resolve the Arian* controversy. Under imperial pressure, both councils produced Arianizing creeds (see Arianism), which were reconciled in the Council of Constantinople* (360).

Aristides. See APOLOGISTS.

Aristotle and Christianity. The discovery of Aristotle’s “lost” works by Roman Catholic scholars in Spain (12th c.) was an event of enormous significance for the development of Christian thinking from the late medieval period onward. In the centuries following the fall of the Western Roman Empire, most of Greek philosophy was forgotten by the Latin-speaking clerics and scholars of the West. Some of Plato’s* ideas remained in circulation as a result of Augustine’s* teachings, but for most Christians, Aristotle was little more than a legendary sage. Of all his voluminous writing, only six essays on logic (the Organon) remained extant (in a 7th-c. Latin translation by the Christian courtier Boethius*). The remainder of Aristotle’s work – thousands of pages on metaphysics*, natural sciences*, psychology*, politics*, ethics*, and aesthetics* – passed into the hands of Greek-speaking clerics in the Byzantine* Empire and, through translations by Syriac*-speaking Christians, into the possession of Arab and Persian scholars in the burgeoning empires of the Muslim world.

The Byzantines preserved these treasures, but the Arabs and Persians did more: they commented critically on them, adapted them for practical purposes, and developed their own schools of neo-Aristotelian philosophy. As a result, when the vanished works appeared to the astonished eyes of Christian invaders in 12th-c. Spain, they were written in Arabic and accompanied by extensive commentaries by Muslim and Jewish scholars – famous thinkers like Ibn Sina (Avicenna*), Ibn Rushd (Averroes*), and Ibn Maimon (Maimonides*), all of them devoted monotheists. All that was needed to make this material available to Christian Europe was to translate it into Latin, a task accomplished by early-13th-c. teams of Christian, Muslim, and Jewish translators working in Spain, Provence, and Sicily.

The works of Aristotle and the commentators held an irresistible appeal to Western Europeans, because they were sources not only of ancient wisdom but also of modern scientific knowledge and Europe had long lagged behind the Muslim world in its general level of material and cultural development. This very fact made some Christian leaders wary of the new learning's explosive potential.

Aristotle's philosophy resonated in some ways with the worldview of the Abrahamic religions. The Greek sage viewed the universe as a single entity, harmoniously integrated, purposeful, and comprehensible. He believed in one God*, immaterial, eternal, perfect, and unchangeable, and in an immortal human soul*. Aristotle defined humans as social beings, capable of reason and of moral choice, whose highest calling was to live ethical lives. And, like Jewish, Christian, and Muslim thinkers, he viewed politics* as a branch of ethics* rather than a science of power.

But these similarities masked serious differences that worried the religious authorities in charge of Europe's new universities. Aristotle had been a pagan, after all. The natural universe, in his view, is eternal, not divinely created. His God, more a principle than a person, bears little resemblance to the biblical Father and Creator who, transcending time and space, demonstrates his concern for humanity by manifesting his will in history*. Neither the justice*-seeking YHWH of the Jews nor the messianic Savior of the Christians, Aristotle's Unmoved Mover is a passive entity, contained by the universe, and conscious only of itself. And what of Jesus Christ and his role in salvation? For Aristotle, salvation* is unnecessary, because the human will* is not imprisoned by sin* and does not require liberation* through the instrumentalities of divine grace*. Aristotle considered the soul immortal, but since he identified it with human vitality and reason, he had no conception of bodily resurrection*, divine judgment*, heaven*, or hell*.

Clearly, some of these ideas were at odds with traditional Christianity. But Jewish and Muslim thinkers had already demonstrated that Aristotle's theological "errors" could be "corrected" and his philosophical and scientific views adapted to make them palatable to biblical monotheists. The more serious problem, perhaps, was the clash between the philosopher's social attitudes and those of earlier Christian thinkers like Augustine and Jerome*. Traumatized by the fall of the Roman Empire, many Catholics had embraced a version of Christianity stressing the inevitability of sin and earthly suffering, the defects of human reason, the utter dependence of the faithful on God and the church, and the hope of a better world beyond the grave. Aristotle, by contrast, pictured humans as capable of mastering their passions, gaining true understanding of the natural world, and improving their lives by cultivating their potential for reason and moderation. The ideals of asceticism*, chastity*, saintliness*, and worldly withdrawal, so important for the development of Christian sensibilities in the monastic* age, took a back seat to the exhilarating potentialities of rational thought.

Little wonder that, following an initial burst of enthusiasm for the rediscovery of ancient wisdom, a council of bishops (1210) ruled that "neither Aristotle's books of natural philosophy nor commentaries [on them] are to be read publicly or privately in Paris, and this under penalty of excommunication." The ban, extended in 1215, permitted the study of Aristotle's logical books at the University of Paris, Europe's premier center of theological learning, but prohibited the reading of all his philosophical and scientific works. Nevertheless, almost from its issuance, the ban proved ineffectual.

Why so? One reason was that Western Europe was experiencing an unprecedented rebirth of economic, social, and cultural activity – the "medieval Renaissance" – which gave Aristotle's work new relevance. Why should rational inquiry be considered dangerous to religious faith*? It might, in fact, prove to be a way of strengthening Christianity at a time of accelerating social change. A growing confidence in human reason and interest in the natural world inspired intellectuals of the Franciscan* order, such as Oxford University's Roger Bacon*, to investigate the relationship between Aristotelian science and Catholic theology. At the same time, representatives of the Dominican* order found Aristotle's metaphysical teachings, emphasizing the unity and harmony of the universe, invaluable in combating dualistic heresies like Catharism*, which pictured a world rent by unending conflict between the principles of good and evil.

By the 1250s, Aristotle's entire body of work was required reading at the University of Paris, and a great debate erupted about its true meaning for Christianity. The participants in this debate – all churchmen and, by now, all Aristotelians of one sort or another – constituted a galaxy of great minds. The beloved Franciscan and future saint Bonaventure* represented the more conservative scholars; the liberals' spokesman was the greatest genius of the age, Thomas Aquinas*; and the radicals were led by a daring Belgian cleric, Siger* de Brabant. Their battle, although civil for the most part, was stormy. Alarmed by the rise of radical ideas among the liberal arts scholars, the bishop of Paris issued a series of condemnations purportedly aimed at Siger's ideas, but also inculcating some of Aquinas's teachings. The ultimate winner of the debate, from the perspective of the Catholic Church, was Aquinas, who was said to have "baptized" Aristotle, although his opponents accused him of Aristotelianizing Christianity. In 1323, the "angelic doctor" was canonized by Rome.

The Thomist* synthesis united Aristotle's ideas about the unity, coherence, and developmental principles of the universe (the universal movement of all things from potentiality to actuality) with the Christian principles of divine transcendence*, salvation*, and love*. Insisting that the natural laws of science and society reflected God's creative will, Thomism constituted the first important attempt to reconcile science* with Christian theology and ethics, and opened the doors of European universities to a great burst of scientific enterprise. But the debate was far from over. Thomism was soon attacked – again, in the name of Aristotle – by Franciscan theologians like Duns* Scotus and William of Ockham*, who insisted that the laws of nature could not circumscribe God's freedom and that human knowledge of the universe must always be provisional. Two centuries later, Martin Luther* and other leaders of the Protestant Reformation bitterly attacked both

Aquinas and Aristotle, but neo-Aristotelian theology revived in the works of 20th-c. Catholic thinkers like Jacques Maritain*, Teilhard* de Chardin, and Bernard Lonergan.

RICHARD E. RUBENSTEIN

Arius (d336), theologian. Libyan by birth, Arius was a presbyter of the Alexandrian church, excommunicated by Bishop Alexander* in 318. Popular and episcopal support forced Constantine* to make his teaching a central issue at Nicaea* in 325. Arius was condemned for heresy* and exiled but was being rehabilitated when he died suddenly in 336. He was perceived by Athanasius* and others as the source of a heresy called "Arianism*." Actually Arianism was a wider stream of thought. Few "Arians" considered him personally authoritative. His few surviving writings make it difficult to discern what was personal in his theology.

RICHARD VAGGIONE

Armageddon, the place of the final battle on the day of Judgment* (Rev. 16:16); derivatively, any decisive battle of unusual size or consequence.

Armagh, the see of the archbishop of Ireland, associated by tradition with Patrick*.

Armenia. Christianity was introduced in the 2nd c. in Southern Armenia by Syriac missionaries from Mesopotamia. The Syriac tradition of Edessa* left a lasting stamp on the Armenian language, liturgy, and church discipline. The official Christianization (c314; traditional date, 301) of the kingdom by Gregory* the Illuminator, opened Northern Armenia to the influence of Cappadocia, leading to a gradual prevalence of the Greek element in the shaping of Armenian ecclesiastical culture. The Armenian alphabet, invented by Mashtots* (c405), made possible the translation of the Bible, Syriac and Greek patristic writings, and the development of original literature in numerous genres. Mashtots's endeavor also consolidated the Christian identity of Armenia even as its statehood was dismantled. Thus, in its eastern part subjugated to Persia, several generations of Armenians resisted Zoroastrian persecutions of Christianity between 428 and 575.

After the long debates provoked by Eutyches* teaching and the ensuing Council of Chalcedon*, the Armenian Church rejected both extreme Monophysitism* and the imperial doctrine at the Council of Duin (553/55) and, in following centuries, elaborated an autonomous christological theory, strictly following Cyril* of Alexandria (see Miaphysite). Armenians expressed Christ's integral humanity in various ways but avoided designating Christ's divinity and humanity as two comparable entities belonging to the same abstract category of nature.

The Arab Conquest (699–701), although bringing new persecutions, transformed the catholicos* into the legal chief of the nation, directly responsible to the Islamic authority. Hereby, the Armenian Apostolic Church acquired a new civil role in Armenian society, maintained also under Turcoman rule (from the 15th c.). In periods of weakened Muslim power, the Armenian princes, relying on the moral weight of the Church, proved able to reunify Armenian lands and sometimes to renovate the ancient kingship. They promoted cenobitic* monasticism on their estates through protection and gifts. The monasteries became centers of economic development, learning, and art (illuminated books). Fortified, they formed a coordinated net of defense during the Seljuk, Mongol, Turcoman, and Kurdish invasions, preventing the depopulation of the country. Yet these invasions are at the origin of the vast Armenian diaspora, further stimulated by the persecutions of Christians in the Ottoman and Savafid Empires and by the Armenian* genocide (1915–16). Several autonomous ecclesiastical jurisdictions emerged because of the dispersion. In the Republic of Armenia, the See of the Catholicos is in the cathedral founded in the 5th c. on the site of Gregory the Illuminator's vision of the Son of God at Edjmiatzin, the city name meaning the "Descent of the Only Begotten."

Statistics: Population (2001): 2.97 million. Christians: Armenian Apostolic, 94.7%; other Christians, 4%. (Source: 2001 census.)

IGOR DORFMANN-LAZAREV

Armenian Apostolic Church. See ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER: ARMENIAN APOSTOLIC CHURCH.

Armenian Genocide. The politics of genocide against the Armenians, accused of being a disloyal, extraneous body in the Ottoman Empire, began with Sultan Abdul-Hamid II after the 1878 Turkish military defeat. Between 1894 and 1896, from 200,000 to 300,000 Armenians were massacred, and another 30,000 were killed in April 1909 in Cilicia.

The Young Turk committee "Union and Progress," directed by Djemal, Enver, and Talaat, seized power (1913) and established the "Special Organization," the future instrument of the extermination of the Armenians. The arrest (April 24, 1915) and shooting of the Armenian intellectuals of Constantinople, among whom were deputies of the Ottoman parliament, opened the way to the elimination of Armenians from the entire Ottoman Empire under the pretext of protecting the Russian frontier from "the Christians' treason." "Confessions" extracted from Armenian notables justified the shooting of men and the deportation of the rest of the population, about 1,000,000, to the Syro-Mesopotamian desert, where, if not murdered on the way, most died of deprivation and epidemics, the survivors being killed during the summer of 1916. About 1,500,000 Armenians were victims of this genocide.

Following the Russian retreat after the 1917 revolution, the Turkish forces attempted to expand the genocide in today's Azerbaijan, which resulted in other massacres and the first exodus of Armenians from Baku (1917–18).

IGOR DORFMANN-LAZAREV

Arminianism, a movement founded by the Dutch theologian Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609, student of Theodore Beza*, Calvin's* successor), diverges from Calvinism primarily in matters of election* and "predestination* to salvation*." Arminius's Dutch followers drafted (1610) the five Articles of Remonstrance* against Calvinism: grace* is universally "preventive" (anticipatory); election is conditional on faith*; the atonement* provided by Jesus' death was intended to be unlimited and universal; God's grace can be resisted; and perseverance in faith is not certain, making it possible for believers to fall from grace. The Articles sparked furious debate with the Calvinists led by Franciscus Gomarus, who were condemned by the Synod of Dordt* (1618). Two main branches of Arminianism can be identified: classical Arminianism adheres to Arminius's five articles, while Wesleyan Arminianism follows John Wesley*'s later modifications, which reconceived the concept of atonement to incorporate an understanding of justice*, maintained that although Christians could lose their salvation, acts of apostasy were not final, and argued that Christian perfection is possible in this life. In the contemporary world, Arminianism is most commonly found in Methodist teachings but also finds a place in some Anglican, Baptist, Church of Christ, Seventh-day Adventist, and Pentecostal churches.

RENÉE JEFFERY

Arnauld, Antoine (1612–94), leading Jansenist* theologian. Born in a Parisian family linked to the Port*-Royal abbey; law and theology student at the Sorbonne; ordained priest; appointed professor of theology at the Sorbonne. In conversation with the abbot of Saint-Cyran, then imprisoned, he wrote Frequent Communion (1643), defending Jansenist views on the Eucharist* (their caution against frequent Communion). Contested by Jesuits* and Rome, he was expelled from the Sorbonne. A renowned mathematician, philosopher, and theologian, a disciple of Augustine*, a Cartesian, and Pascal's* friend, Arnauld participated in the important debates of his time, as his many works (42 volumes) show. See also JANSENISM.

JEAN LESAULNIER

Arnauld, Jacqueline Marie Angélique (1591–1661), Jansenist* abbess and reformer of Port*-Royal. Born in Paris, daughter of anti-Jesuit barrister Antoine Arnauld and sister of theologian Antoine Arnauld*. Forced to take vows, she became abbess of Port-Royal (1602). Spiritual conversion (1608) led Mère Angélique to introduce rigorous monastic Cistercian* reform and close the convent's doors; she supervised the reform of other convents. In close relationship with Francis* de Sales until his death (1622), she was subsequently heavily influenced by the cofounder of Jansenism*, Saint-Cyran. Port-Royal under Mère Angélique became synonymous with Jansenism; she maintained Jansenist tenets despite increasing persecution by Innocent IX and Louis XIV. MITA CHOUDHURY

Arndt, Johann (1555–1621), German Lutheran theologian, pastor, and author of devotional works, including his highly popular and influential Six Books on True Christianity, compiling materials from earlier mystical* and devotional writers (many Roman Catholic), emblems, and general directives on his favorite themes – repentance, true faith, and the holy life of the true Christian – and a prayer book, Little Garden of Paradise. Protestant scholastic Lutheran colleagues opposed Arndt's heretical leanings throughout his career (though John Gerhard defended him). His work had a direct influence on Pietism*, which developed later in the 17th c. and remains strong in Evangelicalism*.

PETER C. ERB

Arns, Paulo Evaristo, Brazilian churchman, Franciscan friar, priest (1945), bishop (1966), cardinal (1973), archbishop of São Paulo (1970–98). Born in Forquilha, Santa Catarina (1921), he was a doctor of patristic literature (Sorbonne, 1952). One of the most representative bishops of the generation after Vatican* II, pastor of the largest Catholic diocese in the world (until its 1989 division), and a supporter of Liberation* theology, he frequently confronted dictatorial security services and the wealthy, becoming a prominent defender of human* rights, struggling for social justice* and land* reform for the poor* and engaged in ecumenism. An intellectual, he wrote 49 books. See also HUMAN RIGHTS CLUSTER: THE CHURCHES IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL.

LUIZ C. L. MARQUES

Arts and Theology. Although artists and theologians have been engaged in both supportive and contentious dialogue since the first days of the church (see Paul's Speech in Athens, Acts 18), an integrated, academic study of theology and art emerged largely after 1950. During the post-World War II arts boom in the USA, several prominent theologians and artists began a fruitful dialogue on the intersections of art, religion*, and contemporary culture. These discussions led to the inauguration of courses in many theological schools, such as Union Theological Seminary in New York City, Boston University School of Theology, and the University of Chicago Divinity School. Theologians who were engaged in research in this area included Paul Tillich*, Amos Wilder, Jacques Maritain*, Nicholas Berdyaev*, Roger Hazelton, and Walter Ong, SJ. These pioneers, followed by a second generation, mostly Tillich's students (James Luther Adams, Tom Driver, Nathan Scott, John Dillenberger, and Jane Daggett Dillenberger), examined the intersections of culture and religion and developed methods for integrating the arts into theological study. By 2000 programs for the advanced study of theology and the arts came into being in a large number of graduate theological schools in the USA and UK, while seminaries' curricula included the arts in ministerial education.

Theology and the arts is a multifaceted field taking different critical and analytic trajectories. Some programs emphasize the liturgical or performative arts (e.g. sacred music, homiletics, or dance) most often encountered in a worship context; others regard the arts more broadly, including literature, film, music, and the visual arts, whether overtly religious or not. The former programs tend to have a more practical aim (e.g. to enrich or renew a community's worship* or spiritual* life), while the latter are oriented toward a wider cultural analysis in which religion and art are two key components of research. Some programs take a more historical, analytical, or theoretical approach, emphasizing, e.g., the history of Christian art and architecture, the intellectual or theological roots of iconoclasm*, theological aesthetics*, visual culture, or art as a facet of ritual studies. Other programs direct more attention to preparing arts practitioners or training future clergy and lay leaders to appreciate and include the arts in their ministries. Church musicians constitute a large proportion of the latter group, but other arts ministries may be highlighted (e.g. chancel drama, liturgical dance*, or the design of worship environments). The theoretical side of the field now also integrates the arts into biblical studies, ethics and society, anthropology* of religion, and religion and psychology*.

All of these approaches find human artistic endeavors to be an important vehicle for expressing and examining matters of ultimate value, meaning, and the human–divine relationship. Historians view the artistic productions of a particular time and place as data that give insight into the character of a religious community and its belief system. Theologians understand the arts to be a nondiscursive and sometimes nonverbal means of conveying and reinforcing dogmatic* positions, moral* precepts, or calls for social and economic justice*. Homiletics, ethicists, and religious educators may perceive a prophetic or pedagogical role for the arts, while pastoral theologians can value the arts for their therapeutic, devotional, or inspirational function. Depending on the theologian's tradition, the arts may be understood to serve a kind of sacramental* function, mediating between the visible and invisible, or between the human and divine realms, as in the Orthodox teaching on the icon*. The role of God as creator and that of the artist as creator are then among the central points of study, along with affirming the essential goodness of the material world and its ability to serve as a vehicle for the holy* (i.e. as Incarnation*). See also AESTHETICS AND THEOLOGY; HIROTOPY, THE CREATION OF SACRED SPACES.

ROBIN MARGARET JENSEN

Asbaje y Ramírez, Juana Inés de (Sister Juana Inés de la Cruz; 1651–95, Mexico), a religious of the liberal convent of San Jerónimo, theologian, philosopher, scientist, poet, music composer. Through biblical and theological arguments, she defended women's rights to study and to write. She was known as the Tenth Muse.

See also MEXICO.

MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH and ELIZABETH JUDD

Asbury, Francis (1745–1816). First bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the USA, Asbury led the movement during its dramatic growth in the new nation. Born in England, Asbury answered John Wesley's* call to serve the Methodist movement in North America (1771). After 1784, when American and British Methodists separated, he assumed the role of bishop in the USA. Although the Methodist Episcopal system and Asbury's autocratic leadership clashed with the democratic ideals of the American Revolution (see United States), Methodists thrived. Much success was due to Asbury, who believed that traveling preachers were best suited to reaching Americans who lived on farms and in small towns with no minister nearby. Though Asbury was a bishop, he rejected the prestige of a professionalized ministry. He preached constantly, traveling an estimated 300,000 miles on horseback, probably seeing more of North America than anyone of his time. Asbury embraced the controversial camp* meeting revivals* to evangelize the frontier. Through itinerant preaching and camp meetings, therefore, Asbury embraced religious practices that succeeded dramatically in the democratic ethos of the nation. Through his leadership, Methodists grew from 300 members when he arrived (1771) to more than 200,000 at his death (1816). JAMES P. BYRD

Ascension, Christ's ascent into heaven after 40 days of resurrection appearances (Acts 1:1–9). Ascension Day, the 40th day after Easter*, always falls on a Thursday. Christ's withdrawal into heaven was used against the Gnostics'* claim to have been instructed by Christ after this period and used by Reformed theologians against the Lutherans' assertion that Christ's Body and Blood are omnipresent.

Asceticism. The Greek word askesis originally meant the physical discipline undertaken by an athlete, but even before the Christian Era, askesis came to signal a philosopher's disciplined self-restraint. Ascetic renunciation was a feature of several ancient philosophical and religious groups, including the Jewish Essenes* and some Gnostics*. Jesus' call to prepare for the coming Kingdom* of God, and his own itinerant ministry, unencumbered by home, family, or possessions, encouraged his followers to practice similar forms of renunciation. When the Kingdom did not arrive and Jesus did not return, ascetic renunciation was nonetheless retained as a "good" in and for itself, reinforced by Paul's favoring of celibacy* over marriage* in 1 Cor 7, as well as by the apocryphal* Acts of the Apostles. Contrary to the view that asceticism arose as a protest against degraded "pagan" morals or the laxity of the post-Constantinian church, recent scholars stress that ascetic teaching and practice became a favored form of Christian living very early. Christian ascetics opted for celibacy, restricted their food, drink, and sleep, renounced properties*, and attempted to cultivate humility*. They claimed that their discipline did not signal a denigration of the body*, but improved the soul*, brought them closer to God, and was an imitation of Jesus.

Even before the advent of organized monasticism* (4th c.), beginning with Pachomius*, Christian asceticism was practiced throughout the Mediterranean world. After the inception of organized monasticism, some Christians chose to live ascetically in less regulated ways; e.g. male and female ascetics lived together as couples or in small groups (see Agapetai).

Asceticism was open to female as well as male practitioners. Several ascetic women – such as Paula*, Eustochium*, Marcella*, Melania* the Elder, Melania* the Younger, and Olympias* – came from the highest aristocracy of the Roman Empire. Their ascetic renunciation was lavishly praised by Christian writers of the day.

A large literature explained ascetic theory and practice. Christian leaders such as Athanasius*, Jerome*, Gregory* of Nyssa, Basil* of Caesarea, Ambrose*, Ephrem* the Syrian, Evagrius* Ponticus, John* Chrysostom, John Cassian*, and Caesarius of Arles laid the foundation for the theory and practice of Christian renunciation in their many writings and monastic rules.

ELIZABETH A. CLARK

Ascetic Monasticism. See MONASTICISM CLUSTER.

Ash Wednesday, first day of Lent*, six and a half weeks before Easter*. It is a time for repentance*, when ashes are rubbed onto the foreheads of the faithful.

Asian American Theologies. Asian Americans are a group of people of Asian descent who live within "the contradictions of Asian immigration, which at different moments in the last century and a half of Asian entry into the United States have placed Asians 'within' the U.S. nation-state, its workplaces, and its markets, yet linguistically, culturally and racially marked Asians as 'foreign' and 'outside' the national polity" (in Lowe's words). A search for an alternative religious paradigm rooted in the lived faith experiences of Asian Americans sets the context in which Asian American theology is currently being undertaken. To be sure, the impact of the dominant North Atlantic religious, theological, and cultural orientations cannot be minimized for Asian Americans' construction of theology. Asian American theology is part and parcel of a larger historical context in which theological traditions have been built and nurtured. At the same time, multivalent religious, cultural, and ethnic/racial orientations of Asian American faith communities are shaping their distinct theologies and paradigmatic frameworks that bridge "the barriers between the intellectuals at the university/divinity school and our communities so that our work takes on fresh, living meaning in the 'real' world" (Lowe).

Asian American theologies are mostly public theologies. Their interpretive scaffold can be said to be a three-legged stool of (1) the nomadic identity derived from the racialized life of Asian Americans, (2) the translocal and diasporic existence that predisposes Asian Americans to the pathos of life, and (3) the navigation among multiple religious orientations inherited from Asian and other religious traditions. These three aspects produce particular theological understandings, practices, life perspectives, and distinct Christian faith postures for Asian Americans, perspectives that offer a fresh understanding of the meaning of the "public" in the USA.

A growing number of theological themes are articulated by Asian American theologians. They include the relevance of the change and relativity expressed in the interplay of yin and yang to the coexistence of Christianity and other religions in a creative process of becoming (Jung Young Lee); postcolonial Feminist theology that examines gender, colonialism, and Christianity (Kwok Pui-lan); pilgrimage by way of marginality and liminality* that brings strangers into solidarity and community (San Hyun Lee); and the cross as a subversive effect of love, a theology that utilizes the Korean concept of jeong (Wonhee Anne Joh). FUMITAKA MATSUOKA

Asian Theology, Trends in. The roots of Asian theology can be traced to the appointment of Asians to the International Missionary Council (early 20th c.). In subsequent Asian ecumenical movements, the Asian theological voice began to be heard through the Indian Rethinking Christianity Movement (1930s), the Indian Journal of Theology (from 1952), the South East Asia Journal of Theology (from 1959; now Asia Journal of Theology), and the East Asia Christian Conference (from 1959, now Christian Conference of Asia). This Asian theological movement was empowered by decolonization, the rise of the Third World Movement, and various postcolonial struggles. Thus major themes of Asian theology include suffering* and poverty* resulting from domination and oppression, the dehumanizing of Asian women*, and interfaith conflicts and collaboration when Christians are a tiny minority. Doctrinal reformulations include the following: Jesus as one among the marginals; Christ as a cosmic principle; rejection of the doctrines of divine impassibility* and immutability in favor of a human-like God; Asian cultural and religious traditions received as sources of revelation together with the Bible; and church conceived in a praxis-oriented language regarding God's mission. Asian theologies take several forms, such as culturally oriented indigenous theologies, sociopolitically oriented contextualizing theologies, and Asian liberation theologies. Incorporating postcolonial* theories into theology is a recent trend, especially in Asian Feminist theological circles and in relatively affluent Asian countries such as Hong Kong and South Korea.

SIMON SHUI-MAN KWAN

Asian Women's Resource Centre (AWRC) for Culture and Theology, established in 1987–88 as a shared dream of a community of Asian women actively engaged in a critical Feminist* theology of liberation* and transformation against a backdrop of colonialism* with a postcolonial* imagination in a pluralistic Asia, rich with natural wealth, peoples, cultures, religions, and philosophies. AWRC envisions a community of women, men, and children who are valued and value each other as equally created in God's image* with dignity, mutual respect, care, and responsibility. In God's Image, a quarterly journal (from 1982), focuses on women's reality, feminist struggle, vision, liberation theology, and hermeneutics. AWRC facilitates programs addressing feminist struggles and praxis in life contexts.

YONG TING JIN

Assemblies of God, the largest denomination in the Pentecostal* tradition (worldwide, c50 million believers in 2000). The Assemblies of God (organized April 1914, Hot Springs, Arkansas) was an outgrowth of a felt need among the scattered local churches that featured Pentecostal theology to provide for discipline of ministers, leadership training, the promotion of a consistent theology, and support for world missions.

The Assemblies of God owes its theological identity to key personalities. In 1901 Charles F. Parham developed in his short-term Bible institute in Topeka, Kansas, the teaching that subsequent to an experience of regeneration and a second experience of sanctification*, all believers should seek a third experience of spiritual empowering, baptism* in the Holy Spirit, marked by speaking in tongues, or glossolalia*. Students in Parham's Bible institute reported experiencing this phenomenon. Associated with this empowering was the expectation of various gifts of the Spirit, most conspicuously divine healing*. Parham's protégé, William Seymour*, took this message to Los Angeles. There, at a humble church facility on Azusa* Street, Seymour led a continuous revival meeting for more than three years (1906–9). From there the Pentecostal Movement became a worldwide phenomenon. Seymour discarded Parham's insistence that the glossolalia associated with Spirit baptism need not consist of "known languages," but simply of "unknown tongues." By 1910, William Durham, a Baptist turned Pentecostal, arrived from Chicago with an additional modification, advocating "the finished work"; a crisis experience of sanctification (taught by the Wesleyans*, including Parham and Seymour) was not required for Spirit baptism. For Durham, sanctification was a process, not a crisis. When the Assemblies of God was formed, the modified Pentecostal theology of William Durham prevailed.

The theology of the Assemblies of God is strongly linked to standard Evangelical* teaching, including the authority of the Bible as Scripture* in all matters of faith and practice; the triune Godhead; the substitutionary atonement of Jesus Christ (see Atonement #2); the necessity of repentance* and faith* in Christ for salvation*; the expectation of Christ's premillennial second coming (see Millennialism Cluster). Baptism* in the Holy Spirit is understood to be an empowering for Christian witness, manifested in a vigorous world mission that encompasses North American-sent missionaries (about 2000 at the turn of the century) and missionaries from numerous countries that once were “receiving” churches but are now “sending” churches. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER; PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENT, ITS HISTORY AND THEOLOGY; PENTECOSTAL WORSHIP. WILLIAM W. MENZIES

Assumption. In Roman Catholicism, the Blessed Virgin Mary* is believed to have been assumed, body and soul, into heaven, immediately following her bodily death. The Feast of the Assumption is observed in the Roman Catholic Church on August 15, as well as in Anglicanism and Lutheranism (though without the word and doctrine of “Assumption”). The Eastern Orthodox* Churches call the Assumption the Dormition*.

Assumption of Moses, Jewish OT pseud-epigraphon (early 1st c. CE; also designated the Testament of Moses), for the most part a prophecy about the downfall of Israel and its eschatological salvation. The prophecy is delivered by Moses to his successor, Joshua, shortly before the former’s assumption into heaven. Christians may have been interested in its doctrines on the spirit of God. See also PSEUD-EPIGRAPHA OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

JOHANNES TROMP

Assurance of Salvation, an emphasis of the Reformed tradition, which affirmed both predestination* and the perseverance of saints. While the original emphasis was on the assurance that comes from faith* itself, Puritan* theologians, desiring a church of “visible saints,” tried to discern the elect on the basis of their accounts of “Christian experience.” See also PRACTICAL SYLLOGISM.

Assyrian Church of the East. See CHURCH OF THE EAST, OR ASSYRIAN CHURCH.

Athaliah, daughter of Jezebel* and wife of Jehoram, king of Judah. Seizing the throne, she reigned for six years until an insurrection led by the priest Jehoiada led to her slaying at the palace gate (2 Kgs 11).

Athanasian Creed, the Symbolum quicunque, named from its opening statement, “Whoever desires to be saved must above all hold the Catholic faith.” Not from Athanasius, it was written between the time of Vincent* of Lerins (c440) and Caesarius of Arles (c525, who quoted it). It clarifies the doctrines of the Trinity* and the Incarnation* using formulations from Augustine* and earlier councils. The Creed has been widely used, both liturgically and doctrinally, in the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Lutheran traditions. Its bold first line was interpreted by F. D. Maurice to mean that eternal life is knowledge of God, and eternal death* is being without God.

Athanasius (c295–373), bishop and theologian; details of his birth and education unknown. He was deacon and secretary to Bishop Alexander of Alexandria*, with whom he attended the Council of Nicaea* (325), as well as bishop of Alexandria* (328–73). He was exiled from his see five times as a result of conflicts with emperors and other bishops (335–37, 339–46, 356–62, 362–63, 365–66). Athanasius is significant for his defense of the full divinity of the Word*, or Son* of God, against opponents whom he labeled “Arians”; for his promotion of the growing monastic* movement and his work to tie it closely to the church; and for his efforts to bring unity and uniformity to the church in Egypt, as other 4th-c. patriarchs also did.

During Athanasius’s career, the church was troubled by what is known as “the Arian controversy” (see Arianism). Bishops and theologians debated, in countless written works and numerous councils, the relationship between God the Father and his Son, or Word (and eventually among the Father, Son, and Spirit). Beginning with his masterpiece, On the Incarnation of the Word (Inc., written between 325 and 337), Athanasius defended the full divinity of the Word, which he considered essential to human salvation*. In his formulation, through the Incarnation* the Word “became human, so that we may become divine” (Inc. 54). In the 350s he began to promote the creed adopted at the Council of Nicaea (325) as the touchstone of orthodoxy on this question: this creed declared that the Son was “of the same substance” (homoousios) as the Father. Athanasius argued that the language the Bible uses for the Son – e.g. “Word,” “Wisdom,” “Power” – makes clear that he is one with the Father and not one of the Father’s creatures. Athanasius branded all who disagreed with his view, no matter how diverse their theologies, “Arians” or “Ario-maniacs,” i.e. followers of the Alexandrian presbyter Arius* (c260–336), whose teachings gave rise to the controversy. As inaccurate as this labeling was, it stuck, and only recently have scholars ceased to label all the ancient theologians who questioned Nicene theology “Arians.” When Athanasius was exiled from his see, it was usually because councils of bishops found him guilty of professional misconduct (especially the use of violence against his opponents), but he claimed (not without reason) that he was persecuted for his theological beliefs.

Athanasius is also a significant figure in the history of Christian monasticism*, which grew and diversified during the 4th c., especially in Egypt*. He wrote letters to desert monks and to female virgins in the cities urging them to avoid “heretical” teachings and to practice their ascetic disciplines in unity with the wider church. To female ascetics, he held up the Virgin Mary* as the model of reclusion and obedience. To ascetics throughout the world, he offered the example of the desert monk Antony* (c251–356). Athanasius’s Life of Antony portrayed its subject as the first true desert hermit, who achieved a maximum level of virtue without the benefit of a traditional education. Antony’s ascetic program constituted a form of daily martyrdom*, which gave him the power to benefit others through healing and exorcism. Written in Greek, the book was rapidly translated into Latin and other languages, and was widely read in many countries. It inspired countless Christians to take up the monastic life, became the model for all subsequent biographies of Christian saints (hagiography*), and continues to inspire Christians today. Athanasius urged nonmonastic Christians to practice a moderate asceticism of fasting, almsgiving, prayer, and temporary periods of sexual renunciation, especially during Lent*. In these ways, Athanasius promoted monasticism as the highest form of the Christian life and worked to make sure that it was firmly connected to the wider church, which consisted primarily of ordinary married Christians, their families, and the clergy.

Like many other bishops in the post-Constantinian imperial church, Athanasius sought to establish what in his view would be a single “Catholic” Church in Egypt with a unified structure and an “orthodox” theology and worship life. Each winter he issued a festal letter, which announced the dates of Lent* and Easter* to all the Christians in Egypt; in his day, Christians differed on when to celebrate Easter, and the observance of Lent was not universal. Athanasius used his letters to exhort the faithful to proper Christian living and orthodox belief. For example, in his 39th festal letter for the year 367, Athanasius defined the biblical canon* for his followers; this is the earliest Christian writing that lists precisely the 27 books that now constitute the NT (see New Testament and its Canonization). In his letters for 369 and 370, he instructed Christians on the proper way to honor the bodies of martyrs and other deceased holy persons. In these ways, Athanasius helped to establish Christian orthodoxy* not only in doctrine, but also in pious practices.

DAVID BRAKKE

Atheism, as Accusation Against Early Christians. Theoretical atheism denies the existence of God; practical atheism is the failure to honor God or the gods (cf. the modern term “Godlessness”). Since Christians refused to take part in traditional rituals, they were called atheists (see Justin Martyr); this was one reason for their persecution*. They themselves could use the term with reference to Gentiles, as those who lacked a relationship with the true God (Eph 2:12).

Atheism and Christian Theology. Atheists challenging the dominant religion, atheism rejecting and subverting theism, and biblical faith grappling with God’s radical otherness are intertwined. Greek and Jew, Socrates and Jesus and his followers, were equally charged with atheism by the Roman authorities.

An atheist is one who challenges the presuppositions of the dominant religion*, as if only an atheist could subvert an established religion! This assumption belies Abraham smashing his father’s idols (as both the Midrash* and the Qur’an* underscore) and history, in which today’s atheism is tomorrow’s religion (Feuerbach*). Then no one can really be an atheist.

Yet atheism surfaces as soon as the devil asks (see Matt 4:1–11), Will God really be there when you need him? Practical atheism confronts only a practical theism. Atheism plays the experience of God’s absence against that of God’s presence, driving a wedge between them. Traditional theist theology is confused when it seeks to resolve the tension between God’s absence and God’s presence by dissipating it under the guise of one and the same God – a metaphysical, universal explanation seeking to address a practical issue.

Metaphysical theism is as faulty as metaphysical atheism. This appears to be the case once the distinction between revealed truth and rational truth is admitted. Metaphysical theism erodes God’s transcending reality when it seeks to deny metaphysical atheism without acknowledging that faith* can assert one thing and reason* another, that divine law is one thing and the laws of nature, which need no God hypothesis and make God superfluous, as atheists claim, are another. Then theists make God into a stopgap.

Whether taken for granted (by theists) or denied (by atheists), as a stopgap God is useless.

Oddly enough, metaphysical atheism stands closer to biblical faith. God's transcendence is not a matter of presence or absence but of God's radical otherness; not a matter of God being this or that, but a matter of God being closer to me than I am to myself, never able to take God for granted, although for me, a human in Christ, there is neither God nor human, as there is neither Greek nor Jew, male nor female, master nor slave.

GABRIEL VAHANIAN

Athos, Mount, on the Chalkidike Peninsula (northern Greece*), is known as the "holy mountain," a center of Byzantine and Eastern Orthodox* monasticism* occupying today a preeminent position among Orthodox monastic communities. Cenobitic* monasticism was established there (10th c.), though monks sought solitude on its rocky terrain probably from the late 8th c. By the 11th c., Athos comprised a federation of numerous monasteries, populated mostly by Greek-speaking monks. Russian, Serbian, and Bulgarian monasteries emerged shortly thereafter, constituting 3 of the 20 independent monasteries at present. The "Jesus* Prayer" (since the 14th c.) and hesychasm* became the preferred methods of private prayer. An 18th-c. revival resulted in the publication of the Philokalia, a collection of foundational monastic spiritual writings, which influenced 19th-c. Russian spirituality. Today, Athos continues its democratic organization and its exclusion of women; it has experienced a renaissance since the 1980s. Many of its approximately 1,500 monks hold university degrees.

JAMES C. SKEDROS

Atonement, or "at-one-ment" (a 16th-c. term), refers to the reestablishment of the proper relationship of sinners with God. It has come to be applied specifically to the significance of Christ's crucifixion*, understood in the context of the broader issues concerning redemption*, salvation*, reconciliation*, and the renewal of human life.

The OT sacrifices* were used to interpret the cross of Christ: the sacrifices of covenant/Passover* (Mark 14:24; 1 Cor 5:7), sin offering (for the forgiveness of sin, Matt 26:28; 2 Cor 5:21), expiation* or propitiation* (substitution sacrifice, Rom 3:25; Heb 7–10; 1 John 2:2, 4:10), and the suffering servant (Matt 8:17; Acts 10:36; 1 Pet 2:23–24). Exactly how does the cross of Christ reestablish a proper relationship with God? Three basic answers have been given; all are grounded in the Bible, and all have strong links with their social context. The sinners' problems are seen, respectively, as bondage to the powers of evil*; guilt, or debt toward God; and a need for human transformation.

1. Ransom and Redemption from Bondage or Healing. In the patristic period, when Christianity was a minority religion within an often hostile Roman Empire, the emphasis was on bondage to death*, the law*, and the powers of evil*, from which humans were redeemed by paying a ransom*. By his death, Christ paid this ransom; "the Son of Man came . . . to give his life as a ransom for many" (Mark 10:45). For Gregory* of Nyssa and Augustine*, the devil*, who had a legitimate claim over sinners, was tricked into abusing this power in the case of Christ, who was sinless. Thus those who attach themselves to Christ through baptism* are freed from the devil's bondage. In Christus Victor (1931), Gustaf Aulén* emphasized the importance for 20th-c. Christians of understanding atonement as redemption from bondage; Christ's life, death, and resurrection are victorious over the forces of evil.

Similarly, Eastern Orthodox* churches view humankind primarily as a victim of the devil's deception. Death* is not God's curse on God's creation, but God's enemy and the inevitable consequence of separation from life with God. Sin* is viewed as a disease. Atonement is thus the "salvific effect of the Incarnation" that heals humans from this disease and extends to the entire cosmos.

Liberation* theology has a similar concern with structures of evil that hold people in bondage. These structures of evil are unmasked and discredited when the undeserved suffering and oppression are exposed by the Christian proclamation; the captives are not only freed from moral and psychological bondage, but also empowered for a new mode of life.

2. Honor and Juridical Satisfaction. During the Christian Middle Ages in the West, God was readily likened to a feudal overlord whose honor is offended by human sin. Sinners owe God a debt of honor; because God is infinite, this is an infinite debt that humans cannot pay. Anselm* asserted that justice requires either punishment or satisfaction. Christ, being both divine and human, offers infinite satisfaction as the representative of those who share his human nature. Luther* and Calvin* changed the focus to God's wrath, which demands punishment rather than the satisfaction of honor. Thus Christ becomes a substitute for, rather than a representative of, sinful humanity, bearing the full force of God's wrath on the cross, because the guilt of sin is transferred from sinners to Christ.

The logic of punishment, which requires the Son to bear the Father's wrath, has been criticized not only for its moral and legalistic rigidity, which engenders guilt as a condition for forgiveness and denies that God is free to forgive, but as a form of "divine child abuse," a projection of the worst human impulses. Yet contemporary theology is prepared to think about God's suffering or identifying with sufferers. Here the focus shifts from wrath to reconciliation (and potentially to the redemption view of atonement).

Christ's death is often viewed, as it was by Thomas Aquinas*, as a sufficient, indeed superabundant, satisfaction for the sins of the whole of humankind; then the satisfaction view of atonement is often combined with one of the other views of atonement to address present sin and evil. Yet in some traditions, Christ's satisfaction for sins is restricted to believers; in parts of the Calvinist* tradition, atonement is limited to the elect, predestined to attain salvation*.

3. Moral Transformation. Abelard* in the Middle Ages and modern liberal theology have emphasized the way atonement changes humans. The cross is viewed as the ultimate expression of God's love for sinful humanity, even in confrontation with human rebellion and violence; the extent of God's love evokes in believers gratitude and love for God. Because the focus is on a change in human attitude, it is called a "moral* influence" theory. This does not necessarily mean that Christ is merely a moral example; the terminology refers to a transforming appeal (often understood to be a divine intervention) to the depths of human affections.

Theologians usually display a preference for one of these ways of thinking about the cross. Yet each of them is grounded in biblical metaphors, none of which should be taken too literally or made the sole focus of reflection. The question, then, is how to think in a connected way about sin*, guilt*, suffering*, divine love*, and reconciliation*.

EUGENE TESELLE and DANIEL PATTE

Attrition, a term developed in medieval Western theology and now part of the Roman Catholic doctrine of penance*. Whereas contrition* is sorrow for sin* because of love for God, attrition is based on fear of damnation*. It is considered an "imperfect" mode of contrition, preparing the person to receive grace* through the sacrament of penance.

Auburn Affirmation, 1923 statement signed by more than 1,200 ministers and elders of the Presbyterian Church in the USA declaring that the confessions of the church cannot be regarded as infallible* and that no General Assembly has the authority to make a definitive statement of the church's beliefs, such as the five points proposed by the Fundamentalist* Movement. The 1927 General Assembly concurred.

Auburn Declaration (the), by Presbyterians of the "New School" after the 1837 General Assembly expelled four synods involved in a plan of union with the congregationalists; it refuted the accusation that this plan departed from Calvinism* and the Westminster* standards. The "Old School" General Assembly eventually approved (1868) the Declaration, stating that it contained "all fundamentals of the Calvinistic Creed," which made possible the reunion of the two groups in the northern states (1869–70).

Augsburg, Peace of, gave adherents of the Augsburg* Confession legal, though inferior, status in the Holy Roman Empire (1555). Emperor Charles* V attempted to enforce the Edict of Worms* and to eradicate the Lutheran Reformation through military action (1546–47). After an initial victory, he was defeated by Protestant princes in 1552. The Truce of Passau gave temporary legal recognition to governments that accepted the Augsburg Confession. At the 1555 imperial Reichstag (diet), final provisions were adopted for the coexistence of the papal obedience and churches of the Confession. It established the principle cuius regio, eius religio (the ruler determines the faith of his subjects).

ROBERT KOLB

Augsburg Confession (1530), defining document of the Wittenberg Reformation, accepted by Lutheran churches as their fundamental statement of faith. Emperor Charles* V demanded that governments introducing Luther's reforms justify this action at an imperial diet in Augsburg (1530). John Eck, a leading Roman Catholic theologian, issued his Four Hundred Four Articles, a wide-ranging critique of Lutheranism*, associating it with ancient and contemporary heresies*. Philip Melancthon* led the Lutheran delegation and forged a new kind of document, a "confession*," to define the Lutherans' legitimacy as a Christian church. Twenty-one articles of faith (including the 20th on faith* and good works) asserted in a moderate language that Wittenberg Lutheran teaching conformed to Scripture and the catholic tradition. Seven additional articles argued for reforms of important aspects of ecclesiastical practice, such as Communion* in one kind, clerical celibacy*, monastic vows*, and compulsory confession*. Melancthon rebutted the Confutation of an imperial Roman Catholic commission in his Apology [Defense] of the Augsburg Confession (1531). ROBERT KOLB

Augustine of Canterbury (d604/5), Benedictine monk, missionary to England, first archbishop of Canterbury. Sent by Pope Gregory* I with 40 monks, he evangelized Southern England (where Christianity had disappeared after the fall of the Roman Empire) and established in Canterbury a church (597) and, subsequently, a Benedictine monastery. With the arrival of more missionaries, evangelization continued, non-Christian temples were purified for Christian worship, and Augustine consecrated 12 suffragan bishops. Canterbury became the primate see of England.

Augustine of Hippo (354–430), rhetorician, bishop, and theologian, well trained in many currents of classical life and thought. Through his voluminous writings, he transformed the classical heritage in a way that influenced medieval, Reformation, and modern thought in the West. He was born and educated in North Africa, underwent conversion in Milan (386), and served as presbyter (391), then as bishop, in Hippo, North Africa (396 until his death).

Under the influence of his mother, Monica*, he grew up thinking of himself as a Christian. After reading Cicero, he undertook a philosophical quest; in reaction against the authoritarian tone of North African Christianity, he adhered to Manichaeism* as an enlightened form of Christianity. After Theodosius* brought the full power of the Roman Empire down upon so-called Christian heresies (380) and Manichaeism (381–83), Augustine rejected Manichaeism and turned to what was held in Rome as orthodox Christianity (Milan, 386). In the Confessions, he cites three factors: acknowledgment that faith* based on authority* is a necessary part of reason's quest (in contrast with the Manichees' confidence that truth can be attained by reason alone); a "turn inward" evoked by his reading of Plotinus* (viewing true reality as spiritual, in contrast with the Manichees' materialism; understanding evil* as corruption or privation of the good, in contrast with the Manichees' dualism*); and a resolution of his personal struggles, which he credited to grace* speaking through Scripture*. He took up the contemplative* life, on the model of both monasticism* and philosophy. In a few years, he became a presbyter and then bishop in Hippo, where he was a prolific preacher, writer, and participant in doctrinal controversies.

Augustine continued the Neoplatonist* quest for immediate union with God, but he also limited it by insisting on the need for revelation* and grace*. His transformation of this tradition is seen most vividly in On the Trinity. In the first books, he probes the biblical basis of the doctrine; in Books 5–7, he develops the view that the Trinity consists of mutual relations (often called the "psychological" view of the Trinity); in Book 8, he explores several modes of ascending to God through contemplation; in Books 9–15, he develops his influential view that the human mind is the image* of God through self-relation (memory, understanding, and will, or, more specifically, immediate self-awareness, self-concept, and self-affirmation), all of them rooted in the same mind but each differentiated from the others by a distinct relation. These are fulfilled in a threefold relation to God (intuition of God, formation by the Word, and love animated by the Spirit). Augustine's understanding of the Trinity shaped later Western doctrine, including the controversial view that the Spirit proceeds from both the Father and the Son (see Filioque).

In conflict with the Donatists*, who saw themselves as the authentic African Church in continuity with Cyprian*, Augustine defended the validity of the sacraments* despite the human failings of those who administer them, placing greater emphasis on the bond of unity within the one Catholic Church. His interpretation of the sacraments as signs stimulated controversy during the Middle Ages, especially concerning the Eucharist*: does it signify the Body and Blood of Christ, or is it transformed into these?

As an interpreter of Paul (especially Romans*), he emphasized original* sin as affecting all descendants of Adam* and Eve; the bondage* of the will to its own disordered affections; grace* as the influence that frees the will so that it can turn toward God; and predestination* as the explanation for this priority of grace over free choice. After a brief controversy with Pelagius* over original sin and the freedom of the will (412–18), his general perspective was enforced by imperial and papal condemnations (418) and by the Council of Ephesus* (431).

The City of God, written late in his life (413–26), was occasioned by the Goths'* sack of Rome (410). In it Augustine drew together many strands of classical thought and offered a biblical perspective on the whole of human history, including political life. Books 1–10 are a defense of the city of God against critics in the "earthly city," attacking them for their political and spiritual pride; Books 11–22 interpret the biblical perspective on the origin, course, and ends of the two cities, which arise out of two conflicting loves, namely, love of self, so much so as to have contempt for God; and love of God, so much so as to have contempt for self. This work influenced medieval theories of church* and state, affirming the role of the "earthly city" even while limiting its scope.

Augustine's life began during a period of religious toleration; he became a convert, presbyter, and bishop at the time when orthodoxy was being enforced and other religions suppressed; he died with Vandal* invaders surrounding his city, a situation anticipating the early Middle Ages. His writings, soon taken to Rome, became a major source of medieval thought. The Augustinian* Rule, which was an important stage in the "monasticization of the clergy," was adopted in the Middle Ages by the canons* regular and by several mendicant orders, including the Dominicans* and the Augustinian* Hermits.

The Renaissance* looked to Augustine's intellectual and mystical interests; the Reformation* to his emphasis on sin and grace; the Catholic Church to the many ecclesial themes in his writings; Descartes* and his followers to his "turn inward" and his rational proofs. The political perspectives of The City of God are variously interpreted to support a Christian state, the "political realism" that relies on power, and a secular state with limited aims and space for religious freedom.

EUGENE TESELLE

Augustinian Hermits or Friars, the Order of.

Augustine founded three monasteries in North Africa, and his monks founded other monasteries. Augustinian monastic life somehow survived the Vandal occupation (5th c.) and the Arab invasions (7th c.); hermits following the Augustinian* Rule remained in Italy. Pope Innocent IV (1244) and especially Pope Alexander IV (1256) integrated hermitic groups to form the Augustinian Hermits, which became one of the four mendicant* orders, its members living in cities and devoting themselves to apostolic activities. The Augustinians claim Augustine as their spiritual (rather than juridical) founder; they remain inspired by his very adaptable monastic rule.

T. J. VAN BAVEL, OSA

Augustinian Rule. There exist three documents entitled "Rule of Saint Augustine": one for men (Praeceptum, oldest ms., 6th–7th c.), another for women (Regularis informatio or Obiurgatio), and a third one (Ordo monasterii), which is certainly not authentic. These three documents circulated in nine different versions. After a lifelong study, L. Verheijen concluded that the Praeceptum, written c397 for a community of lay brothers, can reasonably be attributed to Augustine. Like other rules, the rule written by Augustine* first circulated among other monastic texts before becoming the rule for a specific community.

Its first chapter contains four basic ideas: (1) the first community of Jerusalem (Acts 4:31–35) is the model; (2) the sharing of material and spiritual goods realizes common life; (3) common life is no blind uniformity, but is built on respect for the personality of each; and (4) humility is a positive and pride a negative factor in common life. The following six short chapters apply these fundamental ideas to prayer and life in community, common life and care of the body, mutual responsibility, service of one another, love and conflict, and love in authority and obedience; the concluding chapter is an exhortation.

T. J. VAN BAVEL, OSA

Aulén, Gustaf (1878–1977), Swedish theologian; professor in Lund, 1913–33; bishop in Strängnäs, 1933–52; member of the "Lundensian school of theology" (with A. Nygren* and R. Bring). In Christus Victor (1930), Aulén develops a typology of doctrines of redemption and reconciliation: he favors the "classical" doctrine of atonement* as redemption*, where the struggle between the God of love and the earthly powers of the devil, death, and Law results in God's victory. The Lundensian contra-positioning of agape/love vs. nomos/law intends to articulate the cosmic implications of redemption in order to overcome moralist/legalist connotations of alternative conceptualizations of atonement.

JAN-OLAV HENRIKSEN

Australia. Christianity began in Australia in unpromising circumstances, with the arrival of convicts in 1788. Initially, the Church* of England was the official religion. But the arrival of Congregationalists*, Wesleyans*, Roman Catholics, and Presbyterians* led to the Church Act of 1836, which gave financial aid to major denominations and later to Jews. Aid was also given to schools. Once the various colonies achieved responsible government, policies changed. By the end of the 19th c., state aid had ceased. All churches had equal privileges before the law, as was written into the Commonwealth Constitution in 1901, which recognized God but prohibited any establishment of religion. Church attendance was high, parliaments opened with prayer, and Christianity was seen as indispensable to national life. Most British and some North American churches were present, along with Lutheran* churches from Prussia and Scandinavia.

During the 20th c., several changes took place. Migration brought a significant Orthodox* presence (mainly Greek), along with Asian churches (mainly Chinese). Pentecostal* churches and Charismatic* networks within major churches grew rapidly beginning in the 1960s. Roman Catholics became the largest denomination. Congregationalists, Methodists, and most Presbyterians formed the Uniting Church in 1977. By the end of the century, a quarter of the population claimed no allegiance to any church, and a significant number of Jews, Muslims, Buddhists, and Hindus became Australians, weakening national Christian influences. Aboriginal and Islander Christianity, which had been scarcely visible in 19th c., became much more articulate, as all the major churches recognized the need for structures that gave Aborigines* a voice in their councils, ensuring that the racism and injustice they had experienced over two centuries would be addressed by churches and nation.

Distinctive features of Australian Christianity included meeting the challenges of traveling huge distances by agencies that brought medical help, pastoral care, and education to outback Australians, using camels, radio, airplanes, and the Internet for communication and travel where no roads existed. Initial shortages of clergy meant that lay agents were vital for the provision of ministry. A decline in ministerial and priestly vocations has made lay ministry essential again, aided by the expansion of theological education beyond the colleges that the churches established in the absence of faculties of theology in the universities until the late 19th c. Anglicans introduced synodal government (mid-19th c.), giving their male laity a voice in decision making. Women had to wait until well into the 20th c. Egalitarianism has been a feature of Australian culture. One result of that has been strong compassion for the marginalized, especially in the Salvation* Army, both within and beyond borders, and practical cooperation in philanthropy. Conversely, a regional synod in Rome in 1998 rebuked Australian Catholics for having a too democratic spirit.

Though it was not until late in the 20th c. that several world-class theological scholars emerged, such as P. Davies and C. Birch (both notable scientists), N. Habel, F. Moloney, and G. O'Collins, all the churches have had clergy and members with considerable skill in adapting European and American theologies to Australian conditions. S. Angus and P. Cameron, both Sydney Presbyterians, were tried for heresy in the 1930s and 1990s, respectively, while Fr. Collins of Missionaries of the Sacred Heart was in trouble for suggesting constitutional reform of the papacy*. Biblical authority and exegesis, Christology, miracles, ecclesiology, the role of women, and most recently homosexuality have been highly debated issues. Protestant Evangelicalism was dismissed by Liberals early in the 20th c, but has grown steadily more influential as the Liberal* theological synthesis has unraveled with the challenges posed by new theologies, ethnicity, feminism, rapid cultural change, postmodernism, and variegated spiritualities. Greek Orthodox input into these debates is slowly gathering momentum, as are contributions from ethnic churches. Sharp divisions have also occurred over the boundaries between religion and politics. Parliamentarians have sometimes been justified in their criticisms of poorly prepared submissions from churches and ecumenical bodies on controversial public issues.

A more secular* climate, the influence of multiculturalism, moral relativism, and the declining membership of the churches have meant that their public influence has shrunk over the past 50 years. Though some clergy are still guaranteed media attention, church members will not necessarily regard them as their voice, for individualism and skepticism about authority figures are cultural markers for Australians. That has been reinforced by the criminal sexual behavior of a minority of clergy and religious and by the failure of authorities to deal with such abuses, because they were concerned more for the perpetrators than for the victims. Dr. Hollingworth was forced to resign as governor-general because of his failure in this area while serving as Anglican archbishop of Brisbane.

Women have been important for the churches as volunteers, fund-raisers, educators, and caregivers. But they are no longer content to be limited to such roles and motherhood and to be excluded from the public spheres that have been monopolized by men for historical and cultural reasons. Protestant deaconesses, missionaries, and musicians had no formal roles constitutionally. Ecumenical scholarship and increasingly pointed feminist critiques of patriarchy led to the ordination of women by some denominations, though Anglicans and Pentecostals remain divided and Catholics and Orthodox are opposed to such ordination, seeing it as a surrender to culture rather than obedience to "revelation and tradition." Religious Catholic women have always included those, such as Blessed Mary MacKillop, with a vision that led them to resist episcopal authoritarians; women are now permitted a much wider constitutional pastoral and parochial role. The same is true in other churches and in the Salvation* Army, where Eva Burrows served as general from 1986 to 1993. Such changes have not prevented many younger women from opting out of church life.

Future challenges include reconnecting to the spiritual search of those under the age of 50, finding more credible ways to speak of discipleship amid a supermarket of lifestyle choices, exploring dialogue with other Australians from other world religions, meeting the challenge of environmental issues, dealing with issues of sexuality and family life, and contributing to the search for a society united in compassion, concern for peace, and commitment to changing the darker sides of Australian society.

Statistics: Population (2000): 18.8 million (M). Christians (1970): 11.6 M, 93%; (2000): 15 M, 79% (Roman Catholics, 5.4 M; Anglicans, 4 M; Protestants, 2.6 M; independents, 0.8 M; Orthodox, 0.7 M; marginal Christians, 0.2 M). The population also included in 2000: Muslims, 0.2 M, 1.2%; Buddhists, 0.2 M, 1.3%; traditional religions, 0.06 M; nonreligious, 3.1 M, 16%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

IAN BREWARD

Australian Aboriginal Traditions and Christianity. Approximately 600 Aboriginal dialect groups occupied Australia at the time of colonial settlement in 1788. This entry takes the Pitjantjatjara people of northwest South Australia as an example. Their worldview is expressed in the concept of tjukurpa, or the Dreaming, according to which spirit-beings (kurunitja) that had lain dormant beneath the surface of a pre-existent substance emerged as beings that shared both human and other faunal and floral species identities as, e.g., kangaroo-men, fig-men, and bower bird-women. As they traveled across the earth's surface, they metamorphosed or left their imprint to form the features of the landscape. Humans and other species are believed to be descended from these ancestral spirit-beings, whose activities provided the pattern for life. Local groups descended from specific beings are responsible for maintaining the sites, stories, and rituals to ensure the continuation of these species.

Early Christian missions failed, as dispossession of land, introduced diseases, and conflict led to a rapid decline of Aboriginal populations in regions of initial contact. Although missionaries recognized the common humanity of Aborigines, mission policies reflected the dominant attitudes of the period. Aborigines were seen as a doomed race, and there was little recognition of the values of their societies. Starting in 1850, missions provided protection that enabled Aboriginal groups to survive in several regions.

During the 20th c., the Aboriginal population trend was reversed as government Aboriginal policies changed from protectionism and assimilation to self-management. Some missions similarly developed more liberal attitudes and respect for Aboriginal culture and languages. Thus in 1937 the Presbyterian Church established Ernabella Mission (in northwest South Australia) with a policy of minimal interference with the traditional culture and use of the Pitjantjatjara language. Scriptures and hymns were translated, and new Christians became involved in preaching and teaching. The Ernabella choir, singing hymns in Pitjantjatjara, toured Eastern Australia and Fiji.

In the late 1970s, the Charismatic Arnhem Land Revival Movement emerged from Methodist mission work in Northern Australia and influenced many Aboriginal communities (see Land). Aboriginal Catholics incorporated traditional symbols in church buildings and worship. In Central Australia in the 1980s, Walpiri-speaking Baptists began celebrating Christian stories through traditional ceremonial forms. In the late 1960s, the Aboriginal Evangelical Fellowship developed under strong indigenous leadership. Nungalinga College, established in Darwin in 1974, provides Aboriginal Christians with opportunities for theological education and examination of relationships between their traditions and Christianity. See also ANCESTOR VENERATION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN ABORIGINAL AUSTRALIA; ANTHROPOLOGY CLUSTER: AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINAL THEOLOGICAL ISSUES; HEALTH, HEALING, AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINAL SOCIETIES.

WILLIAM H. EDWARDS

Austria. Christianity, closely linked to the development of the Austrian nation and state and to popular religious traditions in Central Europe, spread very early (3rd–4th c.) to the region around the Danube River when it was under Roman control. The early medieval period saw successive waves of peoples – Slavs, Germans, and Huns – move into modern-day Austria and the surrounding territories that would coalesce into the Hapsburg monarchy (1526–1918). These peoples were only gradually Christianized. In the medieval period, monasteries and ecclesiastical centers (Salzburg and Passau) were crucial to the spread of Christianity.

The Protestant Reformation* made inroads in Austria. Political loyalties and religious affiliations shifted among prominent families and common people alike. The small Protestant communities of modern-day Austria trace their roots to these developments, although legal recognition by the state came only with the Edict of Toleration (1781) and in the 19th c.

The Roman Catholic* Renewal was strong in Austria, as Jesuits* and other religious orders established or reinvigorated centers of learning and reconverted people to Roman Catholicism. Throughout the Hapsburg monarchy, there was a close association of Roman Catholicism with the Hapsburgs, leading to the so-called Pietas Austriaca, a religious-political idea that the Hapsburgs were the defenders of Catholicism in Europe. Joseph II (1780–90) ushered in a period of controversial church reform (involving finances, ritual, and parish life) that had ongoing effects in the 19th c. Equally important were the interpenetration of religious ritual and practices with daily life (marriage, burial, child rearing, and holidays) and the role of women in maintaining day-to-day religious life. Moreover, until recent times, Austrian architecture, literature, music, and politics have been strongly conditioned by both Catholic and Protestant religious communities.

Since the mid-19th c., a reaction against the prominent place of Christianity in Austria has developed. Several constitutional and legal reforms concerning marriage, education, and other issues have been enacted to regulate the relationship between the Roman Catholic Church and the Austrian state. Gradually, new Christian denominations have been officially recognized. A troubling issue has been the relationship of Christians to Jews, who for many centuries suffered discrimination and sometimes open persecution, most dramatically during the Nazi period (the Jewish population dropping from more than 200,000 in 1938 to 4,000 in 1945) (see Anti-Semitism; Holocaust, Jewish [or Shoah]; Judaism and Christianity Cluster).

In the post-1945 period, Christianity in Austria has come into crisis. Although the cultural hold of Christianity (e.g. holidays and baptisms) has remained strong, church attendance and profession of belief have declined precipitously. Some authorities refer to an “exodus” from established churches over such issues as sexual practices and religious taxes. Only in recent years (post-2000) have there been some signs of stabilization in Christian communities. Since the 1960s, the influx of Muslims from Turkey and the former Yugoslavia has created another set of legal and cultural issues for Austria’s Christians and the state.

Statistics: Population: 8 million. Roman Catholics, 74%; Evangelicals (Augsburger/Lutheran and Helvetic/Calvinist* confessions), 4.7%; Eastern Orthodox (Russian, Greek, Serbian, Romanian, and Bulgarian), 2.2%; other Christians, 0.9%; Muslims, 4.2%; Jews, 0.1%; atheists, 12%; no response, 2%. (Source: 2001 census.)

WILLIAM D. BOWMAN

Authority in/of the Church. “Authority” means not sheer power but legitimate power. Authority exists only insofar as those who submit to it do so by acknowledging the legitimacy of those who are in a position to use institutional or other power and/or to speak authoritatively. In Christian thought, authority belongs first to God, then to Christ, then to those who are authorized by God and Christ (prophets*, apostles*) to transmit the Christian tradition, and to the writings that were gathered together as Scripture* and, for Christians, the NT as canon within the canon. How is the divine authority transmitted from Christ to his followers? What is received as authoritative? Differing answers to these questions have occasioned many church conflicts.

In the NT, Paul's claim to authority is based on the gospel he received "through a revelation of Jesus Christ," a charismatic* authority (similar to the charismatic authority of any member of the body of Christ, 1 Cor 12:4–31) that clashed with the institutional authority of the Jerusalem church, which first received the gospel during Jesus' ministry (Gal 1–2). Yet in the Pastoral* Epistles, Paul's school refers to developing authoritative institutional structures, headed by a bishop (1 Tim 3:1–2; 1 Titus 1:7).

Ignatius* of Antioch (d107–13) underscored the authority of bishops (advocating the monepiscopate*, a single bishop in each locality guaranteeing unity in the Eucharist). Irenaeus* (c125–c200) affirmed the authority of the "apostolic proclamation," publicly handed down in the books of the NT and summarized in what we call the Apostles'* Creed. In the following centuries, authority came to be attributed to ecumenical* councils.

Meanwhile, authority became related to rival power centers. The tensions between Antioch*, Alexandria*, and Rome (and the pope*) are reflected in the doctrinal divisions (about Christology*) between Chalcedonian*, Miaphysite*, and Assyrian* (so-called Nestorian*) churches.

In the West, the "Roman" Church had a centralized structure of authority: other churches were to be "in communion with Rome;" authority resided in Rome and the authoritative dogmatic and moral teaching (*magisterium) of the pope and papal curia.

By contrast, the Eastern Orthodox* churches, centered on Byzantium (Ecumenical* Patriarchate of Constantinople), had a somewhat diffuse authority, with autocephalous* churches "in communion with each other" (following the "principle of conciliarity"; the consensus of the whole body of believers). For these churches (until today), the seven ecumenical* councils have a dogmatic authority. But in Eastern Orthodoxy, authority is not merely (indeed, not primarily) dogmatic. Authority is experiential and doxological in character, grounded in mystical* experience. (One does not have the authority of a theologian without personal experience of God and the enlightenment it provides; consequently, authority can no longer be controlled by the institution or limited to the clergy.) Authority is tied to the experience of the "mysteries*," including the mystery of the church as a manifestation of the mysterious encounter of love between God and humankind

(see Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster: Introductory Entries).

As time passed, the authority of the churches became more and more entangled with that of the state (see Church and State Relations Cluster). Ultimately the Western church became an institutional authority exercising great intellectual and disciplinary authority over the whole of European society. This authority and its claim to be based on divine authority were challenged during the Renaissance* and the Reformation*, raising questions about the relative importance of biblical and institutional authority. As the Council of Trent* showed, the issue was partly a matter of the authority of Scripture* against that of tradition (see Tradition Cluster) but should also be seen as a question of who has the right to define what is the teaching of Scripture: Rome and institutional authorities (the magisterium) or local communities (led by preachers), and even individual believers?

The Enlightenment* and its emphasis on individualism and reason* further challenged institutional ecclesial authority, especially of the Roman Catholic Church, which in response re-emphasized the authority of the magisterium, indeed proclaiming it to be an infallible* teaching. The Enlightenment also challenged what remained of institutional authority in Protestant churches. The right of individuals to define what is the teaching of Scripture (the more radical Protestant view) has been amplified in three ways: (1) by embracing reason* as the main authority and exercising radical criticism of the Bible (denying both institutional doctrinal authority and the authority of religious experience); (2) by locating authority in the "inspired reading" of the Bible, i.e. in the Bible as read in relationship with an individual religious experience, especially the experience of the Holy* Spirit emphasized in the Pentecostal*/Charismatic* Movement; (3) by locating authority in a threefold hermeneutical* process that includes the interpretation of Scripture (a) through an individual reading of the text in terms of (b) religious experience(s) and (c) the intellectual and ethical demands of particular contexts – the view represented by Schleiermacher*, Catholic Modernists* (especially von* Hügel), and the hermeneutic movement (from Bultmann* to Ricoeur*). In this last case, as advocacy interpreters (Feminist*, Liberation*, and postcolonial* theologians and biblical scholars) emphasize, authority resides primarily with a judgment regarding the contextual effect of a biblical teaching on others, and consequently authority is collective (not individualist) but resides with the faith community in the world (not with an aloof institution; see Scriptural Criticism).

As various churches through the centuries assumed one or another view of authority, different types of structures of church authority developed (see Church, Concepts, and Life Cluster: Church, Types of Ecclesiastical Structures, where Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Congregational, Charismatic leadership, and Charismatic/Pentecostal types of ecclesiastical structures are distinguished).

DANIEL PATTE

Autocephalous Churches are Orthodox* churches that are “self-headed,” with their own patriarchs* and synods of bishops, an administrative independence that does not deny spiritual unity. The Council of Ephesus* (431) established the principle of autocephaly when the Church of Cyprus became independent of Antioch; in medieval and modern times, national churches were organized in the Slavic world as autocephalous. At present there are 14 autocephalous churches: 4 ancient Eastern Patriarchates (the Ecumenical* Patriarchate of Constantinople and the Patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem) and 10 other Orthodox churches that have emerged over the centuries in Russia*, Serbia*, Romania*, Bulgaria*, Georgia*, Cyprus*, Greece*, Poland*, Albania*, and the Czech* and Slovak Republics.

Auto da fé (Portuguese; auto de fé, Spanish; “act of faith”), a public ceremony of the Spanish and Portuguese Inquisition*, climaxing with a declaration of each prisoner’s sins and either reconciliation through penance* or (in the case of the unrepentant) being handed over to the “secular* arm” for burning.

Autonomy has been evaluated in the Christian tradition both positively, as freedom from bondage, and negatively, as challenging God or religious institutions.

As a political term dating back to antiquity and the Stoics*, “autonomy” referred to free city-states and free men. Paul affirmed that true autonomy is a gift from God for all, including slaves and women (Gal 3:28, 5:1).

In the late Middle Ages, the Stoic and the Pauline understandings of autonomy were combined when the autonomy of the church and papacy was affirmed over against imperial power and, in the 16th c., when autonomous Protestant folk* churches in nation-states were formed, rejecting imperial and Roman ecclesiastical power.

Autonomy from church institutions was further emphasized during the Enlightenment*, but was now formulated as the freedom of human reason* from religious dogmas or institutions, and from the heteronomy* (submission to these dogmas or institutions) they involved.

In ethics, the Enlightenment understanding of the autonomy of reason led to Kant’s* affirmation of the primacy of reason over revelation, by contrast with theological ethics informed by the Augustinian tradition of original* sin. Other theologians, including Tillich*, combined philosophical and theological ethics, e.g. by affirming that autonomy was deepened when related to theonomy.

Postmodern thinkers, especially feminist* theologians, have questioned the notion of the autonomous subject, in order to affirm the role of relationality*.

Autonomy has for the most part been positively evaluated in the Christian tradition. Yet according to the concepts with which one relates it, one variously affirms its excellence, its ambivalence, or its potential danger. (On the danger of individualism as an overemphasis on autonomy, see Racism and Christianity Cluster.)

CRISTINA GRENHOLM

Auxiliis. See CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS.

Averroes, or Ibn Rushd, 1126–98, born in Cordoba; leading Aristotelian thinker in the Islamic* world, who devoted himself to commenting on the works of Aristotle* at the request of the Almohad ruler. His writings posed serious problems for Muslim scholars such as al-Ghazali and Ibn Sina (Avicenna*), because Aristotle taught that the universe was eternal and denied the immortality of (individual) human souls*. Averroes asserted the truth of creation and the immortality of the soul, but was accused of holding that there are two truths, a religious truth and a philosophical truth. Widely cited by Thomas Aquinas* and profoundly influencing Latin Averroists such as Siger* of Brabant, Averroes was at the center of 14th-c. philosophical debates at the University of Padua. Averroes’s work continued for Christian theologians who sought to adapt Aristotelian metaphysics and science as a framework for their thought, despite tensions with the Judeo-Christian view of God. Aquinas's genius lay in his analogical* approach to truth and his synthesis that drew on Augustine*, the Stoics*, Neoplatonists*, and Aristotle's theory of knowledge to bridge the gap between the Christian idea of God as creator and the belief in the immortality of individual human souls and Aristotle's architectonic science of nature. See also BACON, ROGER.

JAMES M. POWELL

Avicenna, or Ibn Sina (c980–1037), a brilliant polymath whose learning ranged over virtually all branches of knowledge but who was especially valued for his work in medicine, the Qanun, which became a standard text for Western medicine. In philosophy, his work consisted chiefly of an effort to synthesize Aristotle* and Neoplatonism* and was closely tied to Islamic* theology, which, like contemporary Christian thought, tended to find Neoplatonism much more compatible than Aristotle. He was also influenced by Gnosticism*. Yet, attracted by Aristotle's logical and scientific writings, Avicenna made important contributions to Aristotle's work on psychology. He had some influence on Scholastics such as Bonaventure* and Henry of Ghent.

JAMES M. POWELL

Avvakum Petrovich (1610–81), archpriest. A former confessor to the czar and member of church reformist circles, he was the most visible defender of old church rituals changed by Patriarch Nikon* (1654) and leader of the Old* Believer Movement. Avvakum, revered as a saint by Old Believers, wrote Autobiography of the Archpriest Avvakum by Himself, an important work that told of his exile to Siberia. Avvakum was burned at the stake by czarist forces in 1681.

ROY R. ROBSON

Awakening. See GREAT AWAKENING; REVIVAL, REVIVALISM.

Azusa Street Revival, a 1906–15 revival meeting in Los Angeles, California, led by William Seymour*, an African American preacher at the African Methodist Episcopal Church on that street. This revival – characterized by speaking in tongues*, ecstatic experiences, and interracial mingling – is viewed as a starting point of the spread of Pentecostalism* in the 20th c.

B

Baal (Heb for “lord” or “owner”), title given to the deities of Canaan and sometimes to the God of Israel.

Babel, the Hebrew term for Babylon*. The Tower of Babel (Gen 11:1–9) was a work of human presumption; its builders were punished by the confusion of languages, making direct communication impossible. This punishment is reversed at Pentecost* (Acts 2:1–21). According to the Christian interpretation, Babylon signifies earthly society (vs. the city of God) and Babel signifies hell*, associated with confusion.

Babylonian Captivity, the period between the deportation of many citizens of Judah to Babylonia (some leaders in 597 BCE, more in 587/86) and their return to Jerusalem after Cyrus’s conquest of Babylon in 539 (Jer 25:11–12), or more exactly the reopening of the Temple in 516. For Augustine*, the city of Babylon was considered a typological* figure of the “earthly city,” and Jeremiah’s advice to the exiles (Jer 29:5–7) was the basis of a Christian social ethic. The removal of the papacy to Avignon (1309–77) was called its “Babylonian captivity” by Petrarch*. Luther* criticized the papacy as a “Babylonian captivity” from which the church must be freed.

Bach, Johann Sebastian (1685–1750), German Lutheran composer whose music was of fundamental importance in the development of Western music traditions and continues to receive worldwide appreciation. Beginning as a church organist in Arnstadt, Mühlhausen, and Weimar, broadening his musical horizons as court Capellmeister in Cöthen, he became the director of music in Leipzig, where he spent the rest of his life (1723–50). Bach composed much music, sacred and secular, instrumental and vocal, but a large proportion was written for Lutheran worship: cantatas*, oratorios*, passions*, and works for organ, in which theology and spirituality are expressed in musical form.

ROBIN A. LEAVER

Bacon, Roger (c1214/20–92), a graduate of Oxford University, where he studied with Grosseteste*; one of the first to teach Aristotle at the University of Paris (c1240–50). Beyond his writing on logic in the Oxford tradition, Bacon’s works on natural philosophy and metaphysics indicate a mature assimilation of Aristotle*, attuned to the implications of Averroes’s* positions on the intellect, determinism, and knowledge. After 1247, Bacon developed interests in language study (wisdom languages: Hebrew, Greek, Chaldean) and the mathematical sciences. At Pope Clement V’s request, he produced The Major Work, The Minor Work, and The Third Work and related works (1266). The Major Work presents a new educational model for the medieval university, advocating the study of the wisdom languages, the study of linguistics (semantics and semiotics*), the application of mathematics to the sciences, and the uses of the sciences in biblical and theological studies. Bacon introduced the study of perspectiva (optics) and used it to draw moral and religious metaphors. The last section of The Major Work on moral philosophy includes religious apologetics, virtue theory, and the role of rhetoric and poetics in religion. Some of Bacon’s views, probably on astrology, were condemned by the Franciscan* order (1278). Back in Oxford (c1280), he wrote Compendium studii theologiae (c1292).

JEREMIAH M. HACKETT

BAHA’I FAITH AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

Baha’i Faith and Christianity:

Baha’i Perspectives

Baha’i Faith and Christianity:

Christian Perspectives

Baha’i Faith and Christianity: Baha’i Perspectives.

The approximately 5 million adherents (in 2000) of the Baha’i Faith affirm, together with their primary texts, a number of core Christian beliefs, including the divinity and sonship of Jesus Christ, the divine inspiration of the Bible, and the significance of the Crucifixion and subsequent impact on human progress. Baha’is hold to a nonliteral interpretation of the resurrection* and future apocalyptic events predicted in the Gospels and Revelation. Although the bodily incarnation* of God's essence in Jesus Christ is not part of Baha'i teaching, Jesus is viewed as the incarnation of God's virtues and attributes and as a sinless being whose soul was pre-existent. Baha'i theology describes Jesus as the "manifestation of God" (cf. "image," Col 1:15; Heb 1:3). Although they do not affirm the inerrancy* of the Bible, Baha'is reject the view of mainstream Islam* that the NT has been corrupted.

Baha'i literature on Christianity is predominantly apologetic, arguing that the founder of the Baha'i Faith, Mirza Husayn Ali Baha'u'llah, fulfilled NT prophecies on the "Second* Coming." Recent scholarly analyses of Baha'i texts on the Bible and comparative theological studies have argued that, rather than denying the uniqueness* of Jesus Christ, Baha'i texts question the exclusivity of Christianity. Christian literature on the Baha'i religion has been mostly polemical – much of it written by former Protestant missionaries in Iran* who seemingly resented the relative success of Baha'is in converting Muslims, and more recently by individuals with no knowledge of the primary languages of Baha'i texts who tried to dismiss the religion as a cult or sect. In academic works related to interreligious dialogue, Christian theologians have placed the Baha'i Faith within a theology of religious pluralism.

Baha'is and Christians share a belief in the importance of an ethical system based on personal responsibility, justice*, honesty, and compassion; of social justice*, respect for nature, interfaith dialogue, and gender and racial equality. SEENA FAZEL

Baha'i Faith and Christianity: Christian Perspectives. Many Christians remain ignorant of the Baha'i Faith, introduced to the Western world at the World Parliament of Religions (Chicago, 1893) by a Christian missionary working in Syria. He enthusiastically quoted the prediction of Baha'u'llah (Baha'Allah; 1817–92), the founder of the Baha'i religion (in Iran*), "that all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers and that diversity of religion should cease."

Some liberal Christians greeted his son and successor, Abdu'l-Baha (1844–1921), with similar enthusiasm in London (1911). The minister of the City Temple (the historic Nonconformist Congregation where Abdu'l-Baha preached) declared, "The Baha'i movement is almost identical with the spiritual purpose of Christianity." At St. John's Church, Westminster, the archdeacon knelt with his congregation to receive Abdu'l-Baha's blessing. Pioneers of the interfaith movement welcomed the Baha'i emphasis on the unity of religions, but other Christians suspected the Baha'i Faith of "syncretism*."

Many Christians, especially Evangelicals*, have criticized Baha'is for denying the uniqueness* of Jesus and questioned Baha'u'llah's symbolic interpretation of the Bible in his Tablet to the Christians (Lawh-I-Aqdas). Baha'u'llah taught that God, though unknowable, is revealed through manifestations, including Jesus, along with Moses, Muhammad, and others. The essential message of these manifestations is the same, although each messenger has a distinct individuality and mission. Revelation is progressive. Baha'u'llah claimed to be the promised one of all religions and compared his own suffering in prison to Jesus' atoning* death. These claims are incompatible with traditional Christian belief.

Baha'u'llah's teachings anticipated many 20th-c. creative developments: the peace* movement, interfaith fellowship, equal rights for women, the International Court of Justice, and the United Nations. Christian advocates of these causes have often been happy to work with Baha'is.

MARCUS BRAYBROOKE

Baius, Michel (1513–89), Flemish theologian, teacher at the University of Louvain, participant in the Council of Trent*. Adopting an idiosyncratic interpretation of Augustine*, he held that original righteousness was natural and that redemption is a restoration of this natural state. Condemnation of his views (1567, 1579) gave impetus to post-Tridentine controversies over nature* and grace* in the Catholic Church.

Baker, Ella Josephine (1903–86). Born in Norfolk, Virginia, nurtured by a strong extended family and Baptist Church tradition, and educated at Shaw University (Raleigh, North Carolina), Baker was exposed to the social and artistic ferment of the Harlem Renaissance (1920s), which led her into the civil* rights field. From 1940 to 1986, Baker served on the staffs of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and Martin Luther King*, Jr.'s, Southern* Christian Leadership Conference, and was a founder of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Her call for a group-centered leadership model conflicted with the male-dominated charismatic model represented by figures like King and Malcolm X.

LEWIS V. BALDWIN

Balaam, diviner asked to curse the people of Israel but led to bless them (Num 22–24). Because he misled them into idolatry (Num 31:16), he is associated with temptation (Jude 11; Rev 2:14).

Balkans. See HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: THE BALKANS.

Balthasar, Hans Urs von. See VON BALTHASAR, HANS URS.

Baltimore, Councils of. As the administrative center of the fledgling US Roman Catholic Church, Baltimore hosted two series of important gatherings of church officials. Seven provincial councils (starting in 1829) were followed by three plenary councils (1852, 1866, and 1884) that drew leaders from recently created dioceses throughout the USA. With each meeting, the number of attending bishops and archbishops grew, reflecting the rapid growth of the Catholic community in the USA caused by immigration from Europe. Carefully worded decrees on such topics as liturgy, seminaries, parochial schools, and church property fostered a much needed sense of unity among American Catholics. The current United States Conference of Catholic Bishops traces its lineage to these Baltimore councils.

THOMAS MASSARO, SJ

Bancroft, Richard (bap.1544–1610), Anglican priest, canon of Westminster Cathedral, bishop* of London (1597), archbishop of Canterbury* (1606). Dogged polemicist and able administrator, Bancroft countered the dual threats posed by Roman Catholics and Nonconformists*. Against the latter (pace Hooker*), he defended the church's hierarchical episcopacy as jure divino, apostolic*, a mark of true Christianity; bishops were both distinct from priests* or presbyters* and independent of secular control.

Yet Bancroft linked religious conformity with loyalty to the English crown. In the Articles of Visitation* and the Canons* of 1604, Bancroft emphasized ceremony, the autonomy of the church, and proper preaching and catechizing*.

BRETT GREGORY ARMSTRONG

Báñez, Domingo (1528–1604), Dominican theologian and professor at several Spanish universities, finally Salamanca. Confessor and spiritual adviser to Teresa* of Ávila, he led the attack on the Jesuit approach to grace* (see Congregatio de auxiliis; Middle Knowledge; Molina, Luis de).

Baptism of Christ, Jesus' baptism in the river Jordan by John* the Baptist, when he received the Holy Spirit (Mark 1:9–11, par.), associated with the festival of Epiphany*.

BAPTISM CLUSTER

Baptism as Defined by the Orthodox Church

Baptism as Defined by Protestant Churches

Baptism as Defined by the Roman Catholic Church

Baptism in the Holy Spirit

Baptism as Defined by the Orthodox Church is the first and essential sacrament*. It manifests the most radical change in the human condition by accomplishing sacramentally both a death and a new birth (Rom 6:3–11; John 3:3–8). Baptism incorporates persons into Christ and his church that they may share in his deified* humanity and, as a new* creation (2 Cor 5:17), come under Christ's rule to grow into the fullness of his nature within the church by sharing its life, faith, values, and vision. The rite of baptism consists of three parts:

1. "Catechesis," culminating in the profession of faith through the recitation of the Nicene* Creed.
2. Consecration of the font; anointing of the catechumen*, adult or infant, with the "oil of gladness"; and baptism through three immersions in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Matt 28:19). The newly baptized is then clothed in a white garment and anointed with the oils of chrismation*.

3. Elements of the Eucharist*, administration of Holy Communion, and tonsure.

Infants are baptized not because they are born sinful or bear guilt, but so that they may be given the gifts of sanctification*, righteousness*, and filial adoption. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRIES.

ALKIVIADIS CALIVAS

Baptism as Defined by Protestant Churches. Lutheran, Reformed, Anabaptist, and Baptist traditions of Protestantism have diverse interpretations of both the theology and practice of baptism. Each, however, invokes the trinitarian formula and perceives baptism in some way as an initiation into the church. Lutherans believe baptism* is sacramental*, they practice infant baptism by sprinkling, and only clergy administer baptism. Reformed Christians have a quasi-sacramental view of baptism, they practice infant baptism by sprinkling, and clergy are the sole administrators. Anabaptists advocate a symbolic view of baptism and, because of their emphasis on a believers' church, oppose infant baptism, and pastors generally perform immersion*. Baptists also affirm a believers' church, reject infant baptism, and practice immersion, and pastors are usually the administrators of baptism.

These differing views of Protestant baptism affect four theological areas. (1) Salvation*: Does one become a Christian through sacramental baptism or personal faith*? (2) The nature of the church*: Is the church composed of infants or believers only? (3) The mode of baptism: What practice symbolizes the truth of baptism – sprinkling, pouring, or immersion? (4) The nature of the ministry and the administrator of baptism: Can baptism be performed by laity or is that the right of clergy only?

WALTER B. SHURDEN

Baptism as Defined by the Roman Catholic Church is a sacrament* of initiation into the Christian community wherein, through grace*, one "puts on Christ." In modern times, the Catholic Church administers initiation for infants through baptism only (not chrismation*; cf. Baptism* for the Orthodox Church); First Communion is postponed until the "age of reason" (about 8), and confirmation until the age of 12. Vatican* II (1962–65) clarified the various parts of the ritual and enhanced the role of parents and godparents. Today infant baptisms often take place during a Sunday Eucharist*, involving the community more intimately. Although infant baptism was often associated by Catholics with the "removal of original* sin," thereby affording the possibility of entry into heaven* rather than an eternity in the "limbo* of unbaptized infants," these associations have largely faded through a more comprehensive, biblically driven understanding of baptism.

To avoid turning baptism into a social rite of passage without much religious connotation, parishes commonly require from expectant couples a period of instruction on the nature of baptism and parents' responsibilities to provide religious formation for their baptized children. While recognizing the importance of faith* for the reception of any sacrament, the church sees the parents, family, and ecclesial community as nurturing the child's faith until the time when the child will personally ratify the sacrament administered as a gesture of God's unconditional love.

The adult catechumenate*, the "Rite of Christian Initiation for Adults," was restored in the 1960s. Several months of gradual assimilation into the community culminate in baptism (frequently at the Easter vigil service, sometimes by immersion) or, if the person has already been baptized in a non-Catholic church, with a public affirmation of Catholic belief, and finally the anointing of confirmation* and reception of the Eucharist.

MICHAEL A. FAHEY, SJ

Baptism in the Holy Spirit, also called "Spirit baptism," is a term that refers to Jesus as mediator of the Spirit (Spirit baptizer), distinct from John the Baptist (baptizer in water for repentance; Matt 3:12; Acts 1:5). No established doctrine of Spirit baptism existed historically, though early evidence suggests a widespread link to water baptism and to the spiritual gifts received by Christians. Most Pentecostals* promoted the Free Church separation of Spirit baptism from water baptism to support access to the Spirit (and Jesus) apart from church rites, bringing Spirit baptism to prominence as a distinct theological concept.

Spirit baptism is associated with (1) Christian initiation by the Spirit, principally through water baptism (1 Cor 12:13) (Roman Catholic, Anglican, Orthodox*); (2) Christian conversion through the Spirit received by faith (e.g. Reformed Evangelical*); (3) a postconversion experience of “entire sanctification” (purity of heart, Acts 15:7–8) (Holiness* Movement); (4) a postconversion empowerment for Christian witness (Acts 1:8) involving extraordinary spiritual gifts (charismata), such as speaking in tongues (Acts 2:4) and divine healing (most Pentecostals*); and (5) Christian initiation or conversion by the Spirit, who is subsequently “released” in life experientially or charismatically (many Charismatics*).

Spirit baptism is perhaps an eschatological gift integrating various aspects of the Spirit’s work.

FRANK D. MACCHIA

BAPTIST CHURCHES CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Baptist Churches and Their Theology
Baptist Worship

2) A Sampling of Contextual Practices

Baptist Churches in North America
Baptist Missionary Society

1) Introductory Entries

Baptist Churches and Their Theology.

Historically, Baptists started out at both ends of the Protestant theological spectrum. The world’s first Baptist congregation was formed in Amsterdam in 1608/9 by a group of English Separatist Puritans whose theology was Arminian*. They affirmed the role of free will* in salvation, the general atonement* of Christ (his death for all persons), and the possibility that Christians could fall from grace* along the way. Returning to England in 1612, this group became known as General Baptists. (Their heirs are often called Free* Will Baptists.) During the 1630s, another community of Baptists formed in London with a commitment to Calvinist theology centered on total depravity, election*, predestination*, and Christ’s atoning death for the elect alone. Their view of limited atonement led to the name Particular* Baptists. Thus from their earliest days, different groups of Baptists held contradictory theological positions. This diversity continued in the USA and is evident in the Calvinism of the Primitive Baptists and the Arminianism of the Free* Will Baptists. Other Baptist subdenominations nuance these two theological traditions in a variety of ways that incorporate aspects of Evangelicalism*, liberalism*, fundamentalism*, and other theological positions.

What unites Baptists theologically is their belief that the church of Jesus Christ is composed of those who can attest to an experience of divine grace, followed by believers’ baptism by immersion. Personal “regeneration” experienced through conversion* and new life in Christ is required of those who seek membership in a Baptist church. The concept of a believers’ church* is central to Baptist theology. In general, Baptists are trinitarians who can affirm the classic dogmas of the Apostles’* Creed, although some remain suspicious of such extrabiblical documents. Many have utilized confessions of faith to summarize essential doctrines and theological ideals. Such confessions date from the 16th c. and reflect various degrees of Calvinism and Arminianism in their orientation. The confessions delineate the views of specific Baptist groups regarding God, Scripture, salvation, the nature of the church, baptism, the Lord’s Supper, church discipline, and the relationship to the state. Amid differences, these confessions reflect certain distinctive beliefs affirmed by most Baptist communions.

Biblical Authority and Liberty of Conscience. Baptists affirm the authority of Scripture* as the normative guide for theology, doctrine, and practice for the church and the individual. Baptists believe that their basic beliefs are taken from the Bible, and preaching from biblical texts is central to Baptist worship services. Baptists do not always agree on theories of biblical inspiration*, however; some affirm a belief in biblical inerrancy* and others hesitate to do so. They also assert that individual believers may be trusted to interpret Scripture aright, in the context of the believing community (the church) and under the guidance of the Holy* Spirit. Individual interpretation of Scripture within the context of a believers' church is a significant aspect of Baptist belief.

Sacraments, or Ordinances: Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Baptists practice two sacraments*, or ordinances*: baptism* by immersion and the Lord's* Supper. Baptism follows a profession* of faith and is administered to adults or to children who testify to an experience of God's grace*. The Lord's Supper is celebrated in churches, usually monthly or quarterly. Certain Baptist churches and groups practice "closed Communion," whereby only members of the specific congregation are allowed to partake of the sacred meal. Some Baptist groups affirm the "spiritual presence" of Christ in the bread and the wine, while others insist that the Supper is a "memorial" in which the faith of believers is nurtured by recalling Christ's death and resurrection. Some use bread and wine, while others (perhaps a majority in the USA) use bread and unfermented grape juice. A few Baptist groups also practice foot*-washing as another ordinance (John 13), a sign of servanthood among believers.

Church Order: Local Autonomy and Associational Cooperation. Baptists believe that the authority* of Christ is mediated through the community of believers; therefore, they generally adhere to a congregational* form of church government wherein decision making is based on communal dialogue and the will of the majority. Each congregation is autonomous, i.e. free to make its own decisions, develop its own ministries, and affiliate with other groups as it chooses.

Yet from the early days of the movement, Baptist churches entered into "associational" relationships with other Baptist churches for fellowship, mutual encouragement, and cooperative ministries. In some cases, these regional associations led to national denominations. Churchly autonomy has led to significant divisions in Baptist life as congregations have split over differences in doctrine and practice.

Baptist Ministry: Priesthood of the Laity and the Ordaining of Clergy. Baptists readily affirm the Reformation doctrine of the priesthood* of all believers. They insist that all Christian believers are free to relate directly to God without the benefit of ecclesiastical mediators. They also suggest that all believers are ministers, called to serve God in the church and the world. Some Baptists in the UK and USA actually practiced the laying on of hands in two ways. They laid hands on all the newly baptized as a sign of their priestly calling, and laid hands a second time on those who were set aside for the "ministry of the Word," carrying out ministerial functions in the church. This kind of egalitarianism energized the laity* but also set the scene for controversies between the clergy and laity in the church.

Citizenship: Religious Liberty and Loyalty to the State. One of the most significant Baptist contributions to the modern world is the idea of radical religious liberty for all persons, believers and unbelievers alike. Baptists were the first religious group in both the UK and USA to suggest that God alone is the judge of conscience and that neither the state nor an official religious establishment can judge whether the conscience of someone is that of a heretic* or an atheist*. Each person is answerable only to God for the religious choices he or she might make. This assertion is based on Baptists' commitment to uncensored faith* as the hallmark of the believing community. At the same time, they have also insisted on loyalty to the "earthly power" of the state as long as its actions do not violate conscience (see Church and State Relations Cluster). Baptists themselves have often disagreed on the nature of dissent in response to political and ethical issues such as civil* rights, war*, voting practices, prayer in schools, paying taxes, abortion*, and state support for religious institutions.

Theological Diversity. These shared beliefs exist in a context of significant diversity, even division, among the 40 million Baptists worldwide, some 30 million of whom live in the USA. Baptists include Arminians and Calvinists, liberals and conservatives, and a wide variety of churchly practices from congregation to congregation. Serious divisions exist over the role of women* in the church, homosexuality*, theories of biblical inspiration*, ministerial authority, the Charismatic* Movement, denominational relationships, the nature of theological* education, and other issues. Theological contrasts are evident in Baptist leaders like liberal James Forbes, former pastor of Riverside Church, New York, and conservative Jerry Falwell, former pastor of Thomas Road Church, Lynchburg, Virginia. Baptist history reflects a theological diversity that often lends itself to continuous debate and division.

BILL J. LEONARD

Baptist Worship evolved with the US Republic. Early-17th- and 18th-c. Regular (Calvinistic) Baptists utilized a Puritan* form of worship that involved praying, singing the Psalms*, Scripture reading, and lengthy sermons, all conducted in “decency and order.” By the mid-1700s the revivalistic* enthusiasm of Separate Baptists led to more “enthusiastic” worship, evident in exuberant preaching, singing of “man-made” hymns, and emotional outbursts from the congregation. By the 19th c., frontier Baptists were drawn to the camp* meeting experience in which “spiritual exercises” – shouting, jerking, crying, and falling – struck the worshipping masses. Camp* meeting songs replaced the Psalms as normative worship music. Preaching*, the mainstay of the service, was presented in a more popular emotional style than the carefully reasoned homilies of the Regular Baptist ministers. A concern for immediate conversion* led to the development of the “mourners’ bench” (or “anxious* bench”), a seat near the front of the church where those who fell “under conviction” might duly repent, assisted by the prayers of the faithful. The mourners’ bench led to the “altar call,” or “invitation to discipleship*,” at the end of the service, when persons “received Christ as savior” or requested church membership. This practice continues in many Baptist churches in the USA.

Worship in African American Baptist churches developed its own forms drawn from revivalism, the slave* experience, spirituality*, and the struggle for civil* rights. It included specific types of hymnody, testimonies from the laity, prayer at the altar, and the dramatic preaching characterized by continuing discourse between the minister and the “answering congregation.” Amid racial and regional differences, traditional worship in many Baptist communions consisted of a relatively simple liturgy, including an invocation, hymns, prayers, offering, solos or choral music, Scripture readings, a sermon, an “invitation,” and a benediction.

By the early 21st c., many Baptist worship practices changed dramatically. Some churches gave greater attention to liturgical* renewal, evident in the use of litanies, classical music, clerical vestments, banners, and preaching from the biblical lectionary. Others moved toward more “contemporary” practices characteristic of the so-called megachurch* movement with its concern for “seeker-sensitive” worship aimed at attracting people outside traditional religious communities. This “contemporary” worship included catchy “praise* choruses” (not hymns), the use of drama, drums, and guitars, folksy sermons, and few traditional Christian symbols. These changes have rejuvenated many Baptist congregations while creating “worship wars” in other churches where members differ over contemporary versus traditional styles.

BILL J. LEONARD

2) A Sampling of Contextual Practices

Baptist Churches in North America.

Approximately 30 million Baptists in North America belong to at least 70 distinct groups. These include a theological spectrum from the Calvinism* of the Primitive Baptists to the Arminianism* of the Free* Will Baptists. The earliest Baptists in North America were either English Particular* (Calvinist) or General (Arminian) Baptists, who helped to form the first churches in North America in Providence and Newport, Rhode Island (1630s–1640s). Seventh Day Baptists arrived soon after. By the 1700s, Calvinists divided into Regular (anti-revival) and Separate (pro-revival) Baptists. These groups made inroads into the maritime region of Canada. Baptists in the USA united in 1814 to found the General Missionary Convention of the Baptist Denomination in America. It remained intact until 1845 when Baptists north and south divided over the slavery issue and the role of the national convention.

The very conservative Southern* Baptist Convention is the largest Protestant denomination in North America, while the American Baptist Churches in the USA is one of the smaller and most racially inclusive groups. African American Baptist groups include Primitive Baptists as well as the National Baptist Convention, Incorporated; the National Baptist Convention, Unincorporated; and the Progressive National Baptist Convention. Traditionally ethnic Baptist groups include German, Norwegian, Swedish, Latino, Korean, and Japanese Baptists in the USA and Canada. The Baptist Federation of Canada unites many Baptist provincial groups. The Fundamentalist*–Modernist controversy of the early 20th c. spawned numerous Baptist bodies, including the Regular Association of Regular Baptists, the Conservative Baptist Convention, the Baptist* Missionary Association, and various Independent Baptist churches. Appalachian Baptists include Primitive Baptists, United Baptists, Old Regular Baptists, and Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit Predestinarian Baptists. Later in the 20th c., divisions in the Southern Baptist Convention led moderates and liberals to found the Alliance of Baptists and the Cooperative Baptist Fellowship. BILL J. LEONARD

Baptist Missionary Society was founded in Kettering, England (1792), by a group of Particular (Calvinistic) Baptists, including Andrew Fuller and William Carey. Carey went to Bengal (1793) and established the Serampore mission. The Society entered Jamaica (1814), where William Knibb was instrumental in securing the abolition of slavery* (1833–34). In China the mission began in 1859, with the society's most controversial missionary, the Welshman Timothy Richard. The Congo mission (1879) played an important role in the history of Leopold II's Congo Independent State. While this missionary activity had varied results, now Baptists are numerous in Mizoram (northeast India*), Jamaica*, Democratic Republic of Congo*, and Angola*.

BRIAN STANLEY

Baptistery, Baptistry, a building, usually octagonal, distinct from the church but often attached to it, in which baptism is administered.

Barabbas, insurrectionist or thief whom Pilate released from prison in place of Jesus (Mark 15:6–15 par.; John 18:40).

Barbarians, those who did not speak Greek or Latin, appearing to be “babblers” (1 Cor 14:11). A term for non-Greeks in Rom 1:14 and Col 3:11; later a designation for people outside the Roman Empire.

Bardaisan of Edessa (154–222), first theologian outside the Roman Empire, who flourished at the court of Edessa* at a time of increasing Roman influence; opposed Marcionism* and astral determinism. Bardaisan came to be regarded as a heretic*. Thus his works did not survive. His thought must be reconstructed from the Book of the Laws of Countries, by a student, and from Ephrem*'s refutations. Bardaisan's rejection of astrology, his hymns, and his cosmology influenced later Syriac* theology and also Manichaeism*. He drew on Middle Platonism, Scripture (esp. Genesis*), and late antique science. His community later became dualist* and survived into the 10th c. UTE POSSEKEL

Bar Hebraeus (Ibn al-'Ibri) (1225/26–86), metropolitan, theologian, ecumenist, philosopher, chronicler, grammarian/lexicographer, physician. He was born in Melitene (west of the Euphrates) into a Christian (not Jewish) family and was ordained bishop (1246), then metropolitan of Aleppo (Syria, 1252). Versed in Syriac, Arabic, Persian, and Armenian, he was the greatest thinker of the Syriac* Orthodox Church during the golden age of Syriac literature. He wrote an extensive collection of scholia (exegetical commentaries) on the OT and NT; a doctrinal commentary on the Scriptures; and two major works of systematic theology, the Candelabrum sanctuarii (some call it the Syriac equivalent of Aquinas's* Summa Theologiae) and the Ethicon, an extensive guide to moral theology and mysticism*, intended for both monks and laity, concerning how to live a holy Christian life. His name is associated with a revised version of the most prestigious eucharistic* rite used in the Syriac Orthodox Church, as well as with rites of baptism* and of the blessing of water. He composed a revised, shortened version of the Anaphora* of St. James.

RIFAAT EBIED

Bar Kokhba (Aramaic, "son of a star"; see Num 24:17), designation of Simeon bar Kosiba, leader of the Jewish rebellion against Rome in 132–35 CE; his followers claimed he was the Messiah*.

Barlaam and Josaphat, venerated as Christian saints, although their vita is a Christianized version of the life of Buddha that enjoyed wide popularity throughout the medieval and early modern periods. The legend details the conversion of Prince Josaphat by the hermit Barlaam; the catechism of the prince is interspersed with frequent "examples" that foster religious belief and the ethical wisdom of a ruler. The original might have been Georgian (most likely), or Greek, or (least likely) by John* of Damascus. Their day of veneration was November 27 (early Roman martyrology) or August 26 (Greek Orthodox Church). Barlaam and Josaphat were never officially canonized.

SALVATORE CALOMINO

Barmen Declaration, written on May 16, 1934, was the authoritative statement of protest from the Confessing* Church against Nazism and, in particular, against the German* Christian Movement. Authored principally by Karl Barth*, with additional input from the Lutherans Hans Asmussen and Thomas Breit, the Declaration established the battle lines between the Confessing Church, the German Christians, and the Reich Church administration led by Reich Bishop Ludwig Müller. In particular, the Declaration rejected the legitimacy of natural* theology, instead insisting on the sole sufficiency of Jesus Christ as the one Word of God on which the church's proclamation must be based, and averring also the freedom of the church from both the state and any political ideology*.

The Declaration was adopted without alteration by the first Confessing Synod of the German Evangelical Church (Barmen, May 29–31, 1934). That the statement was called a "declaration" and not a confession was a compromise in deference to the Synod's Lutheran delegates. Nonetheless, it contained all the elements of older confessional statements, including anathemas.

Despite being a deliberate protest against the forced imposition of the anti-Semitic* Aryan Paragraph onto the church, the declaration was intended primarily to be a theological and not a political protest. However, with its repudiation of the German Christians' National Socialist ideology*, of the Reich Church government, and, therefore, of the Nazi regime's objective of bringing all aspects of German life and culture under its own auspices, the Confessing Church was inevitably also issuing a defiant political statement. In the years following Barmen, the Confessing Church became deeply divided as to the extent to which the political implications of the Barmen Declaration should be pursued. In particular, its response to the Nazis' persecution of the Jews was, and remains, hotly debated. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRY AND IN EUROPE: THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH AND POLITICS; GERMANY; JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: WESTERN EUROPE; RACISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN WESTERN EUROPE.

MARK R. LINDSAY

Barnabas, early Jewish follower of Jesus (Acts 4:36–37), apostle to the Gentiles with Paul (Acts 9:27; 13–15; Gal 2:1, 9) until they parted ways (Acts 15:36–41), possibly because Barnabas sided with Peter in Antioch in the controversy over whether Jewish Christians could eat (non-kosher food) with Gentile Christians (Gal 2:11–13). Yet 1 Cor 9:6 positively mentions Barnabas as an apostle who, like Paul, earns his own living.

Barnabas, Epistle of, early-2nd-c. letter emphasizing the "errors" of the Jews: worship of the golden calf, erroneous cultic observances (sacrifices, fasting, circumcision, diet, Sabbath), rejection of Jesus, and misplaced trust in the Jerusalem Temple.

The notion of covenant* is central to the text. Influenced by the rhetoric of Deuteronomy*, the author stresses obedience to the Law* but excoriates Israel for misunderstanding its “true” meaning. The epistle makes extensive use of typology* and allegory*. Cultic laws are reduced to ethical ideals; other OT passages are seen as prophetic or typological references to Jesus. Ethical requirements are reinforced by means of a “Two Ways” tradition (see Didache). The author does not distinguish between “old” and “new” covenants but simply speaks of “the covenant,” forfeited by Israel and inherited by Christians (see Supersessionism).

The epistle enabled Gentile Christians to lay claim to the privileges of Israel and to adopt an ethically rigorous view of the Christian life without authorizing the adoption of Jewish cultic practices. Although Israel is rejected, the author differs from Marcion* by showing reverence for the OT.

The text was probably written shortly after the Bar* Kokhba revolt. It flourished briefly among the Alexandrian fathers (Clement* of Alexandria, Origen*, Didymus* the Blind) and was falsely attributed to Barnabas*.

JAMES N. RHODES

Baroque Architecture, the complex, irregular style of late Renaissance architecture, art, and music (1600s–1750s). See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Barot, Madeleine (1909–95), Protestant historian and archivist. As general secretary of the Cimade* (1940), she created a team to help refugees from foreign countries and Jews in internment camps during the period of the Vichy government of France (1940–44). She contributed to the creation of networks whose aim was to save Jewish children from concentration camps. In 1950 she was secretary of the YWCA*, then at the World* Council of Churches (1953–73) she was successively head of the departments of Cooperation Between Men and Women in Church and Society and of Education and Development. Throughout her involvement in Christian action, she was concerned mainly with ecumenism (see Ecumenical Movement and Its Theology), dialogue* between religions, the defense of human* rights, solidarity with victims of oppression, and the abolition of torture.

JACQUES STEWART

Bar Salibi, Dionysius (Jacob). See DIONYSIUS (JACOB) BAR SALIBI.

Bar Sauma (d1294), “Nestorian*” monk in China. Probably of Turkic (Uighur) ethnicity, he learned Chinese. Intending to visit the tombs of Christian martyrs and saints, especially in Jerusalem, Bar Sauma traveled (c1280) with a companion, Mark (later Patriarch Yabballaha III), from Zhongdu (Beijing) through Khorasan and Azerbaijan to Baghdad, where they met the patriarch Denha. Eventually he was sent by the Buddhist Mongolian Il-Khan Arghun as his emissary to the West. Bar Sauma recorded his travels and encounters with popes, cardinals, kings, and the Byzantine emperor. He died in Baghdad in 1294. KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Bar Sauma of Nisibis (5th c.), a teacher at the school of Edessa*, trained in the theology and exegesis of Theodore* of Mopsuestia. After the condemnation of Nestorius’s* views (431), Bar Sauma relocated to the Sassanian Persian Empire. He became bishop of Nisibis* and was founder and patron of its school. Elected patriarch of the Church* of the East, he presided at the Council of Beth Lapat (484), which affirmed Nestorius’s teaching. KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Barth, Karl (1886–1968), pastor, theologian, opponent of National Socialism in Germany*. Following what he viewed as its decline owing to the influence of individualistic liberalism during the 19th c. (see Liberalism in Christian Theology and Ethics), he revitalized Protestant theology by producing the most comprehensive dogmatics since the Reformation. Born in Basel, Switzerland, he was educated in Bern, Berlin, and Marburg. He was professor of theology at Göttingen (1921–25), Münster (1925–30), Bonn (1930–35), and Basel (1935–62).

Born to a professor of church history, Karl was drawn early to a career in the church. His most formative influences were Harnack* and Wilhelm Herrmann, from whom he learned to critically appreciate Schleiermacher* and Kant*. He was also much influenced by the socialism of Hermann Kutter and Leonhard Ragaz and by the Pietism* of Christoph Blumhardt*.

After completing his studies, Barth was called to a pastorate in the Swiss town of Safenwil, where he formed a lifelong friendship with Eduard Thurneysen, pastor of the neighboring village of Leutwil. Initially, Barth was deeply committed to the liberalism of his teachers. However, their endorsement of Germany’s war aims during World War I forced him to reconsider not only their ethics but their entire theological framework. While in Safenwil, Barth wrote his groundbreaking commentary, Romans (1919; rev. ed., 1922), in which he explicitly dismantled the theological presuppositions of 19th-c. neo-Protestantism. His indebtedness to the philosopher Kierkegaard* was evident during this period, particularly in his employment of Kierkegaard's "infinite qualitative distinction," by which Barth sought to emphasize the Godness of God over against human religiosity. These commentaries epitomized the postwar theological crisis in Western Europe and brought Barth instant international fame. On the strength of Romans, he was appointed to his first academic post (Göttingen).

During the 1930s, Barth was a vocal opponent of the Nazi regime and, along with Bonhoeffer* and Martin Niemöller, was instrumental in founding the Confessing* Church. In 1935 Barth was dismissed from his university position in Bonn for refusing to give the Nazi salute and was expelled to Switzerland. Once in Basel, he continued to lead the fight against Nazism. He chastised the Confessing Church for not protesting more forcefully on behalf of persecuted Jews (see Judaism and Christianity Cluster: In Western Europe), was involved in underground resistance networks, and in 1944 mobilized foreign governments in an attempt to stop the Nazis' deportation of Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz (see Holocaust, Jewish [or Shoah]). Throughout it all, Barth continued to lecture and write his monumental Church Dogmatics.

In the postwar years, Barth championed the cause of reconciliation with the Germans, sought to ease cold war tensions by urging the West to moderate its anti-Soviet rhetoric, and was active in ecumenical circles. He was involved in the formation of the World* Council of Churches and corresponded with Rome during Vatican* II.

While reading widely across confessional boundaries, Barth was and remained a Reformed theologian. He was committed to Calvin's* legacy, although never uncritically so. Nowhere is this more evident than in Barth's restatement of the Calvinist doctrine of election*. Like his Reformed predecessors, Barth endorsed the doctrine of "double election" but argued emphatically that both election and reprobation were located primarily in Jesus Christ, and not in two separate "camps" or categories of people (see especially Church Dogmatics II/2). Barth similarly took issue with the Lutheran distinction between gospel* and law*; like Luther* and Augustine* before him, Barth insisted on the inseparability of the two. He contended, however, that the gospel, not the law, was both theologically and ontologically prior. Barth's legacy cannot be distilled to one main doctrinal contribution, or even to a theological system. Indeed, the sheer volume of his theological writing – 13 volumes (the last unfinished) of Church Dogmatics – is not simply due to his insistence that all doctrines are interrelated, but is more a product of his demand that theology make progress by constant self-correction, and thus always "begin anew at the beginning."

Nonetheless, there are certain emphases in his theology that can be regarded as characteristic of the whole. For example, throughout most of his life, Barth repudiated natural* theology, a stance that shattered his friendship with Emil Brunner. Instead, Barth was convinced that the revelation* of God can be understood only in the context of the Trinity*. This in turn involved for him a second emphasis, the so-called christological concentration. Barth was roundly criticized for this uncompromising position. However, it was precisely this commitment to Jesus as the one Word of God that enabled Barth to issue such a strong denunciation of the German* Christians' theology in the 1934 Barmen* Declaration. Moreover, in Barth's own mind, an emphasis on the divine "yes" to humanity – the unconditioned grace* of God – was the most vital aspect of a truly Christian theology. The gospel is the good news that grace saves us from any preoccupation about our own salvation*. Barth's great contribution was to restore theology to the church and restore to theology a proper concentration on the Word of God, specifically, the person of Jesus Christ as the true revelation of God to whom the Scriptures bear witness. See also DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY.

MARK R. LINDSAY

Bartholomew, one of the 12 disciples*/apostles*, sometimes identified with Nathanael (John 1:45–46).

Bartholomew's Day, Massacre of St., Catholic slaughter of thousands of Protestants in Paris beginning in the early hours of August 24, 1572, continuing for several days, and spreading to other French cities in the following weeks. It was a tragic reminder of the religious hatreds that attended the Reformation*. See also MARTYRDOM.

RAYMOND A. MENTZER

Bartimaeus, a blind man healed by Jesus at Jericho (Mark 10:46).

Baruch, Book of (also called 1 Baruch), an apocryphal* book, with five chapters in the Septuagint* (the Vulgate* also includes the Epistle of Jeremiah); attributed to Baruch, Jeremiah's secretary. Following an introduction, there is a collection of three originally unrelated compositions – confession of sin (1:15–3:8), eulogy of Wisdom* (3:9–4:4), and a message to those in captivity (4:5–5:9) – held together by the theme of sin, exile, return. The different parts are of uncertain date (most likely between 2nd c. BCE and 1st c. CE).

Baruch, Syriac Apocalypse of (also called 2 Baruch), Jewish OT pseudepigraphon, an eschatological apocalypse, usually dated to c100 CE, also known as Second Baruch (as opposed to 1 Baruch, the Book of Baruch*). It is closely related to Fourth* Ezra in theme and content. According to some scholars, it may have been Christianized during its transmission. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

JOHANNES TROMP

Base Ecclesial Communities (Comunidades Eclesiales de Base, CEBs), in Latin America small groups of laypersons, normally from a neighborhood, slum, village, or rural zone, who regularly gather together to pray, sing, celebrate, commemorate, read the Bible, and discuss it from the perspective of the actual life experiences and struggles of that population. They are sometimes organized as subdivisions of Roman Catholic parishes* and are sometimes self-initiated. See also CHURCH, CONCEPTS AND LIFE, CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL: BASE ECCLESIAL COMMUNITIES (CEBS) and ECUADOR: BASE ECCLESIAL COMMUNITIES (CEBS).

Basel, Council of (1431–49), called by the Conciliarists*, who, in accordance with the decree Frequens of the Council of Constance*, claimed that supreme authority* in the Roman Catholic Church lies with a general council rather than with the pope*. It met north of the Alps to avoid interference by the papal party. This council (like the later Long Parliament in England) refused to adjourn, regarding itself as a “permanent council,” the legislative body of the church; it took several actions that had previously been the prerogatives of the pope. The failure of the council marked the end of Conciliarism as a movement.

Basil, Liturgy of St. This anaphora*, in virtually all languages of the Eastern* churches, exists in several forms and languages (related to particular churches): the short Egyptian text (in Greek, Coptic*, Ge'ez [Ethiopian*]); the longer redactions, especially the Armenian* Versions; as well as the Syriac* and Byzantine* texts.

The prayer culminating in the *sanctus still mirrors the Syriac preeminence of the “Liturgy of the Cherubim and Seraphim,” to which other pairs of angels (not triads) were added. The prayer after the sanctus reflects the history of salvation. The vocabulary of the institution narrative is influenced by the verbs of the *epiclesis; the verb pair “bless and sanctify” of the epiclesis is normative for the East Syriac tradition.

Especially in the Armenian Versions, but also in the other versions, the christological tenets of this anaphora reflect the formulas of the Synod of Antioch* (341) about the Son’s preexistence and his relation to the Father (e.g. the Son as “Logos*,” “Life,” “Wisdom*,” “Power,” “Image”), about the Incarnation, and about the Resurrection and the Parousia. Such formulas were usually included in the prayer after the sanctus (sometimes also in the prayer before the sanctus) and in the anamnesis. New findings seem to preclude the involvement of Basil of Caesarea in shaping this anaphora. Moreover, the longer versions have sometimes preserved older layers than the short Egyptian text.

GABRIELE WINKLER

Basil, Rule of, the foundation of Greek and Russian monasticism (see Monasticism Cluster). It includes the Moralia, 80 rules drawn from Scripture; two sets of rules in question-and-answer form, the “Small Asketikon” with 203 (or 313) short answers, probably written in 358, and the “Large Asketikon” with 55 longer answers, developed later; and several homilies depicting the ideal Christian life. These texts were extensively reworked by Basil and later editors.

The monasticism of Asia Minor probably originated in a “sectarian*” movement led by Eustathius* of Sebaste (early 4th c.) and focused not on solitary contemplation or mortification of the flesh but on the mode of life mandated in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5–7) and narrated in Acts (Acts 2:45, 4:32–35). It may have become further institutionalized through Macrina*, the older sister of Basil, Naukratius, and Gregory* of Nyssa. Under her influence, Basil and Gregory* Nazianzen established a neighboring monastery for men. Her brothers later underplayed her role, perhaps because of her connection with Eustathius.

In 357 (after perhaps 15 years of monastic life) Basil went on a tour throughout the East, observing the monastic life in Egypt, Palestine, Syria, and Mesopotamia; after his return, he gradually developed his Rule. Basil abandoned the punishments used by Pachomius* and emphasized mutual support and obedience to the superior, giving up self-will, and immediately following all commands not contrary to the law of God (upon overstepping his or her bounds, the superior could be rebuked by the older members of the community). The canonical* hours, based in Hippolytus* and the Apostolic* Constitutions, were regularized in this setting. The Rule of Basil became the one followed in the monasteries of the Eastern* Church. Each monastery is self-contained (there is no general administrative structure like that of the West) and follows one of the later recensions of the rule. EUGENE TESELLE

Basil of Ancyra (4th c.) was a moderate Arian* who came to disagree with the view that the Son was a creature. In 359 he and George of Laodicea championed the term homoiousios (of similar essence) to characterize the relation of the Son to the Father. While this position was called "Semi-Arian" by Epiphanius, it was acknowledged by Athanasius* and others at the Council of Alexandria in 362 as a legitimate emphasis on the distinct persons of the Trinity*.

Basil of Caesarea, the Great (c330–79), a Cappadocian* who studied in Athens together with Gregory* Nazianzen (and Julian* the Apostate). Prompted by his sister Macrina*, he adopted the monastic* life (356?). After visiting monastic communities in Syria and Egypt, he became a hermit* and began composing the writings known as the Rule of Basil*. He actively opposed the Arianism* of the emperor Valens*, then became bishop (370). While participating in controversies over the extreme Arian position of Eunomius*, he worked successfully to reconcile the Nicene* party with the Homoiousians*, or "Semi-Arians." He also opposed Apollinarianism* and the Pneumatomachi*. EUGENE TESELLE

Basileia, Greek for "kingdom*," "reign," or "empire."

Basilica, a type of Roman building often used for public gatherings, with a large central hall and aisles at the sides, adapted for Christian churches after Constantine*, perhaps earlier. See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Basilical Monastery, a monastery joined with a basilica*, built either as a memorial to a saint or as a cathedral. Paulinus* of Nola may have built the first at the shrine of St. Felix of Nola; the first in Gaul were St. Martin's in Tours and St. Denis in Paris. There were several basilical monasteries in Rome after the 5th c.; the "minsters"* in Anglo-Saxon England and Germany at the time of Boniface* were basilical monasteries. See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Basilides, Gnostic* teacher in Alexandria (c225–50), author of a lost biblical commentary. His so-called heretical* views are very differently reported by Irenaeus*, Hippolytus*, and Clement* of Alexandria.

Basilina, early-6th-c. deacon* of the church Hagia Sophia in Constantinople*, originally from Cappadocia. Cyril of Scythopolis (Life of John the Hesychast 218.21–220.4) claimed to have heard from Basilina herself that she brought her nephew, a non-Chalcedonian, to the holy man John the Hesychast, who converted him to the Chalcedonian* views, as she hoped. But Basilina herself was refused entrance to John's monastery to seek John's spiritual guidance. He sent her a message that he would come to her in a dream, where she could ask what she wanted. He did; she asked and received his guidance, without compromising his monastic discipline.

See also DEACONESS.

CAROLYN OSIEK

Batak Churches. There are more than 10 Batak churches based in Batakland, Sumatra Island, Indonesia*, with an overall membership of more than 6 million, now including congregations throughout Indonesia, some with non-Batak members.

The German Rhenish mission brought the gospel to the Batak peoples from 1861 until 1942, when the Batak churches claimed themselves Lutheran* and joined the Lutheran* World Federation. Earlier several Batak churches separated from the German mission, for nationalist and self-reliance reasons. Huria Kristen Indonesia became the first self-reliant church in Indonesia (1927). After 1942, owing to religious and ethnic conflicts among Batak subgroups, other churches separated from Huria Kristen Batak Protestan church, the successor of the German mission.

As Lutheran, Batak churches regard preaching* God's Word as important for communicating God's grace* and will, and baptism and Holy Communion as sacred tradition. In daily life, Batak carefully live out their adat (customary law) because, they believe, there are supernatural sanctions against those who disregard the adat – the social and ceremonial system that regulates the rights and obligations among Batak relatives and social categories. The practice of adat is a potential source of tension for the churches, but it has never been totally rejected. Indeed, the German mission used elements of the adat to spread the gospel. Batak Christians strongly hold to adat, even though they follow most openly those elements of adat that do not conflict with the Christian faith.

Other churches (including Charismatic* churches) criticize Batak for living out the adat produced by Batak ancestors* in the time of darkness. Church servants (men and women elders, pastors, and bishops) sometimes criticize those who absent themselves from church services in order to attend adat ceremonies. But members of Batak churches keep observing adat. Observance of adat is defended as respect for ancestors or parents (Exod 20:12; Deut 5:16) and the tradition of the goodness of life that they have passed down to their descendants. Thus Batak churches live according to both the gospel and the adat.

Similarly, on New Year's Eve, every family conducts an evening service in which family members confess their weaknesses in the old year and ask forgiveness from one another – a moving ceremony through which Batak enter the New Year with purified hearts, forgiveness from family members, and God's blessing. See also INDONESIA. BATARA SIHOMBING

Bath Qol, in rabbinic theology, a voice from heaven conveying God's message (cf. Mark 1:11, 9:7; John 12:28).

Bathsheba, wife of Uriah the Hittite, whom David* is said to have seduced (taking advantage of his powerful position?); after her husband's arranged death, she became David's wife (2 Sam 11–12) and the mother of Solomon*, David's successor (1 Kgs 1–2).

Baur, Ferdinand Christian (1792–1860), professor of NT, church history, and theology, Tübingen (1826–60). He was the founder of the Protestant Tübingen school and the author of seminal studies on the doctrines of reconciliation*, Trinity*, and Incarnation* (1838–43), Paul* (1845), the canonical Gospels (1847), the history of Christian dogma (1847), church history (1853–64), and the writing of church history (1852) (see Historiography of Early Christianity as Developed in the 19th and 20th Centuries).

Baur was liberated from the scholasticism of the old Tübingen theologians with whom he studied by Friedrich Schleiermacher* and Friedrich Schelling*, but the deepest and most lasting influence on his thought was that of Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel*. Baur intended to take history and the historical mediation of God with even greater seriousness than Hegel himself took them.

With Hegel, Baur affirmed that the dialectical unfolding of the Triune God is the key to historical process and that history is the clue to the divine nature. At the same time, Baur was a disciplined critical historian who attended to the details of historical evidence. Thus he sought to ground Christology in a historical-critical study of the Gospels and to apply the Hegelian dialectical principles (identity, difference, mediation) to the history of the Christian Church and dogma. He was most innovative in his theory of historical knowledge, which involves an interplay of authentic objectivity and authentic subjectivity. On the one hand, historians strive to transpose themselves into the objective course of the subject matter itself, to rethink the thoughts of the eternal Spirit, whose work history is. On the other hand, historians' own subjectivity and perspective must be acknowledged. Every biblical and theological writing reflects "tendencies," and instead of a single church historiography, there can be only "epochs" of church historiography.

Baur was the great historicizer and relativizer of theology: the flux of historical process dissolves every fixed dogmatic formulation. This is not a counsel of despair but provides insight into the nature of truth*, which is developmental. Baur established principles of historical criticism that are now taken for granted by biblical and historical theology. His most famous student was David Friedrich Strauss (of whose book on the life of Jesus he was quite critical). The historicizing of theology led at the end of the 19th c. to the work of Adolf Harnack*, Albert Schweitzer*, Wilhelm Dilthey, and Ernst Troeltsch,* and Baur's impact on NT studies is seen in the work of Ernst Käsemann*.

PETER C. HODGSON

Baxter, Richard (1615–91), English Puritan* pastor and theologian. Educated informally, he read widely in Protestant and Catholic theology. He was a Nonconformist* about various features of the liturgy, but adhered to moderate Episcopalianism, advocating bishops elected by presbyteries (see Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: Types of Ecclesiastical Structures). His ministry in Kidderminster (1641–60) is regarded as a model of pastoral* care. Max Weber*, in his book on the Protestant ethic, made much use of Baxter's writings. For a time during the English civil war, he joined the army to counteract the "sectaries" and Cromwell*, without success. After the Restoration (1660), he refused a bishopric but participated in the Savoy* Conference, proposing revisions of the Book of Common* Prayer; these were rejected, and under the Act of Uniformity (1662) he, like many others, was prosecuted for unlicensed preaching. A prolific author, he pursued a "Catholic" moderation and inclusiveness, anticipating both the ecumenical* movement and the Protestant Liturgical* Movement. EUGENE TESELLE

Beards, Clerical. Greek priests wore beards, a practice that continued in Eastern* churches, while priests in the West shaved; this was a point of controversy between the two sides of the church (9th and 11th c.).

Beatification, the process by which bishops, and now the pope, permit veneration* of a holy person, without full canonization*.

Beatific Vision, in Western medieval theology, after death the immediate apprehension of God's essence by the redeemed, made possible by the freely given "light of glory" and fully satisfying the human quest for happiness. In some non-Western settings today, this is the immediate experience of God's all-encompassing presence. See also MYSTICISM, MYSTICS; UNION, MYSTICAL.

Beatitudes (from Lat beatus, "blessed/happy," translating Gk makarios) is the term traditionally used to designate Jesus' sayings at the beginning of the Sermon* on the Mount (Matt 5:3–12; Luke 6:20–22), although this literary form is also used in the OT (especially Psalms, from 1:1) and in other parts of the NT. The beatitudes, e.g. "Blessed/Happy are the poor [in spirit], theirs is the Kingdom," have been interpreted (1) as praise for a certain behavior or attitude ("poor in spirit"), and thus as a moral exhortation ("Be poor in spirit and you will receive the Kingdom"), or (2) as a blessing (a performative word by Jesus as religious authority) that transforms the status of those designated (the "poor" or the humiliated "poor in spirit" are now and in the future "blessed" by God), or (3) as a proclamation that designates those whom the readers/hearers should recognize as blessed, as those in whom God is pleased, and as those whom they should respect as such and imitate or serve (cf. Matt 25:31–46). DANIEL PATTE

Becket, Thomas (c1120–70), archbishop of Canterbury (1162–70). A priest in Canterbury, he studied in France and Italy. As chancellor to Henry II of England (1155–62), he became the king's close companion and champion of his policies. After becoming archbishop (1162), he began defending the freedom of the church and its right to discipline clerics. He fled to France, reconciled with the king, and returned to England (1170) but insisted on the church's right to discipline. A remark by Henry inspired four knights to assassinate Becket in his cathedral (December 29, 1170). Indignation was widespread; he was canonized* (1173), and Henry made public penance* at his shrine. The veneration of Becket variously symbolized the independence of the church, preference for the French over the English royal family, and the value of penance as exemplified by Henry. It was criticized by Wyclif* and the Lollards*, with their different view of church* and state. Henry* VIII destroyed the shrine (1538).

Bede (672/73–735), "Father of English History," monk, priest, father of the church, saint. A monk in the twin monastery of Wearmouth/Jarrow from c680, he was the most scholarly author in Anglo-Saxon England. More than 30 works survive. The core of his output was biblical exegesis, but he also produced a range of educational works for his pupils, hagiographies, a martyrology, and his famous Ecclesiastical History (Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum, 731), ending with a brief autobiography and a list of his works. His History and a second work, Time, in particular, exercised an enormous influence throughout the Middle Ages. NICHOLAS J. HIGHAM

Beecher, Catharine (1800–78), daughter of Lyman Beecher*, sister of Harriet Beecher Stowe*. She founded several schools for women, advocated better training of women as schoolteachers, and published A Treatise on Domestic Economy (1841), a much used handbook on household management (cooking, child care, health) that helped create the "cult of domesticity." Ironically, she opposed woman suffrage, arguing that the woman's sphere was the home.

Beecher, Henry Ward (1813–87), son of Lyman Beecher*, brother of Harriet Beecher Stowe*. Known for his eloquence, he was the minister of Plymouth Congregational Church in Brooklyn for many decades. As a preacher and editor, he championed woman suffrage, evolution*, and the abolition of slavery*. His reputation was compromised by a famous lawsuit alleging adultery (1875). See also UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (IN THE UNITED STATES).

Beecher, Lyman (1775–1863), Presbyterian minister in Connecticut, where he preached against intemperance (see Temperance Movement) and helped found the American* Bible Society (1816). In Boston he became sympathetic to the “new measures” revivalism* of Finney*. Moving to Cincinnati, he became president of Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, following his stance against abolition during a classic debate about the abolition of slavery*; the abolitionists left to found Oberlin as a rival school, of which Finney became president. See also UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (IN THE UNITED STATES).

Beelzebub (based on the Hebrew in 2 Kgs 1), or Beelzeboul, the “prince of demons” identified with Satan* (in Mark 3:22–26, par.).

Beguine Spirituality. Beguines, female members of a lay religious movement that began in the early 13th c., were inspired by the desire to return to a more apostolic way of life and to bring the service of God into the marketplace, as the early Franciscans* and Dominicans* had done. The mendicant way of life was not open to women, so many who wished to serve God by serving the poor and needy in poverty, chastity, and obedience became Beguines. The early Beguines were mostly aristocratic and patrician women who lived together in small groups in a house provided by one of their number. The large and beautiful Beguinages of Bruges, Paris, and elsewhere are from a later period. In the early 13th c., Beguines were hailed as leading the most holy kind of Christian life because of their piety and because they did not beg, but rather worked for their living.

Their spirituality grew out of their lives of active service; spirituality required the business of everyday living to be practiced. Because of this, aspects of mystic* grace that might interfere with carrying out daily acts of service for one’s fellows (such as visions, ecstasies, trances, and extreme asceticism) were generally dismissed as juvenile. For the Beguines, one is closest to union with God’s divinity when living, with God’s humanity, a life of suffering service, despised and rejected by others. Suffering* is not simply the means to achieve union; it is the very place of union itself. For example, Mechtild* of Magdeburg writes, “Lord what shall we now say of love? Now that we lie so close on the bed of my pain?” (Flowing Light of the God-head Book 7:21). Paradox* is a defining feature of their writing. They use the Middle Dutch word minne (love*) to speak of God and the imagery of the Song* of Songs, and contemporary courtly love poetry to describe the intimacy and passion of their relationship. The noun minne is feminine and requires feminine adjectives and pronouns, which adds to the ambiguity and paradox of the texts. Beguine texts speak vividly and painfully of the awe-inspiring “otherness” of God, of a love that is beyond comprehension, fearfully great. The fear and awe evoked by the realization of the immense gulf between God and God’s creatures is, for the Beguines, the other side of the intimacy they experience in sharing with God the bed of their pain. See also HADEWIJCH; MARIE D’OIGNIES; MECHTILD OF MAGDEBURG; PORETE, MARGUERITE.

SASKIA MURK JANSEN

Behemoth, a large animal described in Job (40:15–24), possibly based on the hippopotamus of the Nile; Leviathan* may be its counterpart.

Belarus, located in the historic and conflict-prone borderlands between Roman Catholic Central Europe and Slavic Eastern Orthodox regions. Christianity in Belarus reflects this cultural and sociopolitical marginality.

Belarus experienced only short periods of autonomy, and thus its history is integral to that of Orthodox Russia* and Catholic Poland* and Lithuania*. It can claim Christianity as its major faith for a millennium, though for many centuries the people practiced dvoverie (“double faith” combining native religion and Christianity). It includes an Orthodox majority, with a large Catholic minority.

The late 16th and early 17th c. tested religious identities in the region. As Poles tried to seize the Russian throne, the Reformation* and Catholic* Renewal (Counter Reformation) washed across Belarus, each leaving a religious residue. The 1596 Brest*-Litovsk gathering (on the Polish–Belarusian border) created Uniatism* (“Greek Catholicism,” as it is called in the region) to compete for Belarusian souls. The 1666 schism of the Old* Believers divided the Orthodox population. Subsequently (17th–20th c.), the Belarusians found themselves a small, marginal people, divided among Orthodox, Catholic, Old Believer, and Greek Catholic sensibilities, with some Protestant influences. The 20th c. challenged the faith of the people of Belarus through (1) the antireligious policy of the Soviet Communists and (2) the physical and spiritual devastation the region suffered as a major battlefield during both world wars. Another traumatic event was the nearby nuclear accident of Chernobyl (1986).

The Republic of Belarus, which emerged from Soviet control (1991), is a biconfessional Catholic–Orthodox state, favoring the Orthodox majority. The Belarusian Orthodox Church, an exarchate* of the Russian Orthodox Church, is headed by an ethnic Russian, Metropolitan Filaret; his struggle to master the Belarusian language exemplifies the ambivalence of Orthodoxy as both Belarusian and Russian. The general harmony between Orthodox and Catholic communities does not prevent friction from arising on official levels. The reestablishment of the Catholic diocesan structure is for Orthodox officials a violation of their “canonical territory.” The coming of many Catholic clergy from Poland emphasizes the divide between Eastern Slavic- and Polish-oriented populations, and occasions government interference with visas and work permits.

The historically important Uniates (Greek Catholics), Old Believers, Lutherans, and Calvinist Protestants make up small groups today. Originating more recently (but with pre-Soviet roots) is a dynamic Protestant movement (approximately 2% of believers) made up of Pentecostals, Seventh-day Adventists, and Baptists. Among other religious traditions (less than 1% of the population), the largest groups are Jews and Muslims. There is relatively little overt inter-group conflict among these communities, though lines of tension do exist.

There has been a revival of religious identification since the end of the Soviet era, but by all indications religious life remains limited. Religious practice primarily takes the form of rites of passage associated with birth, death, and marriage. In addition, 5% of Belarusians claim to be atheists, and 25% are nonreligious.

The dominant issue in religious life in Belarus today is the role of the government. The Belarusian government has tended to support the Orthodox Church for seemingly political purposes and interferes in the affairs of all churches for political reasons. The greatest need for Christians in Belarus is freedom from meddling by the state so that they can address the serious spiritual needs of the population.

Statistics: Population (2000): 10.2 million (M). Christians, 7.1 M, 70.3% (Orthodox, 5.4 M; Roman Catholics, 1.4 M; Protestants 0.1 M; independents, 0.1 M); nonreligious, 2.4 M, 24%; atheists 0.5 M, 5%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

JERRY G. PANKHURST

Belgic Confession, the confession of faith adopted in 1561 by the Reformed churches in French-speaking Belgium, modeled on the Gallican* Confession of 1559. Now one of the doctrinal standards of the Reformed Church of the Netherlands and its offspring in South Africa and the USA.

Belgium, a predominantly Roman Catholic country, has witnessed during the past two centuries an intense exchange between religion and modernity. The Christianization of present-day Belgium dates from the early Middle Ages. Protestantism was highly influential in the region in the 16th c., but after the failure of the revolt against the rule of the Spanish Hapsburgs (see Spain), the Roman Catholic religious monopoly was restored. When the Belgian provinces were annexed by revolutionary France (1795), freedom of religion was introduced. Following a brief union with the Netherlands* (1815–30), an independent Belgian state came into existence, with a liberal, parliamentary regime and a formal separation between church* and state. Since then, all religions have been granted the same opportunities for development. Yet the most important ones in Belgium – Roman Catholicism, Protestantism, and Judaism – received a form of official recognition, a protected status, and state financial support. Catholicism continued to occupy a dominant position. In 1905, out of a population of 7 million, besides a small minority of nonchurchgoers, there were about 30,000 Protestants and 3,500 Jews.

In the early years of the Belgian state, a strong liberal movement within the Catholic Church endorsed modern freedoms, since they allowed the Church to develop its own charitable and educational organizations. However, under pressure from the Holy See, more anti-liberal tendencies developed (mid-19th c.), leading to a confrontation with the liberal bourgeoisie, whose influence was increasing as a result of extensive industrialization and urbanization. Ideological confrontations came to dominate political life. Between 1847 and 1884, the liberals were mostly in power and succeeded to a large extent in pushing back the Church's influence on state institutions. The Church retreated to its own structures and developed almost into a state within the state, thereby laying the basis for the segmentation of society along ideological lines ("pillarization").

After 1884, following an important shift of power, the Catholic party came to exercise a dominant influence on political life for more than a century. The subsequent Christian Democratic Party, successful thanks to the development of a powerful movement of social Catholicism, gave shape to a pillarized, neo-corporative society. (See Pillars.) The center of influence lay no longer with the state but with the intermediary structures woven into political life.

Between 1870 and 1970, the flourishing Roman Catholic Church in Belgium exercised a not negligible influence on Catholicism as a whole, mostly regarding modernization (see Modernism, Roman Catholic). It played an important part in the Catholic missionary and ecumenical movements. The Catholic University of Leuven contributed to the dialogue with modern science*. The Belgian liberal Catholic tradition, never fully lost and revived after World War II, had an important influence on Vatican* II. Its well-developed social organizations were often a model for surrounding countries. Especially after 1945, Belgian Catholic politicians played a prominent role in international Christian Democracy.

From the 1960s on, cracks became evident in the Catholic edifice; a process of "de-pillarization" emerged from the growth of individualism and secularization*. The Church gradually lost its grip on social structures and saw its influence decreasing. The number of nonchurchgoers markedly increased and religious practice declined, while the following of other religions increased. Meanwhile, Islam* (1974) and Orthodox Christianity (1985) were given official recognition and consequently received state subsidies. There is little tension among the various churches, owing in part to the ecumenical tradition within the Catholic Church. See also LUXEMBOURG; NETHERLANDS, THE.

Statistics: Population (2000): 10.2 million (M). Christians, 9 M, 88% (Roman Catholics, 8.2 M; Protestants, 0.13 M; marginal Christians, 72,000; Orthodox, 49,000; independents, 40,000; Christians without an expressed affiliation, 0.45 M); Muslims, 0.36 M; Jews, 30,000; Buddhists, 30,000; nonreligious, 0.77 M. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

EMIEL LAMBERTS

Belhar Confession, a condemnation of apartheid* and other forms of forced separation in the church "on the grounds of race and color," "descent," or "any other human or social factor," issued by the Dutch Reformed Mission Church (1986) and by the Dutch Reformed Church in Africa when they joined to form the Uniting Reformed Church (1994). In the USA, it has been adopted provisionally by the Reformed Church in America and is under consideration by the Presbyterian Church (USA).

Belial (Heb), Beliar (Gk transliteration). "Sons of Belial" is a term of opprobrium in the Dead Sea Scrolls; Paul uses Beliar as a name for Satan* (2 Cor 6:15).

Bells. Bells rung by hand came into Christian use by the time of Gregory* of Tours (6th c.); hanging bells were used by the 8th c. They have been rung on feast days, to summon worshippers, or to announce a death. Small bells are rung during the (Catholic) Eucharist* at the elevation* and Communion*. Popular belief holds that they can drive away demons*. Because the ringing of bells is a dramatic way of announcing the presence of a religious building, in pluralistic societies it is sometimes subdued. Where a different religious tradition is dominant, bells may be silenced, e.g. in Muslim lands (including Jerusalem until modern times); they were silenced during the French Revolution and in some Catholic countries, where Protestants could not ring bells.

Beloved Disciple, the unnamed disciple in John 13:23, 19:26, 20:2, 21:7, 21:20: "the one Jesus loved." John 21:24 suggests he was John* the Apostle.

Benedicite (Lat "Bless the Lord"), canticle of the three youths in the fiery furnace, added to the Septuagint's* Book of Daniel*; used liturgically in lauds*.

Benedict (c480–c555), born in Nursia (or Norcia); founder of the monastery of Monte Cassino, Southern Italy; author of the Rule of Benedict*. The spiritual biography (Book II of the Dialogues attributed to Pope Gregory* I) credits Benedict, originally a hermit at Subiaco, with having founded several monasteries before Monte Cassino. It paints him as a charismatic preacher and teacher, only briefly mentioning his monastic Rule. The Rule provided a strong model for communal monasticism* and was later used by Cluny* and the Cistercians*.

Benedict was declared the patron saint of Europe by Pope Paul VI in 1964.

MARILYN DUNN

Benedict, Rule of, monastic* rule composed by Benedict* of Nursia, c550; in Latin, 73 chapters, about 12,000 words. Benedict envisages an audience beyond his own monastery, as he encapsulates his view of monasticism, giving comprehensive directions on communal life. Beginning in the 1930s, scholars advanced the idea that it was a derivative of the Regula magistri*, but the traditional view is more likely: Benedict's Rule was expanded into the Regula magistri.

The Rule was composed in 6th-c. Roman Italy*, where life had been disrupted by war and plague. Monasteries were now an accepted part of society, housing retired laypeople and child oblates* as well as those with more durable vocations*. Benedict suggests that they were subject to a good deal of instability and lack of discipline. Thus, while he pays tribute to the tradition that eremitism* is a higher form of monasticism than cenobitism* and recommends the works of Cassian* and Basil*, he nevertheless insists that its strongest form is communal life under a rule and an abbot*. Benedict characterizes the abbot as "taking the place of Christ," awarding him sweeping powers that place only the rule and God above him. Thus Benedict creates a charisma* of office for the head of community that is not formulated in earlier monastic writings.

The Rule defines the pillars of monastic conduct (Lat conversatio) as obedience, silence, and humility*. To further support the abbot, Benedict sets out a hierarchy of monastic officials – deans, cellarer (for food supplies), and porter (doorkeeper) – with specific duties and reluctantly allows the appointment of a second-in-command, or prior*. He insists on the permanence of vows made on behalf of child oblates. The Rule gives specific directions for discipline, dress, and diet, envisaging an estate-based monastic existence, separated as far as possible from the secular world, where monks may have to gather the harvest themselves or practice crafts. The community's liturgical life is based around the daily celebration of Divine Office* – in this case, matins, lauds, prime, terce, sext, none, vespers, compline, and the night office.

The Rule's genius and durability lie in its reinterpretation of earlier traditions to create a charisma of office for the superior along with structures designed to ensure the stability and continuation of monastic life. Its views on the abbot, his officials, and monastic conversatio were excerpted in the "mixed" monastic rules of the 7th c. In the 8th and 9th c., it was promoted by the Carolingian* dynasty as the monastic rule of the Holy* Roman Empire and it became the basis of life at Cluny* and in the Cistercian* order.

MARILYN DUNN

Benedict XV, Pope (1914–22), born Giacomo della Chiesa (1854) into a relatively modest aristocratic family. He studied civil law (Genoa) before pursuing ecclesiastical studies (Rome). After ordination (1878), he received diplomatic training at the Academy for Noble Ecclesiastics, became secretary to Mariano Rampolla (in Madrid and Rome), was moved to Bologna as archbishop (1907), became cardinal (1914), and was elected pope (1914). During World War I, his many efforts to bring peace included a Note (1917) that both sides rejected as favoring the other. He organized the release of prisoners unfit for further service and established a missing persons bureau. Ecclesiastically, he tempered the campaign against Modernists*, established the Congregation for the Eastern Church, and founded the Pontifical Oriental Institute. Missiologically, he attempted to wrest evangelization from colonial ambitions by promoting indigenous clergy (see Mission Cluster: Mission and Imperialism).

MICHAEL J. WALSH

Benedictine Order. There is no evidence in the Rule of Benedict* that Benedict intended to establish a federation of monasteries, though adaptation of his teaching to local circumstances was anticipated. The Rule simply circulated as a resource for other monastic legislators. Its breadth, depth, and wisdom served as its best recommendation, and its observance gradually spread to England and to the Frankish kingdom, where it became the basis of the monastic reform encouraged by Louis the Pious (778–840), successor to Charlemagne, and his monastic agent, Benedict of Aniane (c747–821). This broad adoption of the Rule established it as the norm for Western monasticism, a position consolidated and extended in later monastic reforms (e.g. at Cluny*) throughout Europe (from the late 10th c.). The 12th-c. Cistercian* reform created a stricter form of Benedictine monasticism, while the rise of other forms of religious life (from the 12th c.) reduced the number and significance of the original Benedictines. The Reformation and French Revolution were devastating for Benedictine monasticism, but there was a monastic revival (19th c.) across Europe that spread to the Americas, Africa, and Asia. Since then, Benedictines have been leaders in liturgical* renewal, ecumenism*, and scholarship.

Despite the unity provided by a common text, Benedictine monasticism always had a variety of interpretations and applications of the Rule. Benedictines have never constituted a single “order” in the sense of the later, nonmonastic forms of religious life that appeared during the Middle Ages. Instead, there have been associations of monasteries, known as congregations, which share a particular history or interpretation of the Rule. Some congregations are highly centralized, while others are loose federations of autonomous communities. In this respect, Benedictines exemplify the ancient model of monastic life still common in the Christian East (see the following entries in the Monasticism Cluster: In the Byzantine Empire; In the Russian and Ukrainian Tradition; In the Syriac Tradition), in which monasteries themselves are the primary institutions and most authority remains with the local monastic superior (abbot*, abbess*, prior*, or prioress*), with higher levels of organization playing a supportive rather than directive role. COLUMBA STEWART, OSB

Benediction (Lat “uttering a blessing”), performative* words conferring a blessing* on a person or group on God’s behalf, traditionally by a priest, a pastor, or a bishop, but also by any believer (e.g. in everyday and family settings).

Benediction of the Sacrament, at the closing of certain Western Church services, the point at which the people are blessed with the reserved* Sacrament.

Benedictus (Lat “Blessed be God”), Zachariah’s song of thanksgiving at the birth of his son John* the Baptist (Luke 1:68–79), used liturgically in lauds*.

Benefice, ecclesiastical office whose “spiritualities” are supported by certain “temporalities” (financial support); often called a “living.”

Benefit of Clergy, exemption of clergy and religious* from trial by secular courts; defended by the papacy during the Middle Ages.

Bengel, Johannes Albrecht (1687–1752), was the prominent representative of the Württemberg Pietists*, whose biblical theology, with its eschatological focus, was influenced by the social disruptions that marked that region during the incursions of Louis XIV. His renowned work as a Bible scholar at Tübingen was marked by his extensive textual commentary on the Greek NT, which, in translation, had an impact on lay readers, including John Wesley*. For Bengel, an accurate reading of the Bible in its historical context would overcome an unhealthy theological dogmatism in Protestant orthodoxy. His posting a date for the Parousia* (1836) remains a controversial aspect of his work. J. STEVEN O’MALLEY

Benin (formerly Dahomey). Portuguese introduced Christianity (1640s) in this prominent West African kingdom, which became a French colony (1872), gaining independence in 1960. The proportion of Christians is still exceptionally low (28%) as compared with that of African* Religionists (52%, including practitioners of Vodoun, Vodou*) and Muslims (20%).

The Roman Catholic Church, in the south, became highly visible with the 1871 arrival in Porto-Novo of the Sisters of Our Lady of the Apostles and the Petites Servantes des Pauvres de Cotonou (1921). Following the establishment of a seminary (1913), the first African priest, Fr. Moulero, was ordained (1928), and a regional seminary was established (1930). Fr. Francis Aupiais (1877–1945) strongly affirmed Dahomey’s African cultures, advocating inculturation* of Christianity and opposing colonialism. The Archdiocese of Cotonou (established in 1955) had its first African archbishop in 1960.

The first Protestant church was founded by Thomas Birch Freeman, the son of a former slave (1843), under the auspices of the Methodist Missionary Society of London. But the Protestant churches developed very slowly until 1949, owing to French suspicion of Anglo-Saxon missionaries, and despite the Goun translation of the Bible (1901–23). The Sudan Interior Mission established itself (1947) in the northeast and the Assemblies of God in the northwest.

African* Instituted Churches include the Boda Owa (Dahomey–Nigerian border, 1895), the Eledja African Methodist Church (1927), the Christian Order of the Cherubim and Seraphim (1933), and mainly L’Église du Christianisme Céleste (1952, with Prophet Samuel Otchoffa). There is a lively proliferation of sizable independent Pentecostal/Charismatic and Evangelical churches.

Despite the strong presence of African* Religion, Christianity plays a major role in all aspects of Benin society. Roman Catholics opposed the Marxist* government (1972–90); churches train the political and cultural elite in their schools and seminaries; Christian hospitals are among the best in the country; Methodist Women actively promotes AIDS prevention and educates rural girls and women; Christians played a central role during the Conference of National Reconciliation (1990); and PROCURA (Project of Christian-Muslim Relations in Africa) promotes harmony between Muslims and the rest of the population.

Statistics: Population (2000): 6 million (M). Christians, 1.7 M, 28% (Roman Catholics, 1.26 M; Protestants, 0.2 M; members of African Instituted Churches, 0.2M); African Religionists, 3.1 M, 52%; Muslims, 1.2 M, 20%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

VALENTIN DEDJI

Ben Sira. See WISDOM OF BEN SIRA.

Bequests. See WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

Berachah (Heb “blessing”), typical Jewish form of prayer, sanctifying something by praising God over it or seeking God’s favor; possibly inspired the Christian Eucharist*.

Berdyayev, Nikolai Aleksandrovich (1874–1948), Russian philosopher; born in Kiev. After being arrested for revolutionary activity (1898), he was forced into internal exile (1900–3), during which he abandoned Marxism* for Christian Personalism. He became an independent writer and publisher (St. Petersburg and Moscow, 1904–22), was exiled by the Soviet government (1922), and went to Paris (1924–48), becoming the best known Russian philosopher in the West. His thought focuses on freedom*, regarded not as a social product but as a divine spark. Berdyayev combined this view with a passion for social justice*, affirming the paradoxical unity of freedom and human solidarity in Christ. Berdyayev was a Christian prophet, tirelessly contesting the powers and principalities of a fallen world.

PAUL VALLIERE

Berengarius of Tours (c1010–88), theologian of the Eucharist* who affirmed the real* presence of Christ but denied any change in the elements. Attacked by Lanfranc*, he was condemned several times, definitively at a Roman council (1079), after which he confessed the conversion of the elements “in properties of nature and truth of substance.”

Bergson, Henri (1859–1941). This philosopher’s central concept is “duration” as inner experience. When I experience an emotion, according to Bergson, what I experience is the continuity of the experience and its heterogeneity. There is a kind of unity to the duration of the experience that cannot be separated from a multiplicity. Bergson’s thought, then, is a specific form of dualism*. Yet the dualism of the duration accounts for more traditional forms of dualism, Descartes’s* in particular. The heterogeneity and multiplicity of the duration can develop into the spatial separation that allows us to enumerate objects; this development is Cartesian extension. The unity and continuity of the duration, on the other hand, can develop into the indivisible and homogeneous self of the Cartesian thinking subject. Later, in The Two Sources of Morality and Religion (1935), Bergson extends the dualism of the duration. (1) There is closed morality and static religion, which attempt to maintain social cohesion (a closed space) by means of obedience to laws that are personified in images of God (a unified and homogeneous self). The institutional religions throughout the world are static according to Bergson. (2) However, there is open morality and dynamic religion, which attempt to open the social cohesion through the emotion of loving (continuity) all things (heterogeneity). Thus open morality and dynamic religion put themselves in touch with the duration. Such a contact with the duration is a mystical* experience. Bergson claims that Christian mystics such as Joan* of Arc are the models. While Bergson grants to Judaism* the constant demand of justice*, it is the spirit of Christianity that opens the door of love*, making it the one true dynamic religion. See also RELIGION AS A CONCEPT AND CHRISTIANITY.

LEONARD LAWLOR

Berlin Conference (the) (November 1884–February 1885), was the occasion for the “scramble for Africa,” with its resulting partition of Africa and its implications for missions and the African churches.

During the second half of the 19th c., the European powers, which had traded along the coasts of Africa, began to explore inland areas, seeking raw materials for their growing industries. Their rivalry prompted France* and Germany* to call the Berlin Conference, attended by 14 powers (including the USA, which had commercial but not territorial interests). The Berlin Act of 1885 carved up Africa into spheres of influence and gave Leopold II of Belgium personal sovereignty over the Belgian Congo. The Act guaranteed free trade, access to the Congo and Niger Rivers by all nations, free movement by “Christian missionaries, scientists, and explorers,” and “freedom of conscience and religious toleration” for all persons, indigenous or foreign. The boundaries drawn up at the Berlin Conference, often dividing African nations, have continued up to the present.

Mission* organizations have often found occasion to remind colonial and postcolonial governments of the guarantees given in the Berlin Act, and have benefited from this protection. From their perspective, the guarantees regarding religious freedom have also benefited Africans. But from the African perspective, mission organizations became accomplices in the colonization and fragmentation of Africa. African churches resulting from the missionary enterprise have often recalled this fact of collusion in denominational and ecumenical discussions. African scholars often refer to the Berlin Conference as the beginning of the continent's imperial subjugation and comment critically on the role of Christian missionaries in the colonial period. See also MISSION CLUSTER: MISSION AND IMPERIALISM.

JESSE NDWIGA KANYUA MUGAMBI and
EUGENE TESELLE

Bernard of Clairvaux (1090–1153), popularizer of the Cistercian* order, monk, preacher, theologian, diplomat; established an ecclesiology of papal plenitude of power; helped to launch a new style of preaching and a heightened devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary*.

From a noble family near Dijon, he became a monk at Cîteaux Abbey (1112), entering the new Cistercian order with 30 friends and relatives; he then served as abbot* of Cîteaux (1115). He was highly influential in the Roman Catholic Church: he gained recognition for the Knights* Templar (1128) and traveled throughout Europe (1130) to support Innocent II as pope (after a disputed papal election); one of his former monks was elected as Pope Eugenius III (1145).

At the instigation of Peter the Venerable, abbot of Cluny, Bernard preached in support of the Second Crusade*. The Roman Catholic Church faced challenges from a new breed of academic critic, particularly in northern France. Although not trained in these schools or proto-universities and lacking skills in logic, Bernard powerfully campaigned against heretics* and their teaching, among them Peter Abelard* (condemned at Sens in 1140) and Gilbert of Poitiers (at Reims in 1148).

His book, On Consideration, initially written for Pope Eugenius on how to balance his duties as pope*, was developed into a treatise on the pope's jurisdiction and authority in church* and state, including his theory of papal plenitude of power. Through this book, Bernard sought to ensure the balance of power between church and state, which had been precarious since the Investiture Contest (provisionally resolved by the Concordat of Worms*, 1122) with its principle that the church was responsible for the spiritualities of the appointment of a bishop and the secular authorities for the temporalities. Thus Bernard is viewed as an authority on the powers of the pope.

Bernard's treatises on the monastic life, and on the balance between the active and contemplative* in life in general, are authoritative, as is his spiritual interpretation of Scripture, especially the Song* of Songs.

GILLIAN R. EVANS

Bethany, village to the east of the Mount of Olives, where Jesus lodged (Mark 11) and Simon the leper (Mark 14:3), Lazarus, Martha, and Mary (John 11:1) lived.

Bethlehem, town five miles south of Jerusalem; Rachel was buried nearby (Gen 35:16–19). The home of Boaz* and Ruth*, David's* forebears (Ruth 1:19; 4:9–11), it came to be called the city of David (Luke 2:11) and was the place where Jesus* was born (Luke 2:1–20). The Church of the Nativity* was built here by Constantine* and rebuilt under Justinian*.

Betrothal, originally the promise of a woman by her guardian to enter into a contract of marriage; now a mutual and freely made promise of marriage.

Beza, Theodore (1519–1605), John Calvin's* successor as leader of the variety of Reformed* Protestantism created and led from Geneva. Beza was a provincial French nobleman, educated in the humanities and law in Paris, Orleans, and Bourges, and destined for a career in the church. He became Protestant, married secretly, and took refuge in Switzerland. He was a teacher in Lausanne from 1549, then first rector of the Geneva Academy from 1559. He translated into French much of the Psalter, which became the most important service book for French Protestants. He became involved in Protestant politics during the first war of religion in France (1561–63) and remained an adviser to Protestant political leaders in France and other countries throughout his life. On Calvin's death, in 1564, Beza was elected moderator of the Geneva Company of Pastors, held that position until 1580, then continued to teach and preach until his death. He was a prolific scholar, publishing erudite biblical studies, most notably on Greek texts of the NT, polemics directed against Catholics and Lutherans, sermons, and legal and political treatises. He remained faithful to the teachings of Calvin, although often expressing them in a more systematic manner.

ROBERT M. KINGDON

Bible, Canon of. The list of authoritative books of the Christian Bible has three forms. The shorter canon used in Protestant churches includes 66 books (in the King James Version order): Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 1 Samuel, 2 Samuel, 1 Kings, 2 Kings, 1 Chronicles, 2 Chronicles, Ezra (also called 1 Esdras), Nehemiah (also called 2 Esdras), Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Acts, Romans, 1 Corinthians, 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1 Thessalonians, 2 Thessalonians, 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, Titus, Philemon, Hebrews, James, 1 Peter, 2 Peter, 1 John, 2 John, 3 John, Jude, and Revelation.

The Roman Catholic and Orthodox Bibles also include the OT Apocrypha*: 1 Esdras* (also called 3 Esdras), Additions to Esther*, 1 Maccabees*, 2 Maccabees, Tobit*, Judith*, Wisdom* of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus (Wisdom* of Ben Sira), Baruch*, Epistle of Jeremiah, Susanna*, Prayer of Azariah, Prayer of Manassas*, and Bel and the Dragon.

In addition, the Bible of the Eastern Orthodox churches includes 3 Maccabees, 4 Maccabees, and Psalm 151.

In addition to the books included in Orthodox Bibles, the Ethiopian Bible includes 2 Esdras* (also called 4 Esdras), Joseph Ben Gurion (or Josippon, a popular chronicle of Jewish history from Adam to Titus), Jubilees*, Enoch*, the Testament* of Our Lord, Apostolic* Church Order, Apostolic* Constitutions (or Apostolic Canons), and the Didascalia* of the Apostles. The Bible of the Church* of the East follows the Syriac translation, the Peshitta*, which includes the same books as the Orthodox Bibles but omits 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and Revelation and some passages of the Gospels and Acts.

Bible, Texts and Manuscripts. Since no autograph documents of the biblical canon are extant, the notion of the "text" of the Bible is a theoretical reconstruction based on a critical evaluation of the textual witnesses (inscriptions, papyri, and manuscripts). A manuscript (a handwritten document) is an individual witness to the biblical text. The oldest manuscripts, such as NT papyri or the biblical manuscripts discovered in the Judean desert (see Dead* Sea Scrolls; Qumran*), have significant authority in textual questions. The dating of later manuscripts is a more complicated question because the age of a manuscript does not reveal the date of the text it contains. Codex Bezae (a Greek manuscript containing the Gospels, Acts, and the Catholic Epistles), written in the late 4th c., may contain a 2nd-c. text. Codex Neofiti 1 (a Targum manuscript) is dated to 1504 CE but probably contains a 3rd- or 4th-c. CE text.

For the Hebrew text, most scholars consult the Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia (BHS), which is based on the Codex Leningradensis B 19 (1008 CE), a manuscript that contains the entire HB and is thought to be the best representative of the Masoretic* text (a Hebrew text transmitted by a group of scholars known as the Masoretes, c500 CE). (The Biblia Hebraica Quinta, when complete, will replace the BHS.) Other important witnesses to the Masoretic text include the Aleppo Codex (10th c. CE) and 6th- to 8th-c. Hebrew manuscripts from the Cairo Genizah (a synagogue repository for biblical manuscripts no longer in use). Since the manuscript evidence for the Masoretic text is relatively young, the biblical manuscripts found in the Judean desert, written between 250 BCE and 68 CE, are foremost witnesses to an earlier Hebrew text. Among the biblical manuscripts found at Qumran, the second Isaiah scroll (1QIs^b) is quite similar to the Masoretic text and thus confirms the Masoretic text's fidelity. But others, such as 1QIs^a, diverge significantly from it. This and other divergent manuscripts suggest that the earliest witnesses to the Hebrew text were pluriform. Textual critics must discern the best reading of the Hebrew text (sometimes rejecting the later Masoretic reading) on a case by case basis. On occasion the biblical reader observes the impact of the Judean desert discoveries. In 1 Sam 10:27 the New Revised Standard Version (NRSV) adds a lengthy reading from 4QSam^a (most English translations have not included it) that introduces Nahash and his eye-gouging practice. The NRSV editors considered this Qumran manuscript reading to be earlier and better than the Masoretic text.

These early witnesses to the Hebrew text are complemented by the Versions, especially the Septuagint* (as early as the 3rd c. BCE), the Samaritan Pentateuch (1st c. BCE), the Peshitta* (late 2nd c. CE), the Vulgate* (late 4th c. CE), and the Targums (from the 1st c. BCE up to the 8th c. CE); these early translations offer a glimpse of the state of the Hebrew text before the Masoretic period. But the Versions contain myriad divergent readings, most of which are not superior to the Masoretic text. Textual criticism offers a method of identifying the significant readings in the Versions and for determining whether a particular reading witnesses to a Hebrew text that is earlier than and superior to that preserved in the Masoretic text.

The most widely used editions of the Greek NT are the Nestle-Aland, 27th ed., and the United Bible Societies' The Greek New Testament, 4th ed. These editions offer the "standard text" of the NT, which is intended to be the closest to the original NT based on a critical evaluation of the witnesses. The oldest NT documents are known as "papyri" (referring to the writing material). Some of these papyri, such as p⁵² (a fragment of John 18:31–33, 37–38, dated c125), confirm the "standard text." The Bodmer papyri XIV–XV (p⁷⁵), containing Luke 3:18–18:18; 22:4–24:53 and John 1:1–15:8 (dated beginning 3rd c.), is close to the later Codex Vaticanus (4th c.), thus assuring this codex a principal voice in NT textual problems regarding other texts. Similarly, p⁷² (2nd–3rd c.), containing the letters of Peter and Jude, is an important early witness to these letters. Starting in the early 3rd c., parchment replaced papyrus. Greek manuscripts up to the 9th c. are referred to as "uncials," because of their large or capital letters. After the 9th c., the manuscripts were usually written in a cursive hand and are thus referred to as minuscules.

The abundance of NT manuscripts (more than 5,000) requires scholars to identify those manuscripts that can be traced back to the same exemplar. Most textual critics appeal to early text types of the NT, such as the Alexandrine* text (Egypt), the Koine* text (linked with Antioch* and the basis for the later Byzantine text), and the text of Codex Bezae (D), to classify Greek manuscripts. The early translations of the NT also assist in establishing the NT text, since their Greek exemplar may predate the earliest uncials. The Eastern Versions include the Old Syriac Gospels (3rd c.), the Peshitta (5th c.), and the slavishly literal Harklean version (616 CE). The Western Versions include the Old Latin (2nd c.) and the Vulgate (late 4th c.). To establish the earliest form of the NT, textual critics consider readings from the best Greek manuscripts (such as from the papyri and the codices Sinaiti-cus, Vaticanus, Alexandrinus, and Bezae) and from the Versions (aware of each version's translation techniques). On occasion the reader will observe a textual discussion on the pages of the English NT. The Revised Standard Version removed Luke 22:43–44 to a footnote because these verses are absent in the papyri and important uncials (the Vaticanus and the corrected Sinaiticus). The editors of the NRSV decided to restore these verses to their translation, albeit in double brackets to indicate the editors' uncertainty. In the removal and restoration of these verses, one observes that textual criticism is both a science and an art.

CRAIG E. MORRISON, O.Carm.

BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Bible Interpretation, History of

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Bible Interpretation in Africa

Bible Interpretation in Asia

Bible Interpretation in Asia:
By Asian Women

Bible Interpretation in Eastern Orthodoxy

Bible Interpretation in Latin America

Bible Interpretation in North America

Bible Interpretation in North America:
African American

Bible Interpretation in North America:
Latino/a

Bible Interpretation in North America and Western Europe: Queer

Bible Interpretation in Oceania

Bible Interpretation in Western Europe

Bible Interpretation Worldwide: Feminist

1) Introductory Entry

Bible Interpretation, History of. Periods in the history of biblical interpretation are defined by the church's relation to the wider society. During the 1st–4th c., the church moved from marginality to becoming the church of the Roman Empire (although Christianity was also in the Persian Empire and beyond). The Reformation in the West brought about new Christian communities, some as state* churches, others as free* churches, both types participating in the missionary movements (peaked in the 19th c.). From the free churches came the remarkable growth of Charismatic* and Pentecostal churches in the 20th c. From the 17th c onward, the Bible was subjected to a rigorous criticism that led to the development of historical critical methods, which gradually gained acceptance in the academy.

Pre-Constantinian Interpretation. Biblical interpretation during the first three centuries laid the foundations for subsequent developments. Church Bible interpreters operated on a number of fronts: (1) interpreting the Bible in inner church struggles against heretical* groups: Marcionites*, Gnostics*, and Manichaeans*; (2) disputes with Jews, not least over the interpretation of the OT; and (3) nurturing the faith of the church. The problem lay partly in drawing out a spiritual sense from the OT narratives and the now superseded OT legislation and partly in deriving a coherent cosmology and ethics* from texts containing many views. In dealing with the OT, Christian biblical interpreters drew on the allegorical* techniques of the classical world, already taken up by Jewish interpreters like Philo* of Alexandria. Alexandrian Christian interpreters like Clement* and Origen* followed this path, seeking the higher meanings hidden in the text (see Alexandria, Alexandrian Christianity and Its Theology). In the face of the great diversity of readings of the biblical texts, the church sought unity of interpretation through the imposition of a “rule* of faith” (Irenaeus*, Tertullian*).

From Constantine* to the Reformation*.

The establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire during the 4th c. led to a flourishing of exegetical endeavor. The Antioch* school (Diodore* of Tarsus, Theodore* of Mopsuestia) preferred to establish the literal*, historical sense of the text, while still seeking its spiritual meaning, or theoria. Augustine* (354–430) in North Africa sought to develop a new culture based on the Bible, just as the culture of the Greco-Roman world was based on the classics; so too did Chrysostom* and Jerome*. For this they drew on the typological* and allegorical work of earlier Christian interpreters. The struggles of the 4th c. against Arianism* and Eunomianism* inaugurated a new period of conciliar orthodoxy whereby the interpretation of Scripture was controlled no longer by a simple rule* of faith but by decisions of bishops in council.

Christian exegesis of Scripture flourished again in the Middle Ages, in the monasteries and the schools – an emancipation of biblical interpretation from episcopal control. Much of the work centered on the excerpting and collection of patristic interpretation (the glossa). Scripture had a fourfold sense: the literal, the allegorical, the moral, and the anagogical (indicating the progress of the soul to heaven). Thomas Aquinas’s* theological work is based on his exegesis of Scripture as well as on his readings of Aristotle; he shows himself a careful reader of texts, offering a close analysis of, e.g., Paul’s arguments and engaging critically with the interpretations of the glosses.

The Reformation. The Augustinian friar and professor of biblical studies Martin Luther* reasserts the importance of the literal sense of Scripture against the theological readings of the schools. His struggle to understand what Paul meant by (i.e., the literal meaning of) the “righteousness* of God” is resolved by his grammatical analysis of the genitive “of God,” which he takes in context (Rom 1:17) to refer to the gift of God’s righteousness. Close attention to the literal meaning of the text also characterizes Calvin’s* exegesis. Lay readings flourished as the Bible was translated and distributed in printed form. Ecclesiastical control of biblical interpretation became increasingly difficult; powerful lay readings are to be found in the Radical* Reformation. Calvin laid down guidelines for Scriptural interpretation in his hugely influential Institutes. Luther’s influence was transmitted largely through his commentary on Galatians. The groups springing from the Radical Reformation, which privileged lay interpretations of the Bible, flourished in the missionary movement and in North America; they gave rise to the Holiness* movements of the 19th c. and, from them, the Pentecostal* and Charismatic* churches of the 20th c.

The Rise of Critical Readings. The 17th c. saw the rise of critical readings prompted partly by the diversity of interpretations of Scripture with its dire consequences in the religious wars of the 16th and 17th c. in Europe and partly by the expansion of human knowledge of astronomy, geography, and history. The criticisms of Deists and Rationalists* in the 18th c were addressed by the theological faculties in Germany, notably in the biblical critical studies of Semler and Michaelis in the 18th c. and of F. C. Baur* and the Tübingen school in the 19th c. This was often linked with a liberal* theological stance, denying the veracity of miracles*, identifying Christianity with the rise of a new religious self-consciousness, and seeking to give a purely historical, non-supranaturalist account of the origins of the Christian faith. In the early 20th c., such critical readings of Scripture were linked to a more orthodox doctrine of the Word* of God by the Lutheran scholar Rudolf Bultmann*.

JOHN K. RICHES

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Bible Interpretation in Africa follows various approaches and methods, as interpreters seek to relate the Bible to African contexts in order to provide a biblical grounding for the burgeoning African Christianity and spirituality. Consequently, Bible interpretation in Africa is resolutely “intercultural,” seeking to make intelligible the religious texts originating in particular biblical cultures for readers from other cultures and religious contexts in Africa. Intercultural hermeneutics describes the social and cultural factors of the world that prevailed during the composition of biblical stories. Then the culture of the biblical author and that of the target audience can be compared and contrasted. Pairing social realities of the Bible and its world, unveiled through critical analyses, with social realities of the African world promotes a liberation* hermeneutic* of the Bible for African readers and their contexts. The text can then be reread to address contemporary human experiences lived out in Africa, as it has been reread by Western people (including scholars) in their own settings. Such an approach that transcends the gaps between the settings of biblical authors and audience is plausible because a canonical text has a life and meaning of its own, beyond its original cultural context.

Intercultural hermeneutics does not neglect the specific cultural context out of which a biblical text originated in the ancient world. But it goes beyond an investigation of the history of the text. In this hermeneutics, rigorous comparative analysis of the biblical cultural contexts is paired with analysis of the African symbolic universe. The parallels between these two cultural settings confirm that the Bible can function as a transcultural book. Thus this intercultural hermeneutics is both acceptable to academically trained interpreters and valuable for ordinary readers, helping them to relate the Bible message to their cultural and life settings. Yet an intercultural hermeneutics also involves reading with and through the sociocultural eyes of many grassroots Bible groups in Africa, such as youth fellowships and women groups yearning for Christ’s and God’s compassion in their struggle to provide a high-quality ministry for the many caught in the HIV/AIDS tragedy. Consequently, intercultural interpretations of the Bible in Africa elucidate dimensions of biblical texts that are ignored by Western biblical scholarship. The different horizons of reading resulting from the African “symbolic universe” and social contexts yield autochthonous African theological interpretations of the Bible that provide a distinctive heritage for contemporary African Christianity.

UKACHUKWU CHRIS MANUS

Bible Interpretation in Asia. There is a lengthy history of reading, interpreting, and translating the Bible in Asia. However, “Asian biblical interpretation” more narrowly refers to the readings and interpretations of the Bible that give attention to Asian religiocultural, socioeconomic, and political contexts. How do these contexts impinge on the construction of meaning in engagement with the biblical texts? Thus rooted in the broader fields of contextualization* and contextual hermeneutics*, Asian biblical interpretation takes four forms: cultural*, liberationist*, feminist*, and postcolonial*.

Cultural hermeneutics analyze biblical texts in relation to Asian sacred texts and religiocultural realities. C. S. Song and Kosuke Koyama in the 1970s paved the way for such “cross-textual,” “dialogic” approaches. Examples of such readings include the use of native religious concepts in christological thinking (the Hindu concept of avatar [incarnation] or the Confucian concept of Tien-tzu [Son of Heaven]) and Archie C. C. Lee’s cross-textual analysis of the Chinese creation myth of Nu Kua and the biblical narratives of creation.

Liberationist approaches respond to the socioeconomic and political situations of Asia, particularly the significant poverty* level and the history of oppressive governments. In Korea, for example, the liberationist Minjung* theology was used as a lens in the analysis of the Exodus narrative in the OT and of the social classes in the NT. In India, Dalit* theology invites a dialogic comparison of the Dalits with the oppressed and ostracized segments of society in Matthew’s gospel.

Feminist perspectives address the issue of gender inequality in the social fabric of Asian cultures in the critical engagement of biblical texts. Attending to the experiences of women in the intersection of sex, gender, and power, Asian feminist biblical interpretations take on such issues as the unequal treatment of women and men in Confucian* societies, the abuse suffered by Korean comfort women, the disparity of the legal system in Japan in how matters of sexuality* were and are dealt with among women and men, or the multileveled oppression of Dalit* women in India* (see the present cluster: Bible Interpretation in Asia: By Asian Women).

Postcolonial hermeneutical studies seek to address the history of colonial domination in Asia. Among the many Asian biblical scholars at the forefront of postcolonial studies, R. S. Sugirtharajah has noted various types of postcolonial readings of the Bible: dissident, resistant, heritagist, nationalist, liberationist, and dissident. An example of this is the reading the Book of Daniel as resistance literature.

JEFFREY KAH-JIN KUAN

Bible Interpretation in Asia: By Asian Women. As a result of the Evangelical missionary heritage, most Asian Christian women belong to Evangelical traditions, which espouse a literal* interpretation of the Bible and revere Scripture* as the Word* of God and the authority in religious matters and moral life. Although these women may not challenge the patriarchal background of the Bible (see Patriarchy and Christianity), some have found elements of the Bible that affirm women’s dignity, such as the teaching that women and men are created in the image* of God and that Jesus befriends women, and teaches and heals them.

Feminist consciousness emerged among Asian Christian women in the 1970s, as they began reading the Bible in the struggle for justice* and democracy* and in the fight for women’s ordination* and equality in the church. Christian women reclaimed powerful and courageous biblical women, such as Miriam*, Deborah*, Mary*, and other women leaders of the early church, as role models. In Bible studies and women’s gatherings, women appropriate the tradition of oral interpretation of scriptures in Asian cultures by retelling, dramatizing, and performing stories of biblical women, giving them voice and subjectivity. Through a process of dialogic imagination, they bring biblical stories and Asian stories into creative interaction with one another.

Asian feminist scholars have used insights from sociopolitical analysis and cultural anthropology to show that a patriarchal social structure defined by honor* and shame can be found in both the NT and some Asian societies today. For example, cultic purity and blood pollution condemned as social outcasts the hemorrhaging woman and the Syrophoenician woman as described in the Gospels.

By discovering the cultural dynamics that shape the biblical narratives and the similarities with Asian cultures, these scholars demonstrate the commonalities of struggles between biblical and Asian women.

Other interpreters use postcolonial* criticism in feminist biblical interpretation, paying attention to the use of the Bible in empire building and colonialism. They challenge Western scholars' complicity in supporting colonial ideology* by glossing over the imperial context and agenda. They study biblical women in the "contact zone," such as Rahab and Ruth*, the Egyptian slave girl as migrant worker, and other women suppressed or marginalized in the narrative. They investigate the deployment of gender to support class interests, concentration of power, and colonial domination. Reading the Bible as a complex ideological text, they present reconstructive readings as counternarrative and highlight liberative readings not only by experts, but also by ordinary women readers.

KWOK PUI-LAN

Bible Interpretation in Eastern Orthodoxy. The basic principles of Orthodox biblical hermeneutics include the following:

- Holy Scripture* is an incarnation* of God's Logos*. This is a fundamental christological understanding of the nature of Scripture. The divine Logos truly speaks in the words of sacred Scriptures and is active through them in the reader (see Incarnation Cluster: In the Orthodox Tradition).
- Scripture's use of human words is an expression of God's condescension toward us. This perception of sacred Scripture opens the way to an interpretation that postulates a multiplicity of meanings of the biblical texts. The same sacred text has a different sense each time it is read, the variation reflecting the differences in readers' mystical* relation to God. This posits a specific kind of objectivity: that of the concrete relation between human and God in Christ.
- Scripture and the divine knowledge it mediates are situated in the sacramental* context of the church, which means that Scripture is also sacramental. This sacramental perception of the divine truth in Scripture is synergetic: it is a gift of the Spirit, but at the same time it depends on our worthiness (holiness).

- Scripture is uniformly inspired and, indeed, "written" by the Spirit, yet expressed in the language of the human author. The Orthodox understand Scripture's inspiration* as synergetic or theanthropic, i.e. the fruit of the cooperation between God and human authors. Consequently, as divine, Scripture has to be treated with reverence and obedience. Since Scripture is truly the Word of God, our response to it cannot but be one of obedience, receptivity, and listening. However, the Bible is also human; thus there is room for honest and exact critical inquiry in biblical study.
- Scripture is the unique "canon* of truth" or "rule* of faith," but this does not exclude the conviction that genuine tradition* (paradosis) is also, in a certain sense, "inspired." The tradition, identified as the "apostolic gospel," is the "living memory of the church." Scripture and tradition are neither mutually exclusive nor complementary. Their relationship can be described neither as Scripture or tradition, nor as Scripture and tradition, but as Scripture in tradition. A firm Orthodox hermeneutical principle is that biblical writings can be properly interpreted only in the frame of Holy Tradition.
- The "hermeneutical bridge" that reactualizes the biblical event in the church across centuries is none other than the Holy* Spirit. It is only in collaboration with the Holy Spirit that exegetes can discern the spiritual meaning of Scripture. The interpretative vision that tries to discern the spiritual significance of God's Word is theoria, i.e. contemplation*. The patristic theoria is not really a method, but a spiritual perception inspired by the Holy Spirit (see Patristic Thought in Orthodox Christianity).

- Jesus Christ the Lord, the very object of Scripture, is also the one who gives access to its truth through the Holy Spirit. The spiritual sense of Scripture is therefore nothing else than its *christological sense, a manifold sense that is revealed in Christ himself. Christ, who is theanthropos (God incarnated), is therefore the foundation and the norm of Orthodox Bible interpretation.
- The church* is the place where Scripture becomes contemporary and effective to every person and community. Outside the church's life, one can never say what Scripture really is and how it is to be understood or interpreted. One can read the Bible individually, but not as an isolated individual. One reads it as members of the church. What is true for every member of the church is also true for its theologians. The decisive test and criterion for any interpretation of the Scripture is the "mind of the church."

VASILE MIHOC

Bible Interpretation in Latin America.

A complete outline of biblical interpretation types in Latin America would include imported readings oblivious to the context, readings favoring marginalization in God's name, and literalistic, academic, and liberationist* readings. Liberationist readings are distinctive of Latin America. The 1960s and 1970s were times of liberation movements, followed by dictatorships, persecution, and, lately, submission through neoliberalism. The continent suffers from poverty*, illiteracy, and several forms of slavery*. Rampant neoliberal depletion of resources is followed by a general political move toward nationalism. These contextual facts explicitly influence Latin American interpretation, even more than the Roman Catholic or Evangelical confession of the interpreters.

Latin American Bible interpretation stands on three legs: readers' life realities, the Bible, and faith communities.

Alongside their academic work, most professional exegetes are engaged in some sort of reading with marginalized people: women, the homeless, peasants, prostitutes, street children, slum dwellers, Native Americans, African Americans, etc. Since interpretation starts with readers' situations rather than with historicocritical exegesis, these groups deeply permeate professional readers' views on the texts and consequently their approaches to them.

Similarly, reading with Base* Ecclesial Communities (Roman Catholic) and with poor congregations (Evangelical) is distinctive because the participants' interests and concerns – not the text and not the professional leader – determine the agenda. God has met people in their daily lives before they meet the Bible. Text and daily struggles feed each other during question-and-answer periods, so that people leave the sessions with a deeper understanding of both. The different priorities of these readings generate tensions with official church teachings (mostly Roman Catholic) and with academic studies because of the danger of overemphasizing the subjective (experiences, needs, sufferings) over the objective (text, programs, churches' agendas) and the requirement of truly trusting the people's understanding and wisdom.

Socioeconomic readings seek to address issues of socioeconomic justice* from the prophetic words of the First and Second Testaments. The deep differences that split the world today are systemic. With input from the social sciences, socioeconomic readings take sides with the deprived. They generate tensions owing to three factors: the world sets people apart; we see each other through ideologies*; and there is an increasing awareness of the complexity of any analysis.

Another approach, liberation within liberation, focuses on the concerns of particular groups – women, Native Americans, African Americans – as well as concerns related to gender orientation and ecological issues. Tensions arise as these voices struggle to gain recognition within a hermeneutical milieu theoretically open to those without a voice.

MERCEDES L. GARCÍA BACHMANN

Bible Interpretation in North America.

Until the 1970s, secular scholarly interpretation of the Bible in the USA and Canada was dominated by historical-critical methods (see Historiography of Early Christianity as Developed in the 19th and 20th Centuries). A secular “space” for critical approaches had been carved out through long, bitter battles with church interests since the 19th c.

In church-related institutions, there is still an uneven acceptance of biblical criticism, and often none at all. The immense amount of lay interpretation in faith communities was largely and is increasingly fundamentalist* with (in the USA) an unacknowledged “American inculturation*.” There was (and still is) little connection between grassroots church uses of the Bible and the secular discipline of biblical criticism. The Society of Biblical Literature (SBL), the main organizing body for critical interpretation, is unrelated to any church structure.

In the 1970s, the historical-critical consensus began to be challenged from three sides: literary* criticism, including structuralism*; feminism*; and the social* sciences. Out of these impulses a dizzying variety of approaches were developed: reader-response, canonical, and rhetorical criticism; semiotic*, poststructural, and deconstructive (postmodern*) methods; political and ideological* (including Marxist*) readings; methods developed in liberation* struggles, including black interpretation; womanist*, queer*, and other gendered approaches; and psychological* methods. The SBL has become the world center for scholarly biblical interpretation of every kind, bringing together scholars from many parts of the world, using many approaches, including approaches having their origin in the Two-thirds World. New methods with intrinsic “cross-cultural” dimensions, including postcolonial* readings and cultural* studies, have been strengthened by the participation of Two-thirds World scholars.

North America provides accessible meeting places for Two-thirds World scholars, many of whom are located there as expatriates. This is both a gift and a problem. One problem is that an overwhelming proportion of global biblical scholarly discussion is in the English language. One gift is that some of the new methods, especially those emerging from liberation struggles, have surmounted the strict separation of scholarly and church engagement with Scripture*, even as it has challenged the fundamentalist view of Scripture* and its roles. Black biblical scholars in the USA, for example, are usually very active in churches. The development of the newer approaches has not meant the disappearance of historical criticism, which is still dominant in scholarly discourse. There is a division between its practitioners and exponents of the newer methods, marked, for example, by SBL’s two major journals, the Journal of Biblical Literature (still relatively traditional) and Semeia (created in the 1970s as a vehicle for “experimental” methods).

DAVID JOBLING

Bible Interpretation in North America: African American. African Americans’ engagement of the Bible should be understood not merely as textual interpretation but as a people’s “readings” of the worlds they were first forced to negotiate but then self-authorized to reshape for their affirmation. A schema of historical readings – of text and social texture – can help isolate the sentiments, practices, and orientations of a large segment of the people now called “African Americans.”

First Reading: Awe and Fear. From the beginning of their contact and subsequent captivity in 16th-c. Western Africa and their transition to the Americas, where they experienced slavery* and subjugation, peoples of African descent were confronted with the colonizing, civilizing, and missionizing practices of European slavocracy. One of the most important instruments in such efforts was the Bible, common to all European slave-trading nations. Testimonies from European sailors, teachers, and missionaries, on the one hand, and from African diaspora autobiographies, on the other, register the Africans’ initial lack of understanding of, and uneasy socialization into, European socioreligious orientations. The conventional literacy presupposed by these cultures at first clearly frustrated the “conversion” of the African slaves. The latter were, on the whole, incapable of meeting the literacy requirements for conversion* and participation; even more importantly, they did not seem emotionally disposed toward the book-based religions of the slavers. The notion of divine communication effected through a book was deemed odd, awesome, fascinating, but also full of potential for world negotiation.

Second Reading: Critique and Accommodation. It was not until the late 18th c., with the phenomenal growth of Dissenting* and Evangelical* movements in England and the USA, that enslaved and formerly enslaved Africans began to engage the Bible on a large scale. Finding themselves directly appealed to by the new Evangelicals and revivalists* in vivid, emotional biblical language, and noting that nearly the entire white world explained its power and authority by appeal to the Bible, the Africans in North America engaged it. They soon came to transform the Bible from the book of the religions of the white aristocratic slavers and lower-class dissenting exhorters into their special source of psychic and spiritual power, inspiration* for learning, and language of stinging, if veiled, critique.

This reading extends well into the late 20th c. It encompasses the founding of the independent churches and denominations (late 18th c.) and of many schools and colleges (19th c.). It supplied a rhetorical framework for 19th- and early-20th-c. black nationalisms, and it was the ideological foundation for the mid-20th-c. Civil* Rights Movement and campaigns. This reading of the Bible and North American culture expressed considerable ambivalence: it was both social-critical and accommodationist-integrationist.

Third Reading: Splitting the Margins. Another reading was cultivated in the early 20th c., primarily in the urban centers of the USA. It reflected the sentiments of rural and small-town residents who migrated to the big cities in search of better job opportunities and more social freedoms. These displaced individuals formed new religious communities that gave them a sense of solidarity.

The "reading" of the Bible, and of the world, in evidence among such communities was a more critical, even radical attitude about America: there was little hope of full integration into the mainstream. America was seen as racist* and arrogant, and to be rejected as such. Among the movements associated with such an attitude were the Garvey* Movement, Father Divine and the Peace Mission Movement, the Black Jews, the Nation of Islam, the Spiritual churches, and the Pentecostal* Movement.

Fourth Reading: Leaving Race Behind. Emerging in the late 20th c., this reading was and continues to be in many respects a reaction to both the accommodationist and the separatist readings already discussed. Historically primarily Evangelical in their religious sensibilities, including the importance they attached to the Bible, African Americans have nonetheless exhibited more playfulness than doctrinalism and moralism in their interpretations. Yet in much the same way that fundamentalist* practices and beliefs among whites in the early 20th c. represented a rejection of significant aspects of modernism, so within the world of African Americans a turn toward religious fundamentalism – evidenced in the affiliation with and/or imitation of self-styled white fundamentalist churches – has come to represent a rejection or relativization of African Americans' historical experiences and sensibilities.

Fifth Reading: Women's Reading. From Phillis Wheatley to modern womanist* interpreters, women are part of each of the readings distinguished in the preceding sections. Across each of these readings, differences in historical periods, locations, classes, and other factors notwithstanding, women have added special emphases. Among such emphases, none is more perduring and radical than the challenge that African American religious communities consistently apply the moral imperative of defining the universality of the divine economy of salvation without respect to gender.

VINCENT L. WIMBUSH

Bible Interpretation in North America: Latino/a. Latino/a biblical interpretation emerges from the conjunction of biblical studies and racial-ethnic studies. Biblical studies, writ broadly, involve the analysis of biblical texts in terms of production as well as consumption. This task entails not only the academic-scholarly tradition of reading, but also other major reading traditions: the dogmatic-theological, the ecclesial-liturgical, the popular-devotional, and the social-cultural. The task further involves two recent developments in the discipline: (1) an expansion of its mode of inquiry to include, beyond the traditional grand model of historical criticism, a variety of other such models – literary, sociocultural criticism, and ideological criticisms; (2) an expansion of its object of study to include not only the texts of antiquity but also the readings of such texts and the readers behind them in modernity and postmodernity.

Racial-ethnic studies involve the analysis of representations of the Other in the context of migration and the encounter of population groups. This task entails the phenomenon of migration and its processes of racialization and ethnicization that give rise to the problematic of race and ethnicity. This task also entails a set of related issues: the question of ethnoracial identity, the conditions of diaspora* and exile, the role of the state*, and the constructions and relations of dominant and minority groups.

Latino/a biblical interpretation is thus grounded in biblical ideological* criticism and racial-ethnic minority studies. Within biblical studies, ideological criticism foregrounds power relations in society and culture, with minority criticism focusing on racial-ethnic constructions and relations. Within racial-ethnic studies, minority studies highlight the mechanics and dynamics of dominant-minority formations within a state, with Latino/a studies focusing on the Latino/a population within the USA. Latino/a biblical interpretation thus constitutes an exercise in minority criticism from the perspective of the Latino/a community in the country (see Racism and Christianity Cluster).

As such, Latino/a biblical interpretation has as its base an ever-growing number of residents of Latin American origin or descent, presently constituting the largest minority group in the USA and projected to become a fourth of the population by midcentury. The group hails from all nations of Latin America and finds itself in the country as a result of conquest and migration. From this base, it examines issues of social-cultural domination and subordination in the ancient texts as well as in modern and postmodern readings and readers; it also examines uses of the Bible across the academic-scholarly and all other reading traditions of the Bible on the part of Latinos/as.

FERNANDO F. SEGOVIA

Bible Interpretation in North America and Western Europe: Queer.

Queer interpretation challenges the assumption that biblical texts must be read in ways that conform to certain normative views about sex, gender, and sexuality*. Emerging in the wake of such trends as feminist* hermeneutics and increased attention to the social location of readers, queer biblical interpretation is often associated with movements for the social and religious inclusion of lesbians, gay men, and bisexuals.

“Queer” was sometimes used in the past as a pejorative term for persons known to engage, or suspected of engaging, in homosexual* practice. Instead, the word now functions as a rallying point for those who affirm such practice or contest the assumed normativity of heterosexuality.

Queer readings of the Bible may oppose the use of biblical interpretation to condemn homosexuality, or may reread biblical texts in the light of lesbian, gay, or bisexual experiences. However, as the reference to “bisexual” indicates, queer biblical interpretation also builds on queer theory’s interrogation of rigid, dualistic distinctions associated with sex (e.g. “male” vs. “female”), gender (e.g. “masculine” vs. “feminine”), or sexuality (e.g. “heterosexual” vs. “homosexual,” or “straight” vs. “gay”). Consequently, queer biblical interpretation can also take its point of departure from “transgender” persons and phenomena (e.g. intersexuals and transsexuals). Queer biblical interpretation is therefore defined more by its opposition to, or interrogation of, narrow views of sex, gender, and sexuality than by the sexual or gendered identities of its practitioners. In principle, at least, such interpretation can be carried out by persons of any gender or sexual preference.

Although queer biblical interpretation is in many respects distinct from traditional interpretation, it does share certain emphases with historical-critical approaches to the Bible. Like historical criticism, queer interpretation recognizes that the Bible was written in a distant historical context and is shaped by socio-cultural assumptions that do not always conform to later orthodoxies. For example, whereas modern religious readers valorize monogamous heterosexual marriage, the HB tolerates polygyny, concubinage, and prostitution; and NT passages state a preference for celibacy over marriage. Both testaments make presuppositions about marriage and kinship quite distinct from those informing modern debates about, e.g., "gay marriage." Thus while some queer interpretations attempt to re-read biblical texts to make them more useful for contemporary contexts, other queer readings highlight the historical gap between biblical texts and modern contexts to suggest that biblical norms of sex, gender, and kinship cannot be imposed simplistically on the modern world.

KEN STONE

Bible Interpretation in Oceania is rippling in several places away from dominant Western hermeneutical waves. Most of these ripples are in revolt.

Attention to location (on land, in the ocean, along the edges) has stirred interested interpretations. For example, M. E. Andrew has joined the party that seeks to settle the Bible in Aotearoa/New Zealand, and the volumes of The Earth Bible (ed. Norman C. Habel), gathered in Australia, have raised the cries of earth and country against human neglect and abuse.

The joys of storytelling, a popular pastime in oral cultures, lurk behind the assault on the documentary hypothesis by Anthony F. Campbell and Mark A. O'Brien, who read the sources of the Pentateuch* not as end products that signal their origins but as bases for ongoing reflection and storytelling.

Several interpreters knock on the doors of critical theory (e.g. Roland Boer) and offer healing stepping-stones for the causes of women and native people (e.g. Elaine M. Wainwright, Judith E. McKinlay, and Mark G. Brett).

The Rainbow Spirit Elders (Australia) set indigenous stories and artworks alongside biblical stories. The complete range of indigenous interpretations, however, is not available in writing, partly because the public does not accommodate the languages and orality of the native people of Oceania.

JIONE HAVEA

Bible Interpretation in Western Europe

is heir to more than two centuries of fierce intellectual struggle between churches and their critics. This battle was fought principally in theological faculties controlled by Protestant state* churches, notably Lutheran churches in Germany*. With the decline of state churches, free* churches and lay groups assumed greater prominence.

In academic circles, historical*-critical studies predominate, embracing since the 1980s social-historical studies and reception* history of the Bible. There has been some interest in ahistorical literary studies of the Bible (structuralist, poststructuralist, deconstructionist, and narrative readings).

Controversy surrounds the theological interpretation of the Bible. Stendahl and Räisänen argue that NT scholars should study the history of early Christianity, not exclusively the canonical texts; theological interpretation should come after this historical study. Theissen offers an evolutionary account of the emergence of early Christian religion from its Jewish matrix, an account open to theological interpretation. Others (e.g. Watson) argue that biblical interpretation, properly a matter for the church, should be conducted within the framework of trinitarian* belief. In the shadow of the Holocaust*, Stendahl attacked Lutheran interpretations of Paul linked to negative portrayals of Judaism.

Mainstream state churches have relied largely on the universities to train their ministers and provide instruction to their laity. Theological faculties were controlled by the churches, leading to a denominationalization of theological departments, though greater ecumenical cooperation has developed since the 1960s (in the Protestant–Catholic ecumenical commentary series Evangelisch-Katholischer Kommentar). In the UK, ecclesiastical control has loosened since the 1980s.

Roman Catholic scholarship has flowered since Vatican* II (Schnackenburg, Gnllka, Pesch), as church controls were (temporarily) lifted. The Bible continues to play an important role in inner-church conflict (ordination* of women, gay men, and lesbians). Calvinist and Puritan* theologies, developed when Reformation churches were state* churches (between the 16th and 20th c.), continue to exercise great influence in such debates, particularly through the view that the OT law has continuing authority over the church.

“Nonofficial” ecclesial interpretations have flourished among Methodist and Pentecostal* churches, in a Holiness* tradition reacting to Calvinism. Evangelical* groups (both lay and clergy, e.g. InterVarsity Fellowship) have promoted a more thoroughgoing Reformed reading of Scripture. Other lay groups, such as feminist* and contextual* Bible study groups, draw on Liberationist* theologies.

JOHN K. RICHES

Bible Interpretation Worldwide: Feminist. Feminist interpretation, using a hermeneutic* of suspicion, questions the theological teachings of the Bible concerning women, which create and sustain patriarchy*. Originally Western, it is now practiced in academic circles, denominations, and churches worldwide. Early work was rightly criticized for its ethnocentrism, anti-Semitism*, disregard of class and race*, and assumption of a “universal condition” of women. Feminist interpretation nevertheless served as a point of departure for Christians globally, inspiring many to begin their own process of naming themselves, their goals, their methods, and their varied relationships to the Bible. The main methods include (1) literary studies, (2) sociohistorical studies, and (3) psychological/pastoral approaches.

1. Feminist interpretation is uniquely concerned about texts which suggest that women are the origin of all sin (Gen 2–3; 1 Tim 2:10–15), that their primary function is childbearing, and that submission to men is a reasonable part of God’s creation, not to be questioned or reformed (1 Cor 14:34–35; 1 Pet 3:1–7). By retrieving positive portraits of women in the Bible, interpreters demonstrated that women’s contributions to the religious and social worlds went far beyond childbearing (cf. Exod 1–2; 15; Judg 4–5; Luke 24). “De-patriarchalizing” the Bible meant the juxtaposition of texts like Gal 3:27–28 with Gal 3:26, where the goal of all Christians is to become “sons” of God. Inclusive and gender-sensitive translations* were made. The canon* was reopened to explore neglected texts or traditions (roles of female prophets*; female apostles* like Junia* and Thecla*), and questions about female authorship (Ruth*, Song* of Songs) were posed. Ultimately, the accuracy and adequacy of gendered language in theology were cast into serious doubt.
2. Interpreters focus on the social functions of patriarchy* in the history of the cultures that formed the Bible, sometimes concluding that the Bible itself resists this form of oppression. In the HB, women were shown to possess worth and dignity; studies of the Jesus Movement emphasized its egalitarian possibilities. Comparisons with polytheistic societies raised the issue of monotheism* and its historical relationship to goddess traditions.
3. The largely patriarchal biblical text is examined for women’s specialized and general religious experiences, using the psychology of women. Interpreters critique and enlarge the Bible’s view of women’s spirituality. Woman Wisdom* was retrieved as a cosmic role model, and Jesus became a “female-identified” messiah adequate to women’s needs. Gender was exposed as a social construct (unlike “sex”), and not a divine mandate. See also STANTON, ELIZABETH CADY. CAROLE FONTAINE

BIBLE AND OTHER “SCRIPTURES”

See AFRICAN RELIGION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; BUDDHISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; CONFUCIANISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; DAOISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; HELLENISTIC RELIGIOUS TRADITIONS AND CHRISTIANITY’S SELF-DEFINITION; HINDUISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER; QUR’AN AND CHRISTIANITY. See also LITERATURE AND CHRISTIANITY

BIBLE TRANSLATIONS CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Bible Translations, History of

2) A Sampling of Bible Translations

Bible, Early Translations/Versions

Bible, English Translations

Bible, Present-Day Translations in Africa

1) Introductory Entry

Bible Translations, History of. The Christian faith “never exists except as translated into a culture*” (Bosch); Bible translation is part of this process.

Translation is an intercultural-mediated communication. Bible translation aims at sharing information and fostering communication among sender/author, messenger/translator, and receiver/reader, but not as a one-way process. Its intercultural mediation involves a give and take. Because there is never a one-to-one word correspondence between two languages, any translation process includes some degree of deletion, distortion, generalization, specification, or equivalence, and thus of interpretation. Translation of OT Hebrew and Aramaic texts and of NT Greek texts into other languages is a literary and artistic activity that creatively converts a source text into another text in another language.

The history of Bible translations begins with scribes interpreting orally the Hebrew text in Aramaic, the common language at that time (Neh 8:8; 5th c. BCE). Written Hebrew–Aramaic Bible translation (paraphrase) originated with the Targum (beginning in the early 3rd c. BCE), still within the same cultural family, Semitic culture. Bible translation became more clearly intercultural with the Septuagint* (LXX; 3rd c. BCE); the translation of the HB into Greek bridges Semitic and Hellenistic cultures, but still with a Jewish audience – possibly the Jewish Diaspora in Alexandria. The result of teamwork (traditionally, 70 or 72 translators), LXX was most influential and triggered the development of Bible translations.

For the early church, LXX served as the only sacred Scripture, was quoted by the NT writers, then was augmented by the NT books to constitute a complete Christian canon*. Many OT Versions were based on LXX, including the Old* Latin (late 2nd c.), Coptic (c2nd c.), Ethiopic (Amharic; c4th c.), Gothic (5th c.), Armenian (5th c.), Georgian (6th c.), Syriac (7th c.), and Slavic (from 9th c.) Versions. Nevertheless, the need for Christian Scriptures translated from the original language was felt by many early church communities – the Syriac Peshitta* (2nd c.), Jerome’s* Latin “Vulgate*” (5th c.), Saadia ha Gaon’s Arabic version (10th c.), and Rabbi Jacob Tawus’s Persian version (16th c.). Vulgate gradually acquired the prestige previously reserved for LXX and Peshitta. After extensive use in the Western Church, it was recognized as authoritative by the Council of Trent* (1546).

The Eastern and Western churches were influenced primarily by LXX and Vulgate until the advent of “mixed translations” based on eclectic source texts (Hebrew manuscripts, LXX, Greek NT, Vulgate, and existing translations). The first complete mixed-translation Bibles include those in English (Oxford, 1380), German (Constance, 1450), Italian (Venice, 1471), Spanish (Valencia, 1478), French (Antwerp, 1530), Dutch (1526, Antwerp), Portuguese (Lisbon, 1784), Chinese (Serampur, 1815–22), Malagasy (1835), Tswana (1857), Ga (Accra, 1866), Swahili (London, 1895), Tamil (1796), Hindi (Serampur, 1866–69), and Zulu (1883). This eclectic tendency is still rampant. In English, the first Bible translation fully based on original languages is attributed to William Tyndale (1526–34), superseded by the King James Version (1611), the Bible for English-speaking countries for about 250 years.

Bible translations and interpretations (hermeneutics*) are intertwined, presupposing each other. The translators' exegetical* choices reflect hermeneutical* and cultural choices. For instance, LXX reflects an effort to understand the text in terms of the Hellenistic* culture when it translates the Hebrew description of the earth in Gen 1:2 as "invisible and disorganized" ("empty and void" and "formless chaos" are other possibilities) and the divine name (Exod 3:14) as "I Am the Existing One." Similarly Jerome, despite his claim to have changed nothing in the message of the OT Hebrew texts, acknowledges that his renderings rely on the authority of the Holy Spirit, the Gospels, and the apostles (as understood in the Western Church).

Recent developments in hermeneutical theories have made significant contributions to Bible translation by making explicit its interdisciplinary character. Nida's functional equivalence (or common language) translation theory views translation as reproducing in the receptor language the closest "natural equivalent" of the source language message. The primary goal is to make the translation "clear and natural," while remaining faithful to the original. In the Swahili language, which has no articles, the words mwana wa mtu (son of man, human being) are a clear, natural Swahili rendering of the Greek NT phrase ho huios tou anthropou (literally, "the son of the man") and a faithful rendering of the original Hebrew/Aramaic phrase behind it. Despite inappropriate uses at times, the functional equivalence approach produced popular versions that the majority of Bible readers have used for half a century. They include the "Good News

Bible," "Français Courant," "Die Gute Nachrichte," and "Swahili Habari Njema." Yet competing translation theories have emerged, including literalist, functionalist, descriptive, text-linguistic, relevance, interpretive, comparative, and literary-rhetorical approaches. Each is multidisciplinary (even the literalist approach) and requires biblical exegesis*, translation studies, linguistics, anthropology*, information technology, etc.

In sum, throughout history, Bible translations have shown a preference for common language, and a thirst for translating from original languages and for church-oriented translations, performed by competent translators/interpreters.

JEAN-CLAUDE LOBA-MKOLE

2) A Sampling of Bible Translations

Bible, Early Translations/Versions. As the HB (in Hebrew and Aramaic) migrated beyond the borders of Palestine, translations were required. In the 3rd c. BCE, the Septuagint* (LXX) version emerged as the Bible for Greek-speaking Jews in Egypt. At the same time, Aramaic-speaking Jews living in Palestine and the Babylonian Diaspora* translated the Pentateuch and most other books of the HB into Aramaic, creating a version known as the Targums* (the Babylonian Targums [Onqelos and Jonathan, 4th–5th c. CE] and the Palestinian Targums [Neofiti, 3rd–4th c. CE and Pseudo-Jonathan, 8th c. CE]). A targum to Job found at Qumran (11Q¹⁰Job) is among the earliest witnesses to this translation activity. The Jews in Edessa* translated the HB into Syriac (the Peshitta* OT, late 2nd c. CE). The NT (written in Greek) with its missionary emphasis required immediate translation. As the Gospels traveled east of Jerusalem, they were translated into Syriac – Tatian's* gospel harmony, the Diatessaron* (c170), the Vetus Syra containing the four Gospels (3rd c.), and later the Peshitta* containing 22 books of the NT (5th c.). As the Bible traveled west to Egypt and across North Africa and into Spain and Gaul, it was translated into Coptic (3rd c.) and Latin (the Old* Latin version, late 2nd c.). Jerome's* Vulgate* (late 4th c.) provided a fresh translation of the OT and a revision of the Old Latin for the NT. For biblical scholars, these Versions witness to the stages in the development of the Hebrew text. More importantly, they witness to the reception of the Bible into various cultures, as they include fascinating readings (the Palestinian Targums, e.g., are replete with explanatory readings) that render the Bible comprehensible to its target audiences.

CRAIG E. MORRISON, O.Carm.

Bible, English Translations. John Wyclif* and his followers were the first to translate the Latin Bible into English (c1382). Without the printing press and with extreme opposition to his views, Wyclif's reforms failed to flourish. Yet John Colet's success in teaching Paul's epistles in the English vernacular (early 16th c.) convinced Erasmus* of the need for the Bible in the language(s) of the people.

William Tyndale's* NT in English (1526) drew primarily on the NTs of Erasmus (1516, Greek) and Luther* (1522, German). Though it was not acceptable to print Scripture in English in England during this period, Tyndale rendered the text brilliantly and in a style of English that excited and inspired readers, illustrating with woodcuts to further engage the reader and illuminate the texts. After Tyndale's martyrdom (1536), his friend John Rogers published the "Matthew's Bible" (Matthew being a pseudonym for Tyndale).

Miles Coverdale, who was the first to publish the full Bible in English (1535), published the "Great Bible" (1539) based on the "Matthew's Bible," with improvements.

After the suppressions of Queen Mary*, Queen Elizabeth* (enthroned, 1557) tolerated the English Bible. The first domestic printing (1576) of the Geneva Bible (1560), a popular and important translation, was the first English-language Bible to have verse divisions; it included thousands of reformers' notes and references.

The first NT in English specifically for Catholics was published (1582) in Rheims (France). The OT was delayed until 1609–10, when it appeared in Douai (France).

The King James Bible (1611) dominated English Bibles for 350 years and remains the most important and influential book in the history of the English language.

The Revised Version (1885) and American Standard Version (1901) challenged the King James's supremacy, particularly among scholars. The most significant alteration was the elimination of the Apocrypha*, reducing the English Bible in most future Protestant translations from 80 to 66 books. Significant translations, owing to their attention to contemporary language issues, are the Revised Standard Version (1952); the New American Bible (1970, 2000), the official translation of the Roman Catholic Church; the New American Standard Bible (1971, 1995); the Good News Translation (1976); the New International Version (1978), which surpassed the King James Version as the best-selling English Bible by the beginning of the 21st c.; the New King James (1982); and the New Revised Standard Version (1989). Over the 25 years between 1982 and 2007, numerous translations appeared, as did revisions of existing translations. (See the Bibliography for a list of the major English translations.)

CRAIG LAMPE

Bible, Present-Day Translations in Africa.

The Bible is an African book read at least in part in 665 of Africa's estimated 2,000 languages (153 entire Bibles and 293 NTs in 2003). The first translation of the Bible in Africa, the Greek Septuagint*, served primarily Jewish believers. Subsequent African translations (including Old* Latin, 2nd c.; Coptic, 2nd c.; and Ethiopian translations, c4th c.) served the needs of African churches in evangelism, teaching, and social transformation. The next wave of translations, linked to the 19th-c. missionary movement, played an essential role in the Christianization of Africa. Most African translations are now indigenous African translations (done by native speakers) and contribute to the inculturation* of Christianity. Translators developed theological lexicons proposing indigenous key terms and local equivalents for biblical features: the names and central metaphors for God and other spiritual beings, concepts, practices, festivals, rituals, and social roles. This was no easy task. For instance, to render the name of God, translators grappled with female gods such as Looa of the Iraqw of Tanzania; borrowed God's name from neighboring groups (for fear that their own was evil and unacceptable); and at times used wrong names (e.g. mistaking the Acoli traditional hunchback spirit with the creator God). Key concepts also posed serious problems; e.g. translating "holiness" in the Kenyan Luo and Luyia dialects as "white" or "clean" (hence "white or clean spirit" for "Holy Spirit") is problematic. Nevertheless, Christianity in Africa owes much to these African translations. ALOO OSOTSI MOJOLA

Biblical Commission. See PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION.

Biblical Theology refers to the theology found in the Bible or theology that aims to be deeply imbued with the Bible. Theology found in the Bible can be dense (e.g. Paul's* letters) or can emerge through narrative (e.g. the historical books of the OT). The difference between the OT and the NT raises the question that has existed since the 2nd c.: Are the two testaments ultimately coherent? Marcion* said no and produced his short version of the NT (Luke* and various letters of Paul). This also implied a denial of the theological coherence of the 27 NT books gathered later in the canon. Without following Marcion's massive reductionism, some have argued that the theological perspectives of NT authors differ so much as even to be irreconcilable (e.g. Paul and James* on the theological value of "works") (see New Testament Theology).

Those who, like Irenaeus* (died c200), read the two testaments as a coherent whole find unity in diversity through the Christ event. With various qualifications, they follow the NT authors by interpreting the Christ event in the light of the OT and reinterpreting the OT in the light of the Christ event. Some pursue this task by examining such themes as covenant*, creation*, faith*, promise, redemption*, sacrifice*, and salvation*, which are seen differently and more richly in the light of Christ.

One must ask: Are there only theologies (plural) of the OT and theologies of the NT? Or were many scholars correct in writing books entitled Old Testament Theology (singular) and New Testament Theology? Or should one see, with Brevard Childs, a unity, a biblical theology of the Old and New Testament?

Those drawing theology from the Bible should ask: Are they interpreting the Scriptures* as church members and in the light of Christian faith (including belief in Scripture as the inspired* Word* of God)? Do they draw theology from the whole canon, from a canon within the canon, or even from some reconstructed "original" form of the biblical text? Ten principles developed by O'Collins and Kendall indicate how theology makes the study of scriptures "the soul of theology." GERALD O'COLLINS, SJ

Biel, Gabriel (c1420–95), Scholastic theologian, follower of William* of Ockham, commentator on Peter* Lombard's Sentences. He studied at Heidelberg, Erfurt, and Cologne, became a member of the Brethren* of the Common Life, and was a founder of the University of Tübingen. One of the last of the Nominalists*, he influenced Luther*.

Bigamy. See POLYGAMY AND CHRISTIANITY.

Binding and Loosing, authority given to Peter (Matt 16:19) and the church (Matt 18:18) to forgive or retain sins, employed in excommunication*, penance*, and readmission to Communion.

Unitarianism, a belief in God as Father and Son, either ignoring the Holy Spirit or denying the Spirit's divinity. See also PNEUMATOMACHI.

Biomedical Ethics. Christian theologians helped establish the field of bioethics. Joseph Fletcher and Paul Ramsey were two of the early Protestant founders, though Roman Catholic moralists had long discussed ethical issues in medical contexts. Distinctions made within that tradition, such as "ordinary" versus "extraordinary" means of sustaining life, helped shape medical practice and law. Since the 1970s, the field of bioethics has been dominated by the application of four principles: respect for persons (also called respect for autonomy*), beneficence (doing good), nonmaleficence (avoiding harm), and justice*. The understanding of these principles has increasingly been dominated by philosophical discussion, but Christian voices continue to be important in selected issues such as cloning and stem cell research.

Christians do not speak with a unified voice on bioethical issues. Abortion*, cloning, and the use of stem cells have been particularly controversial. On the grounds that all human life is “made in God’s image*” and that none should be devalued, some Christians reject any destruction of early human life, inside or outside the womb, and Catholic hospitals may refuse to perform abortions. Many Christians believe in a form of “natural* law” that prohibits interference with God’s ordained order for human life; hence, they may reject sterilization or artificial modes of reproduction. Other Christians countenance abortion, sterilization, and new modes of reproduction such as in vitro fertilization and artificial insemination under limited circumstances. Stressing human freedom while mindful of human sinfulness, they argue that God gives us power to invent new means of human well-being and that new technologies can contribute to human fulfillment (such as childbearing). Increasingly, Christian commentators have emphasized the centrality of justice* issues in bioethics, with attention to the global impact of new technologies on women* and other oppressed groups. Christian feminists* have joined philosophical feminists in arguing for the priority of oppression and liberation as concerns in bioethics, while other Christian voices remain dedicated to the protection of embryonic life and of “traditional” lifestyles, including those of sexual reproduction. At stake in some debates is a basic tension between understanding humans as “stewards” of an original creation given by God and understanding them as “co-creators” who are free to shape new directions in human life.

In the USA and elsewhere, Christians have contributed to the shaping of public policy on bioethics by serving on the National Commission for the Protection of Human Subjects of Biomedical and Behavioral Research and on the President’s Council on Bioethics. See also ABORTION; BIRTH CONTROL AND CONTRACEPTION, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF; BODY; ETHICS CLUSTER AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

KAREN LEBACQZ

Biretta, square, rounded cap worn by Roman clergy: white for priests, purple for bishops, red for cardinals.

Birgitta (1303–73), religious “feminist,” Swedish medieval mystic, monastic founder; canonized (1391, Boniface IX) and named Europe’s patron saint (1999, John Paul II). She corrected patriarchal* God narrative by introducing a model for female humanity at the divine level and a maternal genealogy in her “Gospel of Mary.” Her vision of Christ’s birth, told from Mary’s perspective (Revelaciones VII:21), changed Christian iconography*. Her insistence on the mother’s participation in her Son’s redemptive suffering on the cross (I:10, IV:70, VII:15) is audaciously original.

Born and married into Swedish nobility, mother of eight children, and then widowed, she moved to Rome (1349–73) to promote her order. This Mariocentric double*-monastery Bridgettine order (Regula Saluatoris) is gynecentric; the abbess, as Mary’s representative, rules over nuns, priests, deacons, and lay brothers. The order, accepted by Urban V (1370) as an addition to the Augustinian* Rule, spread rapidly through Europe.

Birgitta’s 700 “Heavenly Visions” (Revelaciones) and eight books complete the medieval humanization of Mary and Christ. With a definition of holiness* that embraces female reproductive and sexual experiences, Birgitta inserts Mary as an active partner in salvation history mediating between God and humanity, prescribes an imitatio Mariae, and affirms motherhood* as a universal model of human recognition of the Other, the ethics of God’s new law.

EBBA WITT-BRATTSTRÖM

Birkath ha-Minim, the “blessing against the heretics,” added to the Eighteen* Benedictions, probably about 80 CE (but possibly before). This Jewish prayer blesses God for shattering minim, or heretics*, enemies of God; it targeted all traitors of the People of God – according to the times, possibly Jewish Gnostics, other Jewish sectarians, and Nazarenes, notsrin – the last name added (mid-2nd c.) to target specifically Jewish Christians, but now removed. The birkath did not involve a formal exclusion of heretics from the synagogue. But each time it was read and recited, it raised the question of heresy, forcing conversion or abstinence from leadership roles or from participation in worship, because sectarians would not want to recite a malediction against themselves. Late-1st-c. Christian writings mention followers of Jesus being disciplined “in the synagogues” (Matt 10:17) or treated as “outside the synagogue” (John 9:22, 12:42, 16:2; cf. Heb 13:13, “outside the camp”). See also EIGHTEEN BENEDICTIONS.

Birth Control and Contraception, Christian Views of. “Birth control” refers to the active attempt to control human fertility or the timing and spacing of human births. This includes abstinence, coitus interruptus, the rhythm method, oral substances that regulate fertility (herbs, medications), barrier methods that prevent fertilization, methods that prevent implantation of a fertilized ovum, abortifacients, surgical abortion*, and infanticide. Contraception is more specifically birth control that seeks to prevent pregnancy*. Official Christian doctrine* and popular belief and practice are quite distinct.

Official Christian Doctrines. While Scripture does not specifically address the issue of birth control, the experience of the Hebrew people as a minority culture led to a pro-natalist attitude (see, e.g., Gen 1:28, 9:1, 15:5, 16:10, 22:17, 26:4; Deut 30:16; Ruth 4:11; Jer 30:19, 33:22). Early Christian attitudes toward sexuality were shaped by the teachings of Justin*, Clement* of Alexandria, Augustine*, and others that only procreative sexual intercourse within the bonds of marriage was moral. Aquinas* further argued that contraception was a sin* against nature*. Calvin* and Luther* affirmed procreation as the intended purpose of sexual intercourse. Attitudes toward sexuality began to shift in the early 20th c. when the idea of sexuality* as a good gift from God challenged previous claims. The Lambeth* Conference of the Church of England (1930) marked the first official legitimization of contraception by a church governing body, an attitude now widely accepted by mainline Protestant Christians. The Roman Catholic Church maintains an official prohibition against the use of contraception (Casti Conubii, Humanae Vitae).

Popular Belief and Practice. There is considerable evidence (medical textbooks, apothecary jars, pharmacy recipes, midwifery guides, newspaper advertisements) that contraceptive and abortifacient herbs and drugs have been used since the beginning of recorded history. Medieval medical manuscripts by Carolingian monks (9th c.), Hildegard* of Bingen's writings (12th c.), and 14th-c. Inquisition* court trials demonstrate that many lay Christians have regularly used these methods, provided by midwives, pharmacists, physicians, and folk healers.

Biological realities and social constraints (e.g. women are expected to care for children) mean that women's lives are more directly affected by pregnancy and birth than are men's. In addition, women in patriarchal societies who challenge sexual norms often experience social humiliation and vilification. Consequently, controlling fertility has fallen disproportionately to women.

For most Christians today, the use of contraceptive devices to control fertility is tacitly accepted if not actively supported. Overpopulation and openness to the idea of sexual intercourse within marriage as an expression of love* have encouraged wider acceptance of contraception. Abortion* remains more controversial. See also PREGNANCY. REBECCA TODD PETERS

Bishop (from Lat episcopus and Gk episkopos, meaning "overseer"). In the NT the term is sometimes applied to all the elders* or presbyters of a local church in their function of oversight (Acts 20:28; Phil 1:1). The term "shepherd" seems equivalent (Acts 20:28; 1 Pet 5:2; Eph 4:11). When and how there came to be a single bishop is debated (but see Monepiscopate, Monarchical Episcopate). The bishop was the pastor of the local church, elected by the people and consecrated by at least three bishops, including the metropolitan*. Today in the Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican, Methodist, and other churches, bishops normally oversee a broader area, including multiple local churches.

Bishop in Partibus Infidelium, Roman Catholic honorary office; appointment to a see* in a territory controlled by unbelievers and inaccessible to Catholics.

Black Canons, Augustinian* canons* regular*, who wore black habits.

Black Friars, Dominican* friars*, who wore black mantles over white habits and scapulars*.

Black Holiness Movement. See AFRICAN AMERICAN CLUSTER: HOLINESS.

Black Legend, Protestant propaganda attacking (1) Catholic Spain* for its colonial practices, using the writings of Bartolomé de las Casas concerning atrocities against the "Indians" to discredit Spain as a colonial power and suggest that England (and eventually the USA) had more humane policies; (2) the Spanish Inquisition* and parallel activities in the Spanish Netherlands, giving rise to stereotypes of the Inquisition in European art, literature, and drama, often used symbolically to indict Roman Catholicism, religious persecution in general, tyrannical rulers, or ideological "witch hunts."

Black Madonna, a 1,000-year-old Catholic tradition of venerating nonwhite images of Mary*, the mother of Christ. There is no correlation between the color of the Madonna and the ethnicity of her devotees; numerous white European shrines honor coal black and dark Madonnas (e.g. Einsiedeln, Switzerland; Chartres, France; Montserrat, Catalan Spain; Loreto, Italy). "I am black and I am beautiful" (Song* of Songs) is carved above the entry to Montserrat, a possible reminder that black is associated with beauty.

Why are these Madonnas dark or black? The reasons are site specific. Study of the religious, historic, and cultural context shows that many Madonna shrines are at the sites of shrines to dark female divinities from pre-Christian traditions, usually associated with the earth, e.g. the "Mother Moist Earth" of pre-Christian Slavic traditions. The Black Madonna is also a transcultural, inculturated* devotion that grew out of earlier forms subsumed into Christianity. Known as a powerful healer and miracle worker, the Black Madonna is associated with a fierce form of Mary as the mother and protectress of the poor and excluded. She weaves national identities (Poland's Queen Black Madonna; Mexico's protective patron, the Virgin of Guadalupe; Brazil's Mother of the Excluded, Aparecida) with solidarity and non-violent resistance. She stands for the spirit of liberation*, restorative justice*, equality, and the preservation of the earth (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster). See also MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER.

CHINA GALLAND

Black Monks, monks of the Benedictine* order, who wore black habits.

Black Rubric, the declaration in the Book of Common* Prayer that kneeling during Communion does not signify adoration of any corporeal presence of the Body and Blood of Christ. It was added under Edward VI (1552), removed under Elizabeth (1559), and restored under Charles II (1662). The name comes from the 19th c., when it was printed in black because it was not a "rubric"* but a doctrinal interpretation.

Black Theology is a school of constructive theology in the USA. It has historically been associated with the teaching and writings of James H. Cone and students. However, other theologians, religionists, and philosophers, such as Albert Cleage, J. Deotis Roberts, Major Jones, Shelby Rooks, Gayraud Wilmore, Charles Long, and William R. Jones, were important in the development of Black theology for their rigorous critiques throughout the 1970s. Cone's Black Theology and Black Power (1969) inaugurated Black theology as an insurgent discourse against white supremacy, not only in the USA but also in Latin America, Africa, and Asia. With the Black Power Movement (1964–69), blackness symbolized a radical, revolutionary race consciousness expressed in black history and black culture. Black theology is a theological interpretation of this new black consciousness. Black theology reflects on the meaning of faith in the Black God revealed in the Black Christ from the perspective of black oppression, survival, and resistance. Black culture is identified with the Christ event in which the revelation of God as liberator of the oppressed comes in and through the cultural situation of the oppressed.

A number of historians and theologians have documented the development of Black theology. Monumental is the documentary history by Wilmore and Cone, Black Theology: A Documentary History, in two volumes. These works show that Black theology is open to a great diversity of interests among African American theologians.

From the 1970s to the 1980s, Black theology was primarily a male-dominated discourse. By the late 1980s and throughout the 1990s, African American female constructive theologians and theological ethicists radically enlarged Black theology by their critiques of black male patriarchy* in the production of Black theology (see Womanist and African American Theologies).

In the USA, Black theology has established itself as the dominant discourse in constructive theology among African Americans. Black theology is vital and enlarges as its interests in the suffering, survival, and resistance of oppressed people expand within its global consciousness. See also LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER.

VICTOR ANDERSON

Blackwell, Antoinette Louisa Brown (1825–1921), minister, lecturer, activist, author, acclaimed as first woman ordained by a regular Protestant denomination in the USA (1853) (see Women's Ordination Cluster: In North America). She participated in the Second Great* Awakening institutions and causes. Her childhood was transformed by a Charles Finney*-led revival*; she studied theology at Oberlin; and in her lectures she advocated temperance*, women's rights, and abolition. Committed to both Christianity and equality for women, she worked in uneasy partnerships with religious leaders and suffragists like Elizabeth Cady Stanton* and Susan B. Anthony*. In later years, she wrote a series of books that tried to reconcile a naturalist metaphysics with evolutionary thought and gender equality. See also DARWINISM; UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (IN THE UNITED STATES).

TED A. SMITH

Blake, William (1757–1825), romantic poet, prophet, engraver. Blake was raised in London in a Dissenting* family; his works exhibit the spiritual radicalism and deep biblical knowledge characteristic of those who separated from the Church of England. The collection of his short lyric poems, Songs of Innocence and Experience (1794), displays a radical religious critique of slavery*, economic inequities, and religious hypocrisy. From the age of 10, Blake experienced divine visions; his mature style reflects the esoteric imagery and incantatory style of biblical prophets and visionaries. Blake's theology, honed by his reading in Paracelsus and Boehme*, is largely Gnostic*. In major poems, like The Book of Urizen (1794), Milton (1804), and Jerusalem (1804), Blake reflects on the entrapment of humans' divine nature in the material world and the revolutionary power that would be unleashed once humans awakened and recognized their divine origin. Blake attacked Deism*, Newtonianism*, and other Enlightenment* philosophies that denied the spiritual world. A former student at the Royal Academy, Blake illustrated his own books, as well as editions of Dante*, The Book of Job, and Bunyan's* Pilgrim's Progress. Largely unrecognized in his lifetime, Blake's idiosyncratic religious themes and imagery received a revival of interest in the 20th c. ROGER E. MOORE

Blasphemy (from Gk for "evil-speaking"), speech or action showing contempt for God. It was punished by stoning in Israel (Lev 24:16), and blasphemy against God and/or Christ was condemned by the Code of Justinian*, the Arian* Visigoths, medieval canon* law, and some of the Reformation states, although types of punishment varied.

Blessing, performatory* words that confer God's favor; hence consecration* through prayer, sanctification* with the sign* of the cross, or benediction*.

Blessing of Children. A blessing grants goodness or favor on the recipient and is indicative of a relationship. More than a good wish, the very words of a blessing do what they say. Throughout the Judeo-Christian tradition, children* are considered a sign of God's blessing and are an occasion for praising and thanking God. Thus parents and others (e.g. priests) bless children, especially shortly after their birth. Blessings of children may take place either on significant occasions or as a child dedication.

In the OT, the oldest tradition of blessing (Heb root, brk) of offspring is the blessing of the first-born as a bestowal of inheritance (Gen 27, the story of Esau and Jacob) or as a sign of favor (Gen 48:20, Jacob blesses Joseph's sons Ephraim and Manasseh). The blessing of Joseph's sons is referenced in the Sabbath blessing for boys given on Friday evening (the birkath banim): "God make you like Ephraim and like Manasseh"; for girls matriarchs are named: "God make you like Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, and Leah". Children are also blessed on special holy days.

In the Christian tradition, blessing children was modeled by Jesus himself when he laid hands on them (Mark 10:13–16). In contemporary society, devout parents might bless their children before sleeping at night, at the beginning of a school year, on birthdays, at graduation, and upon marriage. The US Roman Catholic Church's order of blessing of children (Book of Blessings, 150) remarks on the dignity of children and asks that they "may grow in Christian maturity...and become witnesses in the world." This blessing may be given by a priest, deacon, parent, or other person.

In traditions practicing only adult baptism (e.g. Church of the Brethren, Baptist communions), child blessing functions as a child dedication. In the religious observance of the Latter-day Saints, an infant is brought to the ward (or remains at home if the father holds the Melchizedek priesthood), where the infant is blessed and named. Blessing of children may be a formal church service or a spontaneous blessing given by anyone in the course of ordinary life. The blessing might express thanksgiving for God's gift of life and ask for peace and protection for the child. It is a concrete way parents can share their faith life and relationship with their children and can be a special, intimate moment of trust between parent and child.

JOYCE ANN ZIMMERMAN, CPPS

Blondel, Maurice (1862–1949), professor of philosophy (Aix-en-Provence). The most important 20th-c. French Catholic philosopher, he had an enormous impact on Catholic theology. In his seminal work, L'Action (1893), he appropriated the French positive tradition and expanded its framework to include religious practice, developing a "phenomenological*" project aimed at engaging the postmetaphysical mind of the French university. Accepting the principle of immanence*, he showed that an integral examination of the content of human action leads necessarily to an affirmation of the transcendent.

The Letter on Apologetics (1896) radically critiqued traditional apologetics*, showing that the subject's interior disposition is an essential ingredient in the act of faith*; Blondel thus made a significant contribution to the clarification of the relationship between nature* and grace*, as well as to the development of fundamental theology. His History and Dogma (1904) elucidated, at the heart of the Modernist* crisis, the role of tradition* in Catholic hermeneutics*, resolving the issue of the appropriate use of the historical method so as to avoid both historicism and relativism. Despite his loss of eyesight, in later life he dictated a monumental, five-volume philosophical trilogy. With Blondel's decisive influence on such figures as de Lubac and Von* Balthasar, Congar described him as the philosopher of Vatican* II. MICHAEL A. CONWAY

Blood. A symbol of life, sacrifice*, and salvation* with rich layers of meaning. In the OT, blood is understood to be the principle of life (Exod 17:14). All other blood symbolisms* derive from this basic meaning: the saving blood of the Passover lamb (Exod 12:7, 13); the prohibition of murder (Exod 20:13; Deut 5:17); blood as the seal of the covenant* (Exod 24:8); and its use in the consecration of priests (Exod 29:19–21) and during sacrifice to evoke the redeeming, atoning, life-giving union with God (Lev 1:1–14; 16; 17:3–8).

In the NT, blood is a symbol of the redemptive* sacrifice of Christ on the cross and of entrance into a new and eternal covenant with God (1 Cor 10:4,16–22, 11:23–25; Heb 9, 10). The Lord's Supper is the genesis of Christians' ritual celebration of Jesus' giving of his Body and Blood as spiritual food and drink; the cup is the Blood of the new covenant (Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25).

The significance of Christ's shedding his blood and the understanding of the Eucharist* vary, along with the different understandings of atonement* and redemption*. Catholics and other liturgical traditions believe in the real presence of Christ's Body and Blood under the sacramental signs of bread* and wine* as they celebrate the Eucharist*, Mass*, or Orthodox Divine* Liturgy. In Protestant, Evangelical*, and Charismatic* traditions, for which the bread and wine "symbolize" Christ's presence in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, Christ's Blood is also life giving and salvific, though it is often in less liturgical settings that one is "washed...in the blood of the lamb" (Rev 7:14).

Contemporary cultures with so much violence could do well to reappropriate a respect and sense of mystery* for blood as the seat of life. All cultic and symbolic use of blood is a witness to the sacredness of all life.

JOYCE ANN ZIMMERMAN, CPPS

Blumhardt, Johann Christian, and Christoph Friedrich Blumhardt. Johann C. Blumhardt (1805–80) was educated at Tübingen and, while serving as pastor in the Lutheran parish of Mottingen, Germany, became the center of a religious revival* that involved deliverance and healing, based on an appeal to the resurrection of Christ. An outgrowth was a spiritual retreat center he founded at nearby Bad Boll. He was succeeded in this ministry by his son, Christoph F. Blumhardt (1842–1919), who redirected its mission to advocate social reform, thus helping lay the foundations for the Social Democratic Party in Germany*. See also PIETISM.

J. STEVEN O'MALLEY

Boaz, a wealthy resident of Bethlehem* who, following Levirate* custom, married the widow Ruth*, becoming the ancestor of David* and of Jesus*.

Body. Surrounded by ambiguity throughout the history of Christian life and practice, the body has elicited both positive and negative responses among Christians across traditions. The human body registers profound, complex attitudes toward God, gender difference, material justice*, and nature. This ambiguity reflects deep ambivalence among Christian theologians, clergy and laity alike, in response to human finitude, suffering, and the place of change in the divine economy. This coupling of ambiguity with ambivalence requires that, to be understood, "body" always be placed in historical context.

"Body" has both figurative and literal meanings. Indeed, the line between literal and figurative is often indistinguishable. Through the Incarnation*, even God is embodied. The concept of body also marks such corporate realities as the church, understood to be the body of Christ, as well as the body of believers who partake of the Body of Christ at the sacrament of Holy Communion*. "Body" is further identified in terms of the resurrection* of the bodies of all humans at the final Judgment*.

The putative relics related to Jesus' body and the bodies of apostles and saints have historically played a central role in the worship of believers. Believers may apprehend the concept of body in either literal or figurative terms, depending on their communal affiliation or on their own interpretation. Regardless, the references are understood to be real, and the concept of body carries extremely positive connotations. These connotations reflect a Hebrew heritage that connects materiality with the goodness of God's creation* (Gen 1), distributive justice* (the prophets), and the wisdom* traditions (Proverbs).

"Body," however, also connotes negative valuations. Throughout Christian history, the human body has been associated with finitude, deterioration, material injustice, and estrangement from God. These more negative valuations and the ascetic* practices that sometimes accompany them reflect the assimilation of historical features of hellenized Judaism, Stoicism*, and Neoplatonism*. In their origin, as well as their later reappropriations, these views may reflect material conditions ranging from high mortality among women in childbirth and the infants born to them, to low life expectancies across both genders, to food shortages and high taxes, to exclusively male centered power structures that carry over into the present.

In any case, the changeability of the human body came to exemplify the corruption of the human will*, characterized as sin*, an inescapable but redeemable human condition. Though according to orthodox teaching the body's creation and its divine intention are good, as a negative marker the human body as body has been historically gendered as feminine. Based on the creation account of Gen 2–3, male theologians and clergy have traditionally portrayed the feminine-gendered body as symbolic of evil*, personified by Eve* as the author of human sin. At the same time, other male elites have interpreted this text to signify that women are merely morally inferior and therefore rightly subordinate to men, because Eve was made by God from Adam's rib. Contrary to both of these interpretations, early Gnostic* traditions often cast Eve as the author of human freedom rebelling against the Demiurge*, or evil creator God; Gnostics nevertheless just as often required that women become "as men" in order to realize the divine spark within them, because their female bodies entangled women in the material order in ways to which men were not subject. These interpretations, along with interpretations of other scriptural texts, have authorized both sexist and heterosexual practices throughout the life of the church. At the same time, across these various interpretations, the vicissitudes of the body, identified symbolically with female flesh, have required remedy through disciplines* of the flesh in preparation for a better world to come. Such disciplines include fasting*, celibacy*, voluntary poverty*, self-flagellation, and withdrawal from society, permanently or for extended periods of time.

Irrespective of negative ascriptions to the female body, practitioners have intended these practices to produce union or communion with God, or they have meant them to realize the divine within the practitioner. These disciplines, among others, have given rise to various forms of Christian mysticism* in which Christ and the believer become gendered and transgendered. In these contexts, the practitioner is represented as beloved, bride, child, and mother of Christ. Mystics of the High Middle Ages in particular write of nursing at the bosom of Mother Jesus.

The body, however regarded, has played a rich and highly variable role in the history of Christian life and practice, no more so in the past than today. For example, Christians of the 21st c. around the globe, whether Roman Catholic, Orthodox, or Protestant, discipline themselves through the regulation of their bodies, which as critics of a consumer-driven, labor-abusing, earth-destroying culture, they consider ethically requisite in a world of waste and want.

PAULA M. COOEY

Boehme, Jacob (1575–1624), a shoemaker in Görlitz, Germany. Boehme was often in conflict with local Lutheran authorities over his highly complex thought, influenced by alchemical and other hermetic* writings. God the Father, he taught, was a deep abyss or Ungrund, a raging fire (wrath) bequeathing as light and love the Son and the Holy Spirit in and through the revelation of creation, a revelation that the human person receives by faith in Christ. His theory influenced German philosophers, including Hegel*, and English poets, including John Milton* and William Blake*, through 17th-c. translations published by William Law.

PETER C. ERB

Boethius, Anicius Manlius Severinus (c475–c525), Roman patrician and consul (510), well acquainted with contemporary Greek Neoplatonism*. He translated into Latin, and commented on, a number of Greek works, especially on logic written by Aristotle* and Porphyry*; these became the basis of Western knowledge of logic until the 11th c. These works raised the question of universals*, debated throughout the Middle Ages.

Boethius became a member of the court of the Arian* Theoderic in Ravenna. After the reconciliation between Rome and Constantinople (519) ending the Acacian* schism, Boethius wrote his opuscula sacra concerning the Trinity* and Christology*.

When Theoderic discovered that some Roman leaders were secretly corresponding with the court in Constantinople, Boethius was also charged, imprisoned, and executed. While in prison he wrote his Consolation of Philosophy, without explicit Christian language (some have seen parallels with Bonhoeffer's* affirmation of "religionless Christianity" during his imprisonment). It became a Christian classic, translated into most Western vernaculars.

EUGENE TESSELLE

Bogarín Argaña, Ramón Pastor (1911–76). Born in Ypacaraí, Paraguay, he studied for the priesthood at the Gregorian University, Rome. When he returned to Paraguay (1939), the Roman Catholic Church was growing rapidly; he reorganized the Paraguayan Catholic* Action. Ordained bishop (1954–55) of the Diocese of San Juan Bautista de las Misiones, his pastoral action included a strong defense of rural and lay organizations, and efforts to promote the renewal of the Paraguayan Church in line with Vatican* II and the Latin American Episcopal Conference of Medellín*, in which he assumed a leading role. Under his leadership, the Church became one of the main opposition forces against Stroessner's dictatorship.

VERÓNICA GIMÉNEZ BELIVEAU

Bogomilism, an Eastern European Christian movement that emerged in Bulgaria* (c900), blending Orthodox monasticism* and Paulician* and Zurvanic Zoroastrian dualism. During the reign of Peter (927–69), czar of Bulgaria, its members were anathematized as heretics* who believed the devil* was the second son of God and made the world. They lived ascetic* lives like Orthodox monks, adding to their popular appeal. Cosmas the Priest first used the term "Bogomil" to describe the sect (accordingly founded by a priest of that name) and said that the Bogomils accepted only the NT, which they read in Old Slavonic and interpreted allegorically. Bogomils entered the Byzantine Empire (early 11th c.), establishing a community in Constantinople, refining their doctrine, and developing an initiation ritual (as described by Euthemius Zigabenus, who was involved in their persecution in c1100). Bogomilism was still considered a prevalent and dangerous heresy in the 1140s; yet members considered themselves the real Christians, as the Cathars* that they inspired also did in the West. Nonetheless, by 1170 (when a Bogomil leader, Papa Nicetas, came to the West), Bogomils had experienced a serious schism, some adopting the absolute dualist* belief in two co-eternal Gods. The movement thrived in unsettled political conditions, spreading to the Balkans* and surviving in Bulgaria until c1370 and in Byzantine lands until c1430.

CLAIRE TAYLOR

Bohairic, Coptic* dialect originating in the south of the Nile delta. In the 9th c, it displaced Sahidic* as the language of the Coptic scriptures.

Bohemian Brethren (Moravian Brethren, Unitas Fratrum, Unity of the Brethren), organized c1457 in Kunvald, Bohemia, by followers of John Hus* (c1373–1415). Radically sectarian until c1495, they called for biblical preaching in the common language, administration of both bread and wine to the laity in Holy Communion*, renunciation of wealth and power by the church, and reform of the corrupt clerical hierarchy. Their leading theologian was Lukaš of Prague (d1528). At their height, they numbered about 50,000. They issued confessional statements (1535, 1575) and received legal recognition from Rudolf II (1609). All but exterminated during the Thirty* Years' War, their last bishop was John Amos Comenius* (1592–1670). The Bohemian Brethren were renewed in Saxony (1722) by von Zinzendorf* (1700–60). See also MORAVIAN CHURCH; MORAVIAN WORSHIP. OTTO DREYDOPPEL, JR.

Bokeleale, Jean Ifoto Bokambanza (1919–2002), father of the Church of Christ in Congo, which now includes all the Protestants of the Democratic Republic of Congo*; born in Bom-poma (Equator Province) into a polygamous family. After completing his primary and secondary education, he taught at the Christian Institute of Congo (Bolenge). A member of the Disciples of Christ Congo mission, he became assistant pastor at Ikongo (1936) and was later ordained a pastor (1956). He studied at, and graduated from, the Faculty of Protestant Theology of Brussels (1958–63) before studying public administration in the USA. Elected general secretary of the Protestant Council in Congo (1968), he used his talents to bring together all the Protestant churches into a unified Church of Christ in Congo, becoming its first president (1970), then its bishop (1977).

JEAN-CLAUDE LOBA-MKOLE

Bolivia. Until the 19th c., the history of Christianity in Bolivia was exclusively that of the Roman Catholic Church. It arrived with the Spanish* conquest of Alto Peru (1532), following the defeat of the Inca Empire by Francisco Pizarro; the first Catholic diocese of Sucre was established (1538). Other Christian churches arrived in Bolivia late in the 19th c., preceded by small immigrant groups of Lutherans, Anglicans, and Presbyterians. Very early on, Methodists (1906) incorporated native leaders into their church. Canadian Baptists (1898) began a mission that pioneered the development of Protestant schools, radio stations, and religious formation for rural lay leaders. Seventh-day Adventists (1898) also began schools and clinics. In 2000 there were 134 churches, 32 Christian church missions, and 9 new Christian religious movements officially registered with the Bolivian government. The National Association of Evangelicals (1968) includes 72 churches and service organizations, ranging from Baptists and Pentecostals to the Salvation Army.

The third article of the Bolivian Constitution (1967) states that the Roman Catholic Church is the national church, but grants freedom of religion to all churches. The Catholic Church was at first the baroque* Church of Spain (see Roman Catholicism Cluster: In Europe: Spain), which was imposed with very little instruction on native peoples (65% of the population, mostly Aymara, Quechua, Guarani, and Amazon basin groups). Thus there is much syncretism* of native religions and customs with Catholic worship practices, which can also be viewed as Andean inculturation* of Christian practices. For instance, the Pacha Mama of the Andean peoples (the "Earth Mother" figure of creation) and the Virgin Mary* are intertwined in popular devotion with shrines all over the country (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Devotion in Latin America). This religious and cultural intermingling is visible in church art and architecture everywhere. Since Vatican II, and along with other churches, the Roman Catholic Church has begun a serious study of native cultures. Liberation* theologies have evolved into theologies of solidarity* with the poor. For almost all churches, ecumenical* dialogue now includes intercultural and gender issues.

Since the 1960s, Bolivia has seen a great influx of missionary activity by Protestant churches, the Charismatic* Movement, and other groups such as the Mormons* (with temples in several cities and their Latin American center in Cochabamba, Bolivia), all of which have a particular interest in native peoples. This increased missionary activity, with most missionaries from the USA, came in response to the internal migration of millions of Bolivians from rural communities to the cities. Pentecostal, Charismatic, and Protestant congregations, responding to the need of these uprooted people for a new sense of community, gained thousands of converts both in the cities and in the rural areas.

Yet the Roman Catholic Church remains predominant in Bolivia. Thus Sister Nacaria Ignacia, a Spanish missionary naturalized Bolivian and founder of a religious community of Bolivian women, Misioneras Cruzadas, was the first Bolivian saint (beatified by Pope John Paul II, 1992). Cardinal Julio Terrazas, archbishop of the Archdiocese of Santa Cruz, has been an outstanding figure in the Catholic Church since he was ordained a bishop in 1978. He has been a strong voice for social justice* in Bolivian society and even more so since, in 2001, he became the first native Bolivian to be named a cardinal. In 1994, Matias Preiswerk, a Methodist Swiss theologian, founded a now-growing ecumenical theological and biblical study center, Instituto Superior Ecuemenico Andino Teologico.

Statistics: Population (2005): 9.1 million (M). Christians, 8.5 M, 94.1% (Roman Catholics, 7.9 M; Protestants, 0.9 M; independents, 0.3 M; Mormons, 0.1 M [including 0.7 M double affiliations]). (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001 and 2005.)

MICHAEL J. GILLGANNON

Bollandists, a group of Jesuits* in Belgium who have edited and published documents related to the saints* of the church since 1596, using the tools of historiography* and critical historical scholarship.

Bolsec, Hieronymus (d1584), physician, Carmelite friar, controversialist. He converted to Protestantism (c1545) and worked as a physician near Geneva, frequenting theological meetings. He disagreed with Calvin* over predestination*. He argued (citing Rom 8 and Augustine*) that instead of speaking of predestination to salvation* or to damnation* as Calvin did, one should speak of salvation because of a person's faith* in God or damnation because of lack of it. After he was tried and banished from Geneva (1551), and his doctrines officially condemned (Lyon Synod, 1563), he reconverted to Catholicism. He was influential in creating a lasting, negative image of Calvin and Geneva by publishing biographies of Calvin (1577) and Beza* (1582), presenting both as sexual degenerates and Geneva as a hotbed of sedition.

IRENA BACKUS

Bonaventure of Bagnoregio (c1221–74), influential Franciscan* theologian, teacher of the Friars Minor, Franciscan master of theology (1253), regent master and minister general (1257). As a cardinal (1273), Bonaventure played an important role in the Council of Lyon, during which he died. Critical of Aristotelian* philosophy, he favored Platonic* and Augustinian* thought. For him, the mystical* journey from the world to God passes through creation as “signs” and “footprints” of the Creator. His theology of light is based on exemplarity, emanation, and consummation. For him Scripture* is essential and the interpretive key to understanding creation* and human life.

MARY BETH INGHAM, CSJ

Bonhoeffer, Dietrich (1906–45), German Lutheran theologian and martyr of the Third Reich, with a remarkably influential legacy around the world. His early theology, in Sanc-torum Communio (dissertation) and Act and Being (Habilitationsschrift), laid the foundations for later developments by working at the interface of theology, philosophy, and the social sciences; he asserted the “sociality of humanity” (see Relationality) from a christological-ecclesiological perspective (laying the ground for contextual* theologies).

Bonhoeffer’s theology was influenced by his avid interest as a youth in cultures and travel. A one-year stay (1930–31) at Union Theological Seminary (New York) helped him relate theology to social* ethics and the problem of racism*, and challenged him to become a pacifist*. Back in Berlin, where he was a Privatdocent at the university, his lectures, notably on Christology*, attracted a wide audience. When Hitler came to power (1933), Bonhoeffer became involved in the church struggle. Disappointed by the equivocation of the Confessing* Church, he accepted service in a congregation in London (1933–35), while seeking to isolate the Reich Church from the ecumenical* movement. During this period, Bonhoeffer’s theology was developed in sermons, lectures, and essays that addressed these issues.

In 1935 Bonhoeffer became the director of a seminary of the Confessing Church in Finkenwalde. He introduced his students to the discipline* of Christian community life centered on Bible study, prayer, and rigorous study, a discipline later described in his book Life Together. He also wrote Discipleship, his classic study on faith and obedience based on the Sermon* on the Mount. After a brief exile in New York (1939), Bonhoeffer became involved in the resistance against Hitler. The Gestapo imprisoned him (April 1943) for his pro-Jewish activities. When it became clear that he was also implicated in the failed attempt to assassinate Hitler (July 20, 1944), he was sent to the Flossen-burg concentration camp, where he was executed on April 9, 1945.

Bonhoeffer’s considerable theological writings, now collected in Dietrich Bonhoeffer Works (16 volumes), include many essays and lectures in which he critically retrieved Lutheran doctrine, notably the “theology of the cross*” and the “two kingdoms*,” in ways that challenged the prevailing orthodoxy and the failure of the church to counter Nazism. While working for the resistance, he drafted essays for his posthumously published Ethics. His Letters and Papers from Prison (also published posthumously by Eberhard Bethge) outlined a “nonreligious” interpretation of Christianity, awakening international interest in his legacy as a whole.

JOHN W. DE GRUCHY

Boniface (c675–754), the English monk “Win-frith,” the “apostle of Germany.” Under papal sponsorship and with protection by the Frankish ruler (Charles Martel), he converted leaders in Thuringia, Hesse, Franconia, and Bavaria to Catholicism (c718), establishing an orderly Christianity closely tied to the papacy. Made bishop (722), then metropolitan of Germany (731), he created new bishoprics and monasteries. As papal legate, he reformed (c745) the Frankish Church, probably playing a role in the pope’s decision to replace the Merovingian with the Carolingian dynasty (751). Made archbishop of Mainz (745), he resigned to resume his mission in Frisia, where he was martyred.

Boniface VIII, Pope (1294–1303), born Benedetto Caetani (or Gaetani; c1235) in Anagni into minor nobility, studied law, entered the papal service, amassing considerable wealth in the process. He was named a cardinal priest (1291) and succeeded Celestine V as pope when the latter abdicated. Insisting that taxing clerics required his approval led him into conflict with Philip the Fair of France. In a famous bull, Unam sanctam* (1302), he insisted that only by subjection to the papacy could anyone be saved. He was attacked in Anagni by a few armed Frenchmen (September 7, 1303), returned to Rome, and died a few days later.

MICHAEL J. WALSH

Book of Common Order, liturgy adopted in 1562 by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland*, a version of the Forme of Prayers printed in Geneva (1556) for use by the English exile congregation there. First printed in Scotland in 1564, it was superseded by the 1645 Directory of Public Worship of the Westminster Assembly. From 1862, the name Book of Common Order was given to manuals of worship, most authorized by the General Assembly, though not as a mandatory liturgy. The 1940 edition (with 1974 and 1994 revised editions) was particularly influential within Scotland and the wider world.

JANE DAWSON

Book of Common Prayer. See COMMON PRAYER, BOOK OF.

Booth, Catherine Mumford (1829–90), mother of the Salvation* Army, advocate for women ministers. Born in Derbyshire, England, she married William Booth*, a Methodist preacher (1855). They founded the Christian Mission in London (1865) to provide help to the poor. A gifted preacher, Catherine Booth raised money for their work, while William ran the daily operation. The Christian Mission became the Salvation* Army (1878) and from the beginning accepted women as equals in leadership. The mother of eight, two of whom – Bramwell and Evangeline – became generals of the Salvation Army, Catherine Booth worked for the underprivileged and women's rights.

ROSALIE BECK

Booth, William (1829–1912), cofounder and first general of the Salvation* Army, evangelist, and advocate for the poor. Born in Nottingham, England, Booth, a Methodist preacher, married Catherine Mumford (1855). They founded the Christian Mission* in London (1865), which became the Salvation* Army (1878). William effected important social legislation to help poor working people. Under his leadership, the Salvation Army established work in 58 countries. Central to his ministry was a commitment to helping the needy physically and spiritually. In his book, In Darkest England and the Way Out, Booth established the Salvation Army's approach to social welfare work.

ROSALIE BECK

Bordeaux Pilgrim, first written account by a Western pilgrim to Constantinople and the Holy Land (333–34).

Boris and Gleb, Vladimirovich, Kievan princes (d1015). Princely sons of Vladimir, who Christianized Kievan Rus, Boris and Gleb refused to take up arms against their brother Sviatopolk in a struggle for succession to the Kievan throne. Though not martyred for their faith, Boris and Gleb were killed after refusing to fight. They became the models for a particularly Russian form of saint, the passion bearer, who dies in a Christ-like manner.

ROY R. ROBSON

Borromeo, Charles (1538–84; canonized 1610), played an important role in the Catholic* Renewal following the Council of Trent*. Destined to pursue an ecclesiastical career from a young age, he studied both civil law and canon* law (University of Pavia). When his uncle was elected pope (1559) as Pius IV, Borromeo was made cardinal, became cardinal-nepote (secretary of state), and was appointed archbishop of Milan. Borromeo collaborated with the pope to reconvene the Council to Trent* for its third session (1562–63), devoted to the reform of the church, especially local churches. Afterward, in his diocese, Milan, he worked at implementing these reforms – regarding discipline* of the clergy and the convents, education of the youth, and preaching – through a series of local synods. Attacked while he celebrated Mass (1569), he pardoned the would-be assassins (though they were executed). During the plague of 1576–77, he visited the sick in their houses and the hospital, serving as an example for the clergy.

GIUSEPPE ALBERIGO

Bosnia-Herzegovina. Situated between the Catholic Dalmatia and the Orthodox Serbia, the medieval kingdom of Bosnia was a meeting ground for the struggles between Eastern and Western Christianity. Breaking with Rome (mid-13th c.), the Bosnians established their own Bosnian Church, which survived until the mid-15th c. After the conquest by the Ottomans (late 15th c.), considerable portions of the population converted to Islam. From the mid-19th c., the development of the three major ethnic groups, Serbs, Croats, and Bosnian Muslims, was strongly influenced by Eastern Orthodoxy, Roman Catholicism, and Islam*, respectively. Religious and ethnic heterogeneity, and close interreligious communication and interaction, however, had a strong and lasting influence on the way in which these three communities developed throughout the centuries.

Bosnia was part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire between 1878 and 1918, then a part of the kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes until World War II, and a republic in Tito's Yugoslavia*. Declaring independence in 1992, Bosnia-Herzegovina suffered a three-year destructive war, which reconfigured its religious profile and prompted a significant politicization of the three major faiths, with frequent misuse of religious symbols and buildings for political aims. Ethnic cleansing during the war led to segregated ethnoreligious areas, where intolerance and discrimination against minority believers on the part of the majority group have persisted. The State Law on Religious Freedom (2004) administers the legal status of religious groups and the concessions made toward them. Interreligious dialogue* has been promoted by numerous international and local NGOs, and through the country's Interreligious Council, comprising the leaders of the four traditional religious communities: Muslim, Orthodox, Roman-Catholic, and Jewish. See also BALKANS; ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE.

Statistics: Population (2008): 3.94 million. Muslims, 45%; Serb Orthodox, 36%; Roman Catholics, 15%; Protestants, 1%; adherents of other faiths, 3% (with very few Jews). (Based on International Religious Freedom Report, 2008.)

INA MERDJANOVA

Bossey, Ecumenical Institute organized by the World* Council of Churches (1946) for conferences and study, often on emerging issues, to prepare clergy and lay leaders for service throughout the world.

Bossuet, Jacques Bénigne (1627–1704), noted preacher, Catholic bishop (Condom, then Meaux, France), polemicist. Guided by the Catholic* Renewal (Counter Reformation) and classical humanism, Bossuet preached before the court of Louis XIV (from the 1660s) and became its leading ecclesiastical intellectual. Tutor of the heir to the throne, Bossuet wrote for him Discourse on Universal History (1681; popular well into the 19th c.). Bossuet wished to educate the prince about the lessons from God's providence in history and to affirm the historicity of Scripture against emerging biblical criticism. Bossuet divided history into 12 epochs, from Adam* to Charlemagne*, giving primacy to the story of Israel as an example of God's universal sovereignty. In his writings and public discourses, Bossuet opposed all schism in the Catholic Church and supported Louis XIV's policies: to assert Gallican control over the church in temporal matters (against the pope; see Gallicanism), to suppress Jansenism*, and to convert Huguenots* and revoke the Edict of Nantes*. In correspondence with Leibniz* on how to restore unity to the church, he supported the divine right of kings. The agent of court opposition to Madame Guyon's* Quietism*, Bossuet engaged in a bitter polemical dispute with Fénelon* and attacked her character in writing against this "modern mysticism*."

PATRICIA A. WARD

Botswana is predominantly Christian, though Christianity is influenced by and interacts with religious ritual practices, beliefs, and ideologies of Batswana African* Religion, which historically has dominated the center stage and remains strong.

Christianity was introduced through the London Missionary Society (Robert Moffat and Mary Smith Moffat's arrival, 1820, followed by that of their son-in-law, David Livingstone*; the resulting United Congregational Church is the main Protestant church today); Methodists (1840s); Dutch Reformed Church (1870s); Lutheran Hermannsburg Mission Society (1857); Catholics (1895, with a national Roman Catholic Church established in 1959, after which it began growing); Anglicans (1902); Seventh-day Adventists (1921, the second-largest Protestant church); Pentecostals (1940, leading to the development of independent* Charismatic* churches, including women pastors, such as Rebecca Motsisi); and African* Instituted Churches (AIC's, rapidly developing since the 1960s, often with women in leadership roles, such as Queen Seingwaeng, 1883–1967, a leader in the Zion Christian Church).

Christianity made inroads into Botswana when chiefs, such as Sechele I (1833–92), Khama III (c1837–1923), and Lentswe (1876–1924), converted and in turn converted their subjects. Churches gained national identity and local leadership through, e.g., the formation of three ecumenical organizations: the Botswana Christian Council, the Evangelical Fellowship of Botswana, and the Organization of African Instituted Churches.

The emergence of Pentecostal/Charismatic churches and AICs led to theology, teaching, and practices that were much more inculturated* and contextual*, owing in part to the increased involvement of women, both as leaders and as laypersons who often preach. Worship in both Pentecostal churches and AICs, characterized by dancing, clapping, use of traditional instruments, spirit possession, and speaking in tongues*, often has a tribal association, such as going to Matsiloje (Spiritual Healing Church), Jackalas 2 (Head Mountain), or Moria (Zion Christian Church) for their festivals.

As part of their acknowledgment of the African tradition, AICs include African rites of blessing the seeds, children, and fields, sacrifices for sick people, as well as birth and death rituals. In prayers, some AICs invoke the assistance of ancestors*.

Churches have traditionally provided leadership in education and medical care. Responding to the threat of HIV/AIDS has led to closer ecumenical relations with other religions, including African Religion.

Statistics: Population (2000): 1.6 million (M). Christians, 0.97 M, 60% (members of African Instituted Churches and other independents, 0.5 M; Protestants, 0.18 M; Roman Catholics, 0.06 M); African Religionists, 0.6 M, 38.8%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

FIDELIS NKOMAZANA

Branch Davidians, members of an apocalyptic* and messianic* reform movement established in 1959; it derived from Seventh-day Adventism, and more specifically from the “Davidian Seventh-day Adventists” (established in 1934). Reading Revelation* as a continuous historical prophecy, they locate the present in the climactic “Laodicean period” of Christian history. Via typology* they identify the demonic “lamb-like beast” (Rev 13) as the USA, and the mainstream Seventh-day Adventist Church as the apostate Whore of Babylon (Rev 17), while calling for repentance. On April 19, 1993, messianic* leader David Koresh (born Vernon Howell, 1959) died with 75–85 Branch Davidians at their headquarters (Waco, Texas) in a conflagration while under siege by federal law enforcement officers. Survivors continue as “Students of the Seven Seals.” Branch Davidians raise issues concerning hermeneutic* assumptions in reading apocalyptic* literature, charismatic* and messianic* religious leadership, coping with the disconfirmation of religious conviction, and responsible relations between civil secular authorities and radical or insular religious communities.

JOHN R. JONES

Bray, Thomas (1656–1730), founder of benevolent organizations. Assigned by the bishop of London to assist the Anglican churches in Maryland, he funded more than 80 parish libraries, founded the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (SPCK*, 1698) in English territories and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (1701) for foreign missions, and endowed the Associates of Dr. Bray (1723) to fund libraries.

Brazil

Introduction: From “Catholic Monopoly” to Contemporary Religious Diversity. In the territories that formed Brazil, five centuries of Christian presence followed various scenarios. The absolute prevalence of Roman Catholicism, a long-term phenomenon that deeply influenced the formation of the Brazilian national identity, was supplanted by a religious mobility typical of modernity, strongly felt throughout the 20th c. with the effervescence of a variety of confessional denominations. This complex dynamic makes the future of Christianity in Brazil difficult to predict, despite numerous recent academic analyses.

In colonial times (1500–1822) and during the years of the Brazilian Empire (1822–89), Roman Catholicism had the status of the official religion, with a special link to the throne in Portugal*, then in Brazil. From the early 16th to the early 19th c., the Portuguese crown mediated between Rome and the local church. From 1822 to 1889, this role fell to the Brazilian emperor. Thus for almost 400 years, it was virtually impossible to be integrated into Brazilian society without affiliating oneself with Roman Catholicism or at least respecting it. The permission granted for non-Catholic religious gatherings, introduced by the Imperial Constitution (1824), had little impact. The Republic (1889) and the enactment of the secular constitution (1891) started a slow, nonlinear, and often tense process of religious competition in Brazil. By 2000 there was a considerable religious plurality with an increased presence of Pentecostal* and Charismatic* “Protestants*” (called “Evangelicals” in Latin America).

The Catholic Church in Colonial Portuguese Brazil and the Brazilian Empire. That the motivation for colonizing the New World was in large part religious is beyond doubt, although clearly there were also economic and political motivations. Even Christopher Columbus expected to use the gold that he dreamed of finding in the newly discovered lands to finance a new crusade* against the Moors.

Decades later, in a Europe convulsed by the Protestant Reformation*, the American continent with its native populations became important missionary territories where the Catholic Church, a close collaborator in the colonial enterprise, was to recoup souls* after its losses brought about by the fragmentation of Western Christianity. Hence, the concern to bring Christian salvation* combined with metropolitan commercial interests formed the infrastructure of the European colonization of the Tropics.

The arrival in April 1500 of Portuguese explorer Pedro Álvares Cabral on the coast of what would be Brazil was hailed as a miraculous, providential event – a true epiphany* orchestrated by the Christian God. After all, the expansion of the Portuguese Empire ought to correspond to a spreading of the Roman Catholic faith (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). This goal was to be achieved according to the resolutions of the Council of Trent* (1545–63), which remodeled the Roman Church through the Catholic* Renewal. Trent forged a Catholicism of reconquest based on the Eternal City, Rome (Jean Delumeau). This view emphasized the centrality of the Holy See, diluting the power of local churches.

The first organized missions among indigenous populations were led by Jesuits* (arriving from 1549), who during the following decades established their particular form of “reductions*” – mission stations where numerous natives lived together with Jesuit clergy following strict rules of Christian life (especially in the south of Brazil, as well as in Argentina*, Uruguay*, and Paraguay*). Yet as a result of the colonization process, as in many other places in Latin America, the indigenous peoples were soon reduced to a small minority of the population, with immigrants from Europe (now a majority), African slaves, and mulattoes making up the bulk of the population, which now includes Asians (Japanese immigrants, in particular) (see Mission Cluster: In Latin America: Catholic Mission in Brazil).

A paradox of extreme relevance to the Christianization of Brazil should be noted. Despite being consistent with the Catholic Renewal, the catechesis effort built into the colonial enterprise remained relatively distant from the papacy. In Portuguese Brazil, as well as during the independent imperial period, it was the Padroado* Régio (Portuguese for “Royal Patronage”; Spanish, Patronato Real) that held sway. In this regime the Roman Catholic Church, with pontifical authorization, was both financially and materially supported by the monarchy, and legally subject to its tutelage. In colonial times, owing to the Padroado and the shortage of priests in Portugal, which made it impossible to send a substantial number of missionaries to overseas colonies, the “Roman” Catholicism that arose in Brazil was a Catholicism that was Roman only in name; it was quite distant from the Tridentine thinking emanating from the Holy See in Rome. This characteristic persisted during the years of the Empire.

The social status of the Church that formed in these territories between the 16th and 19th c. was weak (it was under the political power of the state), and from the European point of view of the Catholic Renewal (following in the footsteps of the Council of Trent), it was significantly lacking in the ritual, doctrinal, moral, and intellectual/theological realms. In this Brazilian institutional and theological vacuum, late medieval Christian devotions of Portuguese origins survived untouched by the rulings emanating from Trent. Lay religious practices (see Laity Cluster) gained ground with little clerical control and gradually formed a popular Brazilian Christianity that dominated and still dominates everyday life (see Popular Christian Practices Cluster: In Latin America: Brazil). This popular Catholicism also incorporated various elements of African religiosity originally brought by slaves. This blending of Christian elements with African religiosity was officially repressed by the Catholic Church and civil authorities; yet, excluded from the Roman Catholic Church, it was free to develop independently (cf. Vodou* in Haiti).

In the midst of the lay construction of this “Brazilian-style Catholicism” (a revealing phrase commonly used in contemporary Brazil), the hierarchy sprang into action. Attempts to control sacramental and canonical practices can already be found in the early 18th c. with the First Constitution of the Archdiocese of Bahia (1707, printed 1720). Nevertheless, the Catholic Church in Brazil – weakened by the Padroado, which was supposed to support it because the state was frequently disinterested in religious affairs – did not have the strength to promote the effective Christianization prescribed by the Council of Trent. In this context, the presence of Catholic priests in the world of imperial politics was symptomatic. For instance, the priest Diogo Antonio Feijó (1784–1843, ordained 1809) was also a statesman (deputy in the General Assembly, 1826–33), who became regent (1835–37) after the abdication of Emperor Pedro I. Feijó, whom he had opposed. Like other prelates* of the time and regardless of his clerical status, Feijó embraced Gallicanism* (independence of the local churches) and liberal views despite the Vatican's guidelines.

The Council of Trent "arrived" in Brazil only in the mid-19th c. (as Kenneth Serbin documents). Reproducing the Roman challenge to the basic precepts of Enlightenment* and to the growing secularization* and laicism* of modernity, from the 1840s the Church of Brazil sought to revitalize itself by emphasizing the doctrine formulated by the 16th-c. council. It was an attempt to "Romanize" the Brazilian Church, calling a lax clergy to appropriate religious and moral order and faithful laypeople to a daily and orthodox practice of the Catholic faith, while being mindful of the primordial role and place of the Holy See in the Church.

The seminaries acquired a central role in the enforcement of this reformed and clericalized Catholicism, to the detriment of the lay believers and their lay movements. Thus from mid-19th c., there was an effort to revitalize existing seminaries and to create new ones in which European priests imbued with the Tridentine spirit taught. Mention must be made of the Lazarist priests (Counter* Reformation order founded by Vincent* de Paul) and in particular, among the first agents of "Romanization" of the Church in Brazil, of the Portuguese Lazarist Dom Antônio Ferreira Viçoso (1787–1875), bishop of Mariana (in the state of Minas Gerais, 1844–75). In this city, Dom Viçoso reformed the old archdiocesan seminary (founded 1750, remodeled 1853), transforming it into a place of excellence. Other orders and religious congregations followed, founding not only seminaries but also various centers of studies. Examples include the Salesians (named for Francis* de Sales) during the years of the Empire and the Redemptorists (founded by Alphonsus Liguori*) and Marists in the first years of the Republic.

This program of reform and amplification of seminary education saw the number of (mostly diocesan) seminaries rise from about a dozen (mid-19th c.) to more than 600 a hundred years later. These institutions – thought of as ideal places, fortresses of God, protected from the world and its influences – were intended to produce a clerical corps that was socially superior, morally impeccable, and, in theory, apolitical, or at least distant from partisan politics and from affairs of the state, contrary to the preceding generations of priests. Paradoxically, the successful "remodeling" of Catholicism in Brazil can be measured by the most important crisis experienced in state and church relations in Brazilian history: the Questão Religiosa (Religious Question; 1872–75). This crisis arose when two already Romanized young Brazilian prelates, Antônio de Macedo Costa, bishop of Pará, and Vital Maria Gonçalves de Oliveira, bishop of Olinda, following Vatican directives, took a firm stance against Freemasonry*, although the emperor, Pedro II, and the president of the Council of Ministers, Viscount Rio Branco, were themselves Freemasons. The crisis was triggered by the imposition of canonical penalties on members of lay brotherhoods and third* orders who participated in Masonic lodges, a state of affairs previously tolerated by the Church. The two bishops were indicted, arrested (early 1874), and condemned to prison with forced labor. The sentence was commuted to prison without forced labor by Pedro II (December 1874) and, as a result of a popular uprising, revoked by the new conservative cabinet (September 1875). In the midst of the worsening decline of the imperial order, the "Religious Question" marked the distancing of the Brazilian Church from the state – the declining Empire – a distancing that, along with other factors, such as the abolition of slavery (1888), undermined support for the regime, which, in November 1889, gave way to the Republic.

The Presence and Diffusion of Other Christian Churches Before the Republic. Until 1810, Roman Catholicism was the only religion officially recognized in Brazil. In 1808, with support from England, the Portuguese Royal Court moved to Brazil because of the threat posed by the Napoleonic Wars in Europe. The so-called interiorization of the metropolis in Brazil had a great political, economic, and cultural impact, initiating in a unique way the process of national independence. There was a discrete change in the religious domain: permission was granted to hold Protestant religious services to meet the spiritual needs of English citizens, who accompanied and protected the Portuguese Royal Court, provided that their places of worship had the external appearance of houses. The Imperial Constitution of 1824 ratified this orientation, permitting private worship services for religions other than Roman Catholicism, maintaining the restrictions on the places where these could take place, and prohibiting proselytism*.

The following years saw the start of a slow Protestant penetration. In 1824 Lutheran immigrants established themselves mainly in the south of the country, founding the city of Nova Friburgo in the mountain region of Rio de Janeiro State. Missionaries of other denominations followed: Methodists (1837, 1867); Presbyterians (starting in 1859, accompanying the penetration of coffee into the interior of the province of São Paulo); and two Baptist missionary couples (1882, in Salvador, Bahia).

Proselytism, despite the law against it, and an emphasis on conversion distinguished the activities of these groups. Preaching based on daily Bible studies by believers led to literacy education in the context of traditional Evangelical/Protestant Sunday* schools. These schools had a considerable impact on members of the lower classes, including freed slaves. Schools were also created for middle-class people, among them the Presbyterian Mackenzie School (starting in the house of a pastor in São Paulo in 1870, with its own building in 1876) and the Methodist Escola do Alto (Rio de Janeiro, 1887), the embryo of the Colégio Bennett created in the same city in 1920 (see Protestantism Cluster: In Latin America: various entries on Brazil).

Orthodox Christianity, not highly visible in Brazil, first arrived in the country in 1871 (Russians were the pioneers) and has focused on immigrants from Eastern Europe and the Middle East.

The Catholic Church During the First Decades of the Republic. With the advent of the Republic (1889), its constitution (1891) defined the state as laicized (see Laicization) or secularized (see Secularism and Secularization) and cut its ties with the Roman Catholic Church. The Church was freed from the tutelage prescribed by the Padroado, but also lost financial support from the state.

The relevance of the earlier “Romanization” of the Church in Brazil (from the 1840s) increased. Beyond the earlier objective – strengthening the Roman Catholic faith in Brazil and giving to the national church unprecedented social, intellectual, and religious power – there were new urgent goals.

The first task was to guarantee the material survival of the Brazilian Roman Catholic Church by securing new financial resources, in order to ensure that the Catholic faith, formally the faith of the majority of the population, would be respected by the newly installed regime.

To this end, in this tense situation, the national episcopate adopted a moderate attitude toward the republican order, managing to mitigate more radical laicization by the new government. A significant example is the debate over private education, a sensitive issue in church* and state relations since the proclamation of the Republic. Controlling the education of new believers was, of course, of prime importance for the Church. In addition, in material terms, the Catholic schools, principally those catering to the middle and upper classes, where Catholic education prevailed, were a significant source of income for the Church. Despite the firm stance of the Brazilian Church hierarchy, it was impossible to prevent the laicization of education, a traditional claim of republicanism. Nevertheless, this was not a total defeat for the Church: it was successful in obtaining financial support from the state in compensation for its contribution to social work in various areas, including education (see Educational Practices as Christian Service Cluster).

This tense scenario, involving concessions and mutual accommodations, would set the tone for the initial decades of the Republic. In 1930, when Getúlio Vargas became president, through the work of Sebastião Leme, archbishop of Rio de Janeiro (then the national capital), the government and the Roman Catholic Church improved their relations and mutual cooperation. From 1930 to 1945, the government and clergy united around common objectives, such as maintaining order and rejecting any ideas of the (“Communist”) Left. This confluence gave Catholicism a kind of semiofficial recognition.

However, the conflict between Church and modernity was not limited to church–state relations. Laicization, critical assessments of Christianity, religious indifference, materialism, and the leftist threat characterized modern times. Since the Reformation, so to speak, Rome had lived in a “state of siege,” a situation aggravated by the Enlightenment*, the French Revolution, and the teachings of Marx (see Marxism and Christianity), Nietzsche*, and Freud (see Psychology and Theology). Rome reacted in a determined manner, urging the reconquest of contemporary society.

The Church of Brazil, tardily Romanized, officially closed ranks around these crusading intentions. Although the Republic was already encountering a more cohesive ecclesiastical position, it was only in 1916 that the programmatic content of the reconquest of Brazilian society would gain a formal description. Sebastião Leme*, recently named archbishop of Olinda in the northeast of the country, published a pastoral letter that united the national episcopate by inaugurating “a new consciousness-raising of Brazilian Catholicism” and proposing a “fighting program” (José Oscar Beozzo). The goal was to Christianize society on all levels, from institutions to private practices – to mark Brazil with the Latin cross. Thus, e.g., the Church created the magazine A Ordem (The order; 1921) and the Dom Vital Center (1922) with the intention of bringing together Catholic intellectuals; the Marian Congregation (1924) appealed to women; and the Círculos Operários (Workers Circles, 1930) appealed to workers. The Instituto Católico de Estudos Superiores (Catholic Institute for Higher Education, 1932) formed the nucleus for the first Brazilian Catholic university, in Rio. The Liga Eleitoral Católica (Catholic Electoral League, 1933) hoped to elect candidates committed to Catholic views to the Constitutional Assembly convened by Vargas.

Two symbolic initiatives are noteworthy: (1) in 1930 the proclamation as patroness of Brazil of Nossa Senhora Aparecida (Our Lady of Aparecida), originally an 18th-c. devotion based on an image of the Black* Madonna found by fishers in the Paraíba River between Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo; (2) in 1931 the inauguration of the statue of Cristo Redentor (Christ the Redeemer) in Rio de Janeiro. A part of the neo-Christianity project, the Redeemer statue, sculpted in stone, high on the Corcovado Mountain, stood out in the skies of Rio (then the national capital). Both of these symbolic initiatives had as a backdrop the heated debate among the Brazilian intelligentsia regarding the “national character” of the country. For the Roman Catholic Church, Catholicism and Brazilian identity were fully interconnected. Alceu Amoroso Lima*, a leader of the national lay intelligentsia and an active crusader for neo-Christianity in the 1930s, went straight to the point by declaring (at a national Catholic meeting, 1939), “Brazil is not Brazil without the Eucharist.”

The Brazilian Catholic* Action (1935) was created in coordination with the general institution of the Catholic Action by Pope Pius XI, in order to optimize the apostolate of the laity* in ecclesiastical life. Laypeople, meeting in groups such as the Brazilian Catholic Youth (Juventude Católica Brasileira, JCB) and the Female Catholic Youth (Juventude Feminina Católica, JFC), were expected to carry out the actions decided by the hierarchy.

The neo-Christian project also aimed to compete in the religious field. It was a battle against a variety of perceived threats: popular* syncretistic* Catholicism, Spiritism and Afro-Brazilian beliefs of great appeal among the people, and the Protestant penetration reinforced by the arrival of Pentecostalism on Brazilian soil.

The First Pentecostal Wave. The national impact of the “first Pentecostal wave” is connected with the appearance of Assembléia de Deus (see Assemblies of God). Founded by the Swedish missionaries Gunmar Vingren and Daniel Berg in Belém do Pará (1911) with Baptist dissidents, the Assembléia de Deus introduced, as Clara Mafra said, a “heavyweight theological question, which would also transform the evangelical field in all Brazil”: What is the role of the Holy* Spirit? Giving emphasis to divine inspiration* and to inspired improvisation, and thus viewing erudite culture negatively, Assembléia de Deus was eagerly welcomed by common people in the slums around the cities and diffused by the internal migration toward the cities. The rapid expansion of Assembléia de Deus was also assisted by its emphasis on the missionary call that each believer receives (since he or she receives gifts* of the Holy Spirit) and by less rigid theological control (as compared with mainline Protestantism). Moral practice, however, is marked by strict discipline, including modest clothing and the prohibition of smoking and drinking.

The Congregação Cristã do Brasil (Christian Congregation of Brazil), also of Pentecostal orientation, was formed in 1910 in São Paulo by Luigi Francescon, bringing together many Italian immigrants after a schism with the Presbyterian Church. As with Assembléia de Deus, Congregação Cristã do Brasil grew among low-income people struggling for better working conditions, but in this church the gifts of the Holy Spirit reinforced the authority and power of the elders (see Charismatic Authority; Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster: In Latin America: Brazil).

From 1945 to the “New Republic.” The neo-Christian model of the Roman Catholic Church went into decline at the end of the pontificate of Pius XII (1939–58). Less than a hundred days after his election, the new pontiff, John* XXIII, convened Vatican* II. It was the Catholic aggiornamento, a process described as a Copernican turn in the history of the Catholic Church (Rufino).

In Brazil, as Vargas's dictatorship ended (1945), new questions arose for the local church, which created the National Conference of Brazilian Bishops (CNBB, 1952) to address them. In the following decades, Catholic reformism gained pastoral, social, and political strength (see Roman Catholicism Cluster: In Latin America: National Conference of Brazilian Bishops [CNBB]).

The activities of laypeople changed substantially. Brazilian Catholic Action reformed itself, adopting the specialized Belgian model, with the development between 1948 and 1950 of Catholic youth movements aimed at rural youth (JAC), high school students (JEC), freelance professionals (JIC), workers (JOC; see Young Christian Workers [Jocists]), and university students (JUC), which reinterpreted basic Christian concepts, such as that of apostolate and mission, and adopted the "see, judge, act" pedagogical method of the Belgium priest, then cardinal, Joseph Cardijn*.

Alceu Amoroso Lima, who had publicly declared his adherence to liberal Catholicism since the 1950s, became a figure of reference for reformist Catholics, together with the Jesuit Henrique de Lima Vaz, who led the JUC in the 1960s. The primary question was how to envision in the light of Christian faith the Brazilian economic underdevelopment and the massive social crisis. It was more important to be a "critical" Christian than "merely a Christian" with appropriate theological views and practices. Sacramental life is necessary, but it must lead to involvement in the social, economic, and cultural transformation of the country.

The hierarchy, divided between reformists and conservatives, followed more cautious paths. During the governments of Juscelino Kubitschek (1956–61), Jânio Quadros (1961), and João Goulart (1961–64), sectors of the Roman Catholic Church, led by the CNBB and its social pastoral letters, collaborated with state initiatives such as the Movimento de Educação de Base (Movement for Basic Education). The so-called basic reforms of the Goulart government, including the sensitive agrarian reform project, were supported by prelates and progressive intellectual laypeople. On the other hand, the more conservative clergy denounced the "Communist peril."

The military coup of 1964 prompted a significantly ambiguous and cautious document from the CNBB, which reflected the divisions in the Catholic Episcopate. While the cardinal of Rio de Janeiro, Jaime de Barros Câmara, enthusiastically applauded the armed intervention, his former assistant, now archbishop of Olinda and Recife, Hélder Pessoa Câmara*, refused to celebrate a commemorative Mass on the first anniversary of the coup d'état.

As years passed, the dictatorial character of the regime (1964–85) became evident. In a society silenced by force and subjected to brutal repression, the CNBB under the leadership of Aluísio Lorscheider and Ivo Lorscheider called for a re-democratization and the end of censorship and political detentions. They denounced the systematic torture of dissidents and asked for the return of the exiled. They were joined in the fight against the dictatorship by Hélder Câmara and other prelates, including Paulo Evaristo Arns* (head of the largest archdiocese of the country, São Paulo), Fernando Gomes dos Santos (archbishop of Goiânia), Waldyr Calheiros (bishop of Volta Redonda, an important industrial center under the military administration), Adriano Hipólito (bishop of Nova Iguaçu in the violent and poor Baixada Fluminense), and Pedro Casaldáliga (bishop of Prelazia de São Felix do Araguaia, in the Brazilian Amazon).

The progressive clergy of the Catholic Church developed a prophetic witness in times of torment. Other bodies connected to the CNBB played an important role during the dictatorship, e.g. the Conselho Indigenista Missionário (Indigenist Missionary Council) and the Comissão Pastoral da Terra (Pastoral Land Commission), which denounced the pattern of landownership and the economic model of wealth concentration imposed by the regime (see Land, Theological Perspectives and Praxis, Cluster: In Latin America). Lay leaders, such as Alceu Amoroso Lima and Cândido Mendes de Almeida, were also part of the opposition.

During the years of the dictatorship there emerged a Catholic militancy centered on the Base* Ecclesial Communities (Comunidades Eclesiais de Base, CEBs; see Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: In Latin America: Brazil: Base Ecclesial Communities [CEBs]), pastoral networks with a popular base in urban and rural areas where faith and demands for better living conditions were integrated. The poor communities, in the CEBs and beyond, became a privileged space for the formulation of Liberation* theology, an original Latin American contribution to contemporary theological production.

The main question is: How can one be a Christian in an impoverished world? Liberation theologies bring together theological reflection and prophetic denunciations of poverty and its causes, following the examples of biblical prophets. Leonardo and Clodovis Boff, Hugo Assmann, Carlos Mesters, João Batista Libânio, José Comblin, Frei Betto, Eduardo Hoornaert, and José Oscar Beozzo are among the most important Liberation theologians in Brazil.

Progressive Protestants also contributed to Liberation theology. Presbyterian pastor (and subsequently educator and psychoanalyst) Rubem Alves wrote A Theology of Human Hope (1969), a work influenced by Protestant liberal* theology and considered a precursor in the construction of the Christianity of liberation in Brazil. Subsequently, Lutheran pastor Walter Altmann interpreted the trajectory of the “Father of Reform” according to the postulates of Liberation theology in Lutero e libertação (Luther and liberation, 1994). Regarding the military dictatorship, despite the traditional Protestant avoidance of explicit political engagement, Evangelical/Protestant sectors cooperated with progressive Catholics in resisting the dictatorship. Two cases are exemplary.

On the occasion of the commemoration of the 25th anniversary (1973) of the Universal Declaration of Human* Rights, in the midst of the toughest period of the dictatorial government, the Roman Catholic Church and Reformed Christian churches (including Presbyterian and Methodist churches) launched a national campaign for human rights. “They had taken the first collective step in terms of denying legitimacy for the regime” (as Della Cava noted). (This campaign was not shared by Pentecostal and Charismatic denominations.)

The second example of cooperation was the project Brasil: Nunca Mais (Brazil: Never Again), a top-secret investigation (begun in 1979, published in 1985) that proved the systematic use of torture during the Brazilian military regime (1964–85). Led by Cardinal Paulo Evaristo Arns and the Presbyterian minister Jaime Wright with financial support from the World* Council of Churches, Brasil: Nunca Mais investigated the dictatorship’s most violent period (1964–79), described torture methods, and named 444 torturers.

With re-democratization (the “New Republic” of 1985) and the promulgation of the Constitution of 1988, the Brazilian Catholic Church limited its action in the political arena – an attitude reflecting the changes brought about by the papacy of John* Paul II (1978–2005). During his pontificate, Karol Wojtyła limited the intellectual production and the political and social action of Liberation theologians, fearing in particular their use of Marxist analytical methodological tools (see Marxism and Christianity). The imposition of “obsequious silence” on Leonardo Boff (1985), the most popular Brazilian Liberation theologian, and on others, is extremely revealing. At the same time, Rome and many Brazilian dioceses strongly encouraged new traditionalist and conservative movements such as the Roman Catholic Charismatic* Movement (RCC), Communion and Liberation, New Song, and Neocatechumenate.

The Second and Third Pentecostal/Charismatic

Waves. In the years following World War II, and especially under the Kubitschek government, the idea of “modernization” started to take shape. It had repercussions in the Evangelical/Protestant milieu, where the use of radio (see Media and Christianity), songs, and choirs of popular appeal, and of informal language during services, had a notable impact on the propagation of the Pentecostal and Charismatic* faith.

The “second Pentecostal/Charismatic wave” (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster: In Latin America: Brazil) started with the preaching of North American missionaries Harold Williams and Raymond Boatright of the Igreja Internacional do Evangelho Quadrangular (International Church of the Quadrilateral Gospel; see Wesleyan Quadrilateral). Emphasizing the charismatic gift of divine healing (see Health, Healing, and Christianity Cluster), the two missionaries launched an “evangelical offensive” in the city of São Paulo (1951 or 1953, depending on the source), which became a National Evangelization Crusade, spreading throughout the state of São Paulo and in other states of Brazil.

This “second Pentecostal/Charismatic wave” was helped by the characteristic fragmentation of the movement into congregations and denominations, which, for the first time, were founded and led by Brazilians. The similar Igreja Evangélica Pentecostal O Brasil para Cristo (Pentecostal Evangelical Church, Brazil for Christ) was also founded in 1951; the Igreja Pentecostal Deus é Amor (Pentecostal Church, God Is Love), founded in 1962, is aimed at the middle class; the Igreja Pentecostal de Nova Vida (Pentecostal Church of New Life) was founded in 1970.

The “third Pentecostal wave” (the independent Charismatic/Pentecostal Movement) was characterized by the appearance of the Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus (Universal Church of the Kingdom of God, 1977), founded by Edir Macedo, self-proclaimed bishop, in the impoverished suburbs of Rio de Janeiro. Macedo came from a practicing Catholic family and, before becoming Evangelist, was initiated in Candomblé, an Afro-Brazilian religion. Becoming a neo-Pentecostal/Charismatic religious leader, Macedo developed a harsh polemic against the "idolatrous Catholic Church" and "demonic Afro-Brazilian religions." The preaching of the Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus was therefore a "counterposition" (as Clara Mafra calls it) – a polemical discourse that did not prevent it from incorporating Catholic, spiritualist, and Afro-Brazilian elements in its worship services and evangelistic meetings. This church is also characterized by its massive political participation, intensive use of TV, radio, and written media*, and exploitation of the spectacular dimension of faith, such as the gathering of multitudes of worshippers in the largest football stadiums of Brazil. The institutional success of the Igreja Universal – one of the most popular and powerful Evangelical/Protestant churches in Brazil, also with international branches – is presented as providential. The same applies for the individual successes of its followers. Many of them claim in their testimonials ("witnesses") to have overcome through faith various trials – unemployment, alcoholism, illness, and emotional, family, and financial problems – associating their adherence to Igreja Universal with their successful resolution of their problems (see Prosperity Gospel Cluster).

According to Patricia Birman, the Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus is constructing a new image for the crente (believer), the usual and often pejorative name given to Evangelical followers. In contrast to the crente as humble and poorly integrated into society, the true crente is a cosmopolitan, rich, and successful believer.

The 2000 Census: Redrawing Borders. In the census of 2000, the Instituto Brasileiro de Geografia e Estatística (Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics) collected 35,000 representative answers to the question "What is your religion?" The responses provided the basis for a typological construction (with 144 classifications) of religion in Brazil, including a category entitled "without religion."

According to Marcelo Camurça, it is possible to discern from the data of the 2000 census three well-defined groupings: Roman Catholics, Evangelicals/Protestants (same word in Portuguese), and those without religion. Surprisingly, there are relatively low percentages of followers of other religions, such as Kardecism (a spiritualistic religion) and the Afro-Brazilian religions Candomblé and Umbanda, possibly because of the phenomenon of "double affiliation," a mixing of religions common in popular Brazilian Catholicism – an "invisible" syncretism not publicly admitted by those who practice it and who opted to declare themselves Catholic despite also adopting practices of other creeds (see Popular Christian Practices Cluster: In Latin America: Brazil).

Despite the inclusion of these non-orthodox, syncretistic believers in the number of Catholics, the percentage of Catholics has drastically diminished – dropping from 83.8% (1991 census) to 73.8% of the total population – although in absolute numbers Catholics increased from 121.8 million to 125 million (owing to the increase in population).

Meanwhile, during the same period, Evangelicals/Protestants jumped from 9.05% of the population (13 million) in 1991 to 15.45% (26 million) in 2000. Among these, Brazilian-led Pentecostals/Charismatics and especially Charismatics/Neo-Pentecostals predominate with 17.6 million members, the largest churches being the Assembléia de Deus, the Igreja Congregacional Cristã do Brasil, and the Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus. Slightly fewer than 7 million identify themselves as "mission Protestants," mainly Lutherans, Presbyterians, Baptists, Congregationalists, and Adventists.

This census reveals more than a change in the relations between Catholics and Evangelicals/Protestants, though in itself this represents a profound transformation of the Brazilian religious scene. Brazil is passing through a metamorphosis of Evangelicalism/Protestantism (as Maria Lucia Montes underscores). The traditional Protestant churches are losing ground to the Charismatic/Neo-Pentecostal and Brazilian independent Evangelical/Protestant churches. Thus both historical Protestantism and historical Catholicism are losing ground. Is it a Brazilianization of Christianity?

In view of the accelerated growth of Charismatic/neo-Pentecostal churches, should one project a loss of Roman Catholic hegemony in Brazil in the near future? Social scientists, such as Regina Novaes and Marcelo Camurça, believe the answer is no. Even when one takes into account the growth of those "without religion" (an important growth from 6.9 million to more than 12 million in 10 years), it is not possible to forecast a “change in cultural paradigm” in religious terms (Camurça).

An evaluation of Brazilian religious mobility must go beyond the relative numbers of religious affiliation or even beyond comparisons between the totals of followers registered in different censuses. A more detailed analysis shows that the disaffiliation of Roman Catholics occurs among those who, until recently, declared themselves Catholic only because they belonged to the Catholic Church by tradition rather than by individual choice. Thus some specialists of cultural studies (e.g. Cecilia Mariz) go as far as envisioning a Catholic “reawakening” in Brazil as a result of the Charismatic/neo-Pentecostal expansion. In the religious market, this competition could induce practicing Catholics to give more visibility to their faith. Indeed, according to 1999 studies by the Center for Religious Statistics and Social Investigations (connected to the CNBB), the percentage of Catholics attending Mass* weekly increased by more than 80% between 1991 and 1999. This increase can be attributed to two opposite influences. The progressive Liberation theology and the CEBs in which they find expression have very engaged participants. Similarly, the conservative Roman Catholic Charismatic* Movement also calls for faithful engagement, and “charismatic” priests who became media phenomena, such as Fr. Marcelo Rossi, attract multitudes to their celebrations. Internal plurality is a traditional feature of Catholicism amplified in modern times. A significant number of Catholics distance themselves from the Roman Catholic Church’s teachings regarding important points such as birth* control, relationships (marriage, etc.), and sexuality*. Even in circles with a more conservative ecclesiology, such as the Roman Catholic Charismatic* Movement, where one finds a greater obedience to the Vatican directives regarding sexual matters, there are significant points of dissent; the personal religious experience of the sacred by believers, which is now more highly valued, escapes ecclesiastical control, producing tension between charisma and institution. Thus is it another form of a Brazilianization of Christianity?

Conclusion: Between Tradition and Metamorphosis, Transformation and Continuity. Although religious mobility and plurality are rapidly growing in Brazil, Roman Catholics and Evangelicals/Protestants (historical and Pentecostal/Charismatic) make up around 90% of the population. At the start of the new millennium, this situation confirmed the impact of Christianity throughout the history of Brazil – an impact open to divergent interpretations. This is a legacy that is now part of a Brazilian, dynamic, and tense process toward an indefinite future. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL; CHURCH, CONCEPTS AND LIFE, CLUSTER: BRAZIL: BASE ECCLESIAL COMMUNITIES (CEBS); INQUISITION AND “NEW CHRISTIANS” IN BRAZIL; MISSION CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: CATHOLIC MISSION IN BRAZIL; POPULAR CHRISTIAN PRACTICES CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICAN: VARIOUS ENTRIES ON BRAZIL; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: VARIOUS ENTRIES ON BRAZIL.

Statistics: Population (2000): 169.4 million (M). Christians, 152.3 M, 90% (Roman Catholics, 125 M, 73.8%; Evangelicals/Protestants, 26 M, 15.45%; marginal Christians, 1.3 M, 0.75%); other religionists, 5 M, 3%; nonreligious, 12 M, 7%. (Source: 2000 census.)

MARCELO TIMOTHEO DA COSTA

Brazilian Literature and Christianity. The Jesuit missionaries’ correspondence with their superiors in Europe (16th c.) constitutes the first literary Brazilian writing. Their evangelistic work among the Amerindians is presented in their letters in short scenes recounting the conflict between indigenous practices and beliefs and Christianity resulting from the efforts to convert the children, molding them into a new Christian generation (as José de Anchieta documents).

Throughout the baroque period (17th c.), literature, especially poetry (Gregório de Matos), gave voice to the great contrasts in the emerging Brazilian society, including indiscriminate exchanges between the native culture and Christianity, resulting in what appeared to be abuse, soon followed by guilt*, repentance*, and devotion*.

In the 18th-c. context, marked by the exploitation of precious metals and stones by colonizers, Christ’s Passion* underlies all the cultural production (architecture, music, poetry, arts and crafts, painting); the Passion served as a kind of resistance language in the struggle for political independence and the liberation of slaves* (also expressed with OT images). Romanticism brings together popular culture and the myths of the Christian creed (Castro Alves).

Brazil was originally named "Land of the Holy Cross" by Portuguese explorers. The texts that most effectively express the Brazilian Christian civilization project are novels by José de Alencar (19th c.), which clearly take their ethical values from the Gospels and denounce the "Christian" aristocratic and bourgeois citizens close to the emperor, who led a life far from the Christian ideal. (Literature was addressed to the literate aristocracy and bourgeoisie; the rest of the population [90%] was illiterate.)

In the 20th c., with a greater number of readers and the introduction of higher education, local authors and editors of Brazilian literature combined Christian faith and literature in two ways.

The first is represented by poets with a Christian background, such as Jorge de Lima, Murilo Mendes, Cecília Meirelles, and Adélia Prado. Their works make explicit references to Scriptures and demonstrate their expertise in both literature and Christian theology.

The second takes the form of a quest for God in the manifestations of Christian values. These works exhibit both an impressive literary sophistication and surprisingly subtle and deep theological formulations. Such are the works of the most important 20th-c. Brazilian writers: Clarice Lispector, Guimarães Rosa, Manoel Bandeira, and Carlos Drummond de Andrade.

Currently, secularism is drastically reducing the explicit impact of Christianity on mainline Brazilian literature. However, echoes of the Passion continue to sound in the social context of violence.

ELIANA YUNES

Bread, in the ancient Near East, was both a dietary staple and a cultic symbol. Made of wheat or barley (for the poor), bread was the staff of life; thus the term "bread" often meant daily food. In blessing and breaking the bread at the beginning of a meal, Jewish people bless the whole meal.

Bread is a symbol of God's gift of food: the manna in the desert was "bread from heaven" (Exod 16:4). Jesus taught us to ask for our daily bread in the Lord's* Prayer (Matt 6:11, with eschatological overtones); Jesus is the "bread of life" (John 6:35); and the Eucharist* is the bread of eternal life (John 6:48–51). Bread is also a symbol of hospitality* (Gen 18:6; Ps 41:9), covenantal fidelity (Lev 24:8), and unity (1 Cor 10:16–17).

In worship, the bread of the Presence (show-bread) was set before the Tabernacle (Exod 25:30), cereal offerings were of unleavened bread (Lev 2:5), unleavened bread was part of the Passover meal (Exod 12:20), and leavened (West) or unleavened (East) bread is used for the Christian Eucharist, "breaking the bread" (Acts 2:42, 46).

Although in many cultures today bread is not a staple, its symbolic meaning still evokes God's beneficence. JOYCE ANN ZIMMERMAN, CPPS

Brenz, Johann (1499–1570), Lutheran Reformer and church organizer in Southern Germany. At the University of Heidelberg (1513), Brenz studied with Johannes Oecolampadius, the future Reformer of Basel, and heard Luther* defend his theology at the Heidelberg Disputation (1518). Appointed to the Schwäbisch Hall territory (1522), he introduced Lutheran teaching, aiming to ban the Mass*, appoint qualified clergy, establish an ecclesiastical court for moral discipline, set up a poor chest, change marriage* laws, and establish free public schools for boys and girls. Brenz's primary contribution was his work with the Great Church Order (1559), a lasting system of church government and polity* adopted all over Protestant Germany.

ESTHER CHUNG-KIM

Brest-Litovsk, Union of, concluded the 1596 synod between Ukrainian* and Belorussian Orthodox bishops under Polish/Lithuanian rule and the Roman Catholic Church. A decline in the education of clergy, a lack of support from Constantinople (which had fallen to the Ottomans in 1453), and an active Catholic presence after the unification of Poland* and Lithuania* (1569) led the metropolitan of Kiev to accept the authority of Rome. The Orthodox preserved their traditional Eastern rites (Divine* Liturgy) and customs, the Julian calendar*, and married clergy, while affirming Catholic theology. Despite some resistance in Ukraine, the process of Latinization continued, leading to the formation of the Uniate (Greek Catholic) Church (see Uniate Churches). But both Russians* and many Poles, who used the Latin Mass*, opposed the Union of Brest-Litovsk, which was still a source of tension during the celebration of the 1,000th anniversary of Christianity in Russia (1988).

MARIA ROGINSKA

Brethren (the) trace their roots to the rebaptism of eight adults in the Eder River in Schwarzenau, Germany (1708). Led by Alexander Mack, Sr., and known first as the German Baptist Brethren, their offspring in North America include several Brethren groups: the Church of the Brethren (adopting this name in 1908; headquarters in Elgin, Illinois, with about 130,000 members), the Fellowship of Grace Brethren Churches, the Brethren Church, the Dunkard Brethren, and the Old German Baptist Brethren.

The Brethren emerged from the late-17th-c. Pietist* Movement's critique of the formalism and doctrinal focus of state* churches. Echoing concerns of 16th-c. Anabaptists*, the German Baptist Brethren were influenced by both Anabaptism (beliefs about adult baptism, the separation of church* and state, pacifism*, and church discipline) and Pietism (a strong accent on love in human relationships). The celebration of a Love* Feast – a worship service that includes a modest liturgical meal, feet washing, and sharing the bread and cup of Holy Communion – became an important feature in many churches with Pietist roots. The Brethren were often nicknamed “Dunkers” or “Dunkards” because they were baptized, or “dunked,” by triple immersion in lakes and rivers.

The Church of the Brethren calls its members to “another way of living: continuing the work of Jesus – simply, peacefully, together.” This phrase captures distinctive Brethren values: an emphasis on discipleship*, simplicity of life, peacemaking, and the church as community. The Brethren emphasize that they are a “non-creedal church,” often saying, “We have no creed except the New Testament.” Two key themes include “no force in religion” (rejecting the use of coercion in religious matters) and a strong commitment to ecumenical activities, especially through the World* Council of Churches. The Church of Brethren, one of the historical peace* churches, nevertheless respects the individual conscience of members who join the military forces. The church places a strong emphasis on service programs to people in need beyond their membership.

Blending the legacies of both Anabaptism and Pietism, Brethren emphasize the importance of a loving spirit in interpersonal and church relationships. Thus the spirit of truth often takes precedence over doctrine, and the compassion of Jesus supersedes denominational dogma. Frequently citing the words of an early leader, Brethren seek to give witness to the gospel: “For the glory of God and our neighbor's good.”

DONALD KRAYBILL

Brethren of the Common Life, a community that developed in the Netherlands around Gerard Groote* after c1375 to foster devotion and fight clerical abuses. Like the Beguines*, it had no formal vows; the derivative Windesheim community adopted the Augustinian* Rule. The Imitation of Christ, attributed to Thomas à Kempis*, came from these communities. Their schools in the Netherlands and Germany were highly honored; students included Nicholas* of Cusa, Gabriel Biel*, Erasmus*, and Charles* V.

Brethren of the Free Spirit. See FREE SPIRIT, BRETHREN OF.

Breviary, prayer book containing all readings for the Divine Office*, which priests are required to recite daily. See also HOURS, BOOKS OF.

Bridget of Sweden. See BIRGITTA.

British and Foreign Bible Society, lay organization founded in 1804, disclaiming any ecclesial function because its directors were members of various denominations. It initiated the publication of inexpensive Bibles without annotations and excluding the Apocrypha*.

Broadcasting, Religious. See MEDIA AND CHRISTIANITY.

Broad Church, liberal group in the Church of England during the 19th c., in the tradition of Samuel Coleridge* and Thomas Arnold.

Brown Blackwell, Antoinette Louisa. See BLACKWELL, ANTOINETTE LOUISA BROWN.

Brownson, Orestes Augustus (1803–76). Universalist* minister (1826–31), Unitarian* minister (1832), and subsequently pastor of his own religious organization (1836–42), he converted to Roman Catholicism in 1844. He was the editor of several journals (notably Boston Quarterly Review, 1838–42, and Brownson's Quarterly Review, 1844–64, 1873–75), philosopher, theologian, political theorist, and charter member of the Transcendentalist Club (1836–37). After his conversion to Catholicism, he became the foremost lay Catholic philosopher, theologian, and apologist for the Catholic community in the USA. Familiar with modern philosophy, Brownson eventually developed a doctrine of life by communion as a way of explaining the organic nature and mission of Catholic Christianity. His American Republic (1865) applied his theological doctrine of life to US political theory.

PATRICK W. CAREY

Bryan, William Jennings. See SCOPES TRIAL.

Buber, Martin (1878–1965), had three principal areas of concern: the philosophy of dialogue*, Hasidism, and the HB. Underlying his writings is a vision of the cultural and spiritual renewal of Judaism and Western civilization. With respect to Scripture*, he held that neither a purely literary nor a purely critical approach could adequately capture its core religious significance. Through various innovative and unconventional aesthetic* and hermeneutic* strategies, he hoped to encourage the reader to engage in an existential* encounter with the biblical text. His German translation of Scripture is guided by the premise that the Bible records God’s spoken address. The voice of God is to be heard anew by every generation. In consonance, he propounded a “biblical humanism,” which called on one to heed the address of God as refracted through other human beings in the unfolding social and historical realities of life (see I–Thou Relation). Accordingly, he was a tireless advocate of Arab–Jewish rapprochement and Jewish–Christian dialogue.

For Buber interfaith dialogue* must acknowledge genuine differences. Although he regarded Jesus as his “great brother,” he did not hesitate to criticize Christianity. His critique flowed from his conception of biblical faith as positing the essential unity of life and a corresponding rejection of a distinction between the sacred and secular. All aspects of everyday existence must be permeated by the power of faith*. In contrast, he noted, by projecting salvation* as something beyond earthly life, Christianity sponsors an ontological dualism* that denigrates both divine creation* and the efficacy of human acts. Biblical faith manifests a trust in God, whereas Christianity is beholden to a Gnostic* conception of faith as saving knowledge. Christian scholars have challenged Buber’s polemic for its “reckless” essentialism (ignoring the diversity of “Christianities”) and for its failure to recognize the affirmation of the event of the cross as an expression of existential trust.

MARTINA URBAN

Bucer, Martin (1491–1551), Protestant Reformer, ecumenical theologian, church organizer. Born in Alsace, educated within the Dominican* order, Bucer became a leading figure in the Strasbourg Church (1523–49). The ecclesiastical structures he created for Strasbourg and Hesse were imitated by Protestant churches throughout Southern Germany; his ecclesiology* influenced Calvin*. He strove to end the eucharistic* controversy between Lutherans* (consubstantiation*) and Zwinglians* (memorial Lord’s* Supper) through the Wittenberg Concord (1536). He was involved in religious colloquies with Roman Catholics in unsuccessful attempts to reunite the German Church (1540–46). Exiled by the Schmalkaldic War, Bucer taught theology in Cambridge (1549–51).

AMY NELSON BURNETT

Buchman, Frank (1878–1961), founder of the Oxford* Group and Moral* Re-armament. Born in a German-speaking community in Pennsylvania, he became a Lutheran minister. Following successful work as a YMCA* secretary (Pennsylvania State College, 1909–15), he traveled to India and China. Convinced of the need for moral revival, he organized the First Century Christian Fellowship in England (1921), nicknamed the Oxford Group (1928–29) and renamed Moral Re-armament (1938). Both praised and criticized for his attempts to bring about a moral conversion of Hitler and to prevent war, after World War II he encouraged contact between countries and religions. He was criticized for his simplistic moralism and cultivation of well-known leaders.

BUDDHISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

Buddhism and Christianity: Buddhist Perspective

Buddhism and Christianity: Christian Perspective

Buddhist Scriptures and the Bible

Buddhism and Christianity: Buddhist Perspective. Buddhism and Christianity are often misunderstood to be contradictory to each other, because Christianity is monotheistic* and Buddhism is atheistic*. However, this is not necessarily true. Certainly if they are analyzed from a narrow perspective emphasizing the particularity of each, they may be seen to have many differences. Yet from the perspective of an all-encompassing, universal realm, the two may be seen as having a very similar position. This becomes clear when one compares a Christian’s experience of God* with a Buddhist’s experience of enlightenment.

For example, when Paul had his encounter with Jesus on the road to Damascus, he was described as being blind for three days (Acts 9). Whether one interprets this literally or not, it can certainly be said that Paul was changed radically, from a man of hatred and vengeance to a man of love and compassion. It is as if he had entered a furnace and been completely melted down.

The same metaphor can be applied to the Buddhist practitioner. In Zen Buddhism in particular, the term “death” is often used; it symbolizes the need to melt away all of one’s linguistic and rationalistic concepts. Every belief that has up until now served as a foundation for the practitioner’s existence must be obliterated by the heat of the furnace of meditation. This is called the “death” experience. It is this “death” that confers salvation*, or enlightenment, on aspirants, who are saved by the destruction of their mental prisons. From this perspective, Paul evidently experienced this “death” when meeting Jesus. All Christians, in fact, have within themselves the innate ability to have such an experience.

Another crucial similarity between Buddhism and Christianity involves the ideal of compassion*. Jesus taught that we should love* our enemies. Yet who is able to do this? Did Jesus then teach us something that cannot be put into practice? Christians say, “We can’t do it alone, but with God all things are possible.” A Buddhist would say, “In the narrow world of personalities and individual concerns, it is impossible, but in the world of emptiness, everything is accomplished naturally.” What is this “emptiness”? The all-embracing, nonexclusive realm of interdependence, in which all beings are connected to, and thus dependent on, all other beings (see Heteronomy). Entering this realm, one will automatically feel a deep and abiding compassion, both for oneself and for others. To fully realize such a realm with one’s entire being, and not just the intellect, is the goal of every sincere Buddhist. On a fundamental level, this realm can be seen as none other than what the Christians call “God” (see God, Christian Views of, Cluster).

How is the religious practitioner able to enter this realm? What does it mean to “enter the furnace”? For the Zen practitioner, it has traditionally meant abandoning not only one’s sense of self, but also all reliance on words and language. Some ancient Zen masters even resorted to burning the Buddhist scriptures to make this point clear. Freedom in Zen was sought through no-language and no-words; this was the furnace through which the practitioner had to pass. Such a practice is not seen as necessary by most Christians, except perhaps by some followers of mysticism* (see Apophaticism). Yet certainly it must be agreed that a personal transformation must occur: the furnace must be entered. Only in this way can Christians meet God, and Buddhists experience emptiness. SUNG BAE PARK

Buddhism and Christianity: Christian Perspective.

The Christian journey toward understanding Buddhism has been long and difficult. The 19th-c. European scholars who pioneered the study of Indian religions only gradually realized that the Buddha was not another Indian god but a historical figure who inspired a distinctive religious movement. As the traditions that stem from the Buddha’s teachings were better understood, Europeans began to grasp how radical these teachings were. They seemed to suggest that Buddhism was an atheistic* religion with a nihilistic worldview, a cult of nothingness that had no place for God or for human personhood. A prejudice toward Buddhism as a life-denying religion remains influential to this day. In the early 20th c., more and more Europeans were not only attracted to Buddhism but converted to it, founding Buddhist centers and movements. A number of these converts engaged in both pro-Buddhist apologetics and anti-Christian polemics.

Despite these misunderstandings, Buddhist-Christian relations today perhaps represent the most fully developed inter-religious dialogue*. Many Christians, both in Asia and in the West, practice Buddhist meditation, some after joining Buddhist communities, others while claiming to remain Christian. There is a well-established intermonastic exchange between Buddhist monks and nuns in Asian countries and their Christian counterparts in Western monastic orders. Christian participants in such exchanges insist that they have been spiritually enriched by the experience.

Those who have entered deeply into Buddhist-Christian dialogue, however, are aware of the difficulties, both intellectual and spiritual, that must be overcome if mutual understanding is to be achieved. The Buddhist teaching of “not-self” (Sanskrit, anatman), which states that no observable constituents of human biology or psychology allow us to verify the existence of a “person,” is derived from the “mutual codependent origination” (Sanskrit, pratitya-samutpada) of all things. Rather than arising from a preexisting “first cause,” all constituents of reality are interdependent. In the course of time, this was radicalized to mean the absolute “emptiness” (Sanskrit, shunyata) of all aspects of reality. Though this may seem impossible for Christians to accept, Christian “negative theology” (see Apophaticism) warns us that the transcendence of God entails our inability to know God in Godself, and human sciences have shown that the human person is not only a unique individual but a social construct. At the levels of both spiritual practice and social analysis, the encounter with Buddhism has led Christians to reexamine many things they previously took for granted in a conceptual framework derived more from Greek philosophy than from biblical revelation. The result has been a more mature Christian faith. Other Christians have been inspired by the apparent equivalent of divine grace* in Buddhist traditions, such as the Pure Land tradition, which find consolation and the promise of salvation* in devotion to bodhisattvas, who defer their own complete enlightenment and their definitive entry into nirvana out of compassion for suffering beings.

The more radical forms of Buddhism, such as Zen, arrive at such a thoroughgoing nondualism that they seem to eradicate not only the distinction between absolute reality and the phenomenal world, but also that between good and evil. Having transcended the illusion of a “self” and the notion of substantial existence, how does one return to the sphere of responsibility for one’s actions in history? Contemporary Buddhists have developed an “engaged Buddhism,” which applies the Buddhist diagnosis of human ills to the hatred, greed, and delusion underlying the injustice and violence of our world, and acknowledges the primacy of active love* of neighbor (Gk agape) in Christianity, while Christians have recognized the value of the wisdom (Sanskrit, prajna) attained in meditation. Buddhists and Christians are realizing the complementarity of their traditions, at once radically different and radically similar.

JOHN D’ARCY MAY

Buddhist Scriptures and the Bible. Like the HB, Buddhist teachings existed for several centuries as oral traditions before being written down to become scriptures at about the same time as the Christian NT. The Buddhist canon, though about 1,000 times the size of the Christian Bible, was nevertheless preserved in memory by the various schools with remarkable uniformity. The Buddhist scriptures contain vast amounts of legendary material, making it even more difficult to discover a “biography” of the Buddha than it is to reconstruct the life of the “historical* Jesus” from the Gospels. Yet in the context of a vivid portrayal of life in northeast India in the 5th c. BCE, historical scholarship can discern the words and deeds of Siddhartha Gautama, the prince who became the Enlightened One or Buddha (also known as Shakyamuni, “sage of the Shakyas”).

According to tradition, immediately after the Buddha died a council was called so that there would be agreement on his authentic teachings (Sanskrit, dhamma) and the rules of monastic discipline (Sanskrit, vinaya). The individual narratives (Sanskrit, sutras) that make up the canon usually begin with “Thus have I heard . . .”, implying that they are authenticated by witnesses, in much the same way as the parables* of Jesus are reported by the evangelists. Much later (c100 BCE to 400 CE), new sutras began to appear in written form, an act of emancipation at a time when only the Brahmin caste was literate.

These scriptures, arising in the Mahayana (Great Vehicle) Buddhist movement, radicalized the Buddha's teaching on the ultimate emptiness (Sanskrit, sunyata) of all things by deploying a strategy known as "skillful means" (Sanskrit, kausalya-upaya). This allowed these scriptures to assert their legitimacy while claiming to contain definitive teachings that were too advanced to have been given to the Buddha's contemporaries but could now be revealed, much as Jesus said that he taught "in parables" until the disciples were ready to receive the full import of his message (cf. Mark 4:10–20, par.). In many Mahayana traditions, certain scriptures – e.g. the Lotus Sutra revered throughout East Asia – became a central focus of devotion.

At the same time, another strand of Buddhist tradition, predominant in Zen, relies on a "special transmission outside the scriptures, not founded on words and letters [but] pointing directly to one's mind." The central insight is that we already possess the transcendent "Buddha nature"; realizing this, we grasp the emptiness of all reality without dependence on written records. The paradox, of course, is that we know this only because these stories were eventually written down and themselves became scripture. Though Zen monks, too, chant the sutras, the practice of struggling to solve logical riddles (Japanese, koans) until the mind bursts through the barrier of reason and realizes nonduality, takes precedence.

Scripture in Buddhism has a somewhat different function than its Christian equivalent (see Scripture), yet there are plenty of parallels. Just as Jesus worked "signs" in order to translate his teaching into concrete practice (Gospel of John*), the Buddha performed miracles, sometimes in competition with famous magicians. Both Jesus and the Buddha taught in parables, drawing lessons from nature and everyday life. The "hard sayings" of Jesus have been compared to koans, and the crystal-clear imagery of the Dhammapada recalls the Sermon* on the Mount. Paul's saying, "I live, not I, but Christ in me" (Gal 2:20), like Jesus' words about denying oneself to follow him (Mark 8:35 par.), has seemed to some Buddhists to resemble the teaching on "not-self" (Sanskrit, anatman), and the hymn affirming that Jesus "emptied himself" (Phil 2) has inspired speculation about a "dynamic emptying" (sunyata) in the Trinity* itself. Though in different ways, both Buddhism and Christianity are "religions of the book."

JOHN D'ARCY MAY

Bulgakov, Sergei Nikolaevich (1871–1944), economist, philosopher, Orthodox priest, theologian. Born in Orel, Russia, he studied political economy in Moscow and abandoned Marxism for idealism (c1900). He was a professor of political economy (Kiev and Moscow) and a member of the Second Duma (1907) before serving as a delegate to the All-Russian Council of the Orthodox Church (1917–18) and being ordained a priest (1918). He was exiled by the Soviet government (1922). In Paris (1925–44) he was the founding dean and professor of dogmatic theology at St. Sergius Orthodox Theological Institute. The Moscow Patriarchate and an émigré synod judged Bulgakov's concept of Sophia heretical (1935), doing lasting damage to his reputation.

Bulgakov's theological achievement, aided by his friend Fr. Pavel Florensky (1882–1937), was to synthesize Vladimir Soloviev's* religious philosophy and the dogmatic and liturgical traditions of the Orthodox Church. The tensions in the synthesis are part of its creativity. At its core stands the vision of a Trinity* of divine persons embracing each other in mutual love and giving of themselves in continuing kenosis* for the life of the world. A consummate world-affirming theologian, Bulgakov believed that every worthy economic*, scientific*, and aesthetic* pursuit shares in divine Wisdom and has an offering to bring to the eucharistic feast. PAUL VALLIERE

Bulgaria. The first Christian communities in Bulgaria date back to the early ages of Christianity. King Boris I officially adopted Christianity from the Patriarchate of Constantinople (865), and he strove to promote Slavonic vernacular worship (with help from Cyril* and Methodius's translations) and Bulgarian leadership of the local Orthodox Church. The Bulgarian Church declared itself autocephalous* (927), despite Constantinople's opposition. The medieval Bulgarian Church, challenged by the Bogomils* and illuminated by hesychasm*, was subordinated to Constantinople (1018–1235). Ottoman authorities suppressed the Patriarchate from the late 14th until the late 19th c. before restoring it through a firman (official edict) of the sultan (1870). Bulgaria gained national independence in 1878, yet it took much longer before the Bulgarian Patriarchate was officially recognized by the other Orthodox churches (1953).

After the 1989 collapse of Communism, the Orthodox Church regained its place in society. However, the Church was weakened by its Communist legacy of state-controlled pawns among its members, strict control of enrollment in the ecclesiastical academy, and a suspicion of corruption in the church leadership. Heated debates over these past compromises led to the tragic split (1992) of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, with active interference by state authorities, which legitimated an alternative Holy Synod. This internal split had unfortunate, complex, and far-reaching consequences, despite a state-promoted (early-21st-c.) abolition of the alternative church structures. The Bulgarian Orthodox Church was also challenged by the new experience of political, cultural, and religious pluralism, for which the Church was largely unprepared and had neither an adequate theological nor an effective socio-logical approach.

During the post-Communist period, the heightened popularity of religion is attested to by packed churches on feast days; baptisms, funerals, and marriages in church are almost universally practiced. But other church involvement and attendance are very low, despite the fact that Orthodox Christians nominally make up about 83% of the population. For its part, the Church has not developed significant societal initiatives. Reorganized seminaries and religiously sponsored institutions of higher education seek to address a significant shortage of priests, members of religious orders, and religious specialists.

In contrast to the generally intolerant attitudes toward the new religious movements, which came to the country after the fall of Communism, sociological surveys reveal a high level of religious tolerance among and toward "traditional religions." Muslims are in a situation similar to that of Orthodox Christians. Muslims, who include a Turkish community and smaller groups of Pomaks, Roma, and Tatars, are also afflicted by internal disputes; despite efforts at revitalization, they also experience a decline in the number of regular Friday mosque-goers. Normally, Christians and Muslims live peacefully side by side, yet cooperation between them remains limited.

Statistics: Population (2001): 7.9 million. Christians, 84% (Orthodox, 82.64%; Roman and Eastern Rite Catholics, 1%; Protestants, 0.5%); Muslims, 12.2%. (Source: 2001 census.)

INA MERDJANOVA and
JERRY G. PANKHURST

Bull (from Lat bullā, "seal"), a solemn and authoritative papal pronouncement; since the 19th c., usually replaced by encyclicals*.

Bullinger, Heinrich (1504–75), Swiss theologian, architect of Reformed Covenant* theology. He embraced an Evangelical position (1522) and replaced Zwingli* as chief pastor in Zurich (1531). Along with Zwingli and Calvin*, he was one of the principal founders of Reformed Protestantism*.

Although Bullinger and Calvin differed on predestination* and church discipline*, they did come to an agreement on the Eucharist*, with the Consensus Tigurinus of 1549. During nearly 44 years as chief pastor in Zurich, Bullinger's sway over the Reformed* churches in Europe, England, and Scotland rivaled Calvin's own influence. Bullinger was a prolific writer. His works were widely read, and his Second Helvetic Confession* (1566) became a standard confession of faith in the Reformed churches.

Bullinger's doctrine of the covenant was the basis for the later development of this important Reformed concept. In his One and Eternal Testament or Covenant of God (1534), he argued that there was only one covenant in history, which stretched from Adam to Christ. Baptism* and Eucharist replaced the old sacraments of circumcision and Passover. Bullinger's opposition to the Anabaptists* rests in his Covenant thought, as he objected to what he viewed as their rejection of the authority of the OT.

J. WAYNE BAKER

Bultmann, Rudolf (1884–1976), German NT scholar and theologian who combined the critical-historical methods of liberal* scholarship with a biblical theology based on justification* by faith* in the salvation*-occurrence of the crucifixion of Christ. He was best known for his project of demythologizing* the NT.

Son of a Lutheran pastor, he studied theology at Tübingen, Berlin, and Marburg with Adolf Harnack* (history of dogma), Adolf Jülicher and Johannes Weiss (NT), and Wilhelm Herrmann (theology). He taught at Breslau (1916–20), Giessen (1920–21), and Marburg (1921–51). His life spanned a tumultuous era in German history. He lost one brother in World War I, and another died in a German concentration camp in 1942. During the Third Reich, Bultmann was a member of the Confessing* Church, speaking out (1933) against the anti-Semitic policies of the Nazis and German Christians and being a principal author of a document signed by the Marburg theological faculty protesting a decree demanding absolute allegiance to the state and requiring all ecclesiastical appointees and their wives to be of the Aryan race.

Bultmann's first major work, The History of the Synoptic Tradition (1921), established him as a cofounder with Martin Dibelius of form criticism (Formgeschichte). This method of analyzing and interpreting preliterate oral traditions is based on the assumption that these traditions possess distinctive characteristics and exemplify relatively discernible patterns of development. By distinguishing among these stylistic "forms" – miracle stories, short illustrative stories, utterances (wisdom, prophetic, apocalyptic), controversial discourses, legends, etc. – and then sorting out the original and purer forms from their later embellishments, the critic is able to ascertain the earliest and most trustworthy traditions about Jesus. With this method, Bultmann concluded that many of the NT narratives about Jesus, e.g. the birth narratives, the miracle stories, Peter's confession, the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, and the Resurrection narratives, are not historically true but were written for religious or edifying purposes. Nevertheless, this analysis elucidates the historically reliable teachings of Jesus, and these are sufficient to provide a consistent picture of his ministry. These conclusions were published in his book Jesus (1926), which precipitated a host of responses, including "the new quest of the historical Jesus*." Equally important was Bultmann's exegesis of the NT, principally the theologies of Paul and John, presented in his Theology of the New Testament and his commentary on the Fourth Gospel (the Gospel of John*).

Bultmann was unique in being both a leading NT scholar and an influential theologian. His theology can, on one level, be stated simply: the crucified Christ is the revelation of God's grace* (see Cross and Crucifixion); when this revelation is understood, it asks the person to identify with Christ by surrendering the attempt to live out of one's own strength and to experience liberation from the past and freedom to take responsibility for the future.

On another level, this simply stated theology is but the tip of a highly sophisticated intellectual iceberg that includes historical exegetical inquiry, a hermeneutical* interpretive theory, and a philosophical framework for making intelligible the theological message of the NT. Bultmann's hermeneutical theory addresses the question first posed by Friedrich Schleiermacher*: "How is it possible that a present interpreter can understand an ancient text like the New Testament?" For Bultmann such an understanding is possible because both the author and the interpreter live in the same historical world and the interpreter has a "pre-understanding" of the subject matter and can have a "life-relation" to it.

The task of the interpreter of the NT is to translate the mythological language of its authors, both honoring their intentions and making their language intelligible to the present. A careful analysis discloses that the biblical authors' language is prescientific and mythological (see Myth and the Study of Christianity). The intent of this language, however, is to proclaim that human existence apart from faith is subject to transiency and the fear of death and that a new self-understanding has been made possible through the death of Christ. In this new understanding, the believer lives in the world but does not derive his or her meaning from it. The best way to make this message intellectually intelligible to modernity, Bultmann argued, was to employ the philosophy of Martin Heidegger*, which shows that we are beings who exist historically in care and anxiety and lose ourselves in preoccupation with the world.

Bultmann's exegetical studies remain authoritative reference works. Yet his main legacy is his decisive affirmation that critical biblical interpretation simultaneously involves a method of exegesis* centered on a close analysis of language, a hermeneutics* in conversation with contemporary philosophies and cultures, and a theological concern. Even as biblical scholars refine his conception of language, broaden his view of hermeneutics, and pursue other theological concerns, they show themselves to be heirs of Bultmann. See also DEMYTHOLOGIZATION.

VAN A. HARVEY

Bunyan, John (1628–88), Puritan preacher and author of Pilgrim's Progress. Despite his lack of university education, Bunyan acquired a simple eloquence by reading the Bible and John Foxe's* Acts and Monuments. Bunyan fought in the English civil war (1644–46) as a member of the New Model Army and joined a separatist church in Bedford, England (1655), where he was recognized as a preacher (1657). With the Restoration (1660), Bunyan was imprisoned (1660–72) for nonconformity*. Bunyan's greatest contribution owes much to his inner spiritual turmoil, which he describes in Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666) and, after his release from prison, Pilgrim's Progress (1678), an allegory of the Christian life. Continuing to preach, he published polemical tracts against Quakers* and Latitudinarians*, who, he feared, eroded the foundation of the Protestant doctrine of justification* by faith alone.

PAUL CHANG-HA LIM

Buraku Liberation in Japan, a movement aimed at liberating the Buraku people, an outcaste minority in Japan (between 1 and 3 million), from discrimination infringing on their basic human* rights, including the right to have decent living accommodations (rather than being forced to live in one of the 6,000 ghetto-like Bukaru communities), to receive an education, to enter into marriage with someone freely chosen, and to hold an occupation other than a menial job. The Buraku people, victims of oppression since the feudal system, came in contact with Christianity through the 1870s mission work of William Ball Wright of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Afterward the church engaged not merely in evangelism but also in educational and medical services. Until the early 20th c., a Christianity that preached the equality of human beings was largely welcomed by the Buraku people.

While at St. Andrew Church, Tokyo, Toshimichi Imai (later the first president of the Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church of Japan) denounced the discrimination against the Buraku people as a sin* of Japanese society and organized an evangelistic group to meet their needs (1893). Imai was joined in this mission by Kumajirou Kaiho (baptized at the oldest Protestant church in Japan) and Takeo Yasueda (active in an antiprostitution movement).

In the early 20th c., as the focus of evangelism shifted toward cities, these issues tended to be ignored. Nevertheless, Toraichirou Takeba and especially Kousuke Tomeoka worked for social welfare in Mie and Wakayama and in Hokkaido and Tokyo, respectively. In 1900 Chiki Mori founded Meiji School in Niigata for Buraku children. Yet Toyohiko Kagawa* still expressed a discriminatory view of Buraku in some of his works, despite his collaboration with the National Union of Levelers, founded in 1922 for the liberation of Buraku on the principles of human dignity, freedom, and equality. Thus the churches at large were inconsistently sympathetic to the Buraku people, but rarely critical of common, un-conscientized* discriminatory aspects of society. Some church members even refused to celebrate Holy Communion using a chalice shared with Buraku people.

After World War II, formal institutions such as the Christian Council for the Liberation of Buraku (interdenominational, since 1962) and the Buraku Liberation Center (United* Church of Christ in Japan, since 1975) were founded to challenge discrimination inside and outside the church. Since then, unjustifiably discriminatory phrases and vocabulary in the translated Bible* (see Bible Translations Cluster: History of), hymns, church documents, conferences, and Christian publications have been criticized or corrected. Pioneering research on the relation between Christianity and Buraku was undertaken by a historian, Eiichi Kudou, and theologically developed by Teruo Kuribayashi in his Theology of the Crown of Thorns (1986).

NOZOMU MIYAHIRA

Burial Services. There is evidence that, throughout history, human beings cared for the dead and remembered them in particular ways. The Christian history of ritual and liturgy associated with the dead is a trajectory both in universals and in elements particular to Christian theology.

The early history of Christian burial rites is a study in how common cultural practices can be imbued with new meaning. The dead were generally prepared for burial at home, accompanied (as early as the 4th c.) by the singing of psalms and hymns. The body was carried by procession to the cemetery, and in some places Eucharist was celebrated at the grave (as early as the 3rd c.). A third station at the church had been added (5th–6th c.) between home and grave. From this threefold movement developed an order of rites: the vigil* (or wake*), keeping watch and praying with the dead; the funeral liturgy in the church, in some places eucharistic liturgy focused on the story of Christ's resurrection and the "sure and certain hope" of the resurrection for all; and the final commendation and burial in the cemetery. The theological foci were on commending the dead to God, praising God for the means and promise of eternal life, and reminding the mourners that their hope was the same.

The Eastern Orthodox* churches generally solidified their funeral process around non-eucharistic liturgies, differentiating ritually between ordained and lay members, infant deaths, and deaths during Easter Week.

The Western Church liturgies began to reflect by the 8th c. a shift in theology from hope* in the resurrection* to fear of Judgment*.

Part of a complex shift in views on salvation*, dying, reconciliation, and Christian anthropology*, this eventually developed the Requiem* Mass (literally from the phrase “rest in peace”), which retained both ancient texts and newer rituals. The theological emphasis was on absolution* rather than commendation, and preparation for the mourners’ own deaths.

The Protestant Reformation ranged from minor adaptations to the Mass to a brief burial service in the cemetery followed by a preaching service in the church. This change in practice was intended to disavow any association with praying for the dead* and instead to focus on the living and their preparation for death by proclaiming the gospel of the resurrection.

Contemporary Christian practices are increasingly diverse and divided on issues regarding inculturation* and theological differences. Theological issues are centered on the relationship between the dead and the living (see Dead, Prayers for the) and the focus of the funeral (for the dead or the living). The discomfort of many Protestants with liturgy that may affect the dead has resulted in a rise in memorial services where the dead are “remembered” as they were in life and the mourners comforted – a 20th-c. growing development in all reformed rites.

LIZETTE LARSON-MILLER

Burkina Faso (formerly Upper Volta), the home of the ancient Mossi kingdom, became a French colony (late 19th c.) and gained independence in 1960.

Islam* was introduced by Arab merchants (18th c.). The Roman Catholic White Fathers arrived among the Mossi people in 1901. Owing to the strict ban on mission schools by the French administration, Mossi Christianity started with the evangelization of adults. The progress was slow, with polygamy* as one of the major obstacles to conversion. Arriving in Ouagadougou (1930), Fr. Jean Goarisson as a young medical doctor contributed to the expansion of missionary work by discovering a vaccine against blindness and by treating sleeping disease. He gained the government’s and the elite’s respect for missionaries and their work. Mass conversions occurred when the Canadian priest Fr. McCoy opened a dispensary in Dagati (northwest) and healed Poreku, a prominent traditional chief, together with many of his followers (1929); the medical center became a worship center. Starting in 1932, “rain miracles” attracted more converts in the region of Dagaa. Today the Catholic Church, strong among the elite, counts nine dioceses with numerous highly qualified personnel. Fr. Paul Zoungana (ordained 1942) became archbishop of Ouagadougou (1960) and cardinal (1965). The theologian Anselme Sanon was made bishop of Bobo Dioulasso (1975).

Most Protestants are Evangelicals and Pentecostals*/Charismatics*; the Assemblies* of God is the largest denomination. Together these churches form the Federation of Evangelical Churches and Missions, affiliated with the World* Evangelical Alliance. The Association of Evangelical Reformed Churches of Burkina Faso (since 1986) undertakes projects among the poorest population in the Sahel.

Christianity in Burkina Faso can be described as a flowering oasis in the desert. Churches excel by their remarkable cooperation among themselves (including African* Instituted Churches) and interreligious cooperation with Muslims.

Statistics: Population (2008): 15.2 million. Christians, 19% (Roman Catholics, 11%; Protestants, 7.4%; members of African Instituted Churches, 0.6%); Muslims, 49%; African Religionists, 32%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

VALENTIN DEDJI

Burning of Heretics, medieval practice first used in France (1022) and approved by Pope Lucius III (1184). A person convicted of heresy* by a church court was then “delivered to the secular* arm” for punishment (see Inquisition).

Burundi. The introduction of Christianity in this German, then Belgian, former colony is closely linked to colonialism. Earlier attempts were fruitless, mainly because of the hostility of the Arab slave* traders. Thus two pioneering Catholic White* Fathers, Deniaud and Promaux, were killed after nine months on the mission field (1881). The church was permanently planted with the coming of the German colonial masters (1896); the first Roman Catholic mission stations were built in Mugeru and Muyaga (1898), and later Buhonga (1902), Kanyinya (1904), Rugari (1909), and Buhoro (1912).

The first Protestant mission stations, in Kibimba, Musema, and Muyebe, were not established until 1911 by the Neukirchner Missionsgesellschaft missionaries, but died with the departure of the Germans (1916); they were rebuilt by Danish Baptist missionaries (1928), who invited the Church Missionary Society, the Methodist Church, and the Society of Friends* missionaries to help them. The Seventh-day Adventists, who entered in 1925, confined their work to Bubanza Province in the west. From Zaire (currently Democratic Republic of Congo*) came Swedish Pentecostals (arriving in 1935).

In the early stages, Burundians, and especially the mwami (king), were suspicious of every foreign religion. However, the coming of the Belgians, predominantly Catholics, contributed to the growth of the Roman Catholic Church. Largely under the sponsorship of the Belgian government, the Catholic Church was involved in running social facilities, schools, and hospitals; as a result, it grew rapidly.

The Protestant Evangelical churches and the Anglicans did not grow as fast. But the growth of these churches is still considerable and is closely related to the Rwanda* revival, generally known as the East African Revival Movement (beginning in 1930). The publication of the first Kirundi Bible in 1968 for the Protestant churches also opened an opportunity for growth.

The Charismatic and Pentecostal churches (including the Swedish Pentecostal Church, the largest), with their emphasis on the Holy* Spirit, speaking in tongues*, and a strong healing ministry, appeal to many Burundians because through their traditional religion and culture they have a great awareness of the spiritual world.

The independence of Burundi (1962) ushered in an era of handing over the missionary churches to the national leadership. From then on, the most important test for both the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches was the antagonism between the Hutu and Tutsi, with major outbreaks in 1965, 1972, and 1988, and others after 1993. The attitude of the churches toward these ethnic killings can be largely characterized as laissez-faire. This attitude led to mistrust toward the churches and more killing among Burundians. A good number of churches split along ethnic lines. All this put the churches' moral authority in question.

On the contrary, Islam managed to keep both its Hutu and Tutsi members in unity. This may account for the recent growth of this small religion. The influence of the Catholics had slowed down the growth of Islam and its involvement in the top political leadership of the country. However, with Islam's capacity to unite its members above ethnic strife and its recent involvement in top political leadership positions, it can be expected to continue growing and to seriously challenge the Christian churches in Burundi.

Statistics: Population (2000): 6.7 million (M). Christians, 6.2 M, 92% (Roman Catholics, 3.8 M, Protestants, 0.8 M; Anglicans, 0.5 M); African Religionists, 0.45 M, 7%; Muslims, 0.09 M, 1.4%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

THEODORE MBAZUMUTIMA

Bushnell, Horace (1802–76), pastor and theologian; born in rural Connecticut and educated at Yale College and Divinity School; an important and controversial theologian of the 19th-c. USA. He was a key figure in the shift from early-19th-c. conservative Evangelicalism* to theological liberalism*. His volume Christian Nurture (1848) abandoned a conversion*-oriented piety in favor of the role of family nurture. He also wrote God in Christ (1849), concerning Christology*, soteriology*, and the Trinity*, and tried to overcome the divisions between Unitarian* and Trinitarian Congregationalists. His theological views were controversial at the time, and Bushnell became involved in a celebrated heresy* trial. See also UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (IN THE UNITED STATES).

ROBERT BRUCE MULLIN

Business Ethics and Christianity. Christian thinkers have long been interested in ethics related to business matters. The Bible frequently discusses economic* matters and is replete with moral instructions directly applicable to business on both personal and systemic levels. For example, the OT instructs farmers to be good stewards of their land and to share their wealth in order to ensure justice* for the needy, strangers, and refugees*. Employers are instructed to pay wages on time and to use "fair weights and measures" when selling their goods. In the NT, many of Jesus' ethical teachings (e.g. love of neighbor) and parables are also directly applicable to business.

Throughout church history, theologians such as Tertullian* and Luther* saw fit to offer ethical commentary on the commercial practices of their time. Since they lived within the contexts of small-scale, zero-sum economies, their views of business and “trades people” were mostly negative.

Since the advent of modern economies, many Christians have acquired a more positive attitude toward business. Yet in today’s age of large corporations and interconnected global markets, there are many new ethical concerns. Contemporary Christian business ethicists are engaged in addressing topics such as the impact of globalization*; the purpose of corporations (maximization of shareholder wealth or the well-being of other stakeholders); the treatment of workers (including those in developing countries); the implications of seeing business as a “calling” or “vocation*,” honesty in accounting and finance; values-laden assumptions in management theories (i.e. views of human nature in motivating employees; see Anthropology Cluster); the impact of advertising on human values; and environmental stewardship.

Christians are far from univocal on these matters. Some generally (often tacitly) support current trends in global capitalism and many accompanying business practices. Others are more critical and see the need for reform. The roots of these differences seem to lie in factual analysis and theology, i.e. in the assessment of how far business practices are from the justice* that God wills for economic life in human communities. (See Global Ethics.)

A number of Christian corporate executives (including Max DePree, C. William Pollard, and Dennis Bakke) have worked to implement what they view as Christian-based ethics in the values and practices of their corporations. Others have been involved in the “spirituality at work” movement, aiming, in part, to reform business through the integration of spiritually based ethics. Other Christians question the neoliberal economic structure of business as they focus on globalized* solidarity and economic* ethics.

KENMAN L. WONG

Butler, Joseph (1692–1752), Anglican priest, preeminent British moralist and theologian. He wrote Fifteen Sermons Preached at Rolls Chapel (1726) and Analogy of Religion (1736), which countered 18th-c. criticisms of Christianity and were influential in Britain until the 19th c. Sermons appealed to the natural moral faculty of conscience* against Thomas Hobbes’s doctrine of psychological determinism and self-interest. Analogy challenged the natural theology of the Deists*, who opposed the Christian appeal to a special revelation* in the Bible. For Butler, since nature reveals defects and ambiguities analogous to those found in the Bible, “probability must be the very guide to life.” Natural religion has no privileged position over Christian revelation.

JAMES C. LIVINGSTON

Byzantine Art and Architecture, developed after Constantinople* became the capital of the Roman Empire (330 CE); characterized by the use of icons* and the construction of domes. See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Byzantine Theology normally designates what succeeded Greek patristic* theology in the Byzantine Empire (330 [or 527/65, Justinian]–1453, although this period could technically include patristic theology). Byzantine theology continues the interests and, to some extent, the methods of Greek patristic theology, but is marked by two concerns: (1) the 5th-c. ecumenical synods* (Ephesus*, 431; Chalcedon*, 451) that divided the imperial church from those who rejected the Christology propounded by these synods; and (2) the increasing hegemony of monasticism* within the Byzantine Church (and indeed beyond it).

The long-running dispute over Christology* (especially with the Miaphysite* or Monophysite* opponents of Chalcedon) produced both a formalized appeal to patristic authority, which came to be seen as second only to the apostolic authority, especially through florilegia, and also a technical terminology – nature, essence, person, “hypostasis,” and, later, will and activity – and a concentration on logical arguments. This is sometimes regarded as an incipient “scholasticism,” but is far removed from the 13th-c. Scholastics’ achievements.

The hegemony of monasticism led to a vast ascetic* literature, at the center of which is a profound reflection on human nature, fragmented by the Fall*, the restoration of which through Christ’s saving work is assimilated by ascetic struggle, which leads to the restoration of communion with God, experienced in pure prayer.

These two concerns were often held together, especially in the theologians of the early Byzantine period, such as Maximus* the Confessor and John* of Damascus, and later Gregory* Palamas. Their theological synthesis combined an apophatic* approach to God (inspired both by the experience of prayer and by epistemological and ontological considerations) and a thorough development of the implications of Chalcedonian Christology, a profound interest in the created order, and a developed sense of the transfiguring* power of the sacraments* and the ascetic life, leading to deification*. These concerns were sometimes pursued separately, leading to a lay or humanist tradition of theology, concerned with learned commentary on the Scriptures and the patristic tradition, exemplified by Photios* (9th c.) and the 14th-c. lay theologians. Byzantine theology also led to a monastic tradition concerned with the transforming possibilities opened up by the pursuit of prayer, which blossomed in figures such as Simeon* the New Theologian and the 14th-c. hesychast* monks, championed by Gregory* Palamas.

Various issues occupied Byzantine theology. The iconoclast* controversy led to consideration of the nature of image/icon. For both sides, it was a matter of Christology, for the Orthodox icons* were entailed by the Incarnation*. Eucharistic* theology, too, was at issue; the iconoclast notion of the Eucharist as an icon was opposed by an Orthodox insistence on the real presence of Christ; later, attention turned to the eucharistic sacrifice. During the hesychast* controversy, Palamas defended genuine experience of the unknowable God by invoking the distinction between God's unknowable essence and his energies, in which he is truly encountered, a distinction taken up in recent Orthodox* theology.

ANDREW LOUTH

Byzantium, the Greek city chosen by Constantine* when he moved the capital to the East (324), because of its strategic location and its proximity to Troy, legendary origin of the Romans. Refounded and rebuilt, it was named New Rome and, after his death, Constantinople. "Byzantine" is often used to refer to the Roman Empire after this transfer, especially after the West was conquered by Arian* Christian Germanic invaders (5th–6th c). The term can also refer to the political culture of the Empire in the East, specifically the complexity and deviousness of its diplomacy and its internal struggles for power. See also BYZANTINE ART AND ARCHITECTURE; BYZANTINE THEOLOGY.

C

Cabasilas, Nicholas (b c1322), Byzantine lay theologian who, though very little about his life is known (he is often confused with Nilos Cabasilas), is well known for two works: Commentary on the Divine Liturgy and The Life in Christ. A supporter of Gregory* of Palamas and the hesychasts*, he nevertheless does not mention in his works the essence–energies distinction or the Jesus* Prayer. Instead, his works expound a sacramental* piety, indebted to Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite, aimed not at monks, but at laity in all ranks of society. ANDREW LOUTH

Cabrini, Francis Xavier (1850–1917), Roman Catholic nun, the first US citizen to be canonized as a saint (1946; Patron of Immigrants).

The youngest of 13 children born into a farmer's family in Italy, Maria Francisca Cabrini was twice denied entrance into a convent because of her frail health; she was finally admitted and took religious vows (1877). Though she wanted to be a missionary, following her vow of obedience she accepted an appointment as the superior of a small orphanage. Later she founded the Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus (1880), modeling her actions on a treasured scriptural passage: "I can do all things in Him who strengthens me" (Phil 4:13). Devoted to works of mercy, the congregation quickly spread in Italy and Europe, establishing schools (especially for girls) and homes for the aged, the sick, and orphans.

Responding to Archbishop Corrigan's invitation to come to New York, Mother Cabrini began (1889) similar work for the sake of Italian immigrants in the USA, becoming a citizen in 1909. By the time she died (Chicago, 1917), her Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart had built and served more than 50 hospitals, schools, orphanages, convents, and other foundations in the USA. THOMAS MCGOWAN

Caecilian (d before 343). Bishop of Carthage during the Diocletian* persecutions (303–13), he cautioned against seeking martyrdom*. A rigorist group consecrated a rival bishop, accusing Caecilian of being associated with a traditor who had given the sacred Scriptures to officials (see Donatism). He was the only bishop from Latin Africa to attend the Council of Nicaea* (325).

Caiaphas, Jewish high priest who, according to Matt 26–27 and John 11:49–53, 18:28, proposed the arrest of Jesus, declared his guilt, and sent him to Pilate.

Cain, the firstborn son of Adam and Eve, who killed his brother Abel (Gen 4:1–24). The founder of the first city (Gen 4:17), he became for Augustine* the symbol of the "earthly city," whereas Abel was the first citizen of the "city of God" and a sojourner* on earth. In Jewish Midrash, Cain was sometimes called "the firstborn of Satan" (see Devil, Satan, Demons, and Demonic Powers). Conversely, for some Gnostics*, Cain became a representative of the highest deity, while Abel worshipped the Demiurge, the bungling creator. In return Polycarp* called Marcion* "the firstborn of Satan." According to later anti-Jewish Christian superstition, the Jews were often thought to have the "mark of Cain" (Gen 4:15) on their breasts (see Demonization).

Calendars. Three basic calendars have been used by Christian churches: the Julian, Gregorian, and Revised Julian.

The Julian calendar, introduced by Julius Caesar (46 BCE), was probably designed to approximate the tropical solar year. It has a year of 365.25 days divided into 12 months, with a leap day added to February every four years.

The Gregorian calendar was introduced in 1582 by Pope Gregory XIII because the Julian scheme added too many leap days; the astronomical solstices and equinoxes advanced by about 11 minutes per year (i.e. a day about every 134 years). By 1582 the year was 10 days out of alignment, which the Gregorian calendar corrected by removing 10 days. This calendar was soon adopted by most Catholic countries, then by Protestant countries (mostly in the 18th c.), and later by Eastern European countries. Thus the 1917 revolution in Russia was viewed as the "October revolution" (according to the Julian calendar), then as the "November revolution" when the Gregorian calendar was adopted by the state. But the Eastern Orthodox churches continued using the Julian calendar to establish the dates of its holidays. During this time, the Julian calendar continued to diverge from the Gregorian, the difference now being one of 13 days. Thus the Nativity/Christmas falls on December 25 according to the Gregorian calendar, but January 7 according to the Julian calendar.

The revised Julian calendar, very similar to the Gregorian calendar (they will differ by one day in 2800), was partly adopted at the Synod of Constantinople in 1923 by several Orthodox churches. The solar aspect of the revised Julian calendar was accepted by several Orthodox churches, including those of Constantinople, Greece, Romania, and Poland, but rejected by the Orthodox churches of Jerusalem, Russia, Ukraine, and Georgia. However, the lunar aspect of the revised Julian calendar, which dictates how the date of Pascha/Easter* is calculated – was rejected by most Orthodox churches, which still calculate the date of Easter according to the Julian calendar.

DANIEL PATTE

Calling. See VOCATION.

Calvary, “place of the skull” (Lat Calvaria; Heb/Aramaic Golgotha*; Gk Kranion), site of Jesus’ crucifixion outside Jerusalem. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre* was built near the traditional location.

Calvin, Jean (1509–64), Protestant Reformer, theologian, pastor, teacher; born in the cathedral city of Noyon, Northern France. As the talented son of an episcopal official, he was able to study with the bishop’s noble nephews. Benefices supplied educational support (though Calvin never advanced to the priesthood), and after receiving an arts degree in Paris, Calvin was directed by his father to study law. While so engaged, Calvin was strongly influenced by the humanist passion for original languages and sources. He became involved with the new “Evangelical” movement associated with French princess Marguerite* of Navarre, a movement in accord with but independent from German reforms (Luther*, Zwingli*, Bucer*). The question of Calvin’s “conversion*,” its date (c1530 or c1533) and character, continues to be debated. A very reticent man, Calvin made only one public autobiographical statement late in life, in the preface to his commentary on Psalms (published 1557), in which he spoke of his “sudden” or “unexpected” conversion. Scholars debate whether this meant his religious reorientation to the gospel (justification* by faith* and grace* alone, dependent on the sole authority of Scripture*), his break with Rome, or both. It is clear that both aspects of conversion were complete when Calvin renounced his benefices (May 1534) and left France in December for his lifelong exile.

A gifted writer, Calvin began his reform work with a small book called the Institutes of the Christian Religion, published in Basel (March 1536). The six chapters of this Latin text were dedicated to King Francis I of France, whose court was persecuting Evangelicals (“Protestants”) as seditious heretics*. Calvin’s task was to defend his fellow believers by explaining their faith: apologia and catechism in one. A Frenchman in exile and humanist-trained scholar, Calvin understood his calling to be that of a teacher-writer. Many who read his Institutes were impressed by his ability to organize and explain the faith; they tried to draft Calvin into active pastoral ministry. Farel* in Geneva was the first to do so, telling Calvin (simply passing through the city in July 1536) that God would trouble Calvin’s peace if he did not stay to help organize the reform in Geneva.

Calvin recognized God’s call through leaders of the church and stayed. With the new preaching, Geneva had already accepted Zwinglian ideas of magistrates controlling the social and moral life of the church (see Erastianism). However, Calvin insisted on ecclesiastical autonomy in discipline as well as doctrine; church and civil authority are distinct. Ideally, the two cooperate but each has its own constitutional order; the church functions independently when rulers are not members* of the faith (a conviction very important for persecuted churches and the later spread of Calvinism). Geneva’s Christian civil rulers rejected this idea and exiled Farel and Calvin (April 1538). Calvin wanted to return to his writing, but Bucer, leader of Protestant Strassburg, invoked the story of Jonah to call Calvin as pastor of the French-speaking religious exiles in that German-speaking city.

The next three years of ministry were rich. Calvin’s congregation in Strasbourg comprised fellow exiles; he could teach, write, and work with colleagues here and beyond. Bucer was an important influence, and Calvin became acquainted with Philip Melancthon* and others as he participated in ecumenical colloquies (between papal and varied Protestant groups). Calvin married a widowed member of his congregation, Idelette de Bure, who shared his deep commitment to the faith and earned his heartfelt praise as “the best companion” of his life and ministry. Geneva needed Calvin, however. With personal reluctance but the conviction of following God's will articulated by church leaders, he moved back to that small city-state (1541). He spent the rest of his life preaching, teaching, and organizing the Church of Geneva, the last-center of the international movement called Calvinism (see Reformed Churches).

Calvin is known for his writing. The Institutes of the Christian Religion is often called the most important book of the Protestant Reformation. Read in its final edition (1559), it was soon molding Calvin's heirs and being interpreted to fit their ecclesiastical situations. Consequently, it is often forgotten that Calvin intended this catechism-cum-textbook to be read alongside his biblical commentaries, which were the substance of his actual teaching. He lectured on Scripture*, working through one biblical book after another (lectio continua, "continuous reading"). The fruit was a large collection of commentaries on all the NT except Revelation and 2–3 John and on much of the OT (Genesis through Joshua, Psalms, the Prophets, although Ezekiel remained incomplete at his death). More numerous were Calvin's Sunday and daily biblical sermons (as lectio continua). Recorded verbatim after 1549, these include some books (1–2 Samuel, Job) for which there are no commentaries. Besides his biblical exposition, catechisms, and liturgies, Calvin wrote occasional treatises (e.g. on the Lord's Supper; Providence). However, pastoral work filled most of his time: preaching, administering sacraments and conducting marriages; promoting the metrical* Psalms, which became perhaps the most distinctive trait of Calvinist piety; working with the consistory to oversee discipline (vindicating the church's autonomy* by 1555); serving as the liaison between the pastors and the magistracy; and writing letters, receiving guests, interceding for the persecuted, and visiting the sick, despite his own increasingly severe ill health.

Calvin strongly affirmed justification by faith/grace* alone but equally emphasized sanctification* or the "third use of the Law*" (Decalogue) as the pattern for regenerate Christian life; both are the work of the Holy* Spirit. Accepted by God through faith* in Christ given by the Holy Spirit, believers are freed to worship God and called to love their neighbors. God's predestination* is the source of faith, engrafting believers into Christ and his ministry, sharing in both his cross and his resurrection. (Reprobation means that those who do not trust in Christ experience the inescapable relationship with God as hell*.) The context of this piety is corporate: the church* as the body of Christ and the world (the locus of the church's ministry). Calvin's doctrine of the church includes some of his most creative insights: the combination of "lay" (elders, deacons) and "clerical" (pastors, teachers) offices; ecclesiastical autonomy held in tension with constant prayerful engagement in civil society; and devotion to biblical teaching expounded with all the intelligence God gives to human minds and applied faithfully to living always, consciously, in God's sight and fellowship. See also PREDESTINATION.

ELSIE ANNE MCKEE

Calvinism. See REFORMED CHURCHES.

Camara, Helder Pessoa (1909–99), Brazilian churchman, Roman Catholic archbishop of Olinda and Recife (1964–85). A rare synthesis of mystic* and man of action, he was the founder of the National Conference of Brazilian Bishops, CNBB (1952; see Roman Catholicism Cluster: In Latin America: Brazil: National Conference of Brazilian Bishops [CNBB]). He was a cofounder of the Latin American Episcopal Conference, CELAM (1955) and a noteworthy council father during Vatican* II (1962–65). A man of prayer, brilliant orator and preacher, efficient organizer, and indefatigable advocate of justice*, peace*, and nonviolence, he became known as "bishop of the slums," "voice of the voiceless," and "advocate of the Third World," and was accused of being the "red archbishop." He received 24 major awards and published 23 books.

LUIZ C. L. MARQUES

Cambridge Platform (1648). See PURITANS, PURITANISM.

Cambridge Platonists, a group of teachers at Cambridge University during the 17th c. who resisted both the Puritan* and High Anglican parties, asserting that guidance comes through direct illumination* by God.

Cameroon differs from other African countries in its geographical and human diversity; there are more than 200 ethnic groups, including Sudanese, Bantus, and Hamites (or Chamites), along with their diverse traditional beliefs. Before the arrival of Islam* from the north (1715) and Christianity from the west and south (1843), the diverse Cameroonian groups knew and worshipped God through various African* traditional religious practices.

The first contacts between Western Christians and indigenous populations on the coast occurred in the 15th c. Yet missionary work began in the 19th c with the Jamaican Baptist* Missionary Society. In their anti-slavery struggle, Baptist* former slaves* who had been kidnapped in Africa were eager to return to their native countries to preach the gospel – an Africanized Myalist revivalist gospel (see Jamaica). In response to this missionary outburst among Jamaican former slaves, the Institute of Theology was created in Calabar (Jamaica). There the first missionaries to Cameroon, black Jamaicans such as Merrick, Fuller, Pinnock, and Richardson, came to proclaim the gospel to free Africans in order to bring them the salvation* of the soul* as children of God (1843). These Jamaican Baptist missionaries were incorporated into the London Baptist Missionary Society (from 1845), leading to the establishment of English-speaking Baptist churches in West Cameroon, before being replaced by the Basel Mission and the Baptist Mission of Berlin (during the German protectorate, 1884–1916). Meanwhile in the south, the larger French-speaking Église Évangélique du Cameroun (1845) and Église Presbytérienne Camerounaise (1879) were established with the help of the Paris Mission and US Presbyterian missionaries. These and other Protestant churches became autonomous in 1957. Under Cameroonian leadership, the churches sought to serve more directly the Cameroonian diversified culture and religious contexts; they formed the Federation of Protestant Churches and Missions in Cameroon (1969).

The Roman Catholic Church came in 1890, following the baptism in Germany of a young Cameroonian, Kwa Mbange. The late arrival of the Catholic Church stimulated a quick expansion (especially in the 1930s; by 2000, 51% of Christians were Roman Catholics). For the Roman Catholic historian Jean Paul Messina, “the advent of Christianity in Cameroon is a mystery, theologically speaking. It is a real intervention of God. . . . Having a colonized layperson (Kwa Mbange) going to the Western world to reach out to his people with the gospel thereafter, is a rare story in Africa.” Since the Second Vatican* Council, Cameroonian Catholics have challenged Western forms of pastoral work and undertaken an indigenization of the clergy, even as they have developed inculturated* liturgies and teachings.

Christianity has played and continues to play a primary role in the social, cultural, political, and economic development of Cameroon through turbulent times: the German protectorate (1884–1916), the French and British mandates (1916–60/61), the period of fighting for political liberation, political independence (1960), and the proclamation of the Constitution (1972) of a united secular republic, where African Religionists, Muslims, and Christians (the majority) could live together. From 1843 to the 1990s (the high point for freedom of the Cameroonian society, with a decline afterward), Christianity (all denominations) helped fashion a stable and peaceful state of Cameroon through confessional institutions such as schools, hospitals, and rural development projects, including the well-known Teachers’ Training School of Foulassi (where the Cameroon National Anthem was written), the College Alfred Shaker in Douala, the College Vogt in Yaounde, the College of Mazenod, and the College Protestant in Ngaoundere, from which institutions most of the high-ranking (Muslim and Christian) administrative officers of Northern Cameroon graduated. Yet after 1990, a total lack of state control contributed to tensions among these religious institutions.

Statistics: Population (2000): 15 million (M). Christians, 8.2 M, 54% (Roman Catholics, 4 M; Protestants, 3.1 M; independents, 0.6 M); African Religionists, 3.5 M, 24%; Muslims, 3.2 M, 21%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

SAMUEL FROUSOU

Camisards, French Protestants who, from 1702 to 1710, waged guerrilla warfare against Louis XIV’s Catholic soldiers throughout the remote Cévennes Mountains (Southern France). They were called Camisards because of the white shirts (camiso in the local patois) they wore to distinguish one another during intense nighttime fighting. Following the proscription of Protestantism (1685), members of the French Reformed Church were deprived of pastors and of organized ecclesiastical structure (see Protestantism Cluster: In Europe: France). In this vacuum, movements inspired by religious enthusiasm quickly surfaced. Lay preachers, both men and women, and “prophets,” mostly young women but eventually young men too, called for repentance in the face of this disaster (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster: Their History and Theology). Soon their message took on an apocalyptic* dimension and ultimately invited religious war. Hostilities erupted with the assassination of the Abbot du Chayla, an especially offensive royal agent who sought to convert recalcitrant Protestants forcibly (1702). Pierre Laposte, known as

Roland, quickly emerged as the most successful and charismatic Camisard leader. The crown responded with a brutal campaign of repression in which entire villages were destroyed. Roland was eventually killed and other leaders negotiated various surrenders. The struggle had effectively collapsed by 1710. Thousands died in the Camisards' unsuccessful struggle to rid themselves of royal Catholic oppression and worship freely. See also NANTES, EDICT OF, AND ITS REVOCATION. RAYMOND A. MENTZER

Campbell, Alexander (1788–1866), debater, editor, educator; prominent leader of the Disciples of Christ (later known as the Stone*–Campbell Restoration* Movement). Of Presbyterian* heritage, Campbell immigrated to Western Virginia from Northern Ireland* (1809), united with Baptists* (1812), and founded Bethany College (1840). Experiencing religious and social division, he committed himself to Christian unity and a restoration* of NT Christianity, including weekly Communion*. Excluded from the Baptists because of his opposition to creeds* as tests of Christian fellowship and his teaching that baptism* assures the believer of God's forgiveness, Campbell argued that slavery* is authorized by Scripture*, while opposing its continuation in the USA. See also CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST).

D. NEWELL WILLIAMS

Camp Meeting, a type of religious revival* characteristic of the US frontier after 1800, held out-of-doors and lasting for several days. Its background may lie in the quarterly preparatory* services held in the Presbyterian churches of Scotland and Northern Ireland. See also METHODIST WORSHIP.

Cana, village in Galilee, home of Nathanael* (John 21:2), place of Jesus' first miracle (John 2:1–11) and healing of a nobleman's son (John 4:46).

Canaan, "the Promised* Land," encompassing present-day Israel and Lebanon, was pledged to Abraham's offspring for an "everlasting possession" (Gen 17:8), a land "flowing with milk and honey" (Deut 6:3), given as a divine gift (Deut 9:4–5) to the Israelites. Canaan derives its name from its inhabitants, the descendants of Ham's son Canaan, cursed by Noah to serve Shem and Japheth. "Canaanite" carries a negative figurative significance throughout Scripture, associated with idolatry* (Exod 23:24) and sexual defilement (Lev 18:24–28), along with racist stereotypes (Matt 15:22–28), which Jesus resists and overcomes. Postcolonial* theology resists uses of "Canaan" as a justification for colonialism*. JEFFERY C. DAVIS

Canada. Christianity in Canada was and is characterized by a pervading sense of mission* and evangelism*, a multiplicity of denominations, a strong Social* Gospel Movement, the formation of primarily Protestant and Catholic societies in English and French Canada respectively, the challenge of a conquering secular* ethos (after 1960), and a new evangelism that challenges secularism* (early 2000s).

From 1608, the founding of Quebec* by French entrepreneurs, to 1760, the conquest of Canada by Britain, the colony of New France was Roman Catholic in law and fact. While the small French colony was centered on Quebec, Jesuit* and other Catholic missionaries evangelized scores of Amerindian nations throughout North America, called as a whole the Diocese of Quebec, led by Bishop François de Laval (1658) and his successors.

After the British conquest (1760), the Treaty of Paris (1763), which transferred most of French North America to Great Britain, made both the French language and the Catholic faith legal – at a time when Catholicism was still outlawed in Great Britain. From 1775 (the revolt against Great Britain and the formation of the USA) to the early 1900s, the vast majority of immigrants were Christian Protestants who spoke or learned English. During the 19th and 20th c., Quebec remained largely Francophone and Catholic, while Canada's other nine provinces became primarily Anglophone and Protestant.

Canada adopted constitutional frameworks and social policies that reflected its ethnic, linguistic, cultural, and religious composition. For example, from the mid-1800s, Canada created publicly funded elementary and secondary education*, usually Christian (Roman Catholic, Anglican, or nondenominational). Yet secular schools prevailed after the 1960s, following the gradual disappearance of discriminatory immigration laws (after 1945) that brought legions of religiously diverse immigrants. A growing number of Muslims (see Islam and Christianity Cluster), Sikhs*, and Hindus* now lived alongside Christians and Jews.

Christians in Canada have always emphasized mission. In New France, Jesuits* and other Catholic clergies were deeply involved in missions to Amerindian people throughout North America. During the 1800s, Catholic missionaries, led by Oblates of Mary Immaculate assisted by Sisters of Charity of Montreal, Sisters of Providence, and Sisters of Saint Anne from Montreal, expanded their outreach to Amerindians of the Pacific slope and Northwest. They competed with Protestant missionaries, especially Methodists and Anglicans, working through missionary societies based in England, e.g. the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel and the Church Missionary Society. This renewed zeal for mission and evangelism grew rapidly among both Catholics and Protestants. Among Protestants, evangelism was rooted in Puritanism* (from Britain), Pietism* (from Germany), Methodism* and the Great* Awakening (from Britain and the USA), and romanticism*. Among Catholics, the same zealous evangelism, later known as Ultramontanist*, was based on the reformism of the Council of Trent* (1545–63) and the crusading romantic evangelism of the Church of France after Napoleon (1815). Evangelistic Protestants and Catholics focused on traditional Christian teachings about God's sovereignty, Jesus' divinity as the Son of God, the virgin* birth, the atonement* for our sins through Christ, the resurrection* of God's elect to eternal life, the divine inspiration* of Holy Scripture*, and opening one's heart to the Spirit. Evangelism, like an expanding theological and spiritual stream, ran through a variety of competing Christian denominations, including Anglican, Methodist, Presbyterian, Pentecostal, Baptist, and Roman Catholic.

The evangelistic tsunami that swept through the Christian churches in the 19th and 20th c. began to reverse the balkanization of Protestant Christianity. After 1850 Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, and other denominations began to federate. Various joint endeavors, societies, and interdenominational groups served multiple Protestant denominations for missions, Bible promotion, youth, the prohibition of alcoholic beverages, and social outreach. This culminated in the formation of the United Church of Canada (1925), Canada's largest Protestant Church, uniting Presbyterians, Methodists, and Congregationalists. The Church of England in Canada remained within one communion, despite the strong tensions between its traditional High Church wing and its Evangelical, or Low Church, wing. Though numerous Canadian Protestant denominations remained (including Pentecostals, Millennialists*, Baptists) by 1925 the worst of the institutional fractiousness was past.

After 1900, Canada's Evangelicals* progressively became more involved in social work, a concern that dominated the activity of Christian churches after the 1950s. The Christian gospel came to be viewed as a social* gospel; the way to personal salvation*, or liberation*, is through the salvation or liberation of one's neighbor. It is Christians' responsibility to make into their neighbor all immigrants, poor, sick, abandoned children, and oppressed and disenfranchised people of society, including Amerindians, battered and abused* women, refugees*, and minorities. This common concern led after 1960 to growing ecumenical social programs, including a wide range of joint efforts between Catholic and Protestant churches.

A fundamental effect of the Protestant and Catholic evangelistic crusade between 1850 and 1950 was the Christianization of Canadian society. By 1950, French Canada (Quebec) was a Catholic society, and English Canada was Protestant. Canada's civil society had become a Christian society. This was manifest in immigration laws (favoring Christian countries of origin for immigrants), liquor legislation, censorship laws for publications and films, marriage legislation, taxation privileges for religious institutions, laws banning commercial activity on Sunday, and education laws. In 1950 more than 90% of Canadians, including the vast majority of Canadian Amerindians, were Christians. The Dominion of Canada had become the Dominion of the Lord.

A sea change occurred during the tumultuous four decades after 1960, a time when God largely disappeared from Canada's public square. Secularism* came to prevail, leading to widespread secular schooling, as well as permissive legislation and social attitudes regarding premarital sex*, divorce*, the use of contraceptives*, homosexuality*, and abortion*. Attendance at worship services dropped dramatically. Christians and others were frequently shocked by scandals involving pedophile clergy and sexually active "celibate" clergymen. In this context, a new evangelism in Protestant and Catholic churches emerged c2000, saying, "Enough! It's time to return to basics: God*, the Ten* Commandments, the gospel, and the church." See also GOSPEL AND CULTURE CLUSTER: IN NORTH AMERICA; QUEBEC; RYERSON, EGERTON; STRACHAN, JOHN; TACHÉ, ALEXANDRE.

Statistics: Population (2000): 31.1 million (M). Christians, 24.8 M, 80% (Roman Catholics, 13.1 M; Protestants, 5.4 M; independents, 1.7 M; Anglicans, 0.8 M; Orthodox, 0.6 M; marginal Christians, 0.45 M; Native Religionists, 0.8 M, 3%; Jews, 0.4 M, 1.3%; Muslims, 0.3 M, 1%; nonreligious, 4 M, 13%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ROBERT CHOQUETTE

Candlemas, feast of the purification* of Mary and the presentation* of Christ in the Temple, which became the time for blessing the candles for the year and for a procession with lighted candles.

Candles, placed on the altar, lit during services. Votive candles are set before tabernacles* or saints' representations*. The Puritans* objected to all use of candles. See also PASCHAL CANDLE.

Canon (Gk kanon, "measuring rule," thus a standard; Lat regula, "rule"). The term has a wide application, e.g. to the "rule of faith," canons, or decrees of councils; lists of authoritative books of the Bible*; the words essential to the Mass; and a list of saints to be venerated.

Canon, Ecclesiastical Title, for clergy of a cathedral or collegiate church. Canons "regular" live under a rule, usually the Augustinian*.

Canon within the Canon, some aspect of Scripture* that serves as the interpretive key for the rest, e.g. Paul's epistles and justification* by faith for Luther*.

Canonization of the New Testament. See NEW TESTAMENT AND ITS CANONIZATION.

Canonization of the Old Testament. See OLD TESTAMENT AND ITS CANONIZATION.

Canonization of Saints. See SAINTS.

Canon Law, the body of rules for the discipline and governance of Christian churches, especially the Roman Catholic and Orthodox* churches and the Anglican Communion. It addressed at first only internal church matters, but later other concerns, including doctrine. Its sources of authority vary widely, with increasing emphasis in the West on the legislation of the papacy*.

In antiquity and the early Middle Ages, conciliar "canons" and papal "decretals" were assembled into chronological collections, most notably by Dionysius* Exiguus (in Latin, early 6th c.) and by the patriarch John Scholasticus of Constantinople (in Greek, c570). A Frankish compiler (Pseudo-Isidore) active at Corbie added a set of forged decretals (mid-9th c.) emphasizing papal power (see Decretals, False). More easy to use were systematically organized collections appearing in Western Europe (e.g. Vetus Gallica, c600; the Decretum of Burchard of Worms, c1020).

The papal reform movement of the High Middle Ages and the attendant struggle between church and state stimulated legislation and legal analysis (see Popes, Roman Catholic, and the Papacy). New sources of authority (e.g. patristic writings and secular law) became accepted. The Western Church consolidated its claims to regulate otherwise secular matters (e.g. marriage*, commerce, war*). Gratian* summarized previous legislation in the Decretum (final version c1150), which includes his own commentaries. Later jurists emphasized decretals; several collections were included together with the Decretum in the standard compilation of canon law (Corpus Iuris Canonici). Juristic commentaries on this collection (strongly influenced by the Roman law of Emperor Justinian*, 533–34) are prominent examples of legal thinking, developing key concepts such as natural rights, procedural rules, and international law. The Corpus was supplemented by the acts of later councils and judicial decisions of the papal curia. The mass of material becoming increasingly cumbersome, the pope promulgated the Codex Iuris Canonici* (The Code of Canon Law, 1918), using European 19th-c. civil codes as models. Unlike earlier canon law, it states the law in abstract formulations without any reference to specific cases. A completely rewritten Codex was published in 1983.

In the Orthodox Church, ecclesiastical law collections, notably the Nomokanon (last version c1090), also embraced secular law. There is no modern codification. The Pedalion (Rudder, 1793) is the most widely used collection.

The Corpus Iuris Canonici continues to be valid in the Anglican Communion insofar as it has been received. The Corpus has been modified by the Canons of 1604 and 1969.

ANDERS WINROTH

Canon of the Mass. See EUCHARISTIC PRAYER.

Cantata, vocal composition used in worship. Developed in Germany and perfected by Bach*, it includes sections for soloists and chorus.

Canticle, hymn taken from the Bible (but not a Psalm*) and used in worship.

Canticles, Book of. See SONG OF SONGS.

Capernaum, town on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee, a center of Jesus' activity (Mark 2:1, par.) and site of several miracles.

Cape Verde. In this archipelago off the coast of West Africa, a former Portuguese colony (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions), the Roman Catholic Church had a privileged position until 1975, when political independence progressively led to democracy and religious pluralism.

Christianity arrived in Cape Verde with Portuguese navigators (1446) and Franciscans in 1465/66. A Catholic diocese* was erected on the island of Santiago in 1533 and remained until 1705, when for two centuries Cape Verde became part of a West African diocese. Today, there are two dioceses in Cape Verde, in Santiago and Sanvicente islands. Nazarenes arrived in 1901 and Seventh-day Adventists in 1935.

After the independence (1975), a Communist government secularized* the state, aggressively taking away schools and social institutions from the churches, especially the Roman Catholic Church. Religious pluralism became a reality in 1990, when democracy was instituted through the resistance against Communism led by Fr. António Fidalgo Barros and supported by Bishop D. Paulino Évora (of Santiago), and later by Bishop D. Arlindo Furtado (of Sanvicente), an outstanding Catholic theologian. With religious freedom, some independent Charismatic* churches developed with the support of Brazilian and North American churches.

A Catholic theological seminary (established in 1866, in Sannicolau) gave priests and laypeople a good secondary education. Today a master in theology can be earned at Sanjosé Catholic Seminary in Praia, the capital of Cape Verde. A bachelor in theology can be earned at the Nazarenes' theological seminary in Sanvicente. As a result, half of the clergy are natives of the islands. In all denominations, the leadership is male dominated. Since 2003 a modern Catholic hospital in Fogo has been a center for diaconal and social work led by Franciscan sisters, including Sr. Bárbara, Sr. Antonieta, Sr. Teodora, and Sr. Teodolinda.

Statistics: Population (2000): 0.43 million (M); Christians, 0.42 M (Roman Catholics, 0.4 M; Protestants, 15,000; independents, 13,000). A small number of Muslim, Native Religionists, and nonreligious people. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ANTÓNIO BARBOSA DA SILVA

Capital Punishment. See DEATH PENALTY.

Cappadocians, a group of influential personages in the late 4th c., all of whom came from the province of Cappadocia in central Asia Minor, many from the same family: Basil* of Caesarea (328/29–79); his brother Gregory* of Nyssa (330–94); a younger brother, Peter of Sebaste – all of whom became bishops; their sister, Macrina* (327–80), actually the firstborn and probably the first to adopt a monastic* lifestyle; and their brother Naucratiu, who adopted the solitary life around 352. After Macrina's death, Gregory of Nyssa wrote a Life and a discourse On the Soul and Resurrection that was placed in her mouth.

Macrina and Basil had been influenced by Eustathius* of Sebaste (c300–c377), who became controversial because of his moderate Arian* views (he affirmed the Homoiousian* position at the Synod of Ancyra*, 358) and because of his ascetic* mode of life.

Another Cappadocian was Gregory* Nazianzen (329?–389?), who was closely associated with Basil and Gregory. Evagrius* of Pontus (345–99), born in the same region, accompanied Gregory Nazianzen to Constantinople before adopting the ascetic life, first in Jerusalem and then in the Nitrian desert (one of the centers of Egyptian monasticism in the cliff separating the Nile from the desert).

When Basil became bishop of Caesarea (370), Emperor Valens was championing Arianism* in the Eastern Empire; Basil made every effort to fill vacant sees with bishops sympathetic to the Nicene* Creed, including the two Gregories, and all of them wrote against the extreme Arianism of Eunomius*. Basil was a skilled church politician. Gregory Nazianzen was successful as a preacher and a poet but generally a failure as an administrator. Gregory of Nyssa was the most skilled as a theologian and spiritual guide.

Basil and the two Gregories were most influential in shaping the doctrine of the Trinity*. While it is often assumed that their teachings were identical, Basil held to the older Homoiousian* view of the Trinity and resisted any declaration that the Holy Spirit is of the same essence as the Father and the Son. Gregory of Nyssa used the comparison of three individuals united by a common nature – language that veers toward tritheism*. Gregory Nazianzen shaped later doctrine in two important ways. He emphasized that full divinity is in each of the persons, originally in the Father, derivatively in the Son and the Spirit; and he put forward the concept of relation as the key to the differences among the persons, since by definition a parent has an offspring and an offspring has a parent.

EUGENE TESELLE

Capuchins. See FRANCISCANS; RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER: IN WESTERN EUROPE

Cardijn, Jozef (1882–1967), founder and driving force of the Young* Christian Workers Movement, Roman Catholic priest (ordained, 1906), cardinal (1965). As curate in Laeken (Brussels), he founded separate groups for working young women and men, which eventually led to the formation of the Young Christian Workers (1924). This movement quickly became the most famous of the Specialized Catholic* Action groups and spread all over the world. Cardijn's ideas and actions have at least indirectly influenced Catholic Worker* priests and Liberation* theology. At the end of his life, he became a champion of international justice and developing cooperation. EMIEL LAMBERTS

Cardinals, originally the permanent clergy of Rome, including bishops, priests, and deacons; as a college, the pope's counselors. Now bishops anywhere in the world are appointed to these positions. Since 1059 a conclave* of cardinals has elected new popes.

Care of Souls, the role of priests and other ministers of a parish*, congregation, or chapel*; traditionally regarded as the chief activity of the clergy* and the chief reason for ordination*. See also PASTORAL CARE.

Caribbean Islands and the Clash of Theologies. Four types of theology clashed in the Caribbean Islands, although in most instances they were not the self-conscious theologies that students do in theology classes, but the theologies by which believers live and thus the theologies reflected in their ways of life. The Christian theology brought by Europeans wiped out the theologies of the Caribs and of the Arawaks (the first inhabitants of the Caribbean) by annihilating those who held them; yet for many Africans in the islands, both Christian and African theologies survived by blending together.

The Caribs, hunters who liked to fight, believed in a superior power that guided life. They referred to this power as maboya (spirit); embracing one's maboya was a means to counteract and ward off evil forces, but it could be used for evil or good. One's own chemmen (god) was more powerful than one's maboya and could be used to counter evil maboya in an elaborate ceremony led by a priest (boyez) who divined what herbs and practices were necessary. By contrast the more peaceful and gentle Arawaks (Taino) preferred negotiation to war. They believed in a supreme creator god, Yocaju or Jucaju, who shared his powers with his mother, a goddess in her own right, as well as in other deities – e.g. the gods of fire, rain, storms – who were to be feared.

With Christopher Columbus's arrival (1492), a European theology informed by economic and political agendas clashed with that of the Arawaks and later with that of the Caribs. The Arawaks welcomed the foreigners and were decimated by them. According to a Caribbean traditional story, a practice of the Spaniards was to kill 12 Arawaks per day in honor of the 12 apostles. The Caribs fought the Spaniards and lasted well into the 18th c.

The Africans who were brought to the Caribbean Islands (starting in the 16th c.) accepted the colonizers' Christian God yet blended the beliefs of their masters with beliefs from Africa. This is illustrated in Santería (Cuba*; see Ancestor Veneration and Christianity Cluster: In Latin America and the Caribbean), Vodou* (Haiti*), Shango (Trinidad*), and other forms of African Christian theology that have survived. See also CARIBBEAN ISLANDS AND WEST INDIES; CONTEXTUAL THEOLOGIES.

NOEL LEO ERSKINE

Caribbean Islands and West Indies. This region includes Cuba*, Dominican* Republic, Haiti*, Antigua and Barbuda, Bahamas, Barbados, Belize, Dominica, Grenada, Guyana*, Jamaica*, St. Lucia, St. Kitts and Nevis, St. Vincent and the Grenadines, Surinam, Trinidad* and Tobago (independent), Aruba, Netherlands Antilles (including Curaçao, Bonaire, St. Maarten, St. Eustatius, and Saba; Dutch); Anguilla, Montserrat, British Virgin Islands, Cayman Islands, Turks and Caicos Islands (British); French Guyana*, Guadeloupe, Martinique*, St. Martin (French); and Puerto* Rico and Virgin Islands (USA). The total population is 36.7 million (in 2000) in an area of 732,126 square kilometers.

This region became the frontier of various empires, each of which gave it a different name: the Spanish called it the Indies; the British, the West Indies; the French, the Antilles; and the USA, the Caribbean. The sea was baptized the Caribbean Sea, named after the Caribs, one of the most important indigenous groups, together with the Arawaks, Tainos, and Ciboney. After the arrival of the Spaniards (1492), the natives of the islands, especially prey to contagious diseases, disappeared as a result of oppressive colonialism. African slaves* were then imported to meet increased labor demand on sugar plantations. Between the early 16th c. and the abolition of slavery (last decades of the 19th c.), more than 9 million slaves from Africa were forced to populate the New World. It was this institution of slavery* that had the greatest impact on the development of the Caribbean.

Religious traditions in the Caribbean are varied. In some countries, the majority is Protestant, in others Roman Catholic (see Mission Cluster: Imperialism).

During the Spanish period of colonialism, the Catholic mission was closely linked to the civil power. Bishopricks were established in 1511–12 in Concepción de la Vega, Santo Domingo, and San Juan. These first three dioceses were suffragans of the Metropolitan See of Seville. This lasted till the province of Santo Domingo was established (1546), comprising the sees of Puerto Rico, Santiago in Cuba, Coro in Venezuela*, Santa Marta in Colombia*, and Trujillo in Honduras*. In 1515 Bartolomé de las Casas joined the Dominican Friars, who worked out a new scheme for the reorganization of Hispaniola (Haiti* and the Dominican* Republic), based on a new method of evangelization, with separate indigenous communities and respect for their cultures. The plan failed, and there is no evidence anywhere in the region of a single pastoral activity whose precondition for evangelization was respect for the indigenous cultures. Many African slaves were integrated into the Catholic Church (starting in the 16th c.), but similarly there was no respect for their African cultures.

Protestant churches were established in English and Dutch colonies (17th c.), although it was not until the 19th c. that there was a massive conversion of the black population to these churches. The Anglican and Dutch Reformed churches, the earliest non-Catholic churches in the region, did not carry out missionary work among the slaves. In 1735 German Moravian* Brethren reached Surinam and began a mission to the black population, but without much success. In the 19th c., the ruling classes in many places considered un-Christianized slaves much more dangerous than those who professed this religion. Religious instruction then became a means of preparation for emancipation. During this period, most of the Afro-Antilleans in the British and the Dutch Caribbean were integrated into the Protestant churches, especially the Methodist, Baptist, and Moravian churches.

If Christians have become the most important religious group in the region, they are not the only one. When the slaves were incorporated into the Christian churches, they did not abandon their African beliefs. As the ruling classes considered it dangerous to give religious instruction to slaves, in the 17th–18th c. the religious domain was effectively left in the slaves' own hands. And the churches, deeply involved in the slave system, had no real interest in evangelizing the blacks. There is a long list of Catholic and Protestant missionaries who owned a large number of slaves in the region. All this explains the development of Afro-Antillean religiosity. This has evolved into numerous forms, such as Vodou* in Haiti, Santería in Cuba, Shango in Trinidad, Obeahism in Jamaica, Brua in Curaçao, and Winti in Surinam. Since the churches were hostile to African religious values, the slaves had no alternative but to make use of Christian symbols, especially of public Catholic symbols, in the service of the survival of their African soul. What is viewed either negatively as syncretism* or positively as inculturation*, according to one's perspective, became the order of the day, which drew on African as well as Western Christian sources (see Inculturation Cluster: Christianity and the Gospel; Popular Christian Practices Cluster: In Latin America: Native Traditions in Mexico).

A Jewish community established itself in Curaçao (mid-17th c.) and founded the earliest synagogue still in use in the Americas. Since then, Judaism* has had a presence in the region. Hinduism* and Islam* also became major religions in some countries of the area. After the abolition of slavery, in order to safeguard the plantation economy a massive wave of Asian immigrants, especially from India and Indonesia, was brought to the region (19th c.). Today their descendants make up between a third and half of the populations of Trinidad, Surinam, and Guyana. These Hindus and Muslims have retained their original religious observance. Hinduism, Islam, and Christianity constitute the three most important religions in this region and have a considerable impact on these societies. There is a general spirit of tolerance, as shown by the recognition of religious feast days of the different religions as national public holidays.

In the last decades of the 20th c., a veritable mosaic of new religious movements took shape in the Caribbean, some imported and some native. The imported ones that have spread throughout the region include Seventh*-day Adventists, Jehovah's* Witnesses, and Pentecostal* churches, all from the USA. The Charismatic* Movement has also successfully penetrated the mainstream churches since the 1970s, practicing healing* and trances as manifestations of the Holy* Spirit. Of the native movements, the best known is the Rastafari* Movement. There is still no structure for dialogue between those new religious movements and the historic churches. Nevertheless, the ecumenical movement is strong in the region. In 1973 the Caribbean Conference of Churches was founded, an ecumenical body representing 33 Christian churches in the region (in 1996), including the Catholic, Anglican, Moravian, Lutheran, Methodist, Baptist, Reformed, Ethiopian* Orthodox, Presbyterian, and a few Pentecostal churches, as well as the Salvation* Army, the Disciples* of Christ, and the Church of God. Another notable ecumenical achievement has been the establishment, by 11 Christian churches working together, of the United Theological College of the West Indies in Jamaica, which now trains leaders for all these churches.

In the continental area, indigenous communities survived, in contrast to the situation in the islands. Belize, in Central America, was formerly known as British Honduras, until it became independent (1981). The Maya, who had been living there before the arrival of the Europeans, now constitute 11% of the population. The Mopan Maya have preserved many religious traditions. The Yucatec Maya, refugees during the "Guerra de Castas" in Yucatán, Mexico (1846–48), adopted many Spanish traditions. The Kekchi Maya are refugees from Vera Paz, victims of the military repression in Guatemala until late 20th c., and have integrated Catholic rites in their own traditions. The Garífuna are a result of the encounter between Indoamerican Caribs and African slaves and came to Belize since 1802 and constitute nowadays 7% of the population. The practices of Catholicism co-exist with their own culture and religion based on African traditions.

The Guyana coast – today the countries of Guyana, Surinam, and French Guyana – had been the object of many colonization attempts by Dutch, English, and French settlers (16th–17th c.). Many settlements failed owing to the opposition of the indigenous population, the Caribs and the Arawaks, who named the region Guiana, "Land of Waters." Today what binds the Guyana coast together is the languages of the Amerindian population, Arawak and Carib, which are still spoken in this region. In Guyana, independent of England since 1966, 5% of the population is Amerindian; in Surinam, independent of the Netherlands since 1975, 2% of the population is Amerindian; and in French Guyana, an overseas department of France since 1946, the number of Amerindians is unknown because of the constant mobility in the Amazon. Catholicism and Pentecostalism are present among the Amerindians who kept their own religious traditions. In Surinam, the Maroons (or "Bosnegers"), formerly slaves who fled plantations and who now constitute 8% of the population, preserved their own languages (Aukaans and Saramakkan) and forms of African* Religion.

Today the idea of interreligious dialogue is more alive but remains a challenge for the Caribbean. A structure for dialogue between non-Christian religions and Christian churches remains to be created for the region, although there are some local initiatives, such as the Interreligious Council in Surinam (founded in 1989). More voices cry out for a dialogue on the theological level between Afro-Caribbean religions and Christianity. See also MISSION CLUSTER: IN CARIBBEAN ISLANDS.

ARMANDO LAMPE

Caribbean Literature and Christianity. In the first European text documenting the Spanish presence in Hispaniola (Haiti* and the Dominican* Republic) and Cuba*, Columbus alludes to a Christian mission to Amerindians as important for the Catholic monarchs. A Dominican friar and defender of the Amerindians, Bartolomé de las* Casas, quotes from Columbus's Diary (1492) in his History of the Indies (1561). In A Brief Account of the Destruction of the Indies (1552), Las Casas narrates the lives of Taino leaders like Hatuey and Enriquillo, and their reasons for rebelling against the Spaniards and Christianity. Hatuey, who fled Hispaniola, was captured in Cuba; before being burned alive, he told his confessor that if Spaniards went to heaven, he did not want to be with them.

Enriquillo, raised by Franciscan monks, accepted Christianity, profited from a Spanish-style education, then, as a rebel, negotiated a truce with the royal court while remaining a faithful Christian. Manuel de Jesús Galván wrote Enriquillo (1879–82), rescuing the Taino figure and investing the Dominican* Republic's national hero with noble qualities and intelligence.

In Cuban literature, Silvestre de Balboa's Espejo de paciencia (1608) refers to the bishop of Cuba, Don Juan de las Cabezas Altamirano, who was kidnapped by the French corsair Gilberto Girón. In the slave-poet Juan Francisco Manzano's "Ode to Religion" (1831), the speaker asks the Almighty and the Christian religion to console this humble servant. In his Autobiography (1835), Manzano presents himself as a sacrificial lamb*. This and other anti-slavery narratives – e.g. Anselmo Suárez y Romero's Francisco (1839) – hail a docile slave who "turns the other cheek"; they manipulate white Creole readers to identify with black slaves and condemn white slave masters.

Christianity became important for other Cuban writers, such as José Lezama Lima, Cintio Vitier, Fina García Marruz, Eliseo Diego, Ángel Gaztelu, and other members of the Orígenes group. Lezama founded the journals Verbum (1937), Espuela de plata (1939), Nadie parecía (1942), and Orígenes (1944–56). He and other Catholic writers preferred the aesthetic to the political, a tradition they carried into the 1959 Cuban Revolution. A priest, Gaztelu poeticized Catholic symbols. In Paradiso (1966), Lezama masterfully mixed classical and Catholic imageries. The Castro government ostracized these religious writers but rehabilitated them after the breakup of the Soviet Union.

In Latino Caribbean literature, written in English in the USA, some writers underscored their parents' religious and cultural values. The Puerto Rican Jesús Colón (often associated with socialism) highlights Carmencita's devout Catholic practices in A Puerto Rican in New York and Other Sketches (1961), which he organized as a rosary* in number and structure emphases (David García). Nuyorican (New York Puerto Rican) poets prefer to focus on the evils of US society; e.g. Tato Laviera follows this tradition while composing poems with religious symbolism. His "jesús papote" presents this Christ figure as born to a drug addict on a wintry December evening.

Dominican Loida Maritza Pérez, in Geographies of Home (1999), shows the cultural, political, and religious continuity from the Dominican* Republic to the USA, regardless of geographic and linguistic differences. Her Seventh*-day Adventist father demands a discipline that seems archaic in the new environment, while the grandmother's African spiritual beliefs influence the course of the narration.

Alejo Carpentier's classic The Kingdom of This World (1949) focused on the role Vodou* played in the slave rebellion in Santo Domingo (like Santería, Vodou is the coming together of Catholicism and its saints* and African* Religion and its gods, Orishas). Lydia Cabrera's Cuentos negros (1940) has a comparable emphasis, and El monte (1954) is considered the "Bible" of African Religion in Cuba. Cristina García's Dreaming in Cuban (1992) has similar interests; her Agüero Sisters (1997) uses as a novelistic frame a religious system that relies on the coming together of Christian and African religions.

WILLIAM LUIS

Carmelite Order, a Roman Catholic contemplative religious* order that originated on Mount Carmel (near present-day Haifa) among hermits who lived there long before the Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, Albert of Vercelli, drafted (c1207) their "Primitive Rule of Our Lady of Mount Carmel," which uniquely combined contemplation* and apostolic action. When it became difficult for the hermits to remain in the Holy Land, Pope Innocent IV granted the order mendicant* status (1247) and the Rule was mitigated for use in Western Europe. The tension between contemplation and action, desert and city, Discalced* (barefoot) and Calced (wearing shoes) endured throughout the history of the Carmelites, as exemplified by the lives of the canonized Carmelites: Simon Stock (c1165–1265), Teresa* of Ávila (1515–82), John* of the Cross (1542–91), Thérèse* of Lisieux (1873–97), and Edith Stein (1891–1942). PETER TYLER

Carol, a joyous song, originally with dance, sung by people during festivals, especially Christmas. Popular in the late Middle Ages, and again since the 19th c.

Caroline Books (Libri Karolini), a treatise written in Charlemagne's* court, probably by Theodulph of Orleans, in response to the Eastern controversies over icons*. Claiming to pursue the golden mean, it attacked both the iconoclasts* for forbidding icons and the iconodules for excessive veneration of them. The purpose seems to have been to discredit Empress Irene*, with whom, ironically, Charlemagne would propose a dynastic marriage in 802. See also ICONOCLASM AND THE ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY.

Carolingian Renaissance. At his capital of Aachen, Charlemagne* (c747–814) imitated many features of Byzantium*. The palace school, led by Alcuin* of York, salvaged much of ancient learning. Charlemagne acquired manuscripts from Rome, including early copies of the Rule of Benedict*, the sacramentary*, and the authoritative collection of canon* law. From this time comes the style of writing known as “Carolingian minuscule” (“lowercase” letters, also developed for Greek during that period). The educational tradition begun in Aachen spread to Orleans, Reims, Fulda, and elsewhere in France and Germany.

In some respects, Charlemagne was the creator of Christian Europe, requiring every parish to provide basic education for its parishioners and to keep records of baptisms, marriages, and funerals (replaced by the “civil registry” by Napoleon).

Charlemagne’s own time was a period of revival and reform, recovering and consolidating the classical and Christian past. The actual “renaissance” occurred under his son Louis* the Pious (educated by clerics) through reforming councils (816–17) that affirmed the freedom of the church from lay control and imposed the Benedictine* Rule on monastic life, and later through the disputes over the Eucharist* (after 830), grace* and free will* (after 850), and the theological speculations of John* Scotus Eriugena. See also LITURGIES, HISTORY OF.

EUGENE TESELLE

Carroll, John (1736–1815), founding father of Roman Catholicism in the USA. After being educated by Jesuits* in Europe, he joined them (1748–55). Ordained a priest (1761), he returned to the USA after a papal decree suppressed the Jesuits (1773). Supporting the movement for US independence, he took the lead in organizing Catholicism in the new nation. As (arch)bishop of Baltimore, he presided over the growth of the church from 1789 to 1815. Widely respected by Catholics and non-Catholics alike, Carroll combined loyalty to the church with acceptance of religious liberty and republican institutions, setting precedents that shaped the adjustment of Catholicism to US society and culture.

PHILIP GLEASON

Carta Caritatis (Lat “Charter of Charity”), 12th-c. constitution of the Cistercian* order. The Charter stipulates that the Rule of Benedict* is to be followed in all Cistercian monasteries and establishes uniform liturgy, books, and observance together with a system of visitation for their regulation and an annual meeting, or general chapter, of all abbots at Cîteaux. It probably dates from 1165, and not, as previously thought, 1119. Rather than envisioning the spontaneous generation of a federation of new “daughter” houses from older foundations, it was designed to increase the authority of Cîteaux.

MARILYN DUNN

Carthusian Order, Catholic religious* order founded by Bruno (c1030–1101) at La Grande Chartreuse, Diocese of Grenoble, France, in 1084. Part of the 11th- and 12th-c. attempts to restore the original desert ethos of monastic* life, it combined eremitic* cells with communal elements: church, refectory, and chapter room. Thus in the distinctive Carthusian monastery plan, individual cells – actually small houses – are spaced around an extensive cloister. Monks lead a strictly enclosed life and spend much of their time in individual prayer, meditation, and study in the cell, where they also take most of their meals, meeting in church for liturgical worship at set intervals. Lay brothers* care for their material needs. The first statutes, rules for the governance of the growing order, were set down by Guigues, fifth prior of the Grande Chartreuse, in 1127.

The first Carthusian nunnery was established at Prebayon in Provence in the 12th c. The order has remained remarkably faithful to its original contemplative* ideas and is sometimes thought of as the highest and strictest form of Catholic monasticism. Today there are 19 Carthusian monasteries and 6 nunneries, mainly in Europe and the Americas.

MARILYN DUNN

Cassian, John (c360–c435), monk, spiritual writer who helped introduce Egyptian monasticism* to the Latin West. Born perhaps in Scythia, Cassian became a monk in Bethlehem and moved to Egypt in 385, settling in Scetis. He went to Constantinople (c400), where John* Chrysostom ordained him deacon*. Around 415, he settled in Massilia (ancient Marseilles), where he founded two monasteries. His major work, the 900-page Conferences, claims to record 24 conversations with leading Egyptian masters, each focused on a core theme (e.g. discernment, prayer*, chastity*). Benedict’s* Rule required the reading of Cassian in the monasteries of medieval Europe. J. WILLIAM HARMLESS, SJ

Cassock, the ankle-length garment that evolved from a late Roman robe and came to be required of the clergy, especially after the Council of Trent*.

Caste System and Christianity. In India the caste (Sanskrit varna) system rationalizes social stratification. Human identity is construed as hereditary and hierarchical, conflated with specific social, economic, and religious rights and duties. The caste community includes four castes: brahmins (priests), ksatriyas (rulers and warriors), vaisyas (business persons), and sudras (laborers). An economic and ritual divide separates the first three castes ("the twice-born") from the laborers' caste. "Outcastes" or "untouchables" comprise the 15–20% of Indians who are outside the Hindu caste system, being viewed as subhuman or nonhuman. They renamed themselves "Dalits" (broken or crushed ones). In addition, Adivasis ("original dwellers of the land") are never integrated into society (and its caste system). The Indian Christian community consists predominantly of Dalits and Adivasis.

SATHIANATHAN CLARKE

Caste System and Christianity in Latin America. See FEUDAL SYSTEM.

Casuistry, mode of ethical reasoning that resolves "cases of conscience" by applying general rules or considerations to difficult instances, especially when there are conflicting obligations or special circumstances. The term is used negatively to claim that difficult cases are being resolved in an evasive or hairsplitting way (a classic example is Pascal's* Provincial Letters attacking the Jesuits). Those who emphasize individual conscience* often scorn casuistic reasoning as misleading or superfluous.

Catacombs, underground burial chambers located outside the walls of Rome, since custom and law prohibited burial within the city. They were used for Christian burial starting in c200; they contain the earliest Christian art.

Cataphatic Theology speaks of God positively, in terms of who God is, according to revelation in Scripture, tradition, affective religious experience, and/or nature. It is the opposite of apophatic*, or negative*, theology.

Catechesis, Catechisms, Catechumens. In Greek, catechesis means "instruction." Catechumens are those being instructed. In the early church this instruction preceded baptism*, sometimes over a three-year period. The catechumens attended Sunday worship but were dismissed before the celebration of the Eucharist*. The Apostles' Creed* was taught to the catechumens only at the last stage of catechesis, during the 40 days of Lent* leading up to their baptism at the Easter* vigil* service. Several 4th-c. examples of catechetical instruction survive (from Cyril* of Jerusalem, Ambrose* of Milan, Augustine*, and Theodore* of Mopsuestia).

After the baptism of infants became the norm, catechesis was directed toward children and youth. Three traditional texts became the basis of instruction: the Apostles'* Creed, the Lord's* Prayer, and the Decalogue*; at baptism the godparents promised to teach these to the child, and they had to be memorized before confirmation*. Other kinds of instruction for the Christian life were added during the Middle Ages; the 1281 Council of Lambeth* directed priests to give instruction at least four times a year concerning the Apostles' Creed, the Decalogue, the two love commandments, the seven works of mercy, the seven deadly* sins, the seven virtues*, and the seven sacraments*. A Lay Folks' Catechism was prepared under John Thoresby, archbishop of York, in 1357 for the use of priests. In the 15th c., Jean Gerson's* ABC des simples gens was widely used.

Luther's Larger Catechism and Smaller Catechism (1529) inaugurated the use of printed question-and-answer catechism, following earlier models among the Waldenses* and Bohemians*. The genre was widely imitated in other churches of the Reformation, always using the three classic texts; the most widely used were the Geneva, Heidelberg, and Westminster catechisms. In the Catholic Church, catechisms also included instruction on the sacraments*, the virtues* and vices, and acts of popular devotion; especially influential catechisms were those of Peter Canisius* (1556, 1566) and Robert Bellarmine* (1598) and the Roman Catechism authorized by the Council of Trent* (1566).

Luther's catechisms were published with woodcuts, and the use of pictures to aid instruction became widespread in Europe and in missions throughout the world. Catechisms in Nahuatl and other languages were published in Mexico in the 16th c., and the Jesuits in Japan, China, and Vietnam prepared catechisms for these cultural settings.

Because of their origin in doctrinal statements, catechisms were sometimes criticized as being too technical; efforts were made, therefore, to base instruction on the biblical narrative rather than doctrines. The question-and-answer form has gradually been replaced by narrative or exposition.

The Second Vatican* Council decided against any universal catechism in favor of contextual* catechisms directed toward adults. The Dutch* Catechism of 1966, in preparation even before Vatican II, was criticized for being too daring, and a supplement was added to the second edition. Other catechisms were prepared in Germany, Spain, Belgium, and France. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992) was prepared under Pope John Paul II, not to replace the national catechisms but to supply a “point of reference” for them. EUGENE TESELLE

Catechist (Gk “instructor”), someone who prepares candidates for baptism*; more generally, a teacher of Christian doctrine; in mission areas, an indigenous teacher.

Cathars, Catharism, a medieval dualist Christian movement that imported into Western Europe beliefs of the Balkan Bogomils*. By c1200 the Cathars had established five dioceses in Southern France (Languedoc), one in Northern France, and six in Northern Italy (with much doctrinal and organizational dispute), each diocese with its bishop, his assistants, and deacons.

Catharism asserted belief in two coeternal cosmological forces, one good (the NT loving God) and one evil (the Demiurge, the OT vengeful creator god). For the Cathars, including those with a more moderate dualism (the evil creator god simply fell from the good God’s favor), all physical matter was corrupt. Consequently, Cathars did not believe in the Incarnation, although Christ had been sent by the good God to lead humankind to salvation.

The Cathars limited Scripture to the NT, often interpreted allegorically*; prayed only one prayer, the Lord’s Prayer; and utterly rejected the authority of the Roman Catholic Church and the symbol of the cross.

The initiated Cathars, the “perfect” (called “good Christians” or simply “Christians”), lived a life of extreme asceticism* in order to escape at death the material realm and attain the realm of goodness. They renounced personal property* and sexual* intercourse; did not eat meat (except for fish) or dairy products, the products of coition; fasted three days a week; underwent 40-day fasts on bread and water; and were forbidden to use violence or to swear oaths. (Ordinary believers and other Christians would be reborn into an endless cycle in which their souls transmigrated into new animal or human bodies.) After training, new Cathars were initiated through a ritual, the consolamentum, involving the laying on of hands. But this ritual was valid only if the perfect administering it had led the pure life. Any intentional or nonintentional lapse into impure practice by the perfect rendered this ceremony invalid, and the ritual and process of self-denial had to begin again. Discovery of a lapse (even after the death of the perfect) had serious implications for the hierarchy of the Cathar Movement (e.g. the authority of Western bishops ordained by lapsed Bogomil leaders was contested).

In 1209, following the murder of the papal legate Peter of Castelnau, who preached several unsuccessful missions in the Languedoc, Pope Innocent III sanctioned the Albigensian Crusade against the Cathars. By 1229 the crusade had replaced the most important lords who had tolerated the Cathars in the region with “Catholic” northern French. Yet it was only in early 14th c. that Catharism was eliminated from the Languedoc by the medieval Inquisition*.

CLAIRE TAYLOR

Cathedra (Gk “chair”), the bishop’s seat. It was customary for the Greek teacher or Jewish rabbi to sit while teaching (e.g. Jesus sat to interpret Scripture in the synagogue; Luke 4:20). In the early church, the cathedra was in the center of the apse; with the divided chancel in the Middle Ages, it was moved to the side.

Cathedral, a church with the cathedra* of the bishop, usually the most impressive edifice in a diocese. See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Catherine of Siena (1347–80), canonized in 1461; Dominican* tertiary and visionary. Born a dyer’s daughter in Siena, from an early age Catherine Benincasa practiced extreme fasting* and penance*, and entered the Sisters of Penance of St. Dominic at the age of 16. From her convent, she came to have an extraordinary influence at the time of the Great* Schism after the death of Pope Gregory XI. She had visited the last French pope at Avignon, where he was in exile, trying to persuade him to make peace with the people of Florence and return to Rome. On his death, she sided with Urban VI and drummed up support for him from dissenting cardinals and bishops in the subsequent conflict.

Chiefly remembered for her writings and political interventions, she was the author of numerous letters and a mystical text known as Dialogues. Here she writes in the third person, using powerful imagery to describe her sense of union with God: her soul is in God and God is in her soul as “a fish is in the sea and the sea is in a fish.” She was declared a doctor of the church by Paul VI in 1970. LAVINIA BYRNE

Catholic Action, a pastoral strategy to organize the laity* for the defense of the Roman Catholic Church (early 20th c.), which developed into a movement with a strong influence in society and political life (later in the 20th c.). Popes called on Catholics, both men and women, of all social classes and age groups to participate in the apostolic task. For the first time, women were incorporated into the apostolic mission of the Church. Members received a mandate from the bishops and were organized at the parochial, diocese, national, continental, and international levels with strong ties with Rome. Leo* XIII organized the Social Catholic Action. It was developed by Pius* XI and named Catholic Action. The Specialized Catholic Action gathered youth in different social environments: as workers, students, and independent professionals. It attempted to engage the Church in a dialogue with modernity and prepared the way for Vatican* II. Pope John* Paul II did not affirm the important role of the Catholic Action, but it never disappeared. ANA MARÍA BIDEGAIN

Catholic Action and Latin America. The development of Catholic Action can be illustrated by concrete examples from Latin America.

1. From Social Catholic Action to Catholic Action: Early 20th Century. Pope Leo* XIII (1878–1903) was convinced that the Roman Catholic Church needed to organize the Catholic masses to press governments in the Church's favor, particularly to fight new social movements, such as anarchism, socialism, and Freemasonry* (Custodi di quella fede, 1892). He supported the creation of Catholic parties inspired by the social teaching of the Church and related to the action of Catholics in several fields (see Social Encyclicals).

Following Leo XIII (encyclical Rerum Novarum), Pius* X (1903–14), in the encyclical Il Fermo Proposito (1905), defined the object to which Catholic Action should be particularly devoted, "the practical solution of the social question according to Christian principles." He proposed the organization of Popular Christian Action (embracing the whole Catholic social movement under the strict control of the clergy), the Civic Union (to influence the political arena), and the Economic Union (including Catholic working unions and credit unions, under the clergy's control).

In agreement with these orientations, several organizations were developed in Latin American countries (especially Colombia*, Brazil*, Argentina*, Mexico*, Chile*) under the banner of Acción Social Católica. Usually these organizations were tied to right-wing political parties that confronted the liberal states and liberal political parties. In many cases, they were backed by the nuncios* rather than local bishops. They mobilized members of the elite in social assistance programs, seeking thereby to avoid a loss of church influence among the rural and urban working classes while confronting anarchist and socialist movements.

2. Catholic Action under Pius XI (1922–39). In his first encyclical, Ubi Arcano Dei (1922), Pius* XI defined Catholic Action as a mandate by the bishops calling laymen and laywomen to be part of the apostolic mission of the Church. Pius XII continued supporting this innovative perspective that enabled laypeople to participate in the Church's mission, for which only the hierarchy (the bishops and priests) were previously expected to be responsible. Catholic Action movements were regarded as the arms of the hierarchy in the world, with a "mandate" to engage in their mission.

In 1930 Pius XI wrote several pastoral letters to Latin American bishops strongly recommending that they organize Catholic Action in their dioceses, proposing the Italian experience as an organizational model with four branches: women, men, young women, and young men. The social work of the General Catholic Action (Acción Católica General), along with that of religious congregations, was a critical factor in the reestablishment of church and state relations in many countries in Latin America, facilitating modernization while reformist and populist governments were in power.

Meanwhile, in Latin America as elsewhere, Specialized Catholic Action movements were given the responsibility of conducting a "like toward like" apostolate, e.g. workers evangelizing workers, and students evangelizing students, all in "deep communion" with the hierarchy.

3. The papacies of Pius* XII, John* XXIII, and Paul* VI (1939–78). During this period, Specialized Catholic Action in Latin America followed the French and Belgian models, but also drew heavily on experiences in the USA and Canada*, preparing the way for Vatican* II by attempting to engage the Catholic Church in a dialogue with modernity based on the acceptance of new realities. Specialized Catholic Action was also the cradle of Liberation* theology, renewing pedagogy as liberation pedagogy (see Educational Practices as Christian Service Cluster: In Mexico). At the second Latin American Episcopal Conference in Medellín* (1968), the Base* Ecclesial Communities adopted the methodology and small-community organizational structures that Specialized Catholic Action had developed.

This inclusive approach, so important for the Roman Catholic Church and influential even in other Christian denominations, was abandoned as a more conservative church leadership arose under Pope John* Paul II (1970–2005). In Latin America, under the military dictatorships of the 1970s and 1980s, members of Catholic Action were politically persecuted. Many activists experienced exile, imprisonment, torture, and even death. Without ecclesiastical support, the movement virtually disappeared. See also CARDIJN, JOZEF; CATHOLIC APOSTOLIC CHURCH; CATHOLIC WORKER MOVEMENT; YOUNG CHRISTIAN WORKERS (JOCISTS). ANA MARÍA BIDEGAIN

Catholic Apostolic Church, a proto-Pentecostal* and Premillennialist Christian community in Great Britain (early 1830s), whose followers were often called “Irvingites” because of the early involvement of the Scottish Presbyterian cleric Edward Irving. The Catholic Apostolic Church was led by 12 men who regarded themselves as the restored apostolate. Organized in some 1,000 congregations around the world, the group gradually discontinued its activities after the death of the last apostle (1901).

Ecclesologically, the Catholic Apostolic Church combined elements from Anglican and Scottish Presbyterian, Tractarian*, Eastern Orthodox, and Roman Catholic traditions. Its Premillennialist eschatology included the doctrine of the rapture*. Many of its doctrines had their origins in the prophetic utterances of women congregants, but leadership positions were strictly kept in male hands. Although theological innovators, leaders of the Church were politically active in the British Conservative Party, where they worked against what they viewed as end-time corruptions in church and society, including ecumenism*, Liberal* theology, woman suffrage, secular liberalism and communism, political Islam, and the Zionist Movement.

Although grounded in Victorian Western culture, aspects of the Catholic Apostolic Church’s witness proved globally appealing. The New Apostolic Church and movement members who joined Anglican, Lutheran, and Pentecostal faith communities around the world prolonged the Church’s witness after 1901. See also MILLENNIALIM CLUSTER: MILLENNIALISM. MARKKU RUOTSILA

Catholic Epistles, designation for seven NT documents: James*, 1 and 2 Peter*, 1, 2, and 3 John*, and Jude*. “Catholic” was used beginning in the 2nd c. to designate writings addressed to the universal church, rather than to a specific church. Eusebius* (4th c.; Hist. Ecdl. 2.23.24–25) used this term for these seven documents to underscore that, despite questions about their authenticity, they were used “in most churches.”

Catholicity of the Church. The word “catholic” (from Gk catholicos, “universal,” and catholou, referring to “wholeness and integrity”) has been and is understood in different ways. Ignatius* of Antioch might have been the first to use it (c100). It was commonly used in the earliest statements of the faith (2nd c.) developed from the three questions asked of catechumens* before baptism* (cf. Apostolic* Tradition, c215, probably by Hippolytus* of Rome), then affirmed in the Apostles* Creed (first formulated in the 2nd c.) and the Nicene* Creed from the Councils of Nicaea* (325) and Constantinople* (381). The term “catholic” was also used to differentiate the “true” church from sects* and heresies*, which were excluded by the actions of councils.

At first “catholic” simply distinguished the Christian Church at large from local churches, while referring to the wholeness and integrity of the Church (“Where Jesus Christ is, there is the catholic Church,” wrote Ignatius to the Smyrnaens). Cyril* of Jerusalem, in his Catechetical Lectures (c350), underscored the “geographical,” doctrinal, and praxis meanings of “catholic”: “And the Church is called ‘catholic’ for being in the entire world from one end of the earth to the other and for teaching wholly (catholicos) and lacking nothing doctrinal...for completely (catholicos) taking care of and healing every sort of sin...and for being of possession of...every spiritual gift.” Cyril suggested that “catholic” should be contrasted with “heretical*.” This remains the view of “catholicity” held by Eastern Orthodox Churches.

Augustine*, in his controversy with Donatism*, affirmed that what has been “universally” taught or practiced is true. Vincent* of Lerins further specified that “catholic” is “what has been believed everywhere, always, and by all” (Commonitorium, early 4th c.): “What all have at all times and everywhere believed must be regarded as true.”

Confusion in the use of the term “catholic” was inevitable. By calling itself the Catholic Church (and later the Roman Catholic Church), the Western Church claimed the term for itself, rejecting as heretical or schismatic Christian churches outside it. In the process, a certain ecclesiastical structure (see Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: Types of Ecclesiastical Structures) was affirmed as a mark of "catholicity" to the exclusion of others.

But other churches, including the Arian* Church, the Eastern Orthodox Church, the Anglican Church, several national churches, and most Protestant churches, often claimed to be members of the holy catholic church, while affirming their own ecclesiastical structures and specific doctrines and practices (in the spirit of Cyril's definition). See also MARKS OF THE CHURCH, NOTES OF THE CHURCH.

DANIEL PATTE

Catholic Orders. See RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER.

Catholicos, title for patriarchs of national churches outside the Byzantine Empire (Armenian*, Georgian*, Church* of the East) denoting their independence. See also AUTO-CEPHALOUS CHURCHES.

Catholic Renewal, the set of developments in the Roman Catholic world after the Protestant Reformation*. This concept transcends the traditional debate over the use of the term "Counter Reformation" or "Catholic Reform" to characterize the history of the Catholic Church between Luther* and Voltaire*. Catholic scholars have objected to the negative connotation of "Counter Reformation," although it is a widely used term. Many elements of reform, e.g. the 15th-c. reforms within religious* orders, predated the Protestant Reformation. The term "Catholic Reform" neglects the anti-Protestant aspects of early modern Catholicism, including the harsher censorship of books, the prohibition of the Bible in the vernacular, and the increased authority of the Holy* Office. The concept of "Catholic Renewal" incorporates both the repressive, anti-Protestant measures of the Tridentine Roman Catholic Church (see Trent, Council of) and those developments independent of the Protestant schism, including the establishment of new religious foundations, e.g. the Society of Jesus (Jesuits*), a new wave of sanctity in 16th-c. Italy, and the expansion of Catholic missions to Asia, Africa, and the Americas in the wake of the Iberian voyages of discovery and settlement (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions; Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). The "Catholic Renewal" also includes the process by which the Tridentine decrees were implemented, with various degrees of success in different parts of the Catholic world, through the centralization of authority and liturgy in Rome, which would profoundly mark modern Catholicism. The reaffirmation of papal supremacy (see Popes, Roman Catholic, and the Papacy), tighter central control of canonization*, the reduction of local liturgies* to Roman usages, and the doctrinal control exercised by the congregations* in the papacy came to define the nature of Catholicism until the 20th c.

RONNIE PO-CHIA HSIA

Catholic Thought. See ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH AND ITS THEOLOGY.

Catholic Worker Movement, founded in 1933 by Dorothy Day* at the urging of Peter Maurin. It is best known for its houses of hospitality*, usually located in rundown urban areas. Food, clothing, shelter, and welcome are extended by unpaid volunteers to those in need. In 2006 there were 185 Catholic Worker communities, all but 3 in the USA. "Our rule is the works of mercy," said Day. "It is the way of sacrifice, worship, a sense of reverence."

The Catholic Worker is also the name of a newspaper. From 1933 until her death in 1980, Dorothy Day, a journalist, was the editor.

In addition to hospitality, Catholic Worker communities are known for their activity in support of labor unions, human rights, cooperatives, and the development of a nonviolent culture. During periods of military conscription, many Catholic Workers have been conscientious* objectors. Catholic Workers have often been jailed for acts of protest against social injustice and war*. With its stress on voluntary poverty*, the Catholic Worker Movement has much in common with the early Franciscans*, while its accent on community, prayer, and hospitality has Benedictine* overtones. Each Catholic Worker community is autonomous. Since Dorothy Day's death, there has been no central leader.

JIM FOREST

CEBs, Comunidades Eclesiales de Base (Base Ecclesial Communities). See CHURCH, CONCEPTS AND LIFE, CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL: BASE ECCLESIAL COMMUNITIES (CEBs); CHURCH, CONCEPTS AND LIFE, CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: ECUADOR: BASE ECCLESIAL COMMUNITIES (CEBs).

CELAM (Consejo Episcopal Latinoamericano, Latin American Episcopal Conference), an organization of the Roman Catholic Latin American and Caribbean bishops that provides pastoral support and coordinates efforts to address the challenges Latin America faces. Created in 1955 during the Eucharistic* Congress in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, CELAM (with headquarters in Bogotá, Colombia) provides training services, research, and reflection for the 22 National Episcopal Conferences to aid them in their efforts to oversee pastoral and religious development in dire socioeconomic and political situations. CELAM's General Conferences determined the direction of Catholicism on the continent. In Rio (1955), CELAM initiated episcopal coordination. In Medellín (Colombia, 1968) CELAM offered celebrated prophetic reflections on Latin American realities, including the concept of institutionalized injustice, and officially supported "Base* Ecclesial Communities." In Puebla (Mexico*, 1979), CELAM formalized the "preferential option for the poor," despite its conservative reorientation. In Santo Domingo (Dominican* Republic, 1992), CELAM celebrated 50 years of Latin American evangelization and focused on internal issues regarding control over ecclesial life. In Aparecida (Brazil, 2007), CELAM sought to revive the reception of the Second Vatican* Council in Latin America.

ANA MARÍA BIDEGAIN

Celestine V, Pope (1294), first a Benedictine, then a hermit in the Abruzzi with many followers. Elected pope at the age of 80, after a disastrous five-month pontificate he abdicated and was replaced by Boniface* VIII, who imprisoned him. The Spiritual* Franciscans had placed great hope in him, and Dante* puts him at the edges of hell as the one who made "the great refusal."

Celibacy (Lat for "single" or "unmarried"). In both philosophical and religious circles, the term also came to connote wholeness, a life uncomplicated by family concerns. The single life is preferred to the married life, as Jesus (Matt 19:12, Luke 20:35–36) Paul (1 Cor 7:7–8, 35–35, 38), and Revelation (14:4) teach. With their ascetic traditions, the Syriac* Church and the Assyrian* Church (in Mesopotamia), perhaps as late as the 4th c., considered only celibates to be true Christians worthy of baptism*.

Celibacy was a feature of the monastic* movement from its beginning and was one of its vows*. The Eastern Church permitted priests to be married but required that bishops be single. The Western Church, starting in the 4th c., required married clergy to abstain from sexual relations after ordination; there was steady pressure to require that all priests be celibate. During the Gregorian* Reform, clerical marriage was condemned as Nicolaitism*; this position, along with the condemnation of simony*, was based in large part on a desire to make the Roman Catholic Church independent of family ties and the feudal* system. A definitive prohibition of clerical marriage was enacted by the Second Lateran* Council in 1139.

The Reformation, convinced from experience that vows and requirements of celibacy were unfeasible, condemned them as merely human commands, encouraging hypocrisy, works-righteousness, and a spirit of elitism toward other Christians. Acknowledging the NT's preferential option for celibacy, they called it a gift (cf. Matt 19:12; 1 Cor 7:7), which may be taken away and thus is to be observed only as long as one has that gift. EUGENE TESELLE

Celsus (2nd c.) authored the earliest surviving attack on Christianity, the True Discourse (c180), known from Origen's refutation, Against Celsus (248). Celsus probably wrote in response to Justin* Martyr. He praises the Logos* doctrine and Christian morals but finds many absurdities in the Bible, objects to the exclusive claims of Christianity, criticizes the notion of incarnation*, and depicts Christianity as endangering the Roman Empire.

Celtic Christianity, Its Practices and Theology. The search for a "Celtic Christianity," with a desire to import its values and practices into Christian life and liturgy, is a notable trait of contemporary English-speaking spirituality*. The ill-defined past of "the Celtic Christians" (invariably identified simply as the victims of the "Roman party" at a mythically enlarged Synod of Whitby, 664) is perceived to offer forms of church life that, compared with traditional Western churches, are less authoritarian, are sensitive to nature and its rhythms, are less rationalist, and are more sensitive to creativity and women's insights. For others it offers a pre-Reformation unity that can legitimate and make acceptable practices, such as pilgrimage*, that otherwise would be rejected as "High Church" or "too Roman."

In stark contrast to this enthusiasm is the reaction of historians to these claims: (1) "Celtic" is a linguistic rather than a social category (referring to a language spoken in most of Western Europe in Roman time). (2) The theology of Celtic churches in Northwestern Europe is not different from that of churches bordering them, or differences are similar to those that exist (e.g. on issues relating to the calendar) across the Latin West during the Middle Ages. (3) The linguistic basis of Celtic churches was Latin, and they saw themselves, albeit in the looser manner of the time, as being linked with Rome (it was the pope who was prayed for at every Eucharist). (4) They interacted with the other Western churches in Spain, France, and Italy as within a unity. (5) Their sensitivity to nature and its rhythms is little more than what can be found in any rural, preindustrial society. However, there are three distinctive features of Celtic churches.

Sin and Forgiveness. The practice that allowed for the repeated reconciliation for sins* after baptism developed through a combination of a secular concept of using fines as reparations, rather than punishments, for crimes and the monastic notion of continual “lifestyle conversion.” This “penitential” practice stands behind later auricular confession and indulgences (see Penance and Forgiveness).

Asceticism. In a nonurban society, monasteries played a more significant role in church life than elsewhere. This meant that a monastic ideal of holiness and asceticism* became dominant earlier than elsewhere in the West.

Inclusiveness. Many churches emerged within a culture of clear opposition between “Christian” and “pagan”; by contrast, Christianity arrived in Northwestern Europe as a confident culture willing to view existing practices as part of the Spirit-guided “preparation for the gospel”; upon its arrival, Christianity could purify, restore to their “true” meaning, and build on existing practices. What later writers often designated “pagan survivals” were often consciously incorporated into Christian practice (e.g. a well was rededicated to a saint) with Acts 17:16–34 as model (see Inculturation Cluster).

Often critics present “Celtic Christianity” as a fraud. Yet this view ignores the fact that Christians continually recycle parts of their past for their present needs. However, the problem of often random selection of cultural bits is at times indicative of poor theological reflection. For example, a group might wish to celebrate the Irish festival of Samhain (Halloween) on the false assumption that it can be historically isolated from a Christian cult of the dead or that it can be exclusively related to All* Saints’ Day (November 1) rather than to All* Souls’ Day (thus ignoring the fact that those earlier Christians prayed for the dead and believed in a purgatorial state). Yet excluding All Souls’ Day fails to acknowledge both the complexity of earlier ecclesiologies and the emphasis in the festival of Samhain on graves, grave markers (many of which survive), pilgrimage, and relics.

The desires underlying the present-day quest for “Celtic Christianity” may point out certain systemic failings of churches to address felt needs. It is often through remembering what is most uncomfortable that Christians can best critique their unwitting assumptions about their religious culture. THOMAS O’LOUGHLIN

Cemetery (from Gk “sleeping place”), a term originally used only by Christians to designate a place for burial awaiting the general resurrection.

Cenobitic Monasticism, a communal form of monastic life (from the Gk koinos, “common”) characterized by a clear set of obligations for all members, a superior who provides both spiritual and temporal guidance, and procedures for entry to the community and admission to full membership. See also MONASTICISM CLUSTER: MONASTICISM.

COLUMBA STEWART, OSB

Central African Republic. Named the territory of Ubangui-Shari (1894) by Savorgna de Brazza, this landlocked country became independent in 1960 (capital Bangui) with David Dacko as president.

The population includes an amalgamation of ethnic groups that immigrated in the 19th c. to escape Fulani armies and Arab slave* traders. Besides French (official language) and Sango (national language), 67 other African languages are spoken, notably Gbaya, Banda, and Bakoko.

Christianity was introduced by the Catholic Holy Ghost Fathers (1886). By 1894 a mission station was established at Bangui, and Fr. Augouard was nominated its bishop. However, owing to the ruthless exploitation of local people by French companies, Christianity was underdeveloped. This situation radically changed when in the 1920s the American Baptists* and Brethren*, together with four other Protestant missionary societies, redirected their evangelization efforts toward the “poor ones of YHWH” in the Central African Republic. As a result of this joint enterprise, the Central African Republic became the only Francophone country with 60% of Christians as Protestants. A common formula was found for the work among youth, including literature in French and Sango. The Charismatic* renewal spread rapidly in the 1990s; African* Instituted Churches (including Kimbanguists* from the Democratic Republic of Congo*) also developed.

Beginning in 1938, the Catholic Church's presence was consolidated by the arrival of French and Italian Capuchins*. The Church's well-organized education* system attracted many Christian and Muslim students alike. Bangui was made an archiepiscopal see in 1955, but the first native archbishop, Joachim N'Dayen, was not appointed until 1970.

Sociopolitical life in the Central African Republic has been substantially influenced by churches. Barthélémy Boganda (1910–59), a gifted priest, was suspended after he founded the country's influential party, Mouvement pour l'Évolution Sociale de l'Afrique Noire, in opposition to French colonialism. He is still venerated as the "the father of the nation." In 1966 Jean Bédel Bokassa (a failed monk), then a colonel, seized power from his cousin Dacko. In late 1976, Bokassa renamed the nation Central African "Empire" and crowned himself Emperor Bokassa I in a Napoleon-style ceremony (1977). In 1979, following violent social protests during which hundreds of children were massacred, Bokassa was overthrown in a French-backed coup led by Dacko. Churches and civil society groups are striving to support the establishment of social and political stability, but unfortunately with limited success.

Statistics: Population (2003): 3.8 million (M); Christians, 50% (Protestants and independents, 1.14 M; Catholics, 0.76 M); African Religionists, 35%; Muslims, 15%. (Source: 2003 census.)

VALENTIN DEDJI

Centurion, a Roman officer in command of 100 soldiers. Several centurions are mentioned as believers (Matt 8:5–13 = Luke 7:1–10; Mark 15:39; Acts 10).

Cephas (from Aramaic kepha, "rock"; Gk petros), a nickname or title given by Jesus* to Simon (see Peter), apparently because of his faith and belief in Jesus as the Messiah* (Matt 16:18). Jesus' attendant promise, "On this rock I will build my church," has been interpreted to refer either to Peter's faith or to Peter himself as primary apostle and predecessor of the bishops of Rome*.

Cerdo, Gnostic teacher in Rome who differentiated between the "just" Creator* depicted in the OT and the "merciful" God revealed only through Christ. This same distinction is found in Marcion*, who may have learned it from Cerdo after coming to Rome (c140).

Cereta, Laura (1469–99), writer of epistolary essays in Latin that circulated in manuscript form among humanists in Brescia, Verona, and Venice; defender of women's education. Her first biographers claim that she lectured publicly in Brescia for seven years. While her early writings integrate religious and secular themes, her later writings reveal a tension between the two. She faced criticism as a learned woman in a society that valued women for their domesticity and religious pursuits. The Dominican friar Tommaso da Milano counseled her to abandon secular texts for religious ones. In her letters to him, she emphasizes spiritual themes and refers to God as a feminine entity (spectatrix, "overseer," from the Latin masculine noun spectator).

JENNIFER HARAGUCHI

Chaburah (from Heb "friend"), Jewish voluntary organization for religious fellowship; also its fellowship meal. The term could be applied to Jesus and his disciples, and the Last* Supper.

Chad. This former French colony, independent since 1960 (capital, N'Djamena), with 131 ethnic groups, is occupied by Muslim Arabs in the north and east, and African Religionist and Christian Black Africans in the south.

Christianity was introduced by the General Council of Cooperating Baptists of North America, which sent six missionaries to French Equatorial Africa (1920), with Paul Metzler effectively beginning work in 1925. There were hundreds of Baptist churches when in 1973 Baptists resisted a policy of tribal initiation rites enforced by President François Tombalbaye's government. Churches were closed, members were persecuted, 13 Chadian pastors were executed, and missionaries (except medical personnel) were expelled. The government formed its own Evangelical Church independent of the Baptist mission. Churches reopened in 1975 when the government was overthrown.

In the early 20th c., the Vatican placed Chad under the Italian vicariate of Khartoum (Sudan). The tensions between the French and Italian (Mussolini's) governments in the 1930s discouraged the Roman Catholic presence until after World War II. Rome signed a decree authorizing the French Roman Catholic presence in Chad (1946), reviving pioneering attempts by the Holy Ghost Fathers at Kou (1929). In 1947 the territory was divided between Capuchin* fathers and oblates in the southwest and Jesuits* in the rest of the country, including N'Djamena. Msgr. Matthias N'Gartery Mayadi was the first Chadian priest (ordained by the Capuchins, 1957) and the first Chadian bishop (1985).

Protestants (Baptists) excelled in social work, with their Koumra Medical Center, which trains doctors and nurses. Likewise, in the 1970s many Catholic nuns and brothers were trained as medical professionals to staff government hospitals and clinics. Regarding education*, Jesuit missionaries established in N'Djamena one of Africa's best seminaries. Since the 1950s, Catholic development centers have helped improve adult literacy (with some 20,000 Chadian participants in 1980).

A challenging situation evolved when Colonel Idris Deby, a warlord from the Islamic* east, headed (1990) a transition government that was supposed to lead to a pluralistic civilian regime. Starting in 1995, fundamentalist Islamic preachers propagating the Shariah Law infiltrated Chad. The possibility of a Sudanese-type development cannot be ruled out (see Sudan).

Statistics: Population (2003): 9.25 million; Muslims 53%; Christians, 29.2% (Roman Catholics, 14%; Protestants, 13.2%; members of African Instituted Churches, 2%); African Religionists, 17%. (Estimates based on 1993 census.)

VALENTIN DEDJI

Chalcedon, Council of (451). After the victory of the party of Eutyches* (who, from their opponents' point of view, affirmed Monophysitism* and its tenet that the incarnated Christ had a single nature or, from their own point of view, held the more balanced Miaphysitism*) at the Second Council of Ephesus*, which Pope Leo* I called a "robber synod," the situation dramatically changed when Eutyches' protector, the emperor Theodosius II, died. His widow, Pulcheria*, assumed power and married Marcian, who became emperor. For them reconciliation with the Church of Rome was a priority, and an ecumenical council met in Chalcedon (451).

The council recognized the authority of the second letter of Cyril* to Nestorius, the Formula of Reunion (an agreement between Cyril and John of Antioch, a moderate of the school of Antioch*, 433), and of Leo's Tome*. The decisions of Ephesus were revoked, Eutyches was condemned as a heretic, and Ibas* of Edessa and Theodoret* of Cyrrhus were vindicated.

At the emperor's insistence, the council prepared a doctrinal statement declaring Christ to be one person*, or hypostasis*, "known in two natures without division or separation, confusion or change." The language, while influenced by Leo's Tome, was drawn chiefly from Cyril. "In two natures" was added at the insistence of Rome and the Antiochenes; yet the natures were said only to "be known," not to act in distinct ways. Thus the Chalcedonian doctrine could be interpreted either in a strongly Dyophysite* way, as Rome and the Antiochenes did, or with an emphasis on the one person of the Word, as the Easterners did.

The council also declared the Church of Constantinople to be second only to Rome, creating resentment in the apostolic churches of Antioch and Alexandria. As a result, the Church of Alexandria, which considered the doctrine of Cyril* to be at odds with that of Chalcedon and held Christ to be "one nature after the union" (Miaphysites*), found additional reasons to become independent of Constantinople and of the "Melkite*" Church. EUGENE TESELLE

Chaldean Catholic Church. This uniate* church descends from the Church* of the East (East Syriac Church). As a reaction to a 1480 decree making patriarchal succession hereditary, dissident bishops and lay delegates elected John Sulaka, the abbot of the Rabban Hormizd Monastery (near Mosul, Iraq) as patriarch (1540). He sought union with Rome. Pope Julius III proclaimed him "patriarch of the Chaldean Church" (1553).

The Chaldean liturgy in classical Syriac is the Liturgy of Addai* and Mari, in which the Nicene Creed (with the Filioque) is chanted and communicants receive the bread species only. Baptism is effected by immersion three times. The sacrament* of marriage* is received when the two rings are blessed. The Chaldean Church bestowed on the laity the major order of the diaconate* and the minor orders of lector and subdeacon. The austere church buildings have a rectangular nave, with a wall encompassing the sanctuary at its eastern end.

The patriarch (ecclesiastical seat in Baghdad) is elected by the bishops and confirmed by the Roman Catholic pope. There are 12 ecclesiastical sees* in Iraq* and the Middle East, and two eparchies in North America. Estimated membership in 2000 was 600,000, equally divided between Iraq and other countries.

Besides clergy (prepared in a major and a minor seminary), there are monks (the Antonines of Rabban Hormizd), nuns (Daughters of the Immaculate Conception and the Order of the Sacred Heart), and catechists.

Pope John* Paul II and Mar Dinkha IV, patriarch of the Assyrian Church of the East, signed (1994) the “Common Christological Declaration” to promote union between Assyrian* and Chaldean churches, later (1997) approved by the hierarchies of the two churches. The Chaldean Church has been an active participant in the Council of the Catholic Patriarchate of the Orient, promoting ecumenical dialogue among Oriental churches, and in Christian–Muslim dialogue. Since Vatican* II, the many liturgical reforms have included the de-Latinization of the liturgical book and a vigorous effort to revive Syriac, both classical and vernacular, in Iraq and among immigrant communities. See also MAL-ABAR CHRISTIANS. SHAWQI N. TALIA

Chalice (from Lat calix), cup containing the wine used in the Eucharist*.

Chancel (from Lat cancellus, “lattice”), the eastern* part of a church, surrounding the altar* and separated from the nave* by a wall, grill-work, a rail, or an open space.

Chant (from Lat canere, “to sing”), singing of a sacred text in a special liturgical way; probably of both Jewish and Greek origins.

Chantry, an endowment* to support priests saying Mass* for the soul* of the donor or persons named by the donor; originated in the Middle Ages, developed during the 12th–13th c. along with the doctrine of purgatory*. Also the name of special chapels for such Masses, built because only one Mass could be said daily at each altar.

Chapel, the structure containing the cape (capella) of St. Martin* of Tours; later, any shrine with relics of saints; more recently, subordinate, non-church religious structures.

Chaplain, priest or minister associated with a chapel* or with a specialized ministry serving rulers, bishops, institutions, or the military.

Chapter, an assembly of the members of a monastery* to transact business; also the room where this body gathers. A cathedral chapter is the assembly of clerics to assist a bishop in the government of a diocese.

Chardon, Louis (1595–1651), Dominican* friar, spiritual author. The first son of a prosecutor in Picardy, Chardon studied at the University of Paris, then entered the Dominican Convent of the Annunciation (Paris, 1618), a convent that belonged to the Occitanian Dominican Reform launched by Sebastian Michaëlis (1543–1618) to bring theology and spirituality together in accordance with primitive rules of the Dominican order. Very little is known about Chardon’s life. We do know that he became a Dominican friar (1619), then master of novices, possibly until 1630, and that he probably went to Toulouse in 1632, then returned to Paris, where he died of the plague.

Being charged with the care* of souls, he wrote (from 1647) treatises such as the Life of Saint-Samson and translated the Dialogues of Catherine* of Siena and Tauler’s Institutions. In his most notable book, The Cross of Jesus (1647), Chardon tries to understand why devout souls must suffer. By following the crucified Jesus, they are purified and can benefit from sanctifying grace*. The mystical* experience can be present in “ordinary” Christian life. Thus Chardon helps the believers whom he directs progress on the path toward holiness.

YVES KRUMENACKER

Charisma, Charism, “gift* of grace*” bestowed on the recipient to be used for the edification of others (cf. 1 Cor 12:4–11). There are a plurality of gifts (charismata, charisms), i.e. of graces and qualifications granted to Christians to perform their particular tasks or vocations* for the good of others. The Charismatic* Movement emphasizes that these gifts are from the Holy* Spirit. “Charism” is the designation of the particular tasks that specific religious* orders perform in ministering to others.

Charismatic Authority, the kind of authority that rests in a leader’s unique qualities, which are viewed as gifts* (charismata) from God, contrasted by Max Weber* with traditional (e.g. inherited) and rational/legal authority. Charismatic leadership can be countercultural and stimulate cultural changes.

CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements:
Methods for Studying

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements:
Their History and Theology

2) *A Sampling of Contextual Views
and Practices*

- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Africa: Eastern Africa
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Africa: Southern Africa
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Africa: Western Africa
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Asia
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Australasia
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Europe: Eastern Europe
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Europe: Western Europe
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Latin America: Brazil
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Latin America: Central America
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Latin America: Chile
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Latin America: Jamaica
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in Latin America: Mexico
- Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements
in North America

1) Introductory Entries

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements: Methods for Studying. The Charismatic Movement encompasses Christian groups and churches that place a central emphasis on the role of the graces or gifts (Gk charismata) of the Holy Spirit in the life of all their members – not merely their leaders (cf. Charismatic Authority) – as well as the sociopolitical struggles empowered by the Holy Spirit. While the statistical claim by the World Christian Encyclopedia (2001) that one-quarter of Christians can be viewed as Charismatic is difficult to verify, the Charismatic Movement is quite sizable. It can be divided into three Charismatic waves: that of Pentecostal churches (with about 65 million members) that emerged in the early 20th c.; that of renewal Charismatic groups inside the Anglican, Catholic, Orthodox and Protestant churches (a 20th-c. movement; may be twice or three times as large as the Pentecostal churches); and that of independent or indigenous Charismatic churches (also known as “neo-Charismatics”), an even larger Charismatic wave that saw the formation of independent* or post-denominational Charismatic churches that grew very rapidly during the last part of 20th c. This third wave of indigenous Charismatic churches is by definition quite inculturated*, each specific Charismatic church being shaped by the very culture that it most often rejects as the “evil world” and often characterized as empowered by the Holy* Spirit to participate in a “spiritual warfare” against demonic powers that put in bondage people who live in this evil world.

In addition to its emphasis on the gifts of the Spirit, Christian Charismatic spirituality reshapes cultures* and religious landscapes. By discerning signals of transcendence, Charismatic believers are confident that they can have a closer walk in imitation of Christ, guided by the Bible and empowered by the cross’s salvific effect and the graces and gifts of the Holy Spirit that enable believers to serve Christ more than is humanly possible.

Who can be viewed as a “Charismatic”? This definition is much debated, because of the wide range of views concerning the activities of the Holy Spirit. Until recently the literature restricted the term to those who claim that the gifts of the Spirit have not ceased since the Pentecost event and who exercise the gifts within main-line churches. Yet the designation “Charismatic” also applies to Pentecostal churches as well as to many of the emerging independent churches, although Pentecostals would rather “test the spirits,” since not all spirits are from God.

For a critical study of the Charismatic Movement, Africa provides a good test case, because of the importance and diversity of its various branches on this continent. An African perspective offers an alternative critical approach to account for this movement.

The Charismatic Movement has been studied from a modernist* perspective by social scientists (see Weber, Max).

Sociology* of religion, soon followed by psychology* and anthropology of religion, views religious movements as the result of social processes. Persons engaged in the Charismatic Movement attempt to make sense of (bring cognitive order to) a complex and often hostile world. Four explanations for the Charismatic Movement are given. Charismatic groups develop as:

1. an alternative and/or corrective to modernization and secularization*;
2. a response by marginalized people to a feeling of relative social and economic deprivation and of cognitive dissonance (traditional religious views are not helpful);
3. a structure in which symbolic* interaction is possible for disenfranchised persons through the recognition of their personal charismata (gifts of the Spirit);
4. an effect of globalization*, bringing about either an accommodation of indigenous religion to ideologies from North America (e.g. the focus on individualistic religious experience) or the inculturation* of Charismatics into indigenous religious contexts or a combination of both.

From an African or non-Western perspective, these critical assessments are problematic because they attribute the resurgence of religion in Charismatic revivals to an African pathology. The African indigenization of Christianity is depicted as antimodern along with fundamentalism*, as if the relationship between the African past and the modern present necessarily needed to be understood in terms of a view of history framed by social Darwinism* and its view of progress. Far from envisioning a rupture between present and past, one can envision our past as always in our present, a view of history found in several African cultures. Following Peter Berger (Rumor of Angels), Harvey Cox (Fire from Heaven), and Waldo Cesar (Daily Life and Transcendancy in Pentecostalism), it is helpful to envision a critical approach that draws attention to the limits of the Enlightenment* critique of religion*. For this one emphasizes how religion reinvents daily life and culture by utilizing signals of transcendence in the diverse spheres of human existence. One needs to consider:

1. the inner vision and the reinvention of self and life journey;
2. the reimagining of social space and the role of visible and invisible forces in it;
3. the reshaping of the hermeneutic practice for interpreting the Bible that displaces the liberal–fundamentalist debate through a praxis-oriented hermeneutic where experience and Scripture are maintained in a dialectic relationship by the Holy Spirit. The immediacy of the Bible as Scripture* is balanced by the freedom to interpret and appropriate the multiple meanings of the biblical texts accessible to all (and not merely leaders), because of an illumination from the Spirit;
4. the reconstruction of religious life and landscape as demonstrated in missionary strategies and ethics;
5. the redeeming of the public space (the political theology of the Charismatic Movement in each specific situation).

These considerations make possible a constructive study of the Charismatic Movement in different contexts.

OGBU U. KALU

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements: Their History and Theology. The Charismatic Movement falls into three categories (often subsumed under the single label “Pentecostal”): classical Pentecostal churches (since the early 20th c.; c65 million in 2000); renewal Charismatic groups within Catholic, Anglican, Orthodox, and Protestant churches (especially since the mid-20th c.; 175 million in 2000); and independent or indigenous Charismatic churches (also known as “independent,” “postdenominational,” and “neo-Charismatic,” a catchall designation for a diversified movement whose membership exploded in the late 20th c. but is found throughout church history; 295 million in 2000).

Charismatic theology is as diverse as Christianity itself, taking on the hue of the groups affected and the cultures* represented, and it has influenced virtually all of the Christian Church. Christian Charismatics can be found throughout the history of the church: the early church (as Paul's* letters, especially 1 Cor 12–14, and Acts* show), the Montanist* Movement (mid-2nd–6th c.), and movements also associated with Millennialism*, including, e.g., certain French Huguenot* groups under persecution (e.g. Camisards*, 17th–18th c.) and the Shakers* (since the 18th c.). Since the early 20th c., the Charismatic Movement has become more encompassing and of great impact.

Classical Pentecostalism appeared first in North America in 1901 and spread throughout the world during the next decade. Pentecostals taught that glossolalia* (speaking in tongues) was the initial physical evidence of Spirit baptism*. All Charismatics share with Pentecostals a common emphasis on "life in the Holy Spirit," which includes exuberant worship, spiritual gifts, Pentecostal-like experiences (not Pentecostal terminology), signs and wonders, and power encounters. Unlike Pentecostals, renewal and independent Charismatics do not always advocate the necessity of a second work of grace* subsequent to conversion or the evidence of glossolalia* as an affirmation of Spirit baptism. Charismatics place a stronger emphasis on the full range of spiritual gifts, as opposed to Pentecostals, who treat tongues and healing* as primary (see Pentecostal Movement).

Renewal Charismatic Movement. The groundwork for the renewal Charismatic Movement in the USA had already been laid in the 1940s–1950s by the ministries of Oral Roberts, T. L. Osborne, Agnes Sanford, and Demos Shakarian and his Full Gospel Business Men's Fellowship International. Renewal Charismatics began to explore their newfound experiences in the Holy Spirit within their own traditions. During the early 1960s, individuals in virtually every major Protestant tradition (Baptist, Lutheran, Mennonite, Methodist, and Presbyterian) were experiencing a renewal in the Holy Spirit. In Britain, the leadership of Anglican Michael Harper and Pentecostal Donald Gee, together with David du Plessis, gave further impetus to the spread of the Charismatic Movement.

Aggressive opposition to the renewal Charismatic Movement subsequently developed in such groups as the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod, the Southern* Baptist Convention, and nearly all non-Pentecostal Holiness* groups. Notwithstanding, the renewal continued to grow throughout the Protestant world, especially among those Anglicans, Lutherans, and others who assimilated its dynamic into their church life.

In 1962 Pope John* XXIII prayed that the Second Vatican* Council might bring a new Pentecost for the Roman Catholic Church. The renewal officially began in 1967, simultaneously at Duquesne University in Pittsburg and in Bogotá, Columbia. Virtually all of the early Catholic Charismatic leaders in the USA were academics who had been strongly influenced by the debates and decrees of Vatican II, which had recognized in 1964 the importance of charismatic gifts in the life of the church. The Catholic Charismatic renewal spread rapidly throughout the world, growing to almost 120 million members according to 2000 statistics (c8.7 million [M] in Africa, 16 M in Asia, 11 M in Europe, 73 M in Latin America, 9.7 M in North America, and 0.3 M in Oceania).

Independent or Indigenous Charismatic Churches are by far the largest group of Charismatics. This catchall appellation refers to almost 19,000 indigenous, independent, postdenominational churches and groups that cannot be classified as either classical Pentecostal or renewal Charismatic, but share a common emphasis on the Holy Spirit, spiritual gifts, and experiences. In virtually every other way, they are as diverse as the world's cultures they represent.

According to David Barrett, there were about 0.9 million independent Charismatics in African* Instituted Churches (AICs) by 1900 and 65 million by 2000. Indeed, since the 1970s, the Charismatic Movement has exploded in Nigeria and Ghana, and has grown steadily throughout Africa, except in the almost totally Islamic nations of the north. The new Spirit churches are different from older AICs in their Evangelical theological emphasis and more limited inculturation* (also called syncretism*). Here megachurches* (combining Prosperity* Gospel and Charismatic teachings) abound, including Canaan Land ministries (with a 50,000-seat sanctuary) and the Redeemed Christian Church of God, both with headquarters in Lagos, Nigeria.

Independent Charismatic churches in Latin America and Asia experienced similar growth (see the relevant entries in this Cluster). In China, where the Charismatic Movement and Christianity as a whole are growing rapidly, grassroots or house* churches appear in abundance because Communist repression made houses the only viable meeting places for most Christians. According to Barrett, by 1995 nearly 65% of Chinese Christians were Charismatics. Similarly, India*, the Philippines*, and South Korea* experienced strong Charismatic growth.

STANLEY M. BURGESS

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Africa: Eastern Africa comprise the indigenous-founded Christian groups and churches that have developed since the 1980s and are Pentecostal* in character. Their historic origins are linked (1) to renewal ferments within classical Pentecostal and other missionary churches (1920s–1930s), resulting in the emergence of Spirit-filled African* Instituted Churches and (2) to the 1930s–1940s East African Revival Movement within missionary churches. Young evangelists, fostered in the revival, witnessed through interdenominational fellowships, schools, and colleges, eventually establishing ministries and churches. Encounters with North American Pentecostalism (1980s–1990s) through print, electronic media*, and visiting exchanges embellished the revival doctrine with Prosperity* Gospel, healing*, and deliverance theologies.

The Charismatic Movement in Eastern Africa is heterogeneous, with varying doctrinal and ministerial emphasis. Beyond Prosperity teaching and Holy Spirit charismata, it is distinguished mainly by its appeal to women, its puritan morality, exuberant liturgies, evangelism*, and innovative use of media technologies.

Charismatic theology is derived from the Bible as authoritative Scripture* reinterpreted within the African world view and reflects a contextually relevant faith addressing existential and pragmatic needs. Essential to Charismatic theology is the belief in the power of the Spirit (manifested in healing* and glossolalia*) to overcome demons and other evil powers (see Exorcism), understood biblically and in traditional African ways.

The Charismatic Movement challenges patriarchal* structures and engenders new systems of egalitarian social relationships that value individuals. Women and youth have an opportunity to exercise ritual power and leadership. The ethic of transformation in Christ influences their political theology.

The movement has been assailed for antagonizing other Christian groups, for privileging loyalties to “anointed” leaders and to groups over families and attendant responsibilities; for emphasizing personal spiritual experience over theology and doctrine; for its schismatic tendency and uncritical stance toward structural evil; and for merchandising the gospel. Yet it contributed to the renewal of Christianity in Eastern Africa through the spiritual transformation of the personal and social worlds and the “charimatization” of mainline Christianity.

PHILOMENA N. MWAURA

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Africa: Southern Africa

are not only those whose leadership is focused on individuals with specific characteristics that attract adherents, but also neo-Charismatic groups emphasizing the charisma of each believer. Charismatic tendencies are as clearly evident in Southern Africa as elsewhere on the African continent. These tendencies are to be found in mainstream Protestant and Roman Catholic Christianity as much as in the African* Instituted Churches (AICs) and the newer Pentecostal/Charismatic groups to which many young people flock. Southern Africa has by far the largest concentration of AICs in terms of both the number of denominations and numerical strength. Most of these churches are Charismatic in typology and in turn generate neo-Charismatic churches. Alan Anderson writes: "The new Pentecostal and Charismatic churches at the end of [the 20th] century seem to be increasing at the expense of all types of older churches. Like the older AICs before them, these churches have a sense of identity as a holy and separated community, whose primary purpose is to promote their cause to outsiders. These are the 'born again' people of God, with a strong sense of belonging to the community of God's people, chosen from out of the world to witness to the new life they experience in the power of the Spirit. This latest expression of the AIC reformation has had the effect of popularizing a new form of Christianity appealing to the urbanized and significantly westernized new generation of Africans."

The greatest strength of the Charismatic churches is their appeal to the younger generation on a continent where young people constitute the majority of the population. At the same time, one of their greatest weaknesses is the propensity for fragmentation. A charismatic leader emerges in a congregation and attracts followers. He or she leaves that congregation and establishes his or her own meeting place – a rented cinema, a warehouse, a social hall, a school, or even an open place where a tent is pitched. Before long the congregation swells and becomes too large for the available space. Other charismatic leaders emerge, and new Charismatic congregations are established. There is no necessary connection between the parent congregation and the newer ones. Sometimes the relationship is cordial, but at other times there are conflicts and tensions, especially when there are unresolved issues pertaining to leadership and property.

From the perspective of ecclesiology, it remains an open question as to what it means to be a "church" in the Charismatic Movement, whether in Southern Africa or anywhere else. If the focus of ecclesial identity is the charismatic leader, what happens when the leader's charismatic gifts decline or the leader is incapacitated by illness or death? In the more institutionalized denominations, there is a clearly established procedure for leadership transition. In the Charismatic Movement, the change of leadership seems to be chaotic and very often leads to schism as new charismatic leaders arise in the congregations, as they are actually encouraged to do. Yet for Charismatic churches, this chaotic multiplication of Charismatic communities is viewed as the work of the Holy* Spirit.

JESSE NDWIGA KANYUA MUGAMBI

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Africa: Western Africa. The Christianity inherited by mainline, missionary churches in West Africa did not equip Christians to reconcile their worldview with the gospel. To address this deficit, various forms of Charismatic and Pentecostal movements developed. The major groups include the following:

1. African Instituted Churches, since the late 19th c.
2. The classical Pentecostal Movement, since the early 20th c.
3. Charismatic nondenominational evangelical Christian fellowships, attracting since the 1970s members of different Christian denominations who became Charismatics
4. Charismatic renewal groups in the mainline churches, since the 1930s
5. Independent Pentecostal and Charismatic churches and ministries, since the 1970s
6. Neo-Charismatic independent churches and ministries, since the 1990s

Arguably, the African Instituted Churches were the earliest authentically African expressions of Christianity in West Africa. Their beliefs and practices clearly epitomize the resilience of the African indigenous worldview. Thus they seek to satisfy the African's deep religious and spiritual quest and the search for authentic spirituality. Most significantly the African Instituted Churches set the pace, blazing the path that other branches of the Charismatic Movement, first of a Pentecostal type, have followed in their quest for an expression of Christian faith in African terms. Thus between 1906 and the 1940s, the classical Pentecostal Movement adopted many features of African Instituted Churches.

Since 1970 various types of Charismatic and Pentecostal movements have recorded the fastest growth on the religious landscape in West Africa. With their message of repentance* and Holiness ethic, the gifts and power of the Holy* Spirit, spiritual warfare, healing* and deliverance, and emotional, expressive worship, they put much emphasis on mission and evangelism. The movement that began in urban West Africa has now found its way into rural areas. Furthermore, these churches are the main players in an explosion of African Christianity in the Western World. For example, the fastest-growing church in Eastern Europe is a West African-led church, in Kiev, Ukraine, founded by Sunday Adelaja. Two major African churches in the USA are the Nigerian-based Redeemed Christian Church of God and the Ghanaian-based Church of Pentecost.

Charismatic (often called Pentecostal) religiosity is becoming ever more a social phenomenon in West Africa: many people confidently use biblical phrases and names for their businesses; people who aspire to attain political positions boldly declare themselves to be born again and "Holy Spirit filled." The Charismatic churches have founded schools and universities, and offer other social services. Qualitatively, evidence of their popularity abounds with stories of people who would have been lost to secularism* had they not been influenced by the message of the movement.

Their general acceptance is related to their efforts to apply the resources of the gospel to addressing questions raised within the primal worldview of West Africans. Consequently, the ethos of the Charismatic and Pentecostal movements has been adopted by all Christian denominations in West Africa. Mainline churches in West Africa are widely "charismatized." Thus the sharp distinction between denominations and movements is becoming increasingly irrelevant. Actually, the Charismatic and Pentecostal movements are fast becoming the "mainline" Christianity in West Africa, not merely in numbers but more importantly through their spirituality*, theology, and practices, which are tailored to fit the African milieu by displaying a full awareness of the African worldview. These movements are playing a major role in shaping Christianity in Africa because they effectively respond to events and processes at work in African cultures*. Churches in West Africa are at the threshold of a new permutation of Christianity that puts emphasis on an active engagement of the Christian faith in sociocultural issues, thereby becoming relevant to people of the region.

CEPHAS N. OMENYO

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Asia.

In 2000 there were approximately 135 million Charismatics in Asia: 5% classical Pentecostal*, 16% renewal Charismatics in denominations, and 79% independent Charismatics (although these subcategories overlap). Pentecostal missionaries arrived in India* and China* in the 1910s; in Burma (Myanmar*), Indonesia*, and Singapore* in the 1920s; in Korea*, Thailand*, and Malaysia* in the 1930s; and in Papua* New Guinea in the 1940s. Yet there were indigenous Charismatic revivals between 1900 and 1920 in Korea, long before Pentecostal missionaries arrived. In South Korea, Charismatic Christianity has exploded since 1945. By 2000 Seoul had 11 of the 12 largest megachurches* in the world, including Yoido Full Gospel Church (c780,000 members in 2003). These and other Charismatic churches, while at the time denominationally affiliated, are increasingly involved in interdenominational relations and in networks with independent Charismatic churches and groups elsewhere. So Korean missionaries to rural China work largely with house* churches, even as independent Chinese missionaries to other parts of Asia work with Pentecostal and renewal Charismatic organizations.

As elsewhere, the independent Charismatic Movement in Asia has a literalistic* approach to the Bible, a Millennialist* worldview, and an emphasis on the person and work of the Holy* Spirit. It stresses evangelism* through revivals* and crusades (using the latest technologies), as well as through relational interactions in home cell groups (e.g. South Korea) or house churches (e.g. rural China). The spiritual gifts are especially valued, and healings, miracles, and prophecies are marks of charismatic leadership.

The Asian Charismatic Movement accentuates a holistic, this-worldly, spiritual, and communal understanding of salvation*, although as Millennialists its members also remain otherworldly. Conversion* and often an insistence on moral purity reflect the perfectionist tendencies found elsewhere in Holiness* and Pentecostal Christianity. The Pentecostal “fourfold” gospel – Jesus as savior, healer, baptizer with the Holy Spirit, and coming king – is understood to include not only bodily healing, bodily manifestations, and emotional expressions, but also material blessings and general success.

Independent Charismatics in Asia are deeply influenced by animistic beliefs. Cosmologies featuring a multiplicity of gods, ancestor* spirits, and even ghosts are adapted in the Charismatic worldview and associated with angels* and demons*. The Holy Spirit as supreme divine power enables Charismatic believers to overcome the demonic through exorcisms* and spiritual warfare. For example, among the Bible Mission churches in Andhra Pradesh, India, indigenous and Hindu cultures combine to produce bhakti-style liturgies and a guru mentality that elevates the anointed-of-God to the status of a charismatic leader. Charismatic gurus like Mungamuri Devadas (c1885–1960) claimed to receive revelations from the Holy Spirit through dreams and visions that were confirmed through the gift of healings. In the Spirit of Jesus Church and the Holy Ecclesia of Jesus Church in Japan, ritual chants invoke God’s presence and activity in a phenomenologically* analogous way to the chanting of the Nembutsu and sutra recitation in Japanese Buddhism. These churches also Christianize and legitimize traditional Japanese burial practices honoring the ancestors, underscoring in biblical and theological teachings that salvation extends to the spirit world. Similarly, the important Prayer Mountain Movement in Korea builds on indigenous Korean religious beliefs and practices related to sacred mountain sites, and the function of its charismatic leaders is similar to that of shamanic healers (see Shamanism and Christianity). This charismatic spirituality has been compared to popular expressions of Korean Buddhism* and Confucianism*.

Since the gift of the Holy Spirit is available to men, women, and even youth, individual lives are transformed as Charismatic Christians, especially women, are empowered to testify, pray, lead, and work for the Kingdom* of God. The Charismatic emphasis on psychosomatic healing and, in some regions, on material blessings connects with the aspirations of Asian poor and brings about upward social mobility, especially in urban contexts where interactions with Western Christians are more common than they are in the countryside. While Charismatics are mostly apolitical and socially disengaged, they have begun to realize (e.g. in South Korea) the sociopolitical impact that a large number of people can have.

Theologically, how will the ongoing growth of the independent Charismatic Movement in Asia affect the traditional doctrinal views of mainline churches? Ethically, will the Charismatic Movement in Asia produce a “clash of civilizations” with emerging Muslim, Hindu, and Buddhist groups, or will these Charismatic churches interact with their social, political, and religious environments in more positive ways? One thing is sure: these very disparate groups in Asia can no longer be ignored in the context of world Christianity in the 21st c. AMOS YONG in an area with some 2,000 distinct ethnic and linguistic traditions depends on preexisting cultural attitudes toward spiritual life, imported theologies, and the interactions of Christian traditions with political and social developments, such as imperialism, colonialism*, missionary* paternalism, and capitalist expansion. In 2000, Charismatic and Pentecostal members totaled an estimated 4 million (c12% of the population) in 336 denominational groupings, including 3.5 million renewal Charismatics in mainstream denominations and neo-Charismatics in indigenous independent churches.

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Australasia can be seen as originating in indigenous intra-Oceanic and extra-Oceanic cultural transactions. The engagement of European Christianities (since the 18th–19th c.) with local cultures*

The Charismatic Movement entered Australia, New Zealand, and the rest of Australasia in two ways. First, among mainline traditions, it was prefaced by such movements as Keswick spirituality, Camps Farthest Out, and the Healing Movement (e.g. Hickson, Sanford), as well as by international evangelists (e.g. Macpherson, Valdez, Wigglesworth, Roberts, Worley), a radical shift in ecclesial relations through Vatican* II, alternative spiritualities amid Western youth cultures (e.g. Teen Challenge, Youth with a Mission), and a widespread lay reaction against the liberalization of theology. Second, the missionary movement reflexively imported from revivals* elsewhere (Solomon* Islands, Papua* New Guinea, East Africa) alternative or intensified spiritualities* (often through business connections, e.g. the sugar industry, coffee and tea plantations, financial services, and international combines). In the islands, the Charismatic Movement was prepared for by local shamanic religiosity (see Shamanism and Christianity) and the incipient experientialism of Methodism*, particularly as articulated through classical Pentecostal and Latter Rain revival missions.

An organized Charismatic presence in Australia dates from Jim Glennon's popular healing services at St. Andrew's Cathedral (1960), bolstered by Australians (including Alex Reichel) returning from the 1969 South Bend (Indiana) /Ann Arbor (Michigan) Catholic renewal, then by the organization of the movement in the 1970s through the Temple Trust (Alan Langstaff), Charismatic communities (especially Emmanuel, Servants of Jesus), denominational service committees, and Bible colleges.

Revival was often a means of indigenization of Charismatic Christianity in the unstable political and social milieu of new or decolonizing nation-states. Australian and New Zealand Charismatic missions to the Pacific and Asia helped legitimize and sustain their Australian bases in the face of growing denominational resistance to new experiential forms and ecumenism. This opposition saw both the institutionalization of the Charismatic Movement and the formation of many independent Charismatic congregations, many of which went on to sustain significant growth in Pacific and Asian centers.

Engaging with counterculture and Latter Rain influences, the Australasian Charismatic Movement emphasized the use of popular music during worship, deliverance ministry, prophetic vision, typological* interpretations of the Bible, and apostolic leadership. Conflict has arisen over relations with indigenous cultures (e.g. bride-price, polygamy*, and pig killing in the islands; the use of totems in Aboriginal* society), the influence of US revivalism, the relatively dominant role of women, theological innovations such as "Jesus Name," shepherding, demonic oppression of Christians, the "apostolic revolution," and "Prosperity*" preaching. The contributions of Charismatic music from Scripture in Song, Hillsong, Planetshakers, and other Australasian sources to the global church has been significant.

By 2002 in Australia, the Charismatic Movement had emerged with social and political aspirations, something already evident in the heavy Christian political involvement in the rest of the Pacific (flowing from church involvement in national infrastructure building, public corruption, and ecological and economic threats). In some cases (e.g. Michael Maeliau's Deep Sea Canoe Vision Movement, 1984), charismatic dreams and visions have become significant vehicles for the articulation of local identities with global frames and for fueling mission, especially among Pacific migrant communities in the First World. In Australia, “great southland” myths have fed theologies of national renewal and a sense of global mission. Given the relatively scattered population of the region, there is no doubt that the Charismatic Movement has been a particularly energetic and global source of Christian renewal.

MARK HUTCHINSON

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Europe: Eastern Europe. The Pentecostal* message of Spirit-filled experiential Christianity fell on receptive religious soil among Russians and several other peoples of Eastern Europe.

The movement reached czarist Russia and Central and East European nations in a variety of ways before the Communist takeover. The Pentecostal message was brought to Northwestern Russia and the Baltic States by some of the first Finnish Pentecostal missionaries. T. B. Barrat, the Norwegian Methodist minister who after his visit to the Azusa* Street revival in Los Angeles became the father of the Pentecostal Movement in Northern Europe, began publishing his magazine in the Russian language (1913). The expatriates who had become Pentecostal in the USA also played a strong pioneering role as missionaries when they returned to their former countries. Most successful among them was the Russian Baptist Ivan Voronaev, who laid the foundations for the Pentecostal Movement in Bulgaria* (early 1920s), then in the Soviet Union (establishing some 350 churches, mostly in Ukraine*). Many of the US missionaries were associated with the influential Russian and Eastern Europe Mission, and national leaders were trained at the influential Bible school in Danzig.

Under Communism Pentecostals were among the most fiercely persecuted Christian groups in Eastern European nations. In some countries, they were forced into unions with other neo-Protestant ecclesial communities. Governmental restrictions often led to dissident independent Pentecostal churches and unofficial associations known for their separatist and legalistic lifestyles. The collapse of the Communist regimes provided full freedom to Pentecostal and Charismatic groups. New denominations came into existence, some of them linked to global and Western Pentecostal groupings, including the Assemblies* of God and Church* of God (Cleveland, Tennessee). The largest national Pentecostal movements in post-Communist Eastern Europe are found in Romania* and Ukraine, with significant growth in Bulgaria and Belarus* as well.

The largest independent Charismatic church in all of Europe was founded in 1994 in Kiev, Ukraine, by Sunday Adelaya, a native Nigerian. God's Embassy claims more than 25,000 members (2005) who meet in 40 locations across Kiev and have planted more than 600 congregations in the former Soviet Union and around the world. The church's comprehensive mission plan includes proclamation of the gospel of spiritual freedom and empowerment for transformative sociopolitical engagement. Other independent and Word*-Faith churches have been established by strong charismatic leaders who have little or no theological education but are entrepreneurially gifted and able to communicate Christian faith as a message of hope and healing, thus attracting many urban youth. They are known for their effective use of the electronic media and their establishment of publishing houses and networks of communication. Though most of these churches resist the legalism and routinization of classical Pentecostal churches, since they plant daughter churches of their own, many of them are in the early stages of denominational structuring.

The Charismatic Movement has brought renewal to segments of Catholic churches in most nations, while it has affected national Orthodox* churches only randomly.

PETER KUZMIC

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Europe: Western Europe. The Pentecostal devotion to the extraordinary power and gifts of the Holy* Spirit collided with an increasingly secularized* Enlightenment* European culture with confidence in reason and science. Inspired by European revivalism* and US

Pentecostalism, Thomas Ball Barrett came to Norway (1907) to preach Pentecostal "Spirit baptism*." He inspired international participation, except in Italy, which was evangelized by Giacomo Lombardi (1908), and Portugal, which was visited by Brazilian missionaries (1938). Pentecostalism did not achieve a large presence in secular Western Europe. Only Portuguese Pentecostalism can claim more than 2% of the population. Charismatic churches fared better.

Post-World War I isolation and a penchant for congregationalism created a heterogeneous movement, lacking widespread uniformity on issues like speaking in tongues* as evidence of Spirit baptism, eschatology*, and biblical literalism*. British West Indies Pentecostals interpreted Pentecostal power within an Afro-Caribbean cosmology that involved the defeat of evil powers. Also, though Barrett and other founders were ecumenically open, Pentecostalism and the Charismatic Movement grew in most places in tension with established state Protestant or Catholic churches (the Dutch Reformed-Pentecostal dialogue exemplifies a countertrend). Basic is the conviction that widespread conversion*, healing*, and even societal change can occur through the spiritually gifted and empowered church. The ongoing vitality of this vision, however, will require greater ecumenical understanding and cooperation across confessional and national boundaries.

FRANK D. MACCHIA

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Latin America: Brazil. The development of Pentecostalism and the Charismatic Movement in Brazil is marked by three distinct phases, beginning with an isolated group of missionaries and leading to a movement fully integrated within Brazilian society.

At the beginning of the 20th c., a worldwide dissemination of Pentecostalism* was initiated by the US Holiness* Movement, which sent its missionaries to Brazil. From a timid start of a few individuals isolated in a traditionally Catholic* society, Brazilian Pentecostalism constantly increased its presence in Brazilian society.

According to the 2000 Brazil census, during 1990-2000, while the number of Catholics decreased, the number of Evangelicals* doubled to more than 26 million believers, massively increasing from 9.1% to 15.4% of the total population. Among these Evangelicals, 67.6% belong to different Pentecostal churches, most of which divided into three major denominations: "Assembléia de Deus," "Congregação Cristã no Brasil," and "Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus."

Although different denominations and movements share characteristics with the beginning of the Pentecostal Movement in the biblical event of Pentecost*, they have distinctive emphases on the charismatic gifts* of glossolalia*, healing*, and exorcism*. Moreover, different branches of the Pentecostal Movement relate the sacred and the secular realms in various ways.

Historically, the development of the Brazilian Pentecostal Movement can be divided into three interrelated and overlapping stages.

1. Implantation. Foreign missionaries who established the Congregação Cristã (1910) and Assembléia de Deus (1911) arrived at the same time in the north in the state of Pará and in the southeast in São Paulo. These missionaries were isolated for almost 40 years and associated themselves with those who were economically less fortunate and less educated than others, and with those who could not envision any future development or migration. This first stage of the Pentecostal Movement was characterized by anti-Catholicism, glossolalia*, sectarianism, and asceticism*. Congregação Cristã remained isolated. Assembléia de Deus changed when it began to engage with the surrounding society; despite a loss of members who balked at this change, it became the major Brazilian Pentecostal Evangelical denomination.

2. Greater Openness toward Society and "Brazilization," 1950s-1960s. This development took place especially in the region of São Paulo, which was becoming industrialized. The dissemination of Pentecostalism began to take place independently of foreign influence.

This process began with a “National Evangelization Crusade” initiated by US missionaries from Igreja do Evangelho Quadrangular. This crusade had evangelization caravans, which crisscrossed different regions of the country, assembling huge numbers in tents in public places, emphasizing divine healing. This evangelization movement throughout Brazil led to a widespread and fragmented Pentecostalism, and new denominations founded by Brazilians appeared for the first time. The use of radio (see Media and Christianity) as a means of propagation had the remarkable effect of integrating the Pentecostal Movement within Brazilian society. The major denominations were Igreja Evangélica Pentecostal Brasil para Cristo, Igreja Pentecostal Deus é Amor, Casa da Benção, and Igreja de Nova Vida.

3. Rapid Growth of the Independent Charismatic/Pentecostal Movement. From the end of the 1970s through the 1980s, there was a dramatic increase in the Charismatic/Pentecostalist Movement. Initially this growth took place in the region of Rio de Janeiro, where the people were more urban and better educated than those in other areas (see Brazil). The present-day increase and visibility of the Brazilian Charismatic/Pentecostalist Movement are due to this development.

By 2000 the Charismatic/Pentecostal churches were characterized by great social integration: massive participation in politics, use of the media (television, radio, and newspapers), marketing, and an enterprising organizational structure with a strong and centralized leadership. They became sophisticated churches with new theological, liturgical, and aesthetic possibilities. They became less sectarian and more involved in social issues, rejected religious stereotypes, and freed themselves from Pentecostal rigidity – salvation* no longer meant a rejection of the world. In their greatly emotional worship services, one finds the inculturated* use of symbols and objects that have religious significance in various Brazilian religions, especially popular Catholicism, Afro-Brazilian religions, and Kardecism (a spiritualist religion) – practices that earlier would have been denounced and rejected as syncretistic*. However, they remain opposed to dialogue between religions, emphasize the devil* and exorcism*, and strongly proclaim a Prosperity* Gospel according to which God’s plan for believers is that they are to be happy, healthy, and wealthy.

During this period of the Brazilian Charismatic/Pentecostal Movement, there has been a complex process of growth and internal migration, with many facets and ramifications. The primary denominations are now Igreja Internacional da Graça de Deus, Sara a Nossa Terra, and Igreja Universal do Reino de Deus, the last being a classic example of this movement.

Such indigenous Brazilian churches are best called “neo-Charismatic” or “independent Charismatic.” Furthermore, these Charismatic churches that began from foreign missionaries are now themselves sending missionaries to many regions of the world. In addition, this movement has spread to mainline churches, e.g. through the Charismatic Catholic Movement. See also BRAZIL.

PAULO BONFATTI

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Latin America: Central America. In the 1940s and 1950s, the Pentecostal Movement was already established in all Central American countries. At first it spread among marginalized groups of society, but from the 1980s the Charismatic Movement became broadly accepted among middle-class and even some high-society groups. Some Pentecostal groups developed as a result of the work of foreign missionaries, primarily from the USA. But most groups have been locally developed; they are “indigenous Charismatic” (see present cluster: Studying). Pentecostals and indigenous Charismatics represent about 80% of Evangelical/Protestant Christianity in the region.

This Charismatic Movement is heterogeneous in theologies, religious practices, and political options; some are conservative and even fundamentalist*, whereas others are liberal and socially committed. Indigenous Charismatics are characterized by their great missionary fervor. Their dynamic worship includes charismatic demonstrations (like glossolalia*, prayer healing*, and “dancing in the Spirit”), communal singing of hymns, public testimonies, prayers of intercession, and tithe or offering. The renewal Charismatic Movement within the Roman Catholic Church shares many of the liturgical characteristics found in the Protestant indigenous Charismatic Movement and Pentecostalism, yet is now combined with devotion to Mary*. The Catholic Charismatic Movement is also marked by the active participation of laywomen and laymen in leadership roles and by the integration of liturgical life with diaconal action.

In all of Central America, the dominant indigenous Charismatic Movement becomes increasingly a faith focused on a quest for solutions to the crises of individuals’ personal and social lives, making pacts with God to obtain prosperity*, health, and success.

DANIEL CHIQUETE.

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Latin America: Chile. Pentecostalism first emerged around 1909 in Valparaíso, Chile, when the US missionary W. Hoover left the Methodist Church to found the Methodist Pentecostal Church. This soon became a popular and deeply indigenous movement characterized by its beliefs in the Holy Trinity* and the Word of God, its emphasis on the active presence of the Holy* Spirit, and effusive worship services.

In its initial phase, this indigenous Pentecostalism experienced explosive growth, especially among the poor. Congregations subdivided and proliferated. Their initial relative isolation constituted an opening, spurring their missionary spirit with the goal of reaching out to the entire nation and even to neighboring countries.

Later, the evolution of Chilean Pentecostalism was marked by the political-social turmoil of the 1960s, which led Pentecostals to assume social responsibilities; and the 1973 coup d’état that led to a division of the Protestants (“Evangelicals,” including Pentecostals) into two groups: those who supported Pinochet and his government and those who struggled to defend human* rights.

By 1980 Chilean Pentecostalism had consolidated itself into a religious and cultural force of about 15% of the population with a significant and active presence in Chilean society. More recently, neo-Pentecostalism and neo-Charismatic groups have developed among minority groups, influenced and linked to foreign churches, although they adapted themselves to the Chilean society.

CRISTIÁN G. PARKER

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Latin America: Jamaica. Pentecostalism, the Protestant tradition with the largest membership in Jamaica, had its genesis in the religious awakening during the Great Depression (1929–33). In the midst of such socioeconomic and political crises, those most keenly affected tend to turn to God when they feel they can no longer depend on secular systems for answers to the challenges they face as individuals and societies. The New Testament Church of God and the City Mission Church founded by W. Raglan Phillips (1854–1930), with its revivalist* preaching of repentance* and healing*, enjoyed tremendous success among the poor, who feel particularly hopeless during periods of economic hardship. Another wave of Christian revival came in the aftermath of a devastating earthquake (early 1940s); many, fearing that the end of the world was at hand, turned to God “just to make sure” (that they would be saved).

The Pentecostal Movement was the religious component of the social and political revolution and riots in the late 1930s through which Jamaicans achieved universal adult suffrage (1944). Many who felt marginalized in society also felt excluded from the life of the traditional churches with their colonial* outlook and practice. In reaction to the highly Anglicized worship and leadership of the largely English-based churches, the poor and those without formal education left the mainline denominations to form their own groups, where they were free to express themselves, linguistically and liturgically. In the new movement, much emphasis was placed on holiness, the imminent return of the Savior, freedom to choose local leaders, and freedom to discipline adherents who were not meeting the moral requirements of the children of God.

Among the features of traditional churches that came under the wrathful condemnation of Pentecostals were the requirement of formal preparation for leadership of the churches, the preparation of sermons, the wearing of vestments, the baptism of infants, and the attendance at worship of those involved in informal marital relationships. As the movement became more established and accepted, most of these rigid requirements were relaxed. Pentecostal preachers now undergo formal training for ministry, wear clerical garb, and become involved in elective politics, and women are involved in the leadership of congregations and assemblies. Aversion to mainline denominations has become nominal and vice versa. Pentecostal churches are now a part of the ecumenical movement, and as a result of the 1990s Charismatic renewal, some features of worship and discipline in mainline churches parallel those in Pentecostal churches. ASHLEY A. SMITH

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in Latin America: Mexico. As of the early 21st c., Pentecostals and Charismatics constituted about 70% of the sizable membership (about 8–10 million) of Protestants (called “Evangelicals” in Latin America). In Mexico one can distinguish three kinds of Pentecostal/Charismatic churches, which successively originated in traditional Pentecostalism (1910s–1960s), independent Charismatic groups (“neo-Pentecostal,” 1970s–1980s), and neo-Charismatic indigenous groups (1990s).

Traditional Pentecostalism is characterized by baptism* in the Holy* Spirit, glossolalia* (the gift of speaking in tongues), and prayer healing*. It started in urban settings, then developed in rural and native communities, and now encompasses a great ethnic and social diversity. Although conversion in the Spirit represents a transformation of life, it has a very limited effect on believers’ social and political values and practices as members of society.

Traditional Pentecostalism in Mexico is represented primarily by the Apostolic Church of the Faith in Christ Jesus (1914, founded by Romana Carvajal de Valenzuela, in Chihuahua) and the Assemblies of God (1921, Ann Sanders in Mexico City), as well as by the Church of God of the Complete Gospel (1931), the Pentecostal Church of Holiness of Mexico (1932), the Quadrilateral Church (1943), and the Missionary Crusade of Avivamiento (known as “Centers of Faith, Hope, and Love,” 1949). Some Pentecostal churches had had Mexican leaders from the beginning, including MIEPI (Movimiento Iglesia Evangélica Pentecostés Independiente, founded by Valente Aponte) and the Interdenominational Christian Church “the Light of the World” (1926, Eusebio Joaquín), which expanded most rapidly because it addressed the common people’s concerns and needs and had a significant impact in impoverished sectors of society.

Independent Charismatic Movement (“Neo-Pentecostal”) often originated with renewal Charismatic groups (characterized by the experience of baptism* in the Spirit) within historic Protestant churches, and then split from these churches. The most representative communities of this movement are Castle of the King (1974, Monterrey), Christian Friendship (1972, Mexico City), New Wine (1974, Chihuahua), and Calacoaya (Mexico State, 1981). Although they retain most characteristics of traditional Pentecostalism, they can be distinguished by the fact that they do not build sanctuaries because they conduct their meetings in movie theaters; they identify themselves as “centers” or “communities” (rather than as churches) and consequently do not register with the government as official religious associations (with some exceptions). They are nondenominational, particularly focused on middle-class and upper-middle-class people.

The Neo-Charismatic Indigenous Movement is characterized by ecstatic or exotic ritual practices that emphasize liberation from demonic* powers, “spiritual war,” exorcism* (liberation from evil spirits), anointing, prophecies, and visions. In their worship services, spiritual experiences are described as “labor pains,” “vomiting,” “holy laughter,” “lion’s roar,” and “spiritual drunkenness.” They bring this spiritual warfare to all social classes, from higher-class people to marginalized people in urban settings.

JAVIER ULLOA and
REBECA MONTEMAYOR

Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements in North America. Pentecostalism in North America is estimated to have 30 million adherents. The addition starting in the 1960s of Charismatic churches that interpret “Pentecostal” experience from different church heritages has increased that number. Charles Fox Parham (c1900) first preached the Pentecostal experience of “Spirit baptism*” as empowerment for mission and as evidenced by speaking in tongues (Acts 2). Pentecostalism wished to restore to the church a “Pentecostal” or “apostolic” faith through Spirit baptism, divine healing* (and other spiritual gifts), and fervent expectation of Christ’s return. Inspired by the North American Holiness* Movement and a holistic African spirituality, William J. Seymour led the racially integrated Apostolic Faith Mission on Azusa* Street in Los Angeles (1906), the global 20th-c. movement’s birthplace, honing its ecumenical vision. Seymour’s paper, “The Apostolic Faith,” intended “to displace dead forms and creeds and wild fanaticisms with living, practical Christianity. ‘Love, faith, and unity’ are our watchwords.” Biblical literalism* became popular in support of biblical miracles* and prophecy*, but fundamentalists* were criticized for confining the extraordinary experiences of God depicted in the Bible to the ancient past.

Despite Seymour’s ecumenical vision, North American Pentecostalism soon became divided. Holiness* Pentecostals promoted an experience of “entire sanctification*” as necessary for Spirit baptism, in disagreement with “finished work” Pentecostals, who regarded the experience of Spirit baptism as following from faith in Christ’s completed work. Oneness Pentecostals separated from the nascent Assemblies* of God denomination (1916) in support of water baptism* in Jesus’ name and a “modalist*” understanding of the Trinity*. Doctrinal uniformity within respective camps was enforced through the formation of denominations. A racial division occurred early on, although black and white Pentecostals continued trying to structure interracial relations against the pressures of segregation. In 1994 the white Pentecostal Fellowship of North America became the Pentecostal-Charismatic Churches of North America in order to integrate racially. Pentecostalism in North America tended to wed otherworldly spirituality with a pragmatic confidence in this-worldly success (a feature of North American culture). White groups achieved this success much sooner than Latino/a and African American groups, with the latter maintaining more capacity over time to wed spiritual with critical social discernment. Though some Pentecostals seek to change existing social structures, the tendency is to exemplify the social significance of the gospel and meet human needs through alternative, spiritually gifted communities and missions.

The future challenge will consist of moving Seymour’s ecumenical vision forward with a liberating social concern in a movement that is shifting from an apocalyptic* eschatology* among the urban poor to a comfortable faith among those of the middle class.

FRANK D. MACCHIA

Charisms, of Religious Orders. See CHARISMA, CHARISM.

Charity (Lat caritas), love*, primarily for God but also for fellow human beings, called the greatest of the “theological* virtues” (1 Cor 13); care for the poor.

Charlemagne, or Charles the Great (c747–814), king of the Franks (from 768) and “emperor of the Romans” (from 800), son of King Pippin III (714–68). In 768 the Frankish kingdom was divided between Charles and his brother, Carloman, leading to a power struggle that ended with Carloman's death (771). Now sole ruler of the Franks, Charles led extensive military campaigns on the Italian peninsula and consolidated his father's ties with the papacy. He then strove to expand the southern and eastern territories of his kingdom. On Christmas Day, 800, Pope Leo III crowned him "emperor of the Romans" at Saint Peter's Church in Rome. Although Charlemagne's involvement in planning the coronation is disputed, there is little doubt that subsequent years would see him increasingly assuming the role of head of Western Christianity, adapting his policies along this ideological line. In 813 he crowned as co-emperor his only surviving son, Louis, who succeeded him.

Charlemagne's ecclesiastical policy was initially a continuation of that of his father, Pippin III, who had assumed the leadership of the Frankish Church and actively cultivated a state ideology representing the Franks as God's chosen people and their ruler as God's representative on earth. At first Charles was content with promoting ecclesiastical reform, the homogenization of canon* law, liturgy*, and monastic* life, and a general resurgence of scholarship and learning (Admonitio generalis, 789; see Alcuin; Carolingian Renaissance). Later he assumed a more active role following the rise of Adoptionism (a new form of Adoptionism*, which was advocated in Spain and France in the 8th c. and which Charles viewed as heresy*) and other crises in the kingdom. Charles dictated Christian dogma and assumed the position of "king-preacher" at the head of the Frankish Church (Council of Frankfurt, 794). Lobbying by influential thinkers after his coronation as emperor strengthened his resolve to create a society based on Christian principles of justice, leadership, and individual morals.

His subsequent failure to reorganize public life according to Christian morals sobered his spirit and tempered his way of governing during the final decade of his life. Nevertheless, it soon became evident that he had succeeded in paving the way for an extensive ecclesiastical reform set in motion shortly after his death. Louis* (the Pious) benefited from his father's efforts to create a unified Frankish Church and to provide opportunities for talented individuals to take up influential roles in its institutions. Subsequent power struggles between the new emperor and the Frankish Episcopate would, however, prevent the reforms from being implemented to their intended extent. STEVEN VANDERPUTTEN

Charles V (1500–58), holy* Roman emperor (1529–58), king of Spain, ruler of the Low Countries, Naples and Sicily, and Spanish America. Educated in the tradition of the Devotio* Moderna, he was committed to the Catholic faith. Despite his hostility toward Luther*, he needed the troops of the Protestant princes to pursue his policies in Italy, suppress the Peasants' Revolt in Germany, and defend Eastern Europe against the Turks. He defeated the Schmalkaldic League (1547–48) and imposed Catholic uniformity with the Interims* (1548). But soon weakened, he gave rights to Lutheran princes in the Peace of Augsburg* (1555). After abdicating, he died in a Spanish monastery.

Charles Martel (688–741), son of Pippin* of Héristal, father of Pippin* the Short, grandfather of Charlemagne*, "mayor of the palace" of the French kings. He was known for his victory over the Moors (722) at Tours or Poitiers, though they were not expelled from France for several more generations.

Chastity, sexual purity, including both celibacy* and fidelity in marriage*.

Chasuble (from Lat casula, sleeveless outer garment), celebrant's liturgical vestment worn over the alb* and stole* at the Eucharist*.

Chateaubriand, René-Auguste de (1768–1848), French romantic and diplomat. A Breton noble, Chateaubriand was deeply influenced by the French Revolution, spending 1793–1800 in exile in England, where he returned to Roman Catholicism. He published Atala (1801), an exotic tale set in North America, about the tragic love between two "Indians," Chactas, a "pagan," and Atala, a Christian. The tale includes the description of a small agrarian Christian "Indian" utopia led by the Christ-like Fr. Aubry, who illustrates the gospel's "civilizing" force. Le Génie du christianisme (The genius of Christianity, 1802) is an original apology responding to the aftermath of the Enlightenment* and French Revolution. (The publication coincided with the agreement between Napoleon and Pope Pius VII reinstituting Roman Catholicism in France.) Le Génie is largely an aesthetic defense of the beauties of Christianity: the mysteries* of the sacraments*; Christian poetics, moral laws, scriptural truths, and Christ's teaching; the harmonies of nature; and Christian ruins. Printed in an appendix to Le Génie, the tale René recounts the protagonist's uncontrolled passion, alienation, and estrangement from European society and his attachment to Chactas (the character in Atala), by now a wise old "Indian."

Having become the leading voice of early French romanticism, Chateaubriand then wrote Les Martyrs ou le triomphe de la religion chrétienne (The martyrs, or The triumph of the Christian religion), an 1809 prose epic about the persecution* of Christians under Diocletian. Two Greeks, the Christian convert Eudorus and Cymodocea, a pagan who eventually converts because of her love for Eudorus, eventually find martyrdom in Rome in the arena where Constantine later proclaims Christianity the official religion of the Roman Empire. Chateaubriand's Vie de Rancé (The life of Rancé, 1844) is a biography of the abbot who reformed the Cistercian* order at La Trappe under a rule of austerity.

PATRICIA A. WARD

Chaucer, Geoffrey (1343?–1400). Living in late medieval England at a time when Christian faith and the daily, even life-structuring prominence of the Christian Church was inevitable, Chaucer's relationship to Christianity was profound and rich. One of his earliest poems, "An ABC," is an alphabetical hymn to the Blessed Virgin. His Canterbury Tales includes several important religious tales: the "Clerk's Tale" of patient Griselda; the "Second Nun's Tale," a saint's life of Saint Cecilia; the "Prioress's Tale," a miracle of the Virgin; the "Man of Law's Tale" of God's protection of innocent, prayerful Custance in foreign lands among hostile "pagans." Interestingly, all of these are written in the seven-line rhyme royal stanza rather than the rhyming couplets of the majority of the tales. The "Parson's Tale," which concludes the collection, is actually a prose handbook on penance*, taxonomizing the seven deadly* sins and their "remedies."

Many of the nonreligious stories recounted in Canterbury Tales, even the comic, sexually charged fabliaux (e.g. "Merchant's Tale," "Summoner's Tale," "Reeve's Tale," "Miller's Tale") are filled with biblical allusions, some playful, some serious, and many arguably either. Chaucer's knowledge of the Bible is a matter of dispute. Many scholars argued that he had firsthand knowledge of it in an age when that would be relatively rare, while others have suggested that his biblical material came from secondhand sources like sermons. He was clearly interested in biblical commentary and patristic writings – e.g. Jerome's* Contra Jovinianum featured prominently in the "Wife of Bath's Prologue" – and was sufficiently familiar with the exegetical tradition to allude to it, often in startling ways, e.g. in the "Merchant's Tale."

He was both keenly aware of contemporary controversies and anticlerical satire, notably in the portraits of the Pardoner, Friar, Prioress, Summoner, and Monk of the "General Prologue," but he portrayed his village Parson as a thoroughly idealized figure. His most pointed anticlerical satire is concentrated in the "Pardoner's Prologue," in which he shamelessly reveals his frauds; the "Friar's Tale," about a corrupt archdeacon and summoner; and the astonishingly scatological "Summoner's Tale," which reveals the hypocrisy of begging friars.

A number of Chaucer's associates apparently had Lollard* sympathies. Chaucer's own position is impossible to settle, but he was intensely interested in such philosophical issues as predestination* and free will*; he translated Boethius's* Consolation of Philosophy and drew on it seriously in Troilus and Criseyde and the "Knight's Tale," and comically in the "Nun's Priest's Tale."

JOHN PLUMMER

Children. The term "children" has two general meanings in Christianity. Figuratively, Scripture and Christian tradition identify those young in faith as children adopted into the Christian family as daughters and sons of God. "Children" also refers literally to those persons who have yet to assume full responsibility and authority within and for their own life and for whom other adults remain accountable, with the age of childhood and adulthood varying in different historical periods. Christianity has held children in special, if not unique, respect in theory, although not always in practice. Children are given an honored place as heralds of God's reign and participants in the faith, but children also had to submit to the arbitrary power and punishments of adults acting on the church's behalf.

Various traditions have emphasized combinations of the following three constructions of children:

1. Depraved. Early theologians, e.g. Augustine*, and Reformation theologians, e.g. Martin Luther*, saw childhood as a vital moral and religious developmental phase. Children enter the world bearing the marks of "original* sin," an affliction associated with pride, self, and, above all, will. A primary parental task is to suppress and control a child's natural depravity through weekly catechism*, daily prayer and Scripture reading, repeated admonitions, and sometimes intense reprimand.

2. Innocent. Under the influence of the Enlightenment* and theologians such as Schleiermacher* and Bushnell*, many Christians began to view children as inherently social and affectionate, not sinful, and as morally pure or neutral, even “sacred.” A child might still be seen as having been born spiritually and morally disabled, but parental devotion offers salvific remedy. A primary parental task is to nurture a child’s openness, receptivity, and intuitive proclivities toward faith.
3. Gift. The view of children as a gift appears dramatically in scriptural traditions in which Jesus welcomes children (e.g. Mark 9:33–37, 10:13–16); had precedent in the Jewish tradition, where the status of children was different from that of children in the surrounding Greco-Roman world; and reappeared in theologians like John Calvin*, who underscored children as God’s special blessing. They are the promise, sign, and guarantee of the covenant* and also participants in it, qualifying as disciples and exemplifying God’s reign. Parents are commanded to teach the love of God steadfastly and diligently (Deut 6:2, 7). Caring for children, among the least, is a sign of greatness (Mark 9:35).

Christianity in the 21st c. faces radical challenges with respect to children. Christian understandings no longer fit, yet new controlling images suggested by politics, psychology, and the market are inadequate and sometimes outright destructive. Children number disproportionately among the world’s poor and are especially susceptible to exploitation and abuse. Christianity has an important role to play both in caring for children and in refashioning a better understanding of children.

BONNIE J. MILLER-MCLEMORE

Children of God. In the Bible, “children of God,” like “son[s] of God,” connotes a spiritual relationship to God, as well as a moral relationship: God’s children have responsibilities toward others, a vocation*, as Jesus did. The people of Israel were sometimes called collectively “children of God” (Deut 14:1); the only individual called a “son of God” was the king (2 Sam 7:14; Ps 2:7, 89:26–27). In the Gospels, Jesus is called “Son* of God” (e.g. Matt 3:17; Mark 9:7; Luke 3:21–22; John 1:31–34) and calls God “Abba*,” or “Father” (Mark 14:36). He also addresses his followers as children of God (Matt 5:9; Luke 20:36) and in the Lord’s* Prayer invites them to address God as “Abba.” Paul* regards human beings as children of God not by nature but by adoption* through Christ and the Holy* Spirit (Rom 8:14–23; Gal 3:26, 4:5). Consequently, Christians addressed each other as brothers and sisters – a status that included slaves who were Christians (Phlm 16). In subsequent history, Christians repeatedly attempted to manifest this basic equality, e.g. insisting that all receive the Eucharist* regardless of worldly status.

Chile is a Roman Catholic country with a major Protestant presence; it is one of the countries in Latin America with the largest percentage of Protestants.

16th–18th Centuries. In Chile, colonial and Roman Catholic histories are interconnected. The Spanish Conquest was the beginning of Catholic mission. Indigenous peoples saw their polytheistic practices and beliefs confronted by the religion of Jesus and of its vicar on earth, the pope. From the beginning, the Catholic Church developed through intense missionary activity among the natives, who were viewed as “pagans” and “idolaters.” This Catholic Church was formally Christian, although it was an indigenous and mestizo* syncretism*, or an inculturated* Christianity, that often barely hid the survival of ancient beliefs.

South of the Bio Bio River (south of Talcahuano), the Mapuche nation (“people of the land,” called Araucanos by the Spaniards) resisted both conquest (through the Araucanian War) and Christian mission until the late 19th c.

During the colonial period, Mercedarian, Franciscan*, Dominican*, Augustinian*, and Jesuit* missionaries settled in the recently founded cities, building hermitages, churches, schools, clinics, and hospitals, which were quite influential in colonial life. Processions, religious festivals, and high Masses marked the colonial life of Spaniards, natives, and mestizos.

The resulting colonial Christendom* had many mestizos and syncretistic characteristics. “Popular Catholicism” emphasized worship and various kinds of devotion to the Virgin Mary*, still celebrated today. The figure of Mary as the protector of mestizos* is at the center of large pilgrimages; she is designated by different names, ranging from the Virgin of Tirana (in the north) to the Virgin of Candelaria in the island of Chiloé (in the south).

Chile's Independence, 19th Century. The period of independence divided the Christian Church. Diocesan priests participated in the first governmental junta (1810), but a majority of the Church members remained on the side of the Spanish crown. Patriotic priests were chaplains during the diverse military campaigns against the Spaniards.

The initial constitution established Catholicism as the state religion. The Patronato* system, transferred to the president of the Republic, caused innumerable problems regarding the relations among the Chilean state, the local church, and the Holy See (Rome), e.g. each time a new bishop was named.

After 1833 growing clashes between church and state led to a reaction among ultraconservative Catholics against liberalism. In the late 19th c., laicization* and even anticlericalism became stronger in Chile, as did a more active Freemasonry*. The progressively larger gap between church and state led to the creation of a Catholic conservative party seeking to defend the interests of the Catholic Church against the state. The Catholic educational system was strengthened through the work of various congregations* and the foundation of the Catholic University (1889).

20th Century. The Constitution of 1925 finally resolved the rift between church and state. It put an end to the Patronato* system and established the Roman Catholic Church as an autonomous structure.

During this period, apostolic work was developed, in part as a reaction against the socialist and anarcho-sindicalist views that reigned among factory workers and peasants. Meanwhile this Catholic conservatism was confronted by a Christian social current. The split between conservative and social-minded Catholics still characterizes the Chilean Catholic Church.

Father Alberto Hurtado, SJ (1901–52), recently canonized as a Chilean saint, typifies this social Catholicism. In the 1940s, together with others, he led a movement that brought about the creation of workers' unions, charitable organizations, and even progressive magazines. Such initiatives in support of workers and peasants led to projects of agrarian reform in the Church's landholdings, as a forerunner of even broader changes.

The Church's social service trained many lay leaders who, in turn, founded the Christian Democratic Party (1957), which became the governing party with Eduardo Frei Montalva (1964). The Chilean Catholic Church had international influence, especially through Bishop Manuel Larraín's important role in founding CELAM* (Latin American Episcopal Conference, 1955) and at the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65).

In the 1960s, the renewal prompted by the Latin American Episcopal Conference in Medellín* (1968) advocated Base* Ecclesial Communities (CEBs*) as a church model, incarnated* spirituality, and ecclesial work in poor neighborhoods. Against conservative Catholicism, still present, groups of Christians for Socialism developed during Salvador Allende's popular government (1970–73).

Christianity, Military State, and Democratization. Set against the military coup (1973), the Catholic Church headed by Cardinal Silva Henríquez defended human* rights. An ecumenical Committee for Peace was created; a majority of Christians acted in solidarity with those in need, including those pursued by the military state. Yet a significant number of Catholics and Protestants blessed Pinochet's crusade against "atheistic Marxism*." The "Popular Church" resisted the military state (1973–1989), developing CEBs with "a preferential* option for the poor."

With the return of democracy (late 1980s–1990s), many Christian leaders played a role in the democratic governments; the influence of CEBs was weakened, while apostolic spirituality and the Catholic Charismatic Movement developed. A wind of restoration blew within the Catholic Church, and the ecclesiastic discourse became dominated by moral values (divorce, abortion, etc.), generating conflict with the democratic governments (1990s to the early 21st c.).

Protestant Churches and Religious Pluralism. While public worship other than Catholicism was legally prohibited, political pragmatism led to the authorization of Protestant worship in private precincts when British, North Americans, and Germans arrived in the 19th c. The arrival of the US missionary David Trumbull (1845) was a turning point, followed by the arrival of Methodists (1878).

The most important Pentecostal churches of the country originated under the leadership of Pastor Hoover in Valparaíso (1909), who founded the first Methodist Pentecostal Church of Chile. Internal conflicts and disputes led to the multiplication of churches, now numbering several hundred. These Pentecostal denominations rapidly expanded in impoverished lower-class and middle-class neighborhoods, became national churches, and even sent missionaries to various nearby countries. Some neo-Pentecostal/neo-Charismatic* churches developed, influenced by foreign churches (since the 1970s) (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster: In Latin America: Chile).

Historic Protestant churches (Lutheran, Anglican, Presbyterian, Baptist), although significant, constitute a minority; their members generally belong to families descended from immigrants. The Pentecostal/Charismatic churches, by contrast, are an integral part of the Chilean socioreligious panorama.

Formal legal equity among the churches was finally established in 1999 by a law that affirmed the religious diversity of Chilean society.

Statistics: Population (2002): 15.1 million. Christians, 87.9% (Roman Catholics, 70%; Pentecostals/Charismatic/sEvangelicals, 15%; marginal Christians, 1.9%; historic Protestants, 1%); nonreligious, 8.3%; native religionists, 2%; adherents of other religions (Jews, Muslims, etc.), 1.8%. (Source: 2002 census.)

CRISTIÁN G. PARKER

Chiliasm (from Gk chilias, “a thousand”), an alternative term for Millennialism*.

China. The history of Christianity in China is a history of encounter and dialogue with Chinese society and its age-old cultural tradition. For most Chinese, Christianity is a religion from the Western world that is still undergoing a process of accommodation to Chinese society and inculturation*.

Christianity was introduced in China in 635 when a Christian monk named Alopen arrived in Changan (modern Xian), the capital of the Chinese Tang dynasty (618–907). Alopen was welcomed as a Persian missionary from “Da Qin,” a term for the Mediterranean area at that time, and his religion was understood to be “Jing Jiao” (the Luminous Religion) by the Tang Chinese. Actually, Alopen was the first Assyrian* missionary (often inappropriately called Nestorian*; see Church of the East, or Assyrian Church) in China, as told in the inscription of “Da Qin Jingjiao Liuxing Zhongguo Bei” (stele of the propagation of the Luminous Religion of Da Qin in China, discovered in the early 17th c.). With the support of the emperors Tai Zong and Gao Zong, Syriac* Christianity developed smoothly. It is said on the stele that “the religion spread throughout the ten provinces...monasteries abound in a hundred cities.” But during the reign of the empress Wu (690–705), Christianity was attacked by Buddhists* and Daoists*. With the accession of the emperor Xuan Zong (712), Christianity was once again tolerated and continued to develop. During the Tang dynasty, Christianity established communities in Xian, Zhouzhi, Luoyang, Lingwu, Chengdu, Dunhuang, Guangzhou, and other areas. But in 845, the emperor Wu Zong issued an edict forbidding Buddhism and all other foreign religions, such as Manichaeism* and Syriac Christianity. As a result, Syriac Christianity disappeared totally from the Tang Empire, ending the first Christian mission in China.

The second introduction of Christianity into China took place during the Yuan dynasty (1271–1368). It was called yelikewen (transliteration of the Mongol word erke'un), which included in that period both the Church* of the East (commonly known as “Nestorian*”) and the Roman Catholic Church. Assyrian Christians had survived in the border areas of China after the persecution of 845 and flourished among the Uighur, Naiman, and Ongut peoples. In the 11th c., the Keraites were also converted to Assyrian Christianity. Sorhahtani, mother of Khubilai (the founder of the Yuan dynasty), was a Kerait woman who believed in the teaching of the Assyrian* Church. On her death (1252), Khubilai ordered that a Mass be said for her in a Church of the East monastery in Ganzhou (Gansu Province). Assyrian Christians among these peoples moved into the northern parts of China during the Western Liao (1125–1201) and the Jin (1115–1234) dynasties. As early as 1235, there was an (Assyrian) Church of the East in Khanbaliq (the Mongol name for Beijing). Soon after, a Church of the East metropolitan bishop resided in the city. In 1289 Khubilai set up the Chongfu Si, an administrative office for Church of the East Christian affairs. During 1289–1320, there were 72 Church of the East Christian monasteries in China. Mar Sargis, a Church of the East Christian doctor from Samarkand, who was appointed governor of Zhenjiang District in South China by Khubilai in 1277, established 7 monasteries, including 6 in Zhenjiang and 1 in Hangzhou. In 1330 the archbishop of Soltau claimed that there were more than 30,000 Church of the East Christians in China.

During the Yuan dynasty (1271–1368), Catholic missionaries came to China for the first time. In 1245 the Franciscan missionary John of Plano Campini (1182–1252) was sent by Pope Innocent IV to the Mongol court of the Great Khan Kuyuk in the pre-Yuan capital of Qaraqorum (Helin). In 1253 William of Rubruck (1215–57?) also visited the court of the Great Khan Mangu at Qaraqorum. In 1260 Maffeo and Niccolò Polo made a journey to China proper and brought back a letter from Khubilai Khan asking the pope to send to China 100 missionaries well trained in science, the arts, and doctrine. In 1271 the Polos, including Niccolò's son Marco, came to China again. They were accompanied by two Dominicans with papal letters to Khubilai. But the Dominicans turned back; only the Polos arrived in China. In 1289 Pope Nicholas IV sent John of Montecorvino (1247–1328), a Franciscan, to China. When he arrived in Khanbaliq (the Yuan capital) in 1294, he was welcomed by the new emperor, Timur. John converted the Alans (a people from the shores of the Black Sea) and the Church of the East Christian Prince George (Kerguz). He built his first church in Khanbaliq (1299) and soon (1305) a second church with the help of a German brother, Arnold of Cologne. He baptized 40 boys, taught them Latin, and trained them to form a choir for Mass. In 1307 Pope Clement V appointed John of Montecorvino as archbishop of Khanbaliq and patriarch of the East, and nominated seven Franciscans as bishops in China. Three of them, Gerald, Peregrine of Castello, and Andrew of Perugia, arrived in China in 1308. They remained in the capital for five years and received alafa (alms) from the emperor. Starting in 1314, they went to Zaitun (Quanzhou) and became bishops there in succession (Gerald died in 1318, Peregrine died in 1322, and Andrew served as bishop from 1322 until c1330). After the death of John of Montecorvino (1328), the Alans sent a mission to Rome requesting a new bishop. John of Marignolli arrived in China (1342) as the envoy of Pope Benedict XII, bringing a “supernatural horse” as a gift from the pope to the emperor. But he left China in 1346 without assuming his role as bishop, so there had been no bishop at all in Khanbaliq since 1328. In 1362, the last bishop of Zaitun, Friar James of Florence, was killed and the Catholic Church there was also destroyed.

There were conflicts between Church of the East Christians and Roman Catholics during the Yuan dynasty. The number of Catholics during that time was approximately 30,000, but the majority of them were not Han Chinese. The Yuan Christians established their communities in Khanbaliq (Beijing), Zaitun (Quanzhou), Ganzhou (near modern Zhangye), Ningxia, Xining, Yongchang (Liangzhou), Suzhou (near modern Jiuquan), Shazhou (near modern Dunhuang), Huozhou (Gaochang), Jingzhou (in Inner Mongolia), Datong, Hejian, Daming Lu (Hebei), Dongping Lu (Shandong), Yangzhou, Zhenjiang, Hangzhou, Wenzhou, Yachi (Kunming), and other areas. In 1368 the Yuan dynasty was overthrown and all Christians in Khanbaliq were expelled. Christianity disappeared from China for the second time.

The Jesuit* approach to China was initiated by Francis Xavier* (1506–52), who came to Shangchuan Island for the first time in 1551 and returned there in 1552 until his death on December 3, 1552. Although he never set foot on the Chinese mainland, he provided important insights regarding what the forthcoming Jesuit mission in China could be. A significant breakthrough came in 1583, when Michele Ruggieri (1543–1607) and Matteo Ricci* (1552–1610) obtained permission for a permanent stay on the Chinese mainland and established their residence in Zhaoqing. They shaved off their hair and beards and dressed like “Western Buddhist monks” because they imagined the influence of Buddhism to be so strong in China. When they discovered their mistake, they allowed their hair and beards to grow again and donned silk robes like “Confucian literati” in recognition of the predominant position of Confucianism* in Chinese culture. After staying in Zhaoqing, Ricci undertook missionary activities in other places, such as Shaozhou, Guangdong, Nanchang, and Nanjing, and even made a brief visit to Beijing (1598). Together with Didaco de Pantoja (1571–1618), Ricci arrived in Beijing again in 1601, bringing many gifts to the Wanli emperor of the Ming dynasty (1368–1644). The two men were allowed to reside in Beijing. Ricci studied Chinese culture and translated into Latin the Four Books of Confucianism (The Confucian Analects, The Book of Mencius, The Great Learning, and The Doctrine of the Mean). Meanwhile, he also introduced Western knowledge to China and translated many Western books of philosophy, religion, science, and technology into Chinese. Under Ricci's influence, many renowned Chinese intellectuals converted to Christianity; among these, Xu Guangqi (1562–1633), Li Zhicao (1569–1630), and Yang Tingyun (1557–1627) became the “three pillars of the early Catholic Church.” Xu Guangqi invited Lazarus Cattaneo (1560–1640) to Shanghai to establish the Catholic Church there (1608). Later, Xu built another church on his estate at Xujiahui (Zicawei) in Shanghai.

The success of Ricci encouraged more and more Jesuits to come to China, such as Lazarus Cattaneo (arrived in 1594), Nicolo Longobardo (1565–1655, arrived in 1597), Sabbatino de Ursis (1575–1620, arrived in 1606), Nicolas Trigault (1577–1628, arrived in 1610), and Giulio Aleni (1582–1649, arrived in 1613). Trigault returned to Europe and came back to China in 1618 together with 22 Jesuits, including Francisus Furtado (1587–1653) and Johann Adam Schall von Bell (1592–1666). In 1597 the Jesuit province in China was established and headed by Ricci. After his death (1610), Longobardo was his successor. But Longobardo disagreed with Ricci's policy of adaptation to Chinese culture, especially the use of ancient Chinese terms for the name of God (see God, Christian Views of, Cluster: Names for God in the Bible and Church Tradition). In 1627 the Jesuits convened a conference in Jiading to discuss their differences.

Following the Jesuits, the Dominicans, Franciscans, and Augustinians began their own missionary efforts in China. Gaspar da Cruz, OP (?–1570), reached Canton in 1556 and stayed there for a short time. In 1575 Martin Rada, OSA (1533–78), visited Fujian and remained for a few months. The Spanish Dominicans entered Taiwan from the Philippines and established their first church in Jilong (1626). The first Dominican to arrive in Fujian (1631) by way of Taiwan was Angelo Cocchi (1597–1633). Juan Bautista de Morales (1597–1644) and Antonio de Santa Maria Caballero, OFM (1602–69), came to the Chinese mainland (1633), followed by Francisco Diaz (1606–46) in 1634. Luo Wenzao (Gregorio López, 1616–91), who was baptized by Spanish Franciscan Caballero in 1633, entered the Dominican order and was ordained a priest in Manila (1654). Luo was nominated as the first Chinese Catholic bishop by Pope Clement X (1673) and consecrated as bishop of Nanjing (1685). He ordained three Chinese priests in 1688. Before them, Zheng Weixin (Manoel de Sequeira, 1633–73) was ordained as the first Chinese Jesuit priest in Europe (1664).

Christian mission also met suspicion and hostility in China. Shen Que, vice president of the Nanjing Board of Rites, wrote memorials three times to the emperor denouncing the Jesuits. After a reply from Beijing (1617), he launched attacks against Christians. The persecution stopped when he was promoted to Beijing. Shen Que was one of the authors of an anti-Christian writing entitled Poxie ji (An anthology of writings exposing heterodoxy), edited by Xu Changzhi (1639). At the beginning of the Qing dynasty (1644–1911), Johann Adam Schall von Bell and other Jesuits were tolerated and allowed to stay in Beijing. Schall was appointed director of the Astronomical Bureau and had a good relationship with the emperor Shunzhi. But after the death of Shunzhi (1661), Schall was frequently attacked by Yang Guangxian (1597–1669) and finally imprisoned in 1664. With the assumption of supreme power by the emperor Kangxi, the Jesuit Ferdinand Verbiest (1623–88) was appointed director of the Astronomical Bureau, and Yang Guangxian was sent into exile. Kangxi had developed a friendship with Verbiest and other Jesuits and, at the very beginning, showed sympathy for their Christian beliefs. But the Chinese* rites controversy eventually destroyed this friendship and sympathy. As a result, Kangxi banned Christian mission in China.

The Dominican Juan Bautista de Morales made 17 accusations against the Jesuits and attacked the principle of accommodation with the Chinese rites (1643). Charles Maigrot (1655–1730), from the Society of Foreign Missions of Paris, promulgated an order to forbid Chinese Christians to honor Confucius and ancestors* (1693). Charles de Tournon, the apostolic visitor in East Asia sent by Pope Clement XI, issued his “Decree of Nanjing” (1707), after he had an audience with Kangxi (1705). The papal bull Ex Illa Die (1715) confirmed the Decree of Nanjing (later Benedict XIV prohibited these rites in the bull Ex Quo Singulari, 1742). Consequently Kangxi issued his edict to ban Christianity completely in China (1721). Some Jesuit missionaries were allowed to stay in Beijing, but only as advisers on science, the arts, or other cultural work. Nevertheless, the Catholic Church remained in existence in China with about 300,000 members during this period (see Mission Cluster: In Asia: Catholic Mission in China, 16th–18th Centuries).

The Russian Orthodox Church had established a mission in China in 1671. The earliest Orthodox Church in Beijing was set up shortly after 1686. From 1715 to 1956, the Russian Orthodox Church sent a mission 20 times to Beijing.

In 1627 the first group of Protestant missionaries from the Dutch Reformed Church arrived in Taiwan. In 1807 Robert Morrison (1782–1834), the first Protestant missionary from England, arrived in Macao and then in Canton, symbolizing the beginning of Protestant mission on the Chinese mainland. In cooperation with William Milne (1785–1822), Morrison translated the Bible into Chinese (1819). As a result of their missionary activities, Cai Gao was the first mainland Chinese to be baptized into the Protestant Church in Macao (1814), and Liang Fa (1789–1855), baptized in 1816, became the first ordained Chinese evangelist (1824). Liang Fa organized the first Chinese Protestant Church and distributed the Chinese Bible and his tract Quan Shi Liang Yan (Good words to admonish the age), which deeply influenced Hong Xiuquan, the leader of the Taiping Rebellion (1851–64).

After the Opium Wars (beginning in 1840) and the resulting “Unequal Treaties,” China was forced to open its borders, and Western Christian missionaries of various denominations swarmed into China and established their churches or missionary stations in many places. The connection of modern Christian mission in China with Western powers aroused popular hostility and resistance among many Chinese, expressed for instance in “missionary cases” and the Boxer Uprising. In this context, the missionaries paid at least some attention to social concerns in China and organized Christian social work in education, publications, relief, and medical care. Chinese Christians developed “self” consciousness and independence and founded their own indigenous churches in this process. The first independent Chinese church was the East Guangdong Zhaoqing China Evangelization Society organized by Chen Mengnan (1873). Yu Guozhen (1852–1932) established the Chinese Jesus Independent Church in Shanghai (1906). With this development, the “Three-Self” Movement following the principle of self-government, self-support, and self-propagation was put forward in the “Declaration of Churches” by the General Conference of Chinese Protestant Churches in Shanghai (May 1922).

In 1949 there were about 2.7 million Catholics, 700,000 Protestants, and 300,000 Orthodox Christians in China. In 1950 the Three*-Self Patriotic Movement” in Chinese churches formally emerged. In 1954 the Three-Self Patriotic Movement Committee of the Protestant Churches of China was founded. In 1957 the Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association was established, and since then, the Chinese Catholic Church has instituted self-election and self-consecration of its bishops and other priests. Because the number of Protestant churches and their members had declined, in 1958 they united, ushering in a period of “postdenominational development” (see Chinese Contemporary Independent and House Churches).

All church activities were forbidden during the Cultural Revolution (1966–76) in China. Since 1977, however, the Chinese churches have been restored as a result of China’s reform and opening to the outside world. In 1980 the China Christian Council and the Chinese Catholic Bishops’ College were established. In 2000, according to official estimates, the Chinese Catholic Church had 5 million members, about 4,000 clergy, 70 bishops, and more than 4,600 churches and meetinghouses (see Roman Catholicism Cluster: In Asia: China). Chinese Protestantism had about 15 million members, more than 18,000 clergy, more than 12,000 churches, and 25,000 meeting places (see Chinese Contemporary Independent and House Churches; Protestantism Cluster: In Asia: China; Roman Catholicism Cluster: In Asia: China).

ZHUO XINPING

Chinese Contemporary Independent and House Churches. Chinese independent and unregistered Christian communities, often called “house* churches” by both Chinese and foreign commentators, have grown rapidly and have drawn considerable attention since the early 1980s. Although Catholic house churches do exist, the great majority of these communities are Protestant. They began in the 1950s, developed further during the chaotic decade of the Cultural Revolution (1966–76), and accelerated their growth starting in the 1980s. There may be as many as a few hundred thousand such autonomous Christian communities, with the number of adherents ranging from 30 million to more than 100 million, according to the estimates. A realistic estimate is 50–55 million Protestant believers in unregistered churches in 2000, a number about three times the 16–18 million officially claimed in the registered churches. Both personal factors and issues of church–state relations account for the large size of this independent sector of the Chinese Christian Church.

Historical Development. During the first half of the 20th c., a few Protestant movements arose that were entirely independent of the established foreign missions and their churches. These included the True Jesus Church, the Jesus Family, and the Little Flock. These constituted perhaps 20–25% of the Protestant community (less than 1 million) at the founding of the People's Republic of China (1949). Thus there was some tradition of autonomy and localized independence in parts of the Protestant community.

The events of the 1950s were not easy for Chinese Christians. They were subjected to a series of stressful campaigns. The remaining foreign missionaries were expelled, and Christians were put under an elaborate system of monitoring and control centered in the newly created Chinese Christian Three*-Self Patriotic Movement. Made up of Communist Party-approved Christians, it was in turn managed by a state agency, the Religious Affairs Bureau, part of the government and party bureaucracy. In the early 1950s (perhaps as early as 1952 or 1953), some Christians began to avoid the publicly visible church and to meet in homes, but the number was not large. Later in the 1950s, pressure was put on churches to consolidate and close the remaining sparsely used church buildings. Then in 1957–58, the “anti-rightist campaign” sent many Protestants to labor camps; the intensity of the subsequent disastrous Great Leap Forward and the closing of most remaining churches resulted in a significant number of believers forming small unobtrusive home groups.

When the Cultural Revolution was launched by Mao Zedong (1966), all places of worship (of any religion) were closed, and the Religious Affairs Bureau itself was abolished. As a result, more believers attended house churches. The near paralysis of party and state structures until the late 1970s created a climate ideal for evangelization, and many new believers were added to these autonomous communities. By 1978, when churches began to be reopened for the first time in 12 years, there were almost certainly more Protestant believers than there had been in 1949, perhaps as many as 2–3 million.

Between late 1978 and 1980, the party leadership made a strategic decision to reestablish the monitoring system for Protestants that had been used in the 1950s. However, many groups of Christians had become accustomed to an essentially independent existence during the previous decade, and their leaders did not all welcome being under the scrutiny of officialdom. Moreover, when the numerous victims of the late 1950s anti-rightist campaign were released after completing their 20-year prison terms, many of the Protestants among them had little desire to have a close affiliation with the state. Finally, not only was the Three-Self Patriotic Movement reestablished, but some of the same leaders, those who in the eyes of many had collaborated with the atheistic Communist Party and had betrayed fellow Christians, were returned to leadership positions.

For all these reasons, from the start, even with the formation of a new China Christian Council (1980) designed to be more user-friendly for Protestants, large segments of the house church community were suspicious of and stayed at arm's length from the Three-Self Patriotic Movement. The key issue was registration of the congregation. As church buildings were reopened and new ones built, these obviously visible structures were the gathering places for diverse congregations, including former house churches and newly registered congregations made up largely of new converts and led by pastors who were authorized to hold office by the Religious Affairs Bureau. This registration brought with it a fairly dependable guarantee that the congregation would not be harassed by the Public Security Bureau or other arms of the government. It also facilitated access to the Protestant seminaries, which had begun being reestablished in the 1980s.

Yet many house church groups discounted the advantages of registration and affiliation with the Three-Self Patriotic Movement, seeing instead the dangers of being subjected to interference in their preaching or other activities, and especially their habits of enthusiastic evangelism, which they feared would be curtailed by the control system, which, after all, was still predicated on the assumption that religion was a retrograde social phenomenon that would become extinct someday. So although some house churches registered, many did not, and that division of the Protestants into two large sectors, registered and nonregistered, has persisted since the early 1980s, although it has grown more complex in recent years. During that time, both the Three-Self Patriotic Movement-led churches and the unregistered ones have grown rapidly, the former increasing more than 5-fold to something greater than 15 million members, and the latter well over 10-fold to the present number of probably more than 50 million members.

Distinctive Characteristics: Evangelical, Fundamentalist, and Pentecostal/Charismatic. Christian congregations in China do not have an extremely wide range of doctrinal beliefs. The vast majority of Protestants adhere to what can reasonably be called an evangelical faith* (see Evangelicals/Evangelicalism Cluster: Evangelical Theologies), including a stress on individual salvation*, the central role of Scripture*, the divinity and atonement* of Jesus, justification* by faith, and so forth. Registered and unregistered believers alike would readily subscribe to most of the major historic creeds* or confessions* of the faith. Most of the pastors and teachers at both categories of gathering are similarly like-minded in their conservative evangelical beliefs. Likewise, some in both sectors, though probably more in the unregistered sector, are “fundamentalist*” in that they see themselves in an adversarial relationship with “the world” and their own society (Christ against culture*) and have an extremely rigid code of ethical behavior and proscribed activities.

There are, however, at least two ways in which registered and unregistered churches for the most part differ. First, Pentecostalism* (the Charismatic* Movement) is prevalent in a significant part of the unregistered sector, especially in the countryside, whereas it is rarer in the urban registered churches. The Pentecostal/Charismatic concepts of the spiritual gifts (charismata*), being “filled with the Holy* Spirit,” and behaviors such as speaking in tongues*, prophecy, and supernatural healing (see Health, Healing, and Christianity Cluster: In Asia) smack of superstition in the eyes of the Religious Affairs Bureau. These charismatic expressions of faith very seldom appear in large worship services in the registered churches, although they sometimes do in small groups within these congregations. Second, most of the unregistered churches have very little “quality control” in doctrinal matters. Most of the “sects*,” which are deplored by both registered and unregistered Protestants and are outlawed by the state, originated in unregistered church movements. There is a lively tradition of local popular religion and of Millennialist movements in China. Most of the sects viewed as “evil cults” in China, such as Eastern Lightning, originated when the charismatic leader of a Christian group with no institutional oversight distorted Christian concepts, combining them with traditional popular religion at the local level.

Social Analysis and Trends. As the number of unregistered churches has increased during the past 25 years, the Chinese population has undergone a large shift from the countryside to the cities. The percentage of unregistered churches in the urban environment has almost certainly increased. Among those urban congregations, the number of groups made up of middle- and upper-middle-class Chinese, from the professions, business, and academe, and some from the bureaucracy and even the Communist Party (though religious belief is officially forbidden for party members), has notably increased. This means that the typical urban unregistered church is rather different from those in the 1980s; it is more confident, aggressive, and able and willing to be visible, e.g. in renting rooms in hotels or commercial buildings for their meetings. The difference is especially striking in those groups made up of young professionals, intellectuals, faculty members, and graduate students. Many of these churches apparently have no particular objection to registering with the government, but they have little interest in associating with the Three-Self Patriotic Movement, not primarily because of church–state issues, but because the intellectual level of the churches in the Three-Self Patriotic Movement is too low.

Unregistered churches in the rural areas are also changing. With the population flow to the cities, many Christians have migrated, giving rural churches and church networks a foot in urban areas. A few large nationwide networks of unregistered churches have emerged, and these became sufficiently confident in the late 1990s to issue publicly both a statement of faith and a joint open appeal to the state to grant more religious freedom.

In the 21st c., the independent and unregistered churches of China present a more complex challenge for analysis and understanding than they did at the end of the 20th c. Although there is increasing contact and interaction with the registered churches and the Three-Self Patriotic Movement, it seems likely that the phenomenon of the unregistered church will remain strong.

DANIEL H. BAYS

Chinese Ethnic Minorities and Christianity. Although there are 55 officially recognized ethnic minorities in China, the number of linguistically, culturally, and religiously diversified ethnic groups might be several hundred. These groups have developed cultural and religious systems that are distinct from those of the Han Chinese people. Christianity played a role among several minorities, especially in the southwestern part of China.

In the 13th and 14th c., Christianity gained wide recognition among the Mongolian nobles, exerting a strong influence on the Yuan dynasty's court. Yet it was only in the late 19th c. that missionaries began to plant churches among the southwestern minorities. From the 1920s, Christianity played an important cultural and social role within these communities, becoming the main religion among the Lisu, Miao, Nu, Jingpo (Kachin), Lahu, Wa, Yi, and Hani. In the late 20th and early 21st c., the growth of Christianity among Chinese Mongols and Koreans in North China was also notable.

Owing to sociocultural differences, Christianity was established and grew among the ethnic minorities in China in very distinctive ways, as compared with the situation among the Han Chinese. Christianity played a stronger role in the social and cultural transformation of these minorities. Through the process of teaching from the Bible and of Bible translation, Christian missionaries brought literacy to the preliterate minorities. Schools and hospitals were founded, and health care, a different economic organization, and a new lifestyle were promoted. The Christian churches, their clergy, and their institutions strengthened the organizational structure within each ethnic community, and thus played an important role in framing these communities' ethnic identities.

Ethnic minorities have generally regarded Christianization as liberating and empowering. Even though they were asked to separate their Christian faith from their ethnic cultures, in a tacit way inculturation* took place from the beginning. Yet this process became explicit (from the late 20th c.) when Christian ethnic leaders began to encourage believers to express their Christian faith in traditional ethnic ways, and thus to develop their own form of Chinese Asian theology. In this way Christianity played an important role in helping the ethnic minorities in China to build their religious and cultural identity and to promote an interethnic dialogue in China. See also CHINA; CHINESE CONTEMPORARY INDEPENDENT AND HOUSE CHURCHES. YOU BIN

Chinese Literature and Christianity. The first major corpus of Christian literature in Chinese was written by early-17th-c. Jesuit missionaries who, together with Chinese Catholic scholars such as Xu Guangqi (1562–1633), Li Zhizao (1569–1630), and Yang Tingyun (1562–1627), engendered a provocative Christian–Confucian dialogue by endeavoring to identify Christian theology with certain aspects of classical Confucianism*. Prominent examples of this accommodative strategy of inculturation* include Matteo Ricci's* (1552–1610) Tianzhu shiyi (The true meaning of the Lord of Heaven, 1601) on the character and attributes of God and Diego de Pantoja's (1571–1618) Qi ke (Seven conquests, 1614) about overcoming the seven cardinal* sins.

With the aid of Chinese scholars like Wang Tao (1828–97), 19th-c. Protestant missionaries produced a large body of Chinese Christian literature. They translated Western Christian literary classics, including The Pilgrim's Progress (trans. William Burns, 1853), Augustine's Confessions (trans. William Muirhead, 1884), and The Imitation of Christ (trans. Henry Blodget, 1889). Their own literature includes William Milne's (1785–1822) best seller Zhang Yuan liang you xiang lun (Two friends, 1819), in which a Chinese believer discusses Christian tenets with his neighbor, and Griffith John's (1831–1912) Yin jia dang dao (Leading the family in the right way, 1882), about the Christian way of life in which a Chinese convert leads his family.

Both Ricci's and Milne's influential works were written in a dialogic form, while other works followed the pattern of a Chinese novel. The Bible was also presented as a work of Chinese literature, notably the Delegates' Version in classical Chinese (1854) and the vernacular Union Version (1919), which, it was hoped, would make an intellectual and literary impact on contemporary Chinese scholars. Owing to the patronage of the London Religious Tract Society, most 19th-c. Chinese Christian works were interdenominational and Evangelical in character.

Against the background of Western imperialism and the end of the imperial era, the May Fourth Movement (1919) aimed to reexamine China's fundamental values and purge the nation of its Confucian legacy. Some Chinese scholars saw Christianity as an alternative ideology that would be useful for national renewal. Chinese writers like Bing Xin (1900–99), Xu Dishan (1893–1941), and Ba Jin (1904–2005) were attracted by the core values of Christianity, particularly sacrifice*, forgiveness*, and universal love*, all based on Jesus' personality and teachings. Bing Xin advocated a philosophy of love in Fan xing (A myriad of stars, 1923) and Chun shui (Spring waters, 1923), collections of poems filled with images of light, expressions of hope, and praises to God. The salient Christian virtues and ethical teachings are manifest in Xu Dishan's novels, Shangren fu (The merchant's wife, 1921) and Zhui wang lao zhu (The web-mending toiling spider, 1925); their heroines, Xiguan and Shangjie, respectively, are portrayed as embodiments of mercy, faithfulness, and perseverance. Meanwhile, the institutional forms of churches and Western models of Christian theology were satirized by writers like Xiao Qian (1910–1999), whose novel Guiyi (Conversion, 1935) condemns the Salvation* Army and takes Christianity as a synonym for cultural imperialism.

JOHN TSZ PANG LAI

Chinese Rites Controversy. In the encounter between the gospel and the Chinese people, the most explosive controversy surrounded the ancestor* veneration rites, traditionally associated with Confucius* and his teaching on filiality. Matteo Ricci* (1552–1610) and the Jesuits viewed these rites as purely honorary and ceremonial, thus gaining many converts among the Confucian literati. When Dominican missionary Juan Bautista Morales complained that these rites were superstitious*, controversy erupted and continued until Benedict XIV prohibited these rites in the bull Ex Quo Singulari (1742). The Roman Catholic Church reversed its prohibition through two instructions, Pluries Instante (1936) and Plane Compertum Est (1939). See also CHINA.

JONATHAN Y. TAN

Chinese Women and Christianity. Early converts among Chinese women came mostly from the lower classes. The Christian Church offered them new religious perspectives on the world and themselves. Some converted because of tangible benefits and rewards, such as attending mission schools, employment, and protection. In the early 1920s, female Christians made up about 37% percent of the Protestants in China.

Church activities for women included Sunday worship, Bible studies, prayer meetings, and catechism classes. “Bible women” were hired to teach illiterate women to read the Bible and visit parishioners. Female leaders in local congregations were often active community organizers, teachers, and arbiters of disputes in their communities. In the Catholic Church, women could become members of religious orders, and some joined the group of Christian Virgins, dedicating themselves to a life of celibacy and contemplation.

In addition to evangelistic work, Christian missions provided education* for girls and women and introduced Western medicine to China. In 1844 the first mission school for Chinese girls was opened in Ningbo, and North China Union College for Women and Ginling Women’s College were founded in the early 20th c. Some of the graduates of these colleges became teachers, writers, and social reformers. Christian women initiated various social reforms, such as the anti-foot-binding movement, temperance unions, and health* campaigns. Shi Meiyu and Kang Cheng were Western-trained medical doctors involved in welfare reforms for women and children. The YWCA* provided social services, organized anti-opium campaigns, and offered literary classes for female workers.

Social participation and heightened awareness of the political changes in China called for deeper religious reflection. Christian women discussed the social implications of Christianity and challenged patriarchal* practices of the Church. The churches were closed down during the Cultural Revolution (1966–76), but since they reopened in the late 1970s, women have been the most active members, and many were ordained to serve Christian congregations.

KWOK PUI-LAN

Chi-Rho. The two Greek letters that begin the title “Christ,” combined in a monogram by Constantine. See also IHS; INRI; NOMINA SACRA.

Choir (Lat chorus), the group of singers in worship; the area in which they sing in the chancel* (though they also sing in a gallery).

Chrism, olive oil mixed with diverse substances (depending on the church), used for anointing* in the Greek and Latin churches in the sacraments of baptism*, chrismation*, confirmation*, and orders* (a different oil is used in anointing the sick).

Chrismation, the second sacrament of the Eastern Orthodox* Church, is conferred on the newly baptized (adult or infant) by the priest immediately after baptism* to impart the gift of the Holy* Spirit and signify the Spirit’s indwelling presence. The chrism – a mixture of olive oil, wine, and prescribed aromatic substances symbolizing the diverse gifts of the Holy Spirit – is prepared and consecrated periodically on Holy Thursday by the ecumenical* patriarch or the heads of autocephalous* churches and distributed to the parishes. Chrismation is also used to consecrate churches and to receive baptized converts from certain other churches.

ALKIVIADIS CALIVAS

Christ (Gk Christos, like the Heb *Messiah; literally translated as “the anointed one”). In the OT, one is anointed as a sign of being chosen for a task, especially kingship, but also priesthood or a prophetic role. In the NT, "Christ" is the most common title of Jesus. See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER; JESUS, IMAGES OF, CLUSTER; JESUS, QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL; MESSIAH.

Christendom, a term coined in medieval England and Northern Europe to refer to the sense of a single church integrally connected with the government, and then to Christians collectively, to the territory they occupied, and most often to the ideal of a Christian nation (as opposed to evil or "pagan" society and culture*).

Christening, the act of baptizing, whereby a person is made a Christian and given a "Christian name."

Christian. The term "Christian" was first used in Antioch (Acts 11:16). Its Latin suffix suggests that it was coined by Roman officials who suspected that Jesus' followers were members of a political faction. While Paul often speaks of being "in Christ," the term "Christian" was used for many years only by outsiders (Acts 26:28). Believers were persecuted "as Christians" (1 Pet 4:16), which is probably why Ignatius*, before being martyred, appropriated the term for himself. From the 2nd c. on, it became an honorable self-designation, suggesting that Christians were both loyal to and anointed through Christ (see Hellenistic Religious Traditions and Christianity's Self-Definition). Through the centuries and in various cultures, the term "Christian" acquired many connotations, because it refers to the self-designation of anyone claiming an association with Jesus Christ, however he or she might conceive of this association.

DANIEL PATTE

Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) originated with the 1830s union on the US frontier of the followers of Barton Stone* and Alexander Campbell*. Leaders preached God's unconditional love* revealed in Jesus Christ unencumbered by teachings such as the Calvinist* doctrine of election*, believing that this simple gospel, received in faith*, overcomes the sinner's rebellion against God and unites believers with God and one another. They also called for the restoration of what they believed to be NT practices, including fellowship on the basis of confession that Jesus is the Christ (rather than doctrinal creeds*, which they labeled divisive), congregational governance, weekly observance of the Lord's Supper* as a reminder of God's love, and believers' baptism* by immersion as an assurance of God's forgiveness. They taught that unity would lead to the conversion of unbelievers and usher in Christ's millennial* reign of peace and justice. Congregations were called Christian Church or Church of Christ, and the movement was identified as Disciples of Christ. Developments related to changing social contexts have led to divisions over how to achieve unity.

The first division occurred over the use of instrumental music* during worship and the establishment of mission organizations beyond the congregation. Some congregations, located primarily in the rural South, opposed these developments as being contrary to Scripture. Identifying themselves as Churches of Christ, they were recognized by the 1906 religious census as separate from the Disciples of Christ.

The second division was recognized in 1971 with a listing in the Yearbook of American Churches of the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ. These congregations separated from the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) because of its participation with other churches in the 20th-c. ecumenical* movement (viewed as condoning denominationalism*), its acceptance of historical-critical biblical interpretation* (viewed as undermining biblical authority), and its acceptance of persons as church members already baptized in some form other than believers' immersion (acceptance viewed as violating Scripture). Differences between rural and urban locations appear to have influenced this division: the 1971 census shows that the total membership of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) in urban counties exceeded that of the Christian Churches and Churches of Christ by 50%.

The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) ordains women* and observes its historic practices of baptism and the Lord's Supper. Through participation in the ecumenical movement and conversations with the other streams of the Stone-Campbell movement, it calls for unity amid diversity.

D. NEWELL WILLIAMS

Christian Democratic Parties in the Low Countries, France, Italy, Austria, and Germany came to prominence after World War II. They arose from roots in previously existing Roman Catholic parties and Christian labor movements. There are similar parties in Latin America. In Germany the Christian Democratic parties are interconfessional; in Scandinavia their base is Protestant.

In the decades and countries in which Christian Democracy has been a major political force, their main opposition party has generally been socialist. This necessarily leaves Christian Democratic parties with a constituency generally right of center, though drawn somewhat to the left depending on the strength of their own non-socialist labor contingent. Their heritage, however, consists of distinctly progressive forebears who battled laissez-faire and upper-class political economies in the name of social justice*. They also had to contend with European Catholics' fear of democratic politics as dangerous and revolutionary. The experience of World War II finally discredited authoritarian regimes and showed the worth of democratic institutions in protecting human values. Christian Democracy was the most significant new development of the 20th c. in the history of Western European political parties. See also DEMOCRACY AND CHRISTIANITY.

PAUL MISNER

Christianity and Other Religions. See RELIGIONS AND CHRISTIANITY.

Christian Science, founded by Mary Baker Eddy* (1821–1910), popularized the metaphysical* interpretation of Christian theology that gained currency in late-19th- and early-20th-c. US culture. The term “metaphysical” denotes the primacy of Divine Mind as the controlling factor in human experience. If God is Mind and the substance of being is Spirit, then human beings, as the expression of Mind, must reflect God's eternal perfection. Original* sin is not the cause of human suffering. All negative experiences, including sin*, disease, and death*, are the result of a profound error in thinking, an error Eddy termed of “mortal mind.” The fundamental perceptual error of mortal mind is the pernicious belief in the self-limiting reality of a material world. For Eddy, Spirit was the ontological and theological universal; matter was mental error.

While traditional Christian teaching commonly places the Kingdom* of Heaven in a realm beyond and hereafter, Christian Science calls for the actualization or demonstration of perfection in the here and now by knowing the truth of being. The Christian Scientist does not pray to a God apart for health*, security, and prosperity*. These are qualities of God's unchanging expression that human beings invariably will reflect, experientially, once they depart from erring, limited, mortal thinking. God, as Divine Principle, can be demonstrated, scientifically, by anyone who knows and affirms this principle of being. Eddy called on her followers to reflect seven synonyms for God: Principle, Mind, Spirit, Soul, Life, Truth, and Love.

The “Christian” element in Christian Science emerges in a radical reinterpretation of Jesus' role in the Gospels. Gone is the atoning*, sacrificial death on the cross. Jesus becomes the exemplar, the first and ultimate “Christian Scientist,” who demonstrably overcame sin, sickness, and death through his superior perception of the allness of Spirit and the nothingness of matter. Jesus is revered by Christian Scientists, but he is not the Messiah as defined by orthodox Christology. Rather, Jesus is unique because he was the first human being to understand and fully express Divine Mind. Jesus' at-onement with God is the natural state of all human beings.

Though Eddy's many detractors scoffed at her theology, claiming it was irrational and dangerous, she stressed the practical nature of her “science.” For her, it was in day-to-day challenges that Christian Scientists proved God's perfection. Thus healing became a focus of the religion, a practical manifestation of the change in thinking from the material to the spiritual.

JOHN K. SIMMONS

Christian Socialism. The intriguing relationship between Christianity and socialism has been complicated by the materialistic determinism of the dominant Marxist* version of socialism and the atheism* of most socialist political movements. However, an open-minded inspection of the topic reveals a surprising number of principles and values on which socialism and Christianity generally find ample common ground: deep concern for the well-being of workers, commitment to the equal dignity of all humans, and a justification for state interventions in the economy* to protect losers in economic competition.

Since the mid-19th c., thinkers calling themselves “Christian Socialists” have found much inspiration in scriptural* support for the communal nature of property*; e.g. Acts 2:44 and 4:32–35 portray the primitive church practicing a common holding of goods. Centering on France, Germany, England, and the USA, Christians espousing a variety of socialist ideals have, for nearly two centuries, started utopian communities, agitated in support of the labor* movement, and organized for social reform.

Among Protestants, the US “Social* Gospel Movement” led by Washington Gladden and Walter Rauschenbusch* is perhaps the best embodiment of church support for socialist principles. The early writings of Reinhold Niebuhr* and Paul Tillich’s* “theology of culture” also espouse broad socialist approaches to life in society.

Much Catholic social thought overlaps with the central concerns of socialism, although Pope Pius* XI put a damper on the topic when in his 1931 encyclical Quadragesimo Anno* (§120) he wrote, “No one can be at the same time a sincere Catholic and a true socialist.” Subsequent Catholic social teaching has refined the extent to which authentic church-based concerns regarding social responsibility and economic equity overlap with theories and practices of socialism. Socialist influences found their way into late-20th-c. Liberation* theology and even into official Catholic doctrine when Pope John* Paul II heralded (albeit in a carefully nuanced way) the notion of the preferential* option for the poor. See also SOCIAL ENCYCLICALS; SOCIAL GOSPEL MOVEMENT.

THOMAS MASSARO, SJ

Christina of Markyate (b.c1096–?1155), hermit and prioress of Markyate (Hertfordshire, England), renowned for the intimate portrait of her spiritual development in a contemporary biography and for her possession of the St. Albans Psalter, a magnificently illuminated manuscript that included scenes of direct relevance to Christina’s own visionary experiences. The Life and the Psalter together provide valuable evidence regarding the religious climate of post-Conquest England, the ways someone of Anglo-Saxon birth could make a place for herself in the new Anglo-Norman monastic* world, the value placed therein on a woman’s experience of God, and the rationale whereby such a woman might choose to see herself as wedded to Christ – spurning the offer of both an illicit affair with a bishop and a comfortable married life among the nobility. According to the Life, the abbot of St. Albans, on whom Christina relied for the material support of her priory, in turn depended on Christina for divinely inspired guidance and counsel. The Psalter, most likely a gift to her from the abbot, contains the oldest extant text of Old French* literature (the story of St. Alexis), an indication of the value placed on the development of a French vernacular that could vie with the Old English literature the Normans had inherited. HENRIETTA LEYSER

Christmas, festival of the birth of Christ, also called Nativity* (Lat for “birth”; Spanish, Navidad; French, Noël; Italian, Natale). The Gospels indicate no date (Matt 1:25–2:1; Luke 2:1–7). It was first observed on January 6 (see Epiphany), still the date used by the Armenian* Church. During the 4th c., in Europe it came to be observed on December 25, the date of a traditional celebration of the sun and lengthening days. It is preceded by Advent*, considered in the West to be “the beginning of the church year”; the “twelve days of Christmas” are completed by Epiphany. Since the Middle Ages, Christmas has been a time of celebration and gift giving, influenced more by popular culture than by doctrine. In the Eastern churches, the Feast of Nativity culminates on January 6 as a part of the Theophany* (Epiphany*) celebration. The Puritans* objected to Christmas as unbiblical, but it continued as a civic, cultural, and commercial holiday, and today there have been attempts to restore its religious meaning by minimizing or transforming its cultural features.

Christocentrism, any form of theology in which Jesus as Christ is the key to religious knowledge, human history, or the cosmos.

CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Christology: In Eastern Orthodox Church History

Christology: In Western Church History

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Christologies in Africa

Christologies in Africa: Images of Christ
Christologies in Asia

Christologies in Asia: The Jesus of Asian Women

Christologies in the Caribbean Islands: History

Christologies in the Caribbean Islands: Present Day

Christologies in Latin America

Christologies in North America

Christologies in North America: Feminist and Womanist

Christologies in North America: Latino/a Christologies in South Pacific and Australia

See also INCARNATION CLUSTER; JESUS, IMAGES OF, CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Christology: In Eastern Orthodoxy Church History. See TRINITY CLUSTER: IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

Christology: In Western Church History. Christology in the Western Church concerns the doctrine of the person of Christ, focusing on how his divinity and humanity are related (rather than on how Christ is related to the other persons of the Trinity*, as is the focus of Eastern Orthodox churches). One commonly finds an approximate distinction between “low” Christology and “high” Christology. A “low” Christology is one that emphasizes Jesus’ humanity. This was the original experience of the disciples*; it is a feature of many early Christologies, especially those that were called Adoptionist*; and it is a characteristic of many modern Christologies that are based on the so-called historical* Jesus or are concerned to avoid excessive claims. A “high” Christology emphasizes that Jesus manifests a pre-existing divine being, sometimes distinct from the Father (as in Arianism*), sometimes of the same essence as the Father (as in Nicene* orthodoxy). The endemic question for Christology has been how to acknowledge Christ’s full humanity while also affirming his divinity.

Within early Christianity and the NT, there were various ways of understanding Jesus: as the wonderworker (especially in Mark), virginally conceived (in Matthew and Luke), or adopted by God and filled with divine power (as in Mark 1:11 and Rom 1:3–4); as the righteous one who speaks with authority and manifests the divine Wisdom (as in Matthew); or as the incarnation of a preexistent divine being (as in John; see Preexistence).

As doctrinal debate moved into its formative stage, there were three basic approaches to answering the question “Who is Jesus Christ?” For the Adoptionists, the answer was “the man, filled with divine power”; for the “Word*-flesh” school, the answer was “the Word becoming man”; and for the “Word*-man” school, it was “the Word conjoined with the man.”

Debating Adoptionism. In Rome (c250) there was a decisive rejection of Adoptionism, the view taught by Artemas (or Artemon) that Jesus was a “mere man.” The alternative was to think of him as a divine person. There came to be a change in the second article of the creeds. While the Apostles* Creed continued to speak of Jesus as “conceived by the Holy Spirit,” the Eastern Creed (“the Creed,” always in process as a single but ever changing living tradition) began to speak of Jesus as the divine Word*, active in creation. Thus the name “Jesus Christ” referred to the second person of the Trinity*. Along with this, there was often a denial, or perhaps only an ignoring, of Jesus’ full humanity: if Jesus was a divine person, he had no need of human personhood; indeed, if he had a human mind or soul, this would seem to make him a “mere man.”

Debating “Word-Flesh” Christology. According to this approach, Jesus was a divine person manifested in human flesh, without a human mind or soul. This school emphasized the divine power at work in salvation*, looking more to the divine cause and the human effect in saving others than to the mediating factors in Christ’s humanity.

The Synod of Antioch (268) that condemned Paul* of Samosata gave dogmatic status, especially in the East, to the Word-flesh Christology that had already become widespread. In the early 4th c., this was the understanding shared by almost all thinkers, including Athanasius*, his Arian* opponents, and Apollinaris*, a major defender of the Nicene* faith, around whom controversy centered.

Apollinaris, by explicitly stating the widely held assumption that Christ lacked a human mind, triggered the definitive debate over the person of Christ. Damasus* of Rome held a council (377) that declared Christ to have complete humanity, yet not in the sense of “two Sons.” Apollinarianism was condemned at councils in Alexandria (378), Antioch (379), and Constantinople* (381) and at another Roman council (382).

Debating “Word-Man Christology.” The church now faced the question of how to affirm Jesus’ complete humanity without implying “two Sons,” one divine and one human. An influential answer was supplied by Gregory* Nazianzen (Epp. 101, 102, 202; also Orat. 38). He retrieved the dictum “What is not assumed is not healed,” which had first been used by Irenaeus*, Tertullian*, and Origen* in an anti-Gnostic* way to defend the reality of Christ’s body; on this same principle, then, a human mind must have been assumed and healed. But how? Gregory described the mind of Christ as the intermediary principle uniting Word and the animated body. This was a revival of Origen’s Christology (cf. De princ. II,6), which spoke of Jesus’ mind as so closely united with the Word, through affection and intuition, that there is a union of being. The Neoplatonist metaphor of “mixture” or interpenetration, originally developed to explain the union of soul with body, was utilized by Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory* of Nyssa, and Augustine* to explain the union of two spiritual substances, mind and Logos: Christ’s human mind is the medium of union, united so completely with the Word that the two become one.

Similar, but with a fateful difference, was the position of the Antiochene* tradition (Eusebius* of Emesa, Diodore* of Tarsus, Nestorius*, Theodore* of Mopsuestia). Emphasizing God’s immutability, they ascribed all change, passivity, and suffering to Christ’s human subjectivity. To explain the union, they spoke of divine grace and human response. Rejecting the metaphor of mixture, they asserted a “conjunction” of will rather than of mind or being; this conjunction, furthermore, is dynamic, susceptible to development, as suggested by Jesus’ growth in “wisdom, stature, and grace” (Luke 2:40).

The Christology of the Alexandrian* tradition (in contrast with both) thought of the Word as the subject of Jesus’ human experience, being born first in eternity and then from Mary. Conflict between the Alexandrine and Antiochene traditions broke out when Nestorius became bishop of Constantinople (428) and opposed the term “Theotokos”* (Mother of God). He was immediately attacked by Cyril* of Alexandria; the conflict was exacerbated by rivalries between the sees of Alexandria and Constantinople, and by the hospitality shown toward Pelagians* in Constantinople, making Nestorius suspect in the West. Cyril issued 12 anathematisms (430) declaring that Christ is “one out of two,” insisting on the “one incarnate nature of the divine Word” (hence the term “Monophysites*,” or more accurately “Miaphysites*”) and demanding that Christ’s humanity not be called “a man” or anything other than the Word incarnate. At the Council of Ephesus* (431, held in the first basilica dedicated to Mary), Cyril’s party took action before the arrival of the Antiochenes, interpreting the Nicene Creed to affirm a union in the one hypostasis* of the Word and condemning Nestorius. The Antiochene party then met separately; its creed, ironically, became the basis for the “Formulary of Reunion” agreed upon by both parties (433). The Antiochenes, however, refused to accept any condemnation of Nestorius, and many in the Cyrillian party continued their polemic against the views expressed in the Formulary.

A group of Cyrillians led by Eutyches* gained a brief victory at the Second Council of Ephesus* in 449, called a “robber synod” by Pope Leo* I. The situation was reversed at the Council of Chalcedon*, which declared Christ to be one person or hypostasis, “known in two natures without division or separation, confusion or change.”

Debating Chalcedon. For the West, the Council of Chalcedon, as interpreted through the Tome* of Leo, was the end of doctrinal debate. For the East, it was the beginning of several centuries of conflict between alternative ways of understanding Christ. The Cyrillian party, emphasizing the union of the two natures in the one person of the Word, spoke of a natural union and asserted that Christ was “from” (Gk, ek) but not “in” two natures. The dynamic force of the Incarnation* made it possible to understand Redemption* as the time when all natural life would be caught up into a graced deification* (theosis*). The Antiochene party, insisting on the abiding difference between the two natures, used language that suggested two beings, and thus their opponents claimed that they taught a merely accidental union, a union of will rather than of being. Chalcedon had affirmed two natures or essences and one hypostasis or entity (understood as “person”), thus a hypostatic union. What Chalcedon did not make clear, however, was whether this meant a union through the human subjectivity of Christ, as in the Origenist and Antiochene traditions, or the taking of an impersonal human nature by the preexisting hypostasis of the divine Word, as in the line from Cyril to the later “neo-Chalcedonian” party. Even the notion of enhypostasia that was later set forth by Leontius of Byzantium (c543) could be interpreted in either of these two ways.

Attempts at Compromise. Followers of Cyril either opposed Chalcedon or interpreted it as nothing more than an explanation of the doctrine of the Council of Ephesus in 431. The emperors, seeking reconciliation with the Cyrillians in Egypt*, Syria*, and Armenia*, issued successive decrees intended to diminish the authority of Chalcedon (see Encyclion; Henoticon; Typos).

Rome broke communion with Constantinople over these doctrinal issues (484–519), learning in the process to take a more independent attitude toward state intervention in religious affairs. By this time, Assyrian Christians of the Church* of the East (commonly called by the misnomer “Nestorians”) began their independent life in the Persian Empire.

Inside Byzantine territory, the controversy was between the Chalcedonian and the Cyrillian parties, called respectively Dyophysites* and Miaphysites*. Although the emperors tried to modify Chalcedon’s language in the direction of Cyril, the Cyrillians did not reciprocate, and they remained in control of the Coptic* Church in Egypt and the Syriac* Orthodox Church (polemically nicknamed Jacobite*; Armenia* had already developed as an independent kingdom).

The emperor Justin achieved reunion with the Western Church (519). His nephew Justinian*, trying to conciliate the Cyrillians, condemned the so-called Three Chapters* (544), and the Second Council of Constantinople* in 551 did the same. When Pope Vigilius*, under pressure, twice affirmed these condemnations (547, 553), large areas in the West broke communion with Rome as well as Constantinople.

During the 7th c., the emperors made a new attempt at conciliation on the basis of the idea of “one theandric [divine-human] energy and will” (see Monothelitism). This position was opposed in the West, aided by Maximus* the Confessor; it was condemned at the Third Council of Constantinople* in 680–81.

Separation of Three Communions. The Church* of the East was already outside the Roman Byzantine Empire and within the Persian Empire. Conquests by Persia (615–29) and more permanently by Islam (from 634) removed the Cyrillian churches of Syria and Egypt from the territories controlled by Constantinople. The emperors in Constantinople now became defenders of the faith as defined by the seven ecumenical* councils. A work by John* of Damascus, The Orthodox Faith (c740–50), came to be regarded as the definitive statement of Eastern Orthodox doctrine.

The meaning of “two natures in one person” was still not agreed upon even by those who acknowledged Chalcedon. The East tended to emphasize the Word as the sole person, while the West emphasized full humanity, even speaking of the Word assuming “the man.” The so-called Spanish Adoptionists* were condemned because they continued to use Western language at a time when the popes were adopting Eastern language.

As the era of Scholastic theology dawned in the West, there were three predominant approaches to Christology (Peter Lombard, III Sent., d. 6), influenced by a translation of the Orthodox Faith of John* of Damascus. The assumptus homo theory asserted that Christ was a man, subsisting through himself; its orthodoxy was safeguarded by the language of Augustine* and Leo that the man Jesus “was not first created and then assumed, but was created by being assumed." The habitus theory went to the opposite extreme, asserting that the Christ's soul and body, being assumed like a garment or habit, are not even "something" but are "nothing" without the Word. This "nihilianism" of Abelard* and Peter* Lombard was condemned at the Third Lateran Council in 1179. The subsistence theory speaks of the single person of the Word, subsisting first in a divine way, then after the assumption of human nature also subsisting in a human way; the humanity never subsists in and through itself, but only "in" the Word. This approach was closest to the Council of Ephesus, Cyril's 12 anathematisms, and the Second Council of Constantinople, and as these sources were rediscovered and analyzed in the 13th c., it became the predominant view, although the Franciscans* continued to hold the assumptus homo position.

The Reformation adhered to the doctrine of the first four ecumenical* councils, ending with Chalcedon. Debate between the Lutherans* and the Reformed* was occasioned by their differences in eucharistic doctrine. The Lutherans, in order to explain how the Body and Blood of Christ are "in, with, and under" the elements, asserted that Christ's humanity shared the attributes of the divinity, including omnipresence; consequently, they were accused of Monophysitism* by the Reformed. The Reformed asserted that the ascended body of Christ, in its human dimensions, is in heaven, that Christ is made present in the Eucharist by the power of the Holy Spirit, and that Christ's divinity is "outside" his humanity (the so-called extra Calvinisticum); consequently, they were accused of Nestorianism* by the Lutherans.

More intensive historical study (18th–19th c.) brought to light the differences between the four Gospels and raised questions about both their historicity and the meaning of their assertions about Jesus. As certitude about "historical truth" diminished, greater efforts were made to establish a connection between Jesus and the universal truths of reason*. This was done in an especially influential way by Kant*, who spoke of the "ideal archetype" of humanity posited by practical reason; by Schleiermacher*, for whom Jesus actualizes this archetype; and by Hegel* and his followers, for whom the ideal, first explicit in Jesus, has a life and power independent of him.

Three major trends can be identified in contemporary theology:

1. Most theologians, following Schleiermacher, revived the Origenist, Nestorian, or assumptus homo view that the "psychological center" in Christ is the man Jesus, not the divine Word, giving even more emphasis to Jesus' growth "in wisdom, stature, and grace" (Luke 2:52). Jesus actualized the human potentialities for relationship with God; new life on the part of Christians is the result of his historical influence through the Christian community and its sacraments.
2. Some theologians, more in line with Kant and Hegel, suggest that Jesus "represents" more than he "actualizes." Jesus primarily symbolizes a relationship that is possible without any knowledge of Jesus yet is discovered through him: the divine Word or Spirit also operates directly on other human beings. For some with a more historical perspective, Jesus becomes the initiator of a broader process that develops beyond anything that he could represent in the 1st c. Thus they speak of the "Christ principle," and feminists speak of "Christa" as a principle transcending the 1st-c. patriarchal setting and Jesus' invocation of God as "Abba."
3. The Cyrilline Christology emphasizing the Word in human flesh also has its contemporary champions. For some Liberation* theologians, the second person of the Trinity, fully divine, identified himself with the poor and oppressed (Matt 25:31–46). A fully divine power of salvation (liberation from oppression) is at work, making it possible to respond to this unconditional demand. See also JESUS, IMAGES OF, CLUSTER; LITERATURE AND CHRISTIANITY.

EUGENE TESELLE

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Christologies in Africa are cultural verbalizations of the identity and significance of Jesus, the Christ of God, as he is encountered in faith by African Christians in their historical, socioeconomic, and political situations and their religiosity, which shape the varieties of current African Christologies. New African faces of Christ arise in response to Western depictions of Jesus (based on Western historical models) that are not adequate for Africans.

In African* Religion and soteriology, there were valiant persons who fulfilled the role of savior: sages, benevolent chiefs and kings, healers – Onisegun (Yoruba), Nganga (Bakongo), and Dibia Mgborogwu (Igbo) – priests, priestesses, and great ancestors* who served as channels through which the vital force of the Supreme Being was transmitted to posterity and energized the community. Some of these mythical figures had been divinized and given different theandric attributes.

Owing to the diversity of African cultures, there has been a plethora of African responses to the question “But who do you say that I am?” (Mark 8: 29). The many images of Jesus as the Christ derived from African concepts represent African peoples’ confession of the lordship of Jesus and how he meets them at the point of their needs. Culturally loaded concepts like “our Ancestor,” the “African King,” Odogwu n’ Agha or Onwuatuwegwu (Brave or Fearless Warrior [Igbo]), Omoba (Prince [Yoruba]), Nnukwu Ukochukwu (High Priest [Igbo]), and Onisegun Ode Orun (Healer from Heaven [Yoruba]), are ingeniously used to designate Jesus in African* Instituted Churches and in Charismatic* churches and given “Christ-ful” significance – especially in faith-moving hymns and praise songs, expressing the reality of Jesus in African Christians’ salvation history. Such African christological constructs reflect the deep connections with Christ held in many of the vibrant Christian communities in Africa as Christ is encountered in faith and in everyday life.

African Christologies in contemporary African Christian theology indicate how African faithful discern the significance of Jesus’ life cycle – birth, youth, words, work, death, and resurrection – for their culture and contexts, including the life contexts of African women, who need to retrieve human rights in overt patriarchal societies, and of people struggling with HIV/AIDS. Thus liberation and liberating ecclesiology have become essential ingredients of christological reflections in Africa.

Having crossed cultural boundaries, Christianity needs to wear different garb, namely African Christologies, the heartbeat of African Christian theology and the point around which all pastoral activities in Africa revolve.

UKACHUKWU CHRIS MANUS

Christologies in Africa: Images of Christ. Several christological images emerged as African theologians faced Jesus’ challenging question: “Who do you say that I am?”

Eschatological images present Jesus as sent from God to an alienated world, where God’s presence takes the shape of the Crucified One. Jesus takes on himself the conditions of the poor*, the marginalized, and the oppressed; through his resurrection, Jesus as Savior reveals God’s victory over the world’s alienating forces, opening a future for a new humanity (as Mercy Amba Uduyoye and Elizabeth Amoah [Ghana] and Nasimiyu-Wasike [Kenya] say).

Anthropological images of Jesus, derived from African concepts, wisdom, and knowledge, are greatly influenced by the African religiocultural heritage: Christ as the greatest ancestor* (John Pobee [Ghana]), Christ the proto-ancestor (Benezet Bujo [Democratic Republic of Congo]), Christ the brother-ancestor or elder brother (Charles Nyamiti [Tanzania]), Jesus as healer (Theresia Hinga [Kenya]), and Jesus as mother, a nurturer of life (Theresa Okure [Nigeria]; Nasimiyu-Wasike [Kenya]).

Liberational images of Jesus are articulated by several African theologians (Jean-Marc Ela [Cameroon]; Theresia Hinga and Nasimiyu-Wasike [Kenya]; Mercy Amba Uduyoye and Elizabeth Amoah [Ghana]). Jesus calls both women and men to discipleship, recognizing them as equally responsible persons (Luke 11:27–28, 8:1–2) who should work for the liberation of all people and challenge all traditional practices that are dehumanizing. Jesus especially calls African women not to accept fatalistically their hardship and suffering but to work for the elimination of those forces that limit them and reduce them to non-persons (Nasimiyu-Wasike [Kenya]).

Cosmological images present Jesus as a restorer of the cosmos who reconciles all created reality with God (Rom 8: 20–23). Natural calamities (drought, floods, famine) have claimed millions of African people. Jesus, who rebuked the winds and ordered harmony and restored tranquility, is able to restore harmony and peace to the African continent and the whole world.

ANNE NASIMIYU WASIKE

Christologies in Asia. Articulating the Christian confession that Jesus is the Word* of God made flesh and the Savior* of all humankind in Asian terms is a daunting task that Asian theologians have taken on with imagination and resourcefulness.

Assyrian* Christians (commonly known as “Nestorians,” a misnomer) during the Tang dynasty made the first attempt to express christological doctrines in Asian religious terms. The famous Xi’an stele (erected 781; discovered 1623) and the “Dunhuang Documents” show that the earliest Christian missionaries to China borrowed extensively from Buddhist*, Confucianist*, and Daoist* concepts to explain the person and work of Jesus. Accordingly, Christianity is the “ever-true and unchanging Dao” itself; Jesus established a “new teaching of nonassertion” (Daoist), taught “how to rule both families and kingdoms” (Confucianist), and took an oar in “the vessel of mercy” and “ascended to the Palace of Light” (Buddhist). In India the Hindu idea of the “descent” of the gods in the form of avatars is compared with the incarnation of the Logos, and Krishna is compared with Jesus (Ovey N. Mohammed). The Hindu idea that humans can become avatars through the indwelling of the divine spirit was applied to Jesus. Christ is believed to be present and active in all authentic religions (Raimon Panikkar). Jesus was also presented as the Enlightened One, like Siddhartha Gautama (Seichi Yagi, Peter Phan), or as a poor monk who alleviates the enforced poverty of the masses by his voluntary poverty (Aloysius Pieris).

A second christological model presents Jesus through cultural categories. In India, non-Christians of the Indian Renaissance first attempted this inculturated* Christology. They saw in Jesus the embodiment of Hindu and Indian ideals, the supreme guide to happiness (Ram Mohun Roy), the incarnation of cit (consciousness) of the triad of sat-cit-ananda (Keshub Chunder Sen, Brahmabandhav Upadhyaya), jivan-mukta, one who achieved liberation while still alive (Swami Vivekananda), the Son* of man seeking the poor of the earth (Rabindranath Tagore), and the supreme satyagrahi, lover of and fighter for truth (Mahatma Gandhi). Christ has also been presented as Purusha, the creator god in the form of man (P. Chenchiah); as Prajapati, lord of the created world (K. M. Banerjee); as the eternal Om (S. Jesudasan); as the crucified guru (M. Thomas Thangaraj); and as the elder son and ancestor* par excellence (Peter Phan).

More recently Christology accounts for the massive poverty and exploitation in Asia on the basis of ethnicity, race*, caste*, and gender. Christ is presented in India as one of the outcast and untouchable Dalits* (Arvind P. Nirmal and M. E. Prabhakar) and in Korea as a member of the Minjung*, the oppressed masses (Kim Yong Bock, Suh Nam Dong, Ahn Byung Mu). In Japan Jesus’ crown of thorns is taken as a symbol of the liberation of the Buraku* people (animal slaughterers, a minority discriminated against as filthy people, in contrast to the imperial throne of chrysanthemums) (Teruo Kuribayashi). In the Philippines, Jesus is portrayed as taking part in the struggle for independence (Carlos Abesamis, Eleazar S. Fernandez). In Taiwan, homeland theology (Wang Hsien Chi) and Chhut Thau Thin theology (Huang Po Ho), respectively, emphasize the political or the cultural dimension to foster self-determination for the Taiwanese people. Asian Feminist theology highlights Christ's role in liberating women from the patriarchy* and androcentrism* that is endemic to several Asian cultures (Marianne Katoppo, Mary John Mananzan, Virginia Fabella, Elizabeth Tapia, Chung Hyun Kyung, Kwok Pui-lan, Aruna Gnanadason, Muriel Orevillo-Montenegro). PETER C. PHAN Christologies in Asia: The Jesus of Asian Women. Jesus, fully liberated and liberator, brings fullness of life. Maleness is not essential to his Christhood. Jesus accompanies people struggling toward freedom (Virginia Fabella, Mary John Mananzan, Lydia Lascano, Sharon Rose Joy Ruiz Duremdes). Jesus is a Minjung* worker (Soon Hwa, Oh Chag-yo), the Woman Messiah in solidarity with the outcast (Chung Sook Ja), a wounded healer (Limatula Longkumer, Elizabeth Tapia), and a risk-taking servant who works for his friends' well-being (Teresa Dagdag). Jesus is crucified with women on the cross of sexual violence* (Chang Jung-nim), of patriarchy*, classism, casteism*, ethnocentrism, and imperialism*.

Jesus crossed social and cultural boundaries to become a savior and women's partner in demolishing patriarchal culture (Hisako Kinukawa). Being a sannyasi (ascetic*) par excellence, Jesus embodied cit (intelligence/awareness) of the Vedic sat-cit-ananda (Vandana Mataji). As a model of priesthood (Pauline Chakkalakal), Jesus the mudang (priest) exorcises* han (accumulated pain and anger against oppression and injustice), performs a life-giving dance in the han-pu-ri ritual, and offers an opportunity for repentance, healing, and "making things alive" at the cosmic level (Chung Hyun Kyung, Choi Man Ja). Creativity, giving new life and redemption* symbolized powerfully by Jesus' Blood, is linked to women's menstrual and birthing blood (Aruna Gnanadasun, Elizabeth Joy, Gabriele Dietrich). Like a mother* (Ahn Sang-Nim, Sun Ai Park, Rebecca Asedillo), the many-breasted Mother Christ breastfeeds her children, nourishes and redeems them from waywardness. Jesus is God-with-us, dancing with us to celebrate small victories over the multiple crosses women bear daily (Muriel Orevillo-Montenegro). Jesus is the epiphany* of God, though not the sole revelation of God (Kwok Pui Lan).

Jesus is Shakti, spiritual energy, source of living water and truth (Stella Baltazar, Gnanadasun, Monica Melanchthon). Jesus is sage, prophet, and grace of Sophia-Prajna Paramita, the beauty of Wisdom incarnate (Grace Ji-Sun Kim). Wisdom* Christology puts Jesus the Christ within a pluralist paradigm that leaves room for dialogue.

An organic Christology highlights more life-giving images of Christ in Jesus as the vine, bread, living water (Kwok), and grain (Chung). Christ is Inang Bayan, the life-sustaining motherland/mother earth. Christ is the loving and caring communities working for people's well-being (Orevillo-Montenegro). Postcolonial imagination sees Jesus as a "subject-in-process" who opens for women a new space and a new way of being-in-the-world. This "variegated Jesus" of multiple identities embodies the power of the erotic, passion for life in relationship and mutuality. The fluid space between Jesus and Christ becomes a site of resistance to all forms of oppression (Wong Wai Ching [Angela]).

MURIEL OREVILLO-MONTENEGRO

Christologies in the Caribbean Islands: History.

The Moravian* Church (first in St. Thomas, 1732) spread rapidly because of its emphasis on the suffering of Christ and its vivid account of the crucifixion of Christ wearing a crown of thorns. Enslaved peoples in the Caribbean made a ready connection between Christ's suffering and their own. Moravians appealed to Zinzendorf's* Catechism for the Heathen to help Caribbean people understand that Christ was equal to God. The catechism instructs: "Q: Who made men and women? A: The Lord God. Q: What do you call him? A: Jesus Christ... Jesus means Redeemer and Christ means king." The cleric went on to explain the doctrines of the Fall*, Incarnation*, and Christ's cross*.

Methodists, in their preaching in the Caribbean (since 1800 in the Bahamas), focused on their parishioners' sins* and the need for punishment (see Atonement # 2). The answer to the problem of sin was knowing Jesus as Savior and appropriating his death on the cross; otherwise, instead of meeting Christ as Savior one would meet him as Judge.

The Baptists (in Jamaica* since 1782, with the Black Baptist Church founded by black Americans who escaped from the USA after the American Revolution, 1784) put questions to a candidate for baptism that illustrate the Church's Christology: "Minister: Well, Thomas, do you know who Jesus Christ is? Candidate: Him de Son of God, Minister. Minister: What did Jesus come into the world to do? Candidate: Him come to save poor sinners. Minister: Do you think he is able to save sinners? Candidate: Me know him able. Minister: How can you know that he is able? Candidate: Because him make de world: and if him make de world, him able to do all Tings: and minister no tell we often-time dis make him left him fader Trone, and come into dis sinful world. Minister: What makes you wish to be baptized? Candidate: Because Jesus Christ, put under water, rise up again and we wish to pattern after him. Minister: Perhaps you think the water will wash away your sin? Candidate: No, no; water no wash away me sin; nothing but precious Massa Jesus blood wash away me sin."

NOEL LEO ERSKINE

Christologies in the Caribbean Islands: Present Day.

A Caribbean Jesus embodies the gospel offering salvation*, rescuing persons from the powers of sin*, the structures of death, and the forces of evil. Luke 4:18–19 exemplifies the missiological consciousness of Jesus: As Savior he saves people from all diseases and forms of human degradation and transforms their lives. As exorcist* he delivers people wrestling with the known and unknown. As liberator he is the historical ancestor*, who sacrificed his life to free enslaved blacks. This human identification solidly links Jesus with Caribbean human vulnerability. Jesus, as the Christ of faith, calls the Caribbean people to love and respect all persons, for they are "[o]ut of many, one people," despite racial, national, religious, political, linguistic, sociological, and geographic differences. As "solidarity man," Jesus stands in solidarity with oppressed women, who are bringing about revolutionary changes in society, planting seeds of justice and peace. "Christ is also the oppressed one who, by the resurrection, liberates the oppressed ones" (Williams). Jesus as Black God (Garvey* and Rastafari*) calls Caribbean "blacks" to "emancipate themselves from mental slavery" (Bob Marley) and redefine their personhood as dignified and valued.

These images of Jesus offer a new appreciation of self and Caribbean roots in Shango (Trinidad*), Pocomania (Jamaica*), Kele (St. Lucia), Vodou* (Haiti*), and Santería (Cuba*).

LESLEY G. ANDERSON

Christologies in Latin America tend to pay particular attention to the earthly ministry of Jesus, as in the book-length Christologies of Leonardo Boff, Segundo Galilea, José Comblin, and Rubén Dri. The Central American radio adaptation of the life of Jesus by María López Vigil and José Ignacio López Vigil brings a dark-skinned, laughing Jesus close to many. José Míguez Bonino's collection of essays (1977) underlined the need to understand Jesus neither as a powerless victim nor as a celestial monarch. It is important to frame the christological question in Latin America, because, too often, the figure of Jesus functioned to justify the conquest and suffering of the many, while glorifying power and domination by the few (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions; Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). Such cautions are echoed by recent Feminist christological work. Jon Sobrino, the Latin American "christologian" par excellence, emphasized following Jesus as a mystagogy* that serves both as a practical confession of faith and as a way of gaining significant understanding; to follow Jesus (seguimiento) empowered by the Spirit means to proceed (proseguimiento) today along the path opened up by Jesus, to embrace Jesus' preferential* option for the poor and his way of life; the resulting opposition, persecution, and even martyrdom* are illuminated by the hope* of resurrection*. See also Incarnation Cluster: In Latin America; Liberation Theologies Cluster: In Latin America; Latin American Theologies.

NANCY ELIZABETH BEDFORD

Christologies in North America. Christology is that division of Christian theology that attempts to answer the question "Who – according to faith – is Jesus, and what does it mean to name him 'the Christ'?" Together with the soteriological* question ("What has he done for us?"), Christology constitutes the definitive center of Christian faith and practice. It is therefore not surprising that it is also the subject of perennial controversy in the Christian Church. North American Christianity is certainly no exception.

For a numerically (and politically) significant portion of Christian groupings in the USA particularly, Jesus Christ is understood to be unqualifiedly identified with the ultimate and transcendent deity. Belief in the divinity of Christ is one of the five "fundamentals" of late-19th-c. fundamentalism*, and while it is more nuanced in "conservative" churches that would reject the nomenclature "fundamentalist," a strong feature of all Christian conservatism in the North American context is its tendency to accentuate the divine origin and nature of Christ. This has led some observers to conclude that the great danger of Christianity in North America is its propensity to embrace an undialectical monotheism* or Christomonism, "a unitarianism of the second person of the Trinity" (H. Richard Niebuhr*).

Partly in reaction to this overemphasis on Christ's divinity, liberal* Christianity in North America (see Liberalism in Christian Theology and Ethics) has consistently emphasized the genuine humanity (vere homo) of Jesus, seeing him not so much as an ontological extension or incarnation of God as an inspired and prophetic human being through whom God has revealed the divine character and purposes. Liberal and moderate forms of Christianity, as represented by most "mainstream" Protestantism and much contemporary Catholicism, locate the high significance of Jesus not primarily in his being as such but in the scriptural witness to his teaching, healing, and relationships with others.

While this liberal view may indeed represent a deviation from "classical" christological orthodoxy as expressed in the formula of Chalcedon* and other historically important decisions of evolving Christendom, it is arguably more faithful to the whole (Hebraic-Christian) biblical approach than are the dominant traditional Christologies, which were strongly influenced by Greek philosophical conventions and by the post-Constantinian political destiny of a Christianity in the service of empire. Furthermore, in the religiously pluralistic situation of the present, a Christian faith committed to triumphalistic Christologies affirming straightforwardly that "Jesus is God" virtually precludes dialogue with other faiths. See also THEOLOGY AS HUMAN UNDERTAKING CLUSTER: NORTH ATLANTIC THEOLOGIANS DOING THEOLOGY: A DIALOGUE BETWEEN TEXT AND CONTEXT. DOUGLAS JOHN HALL

Christologies in North America: Feminist and Womanist.

Feminist and Womanist Christologies examine the meaning of Jesus Christ in the context of women's experience, advocating for women's full human dignity. This influences women's approach to biblical accounts of Jesus and systematic theological categories related to Christology. Feminist Christologies have addressed the biblical/historical Jesus*, implications of Jesus' maleness, and Jesus' role in upending the hierarchical, patriarchal* religious and social codes of his day. Along with Feminist Christologies, Womanist Christologies have emphasized Jesus as a liberator but also accented Jesus as a co-sufferer with humanity. Asian American feminist Rita Nakashima Brock highlights Jesus' relational power, working with the community to bring salvation*. Some Womanist and Feminist theologians have underscored the importance of the Incarnation* for affirming the value of human bodies* and all of creation (Kelly Brown Douglas, Carter Heyward, Sallie McFague).

By analyzing biblical literature, some Feminist Christologies claim that Jesus clearly contradicted patriarchal codes of his day and was, in some sense, a feminist. They note that Jesus included women among his disciples, championed the most outcast women, appeared first to women on Easter morning and commanded them to preach the gospel, used female metaphors for God, and is likened in the synoptic Gospels to Sophia, or Wisdom*, a female image of divinity in the Hebrew scriptures (Elizabeth A. Johnson, Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza).

Jesus' maleness is a perennial christological issue for Feminist theologians. Some churches have argued that women cannot fully represent Jesus because of their gender and therefore exclude women from full church leadership (see Women's Ordination Cluster). Early Feminist theologians, in particular, questioned whether a male savior can be ultimately redemptive for women. Most argued that Jesus' maleness is incidental rather than necessary to his nature and role as redeemer and savior.

In both Feminist and Womanist theologies, the most common christological focus concerns Jesus as a liberator from oppression. In a prophetic role, Jesus consistently sides with the oppressed, calls for justice, includes women in his ministry, and reverses patriarchal hierarchies of authority (Marjorie Suchocki, Rosemary Radford Ruether). Likewise, Jesus' preaching of the reign* of God does not support gender hierarchies, because delineations between male and female are negated in the body of Christ. Jesus sets a revolutionary standard for society today.

Womanist theologians have emphasized that Black women's Christologies differ from both Feminist and Black male Christologies. Jaquelyn Grant, for example, distinguished Black women's personal and communal experiences of Jesus from white Feminist theologies of Christ. Extending Black Liberation theology, some Womanist theologians argue that Jesus' saving power offers liberation from sexism* and heterosexism* as well as racism*. A recurring theme in Womanist Christology centers on finding strength in Jesus, who is known through communities of liberation, to both bear and fight their double oppression of racism and sexism (Kelly Brown Douglas).

Since 2000, Womanist and Feminist Christologies have profoundly shaped theological discussion concerning the cross*, atonement*, and redemptive*, substitutionary suffering*. Some of these Christologies have claimed that the cross and Christian atonement theories (see Atonement #2) reinforce systems of oppression by demanding self-sacrifice and suffering from the weak while justifying and sanctifying oppression and abuse by the powerful. Since salvation* is often associated with passive suffering, theology risks supporting racial, domestic, nationalist, and imperialist violence (Kelly Brown Douglas, Delores Williams, Marit Trelstad, Rita Nakashima Brock, Rebecca Ann Parker; see Violence Cluster). These theologians may offer alternative christological emphases on baptism*, resurrection*, renewal, or the covenant*, which Jesus renews. On the other hand, some Womanist and Feminist theologians argue that Jesus' suffering on the cross is redemptive or revelatory for women since it emphasizes God's participation in suffering and promises triumph over evil and oppression (Joanne Marie Terrell, Deanna Thompson, Darby Ray).

MARIT TRELSTAD

Christologies in North America: Latino/a. Latino/a theology and its Christologies emerged at a moment when contextual and Liberation theologies exploded onto the global theological arena and sought to speak both for and from the history, spirituality, and contemporary situation of Latino/a communities. Within Latino/a religiosity, the crucified Christ plays a central role. The Jesus of Good* Friday is a central christological symbol stemming from a theological worldview that strongly emphasizes Jesus' humble origins, his prophetic message, and his active presence in the present-day lives of Christians, in particular his solidarity with the oppressed* and marginalized. The theological significance of this distinctive Latino/a understanding of Jesus is the subject of Latino/a Christologies.

Latino/a Christologies emphasize Jesus' concrete historical reality and its implications for our understanding of Jesus today. At the center, the crucified Jesus reveals God's love for humanity and God's presence with and advocacy for the poor. The Latino/a faith in the crucified Jesus cannot be found in the dogmas, official teachings, or theological treatises of academic theology, but instead is situated in the concrete faith and lives of Latino/a communities. Their popular* faith expressions are the starting point of Latino/a theological reflection, and thus play a fundamental role in Latino/a Christologies.

The image of the crucified Jesus best embodies the spirituality and theology of Latino/a communities throughout the USA. This mestizo* Jesus, one who has a preferential* option for the oppressed and accompanies them throughout their struggles, calls Christians to be concrete disciples who follow in Jesus' footsteps. The crucified Jesus of Latino/a religiosity reminds Christians of the dangerous memory of Jesus' ministry, life, and death. For Latinos/as the importance of popular religious practices demonstrates the active dimension of this faith: one not only believes, one also acts. As disciples, Christians are therefore called to follow Jesus to those marginalized spaces. On Good* Friday, as Latino/as accompany Jesus to his crucifixion, they are reminded and comforted by the fact that they do not suffer alone. The symbolic accompaniment of the via crucis is a reminder of the constant accompaniment of Jesus in their lives and struggles, and the accompaniment of the marginalized by believers. See also JESUS*, IMAGES OF, CLUSTER: IN LATINO/A DEPICTIONS.

MICHELLE A. GONZALEZ

Christologies in South Pacific and Australia. The tendency in contextual theologies in Australia, New Zealand, and the Pacific is to focus on themes that are not directly of a traditional systematic theological nature; these contextual theologies focus on themes such as identity, land*, ecology*, Spirit/spirituality*, method, and the relationship of indigenous peoples to settler societies. There is also a practice of responding to occasional, ad hoc public issues as they arise. Sometimes the language of Christ and context is used as a code to explore models of how gospel and culture*, or the local and the global, relate.

The invocation of Christology for the sake of a local theology was probably first associated with the request of Sir John Guise (governor of Papua* New Guinea, 1975–77) to the Pacific Council of Churches to “reveal to us the Pacific Christ.” The purpose was strategic: (1) how might the story of Jesus be transplanted into island culture? and (2) what have been the received understandings of the person and work of Christ mediated through Western missionaries, and how might cultural symbols and practice now be employed for the sake of interpretation and relevance?

That concern for a critical engagement of a “national” story with the narrative of faith is replicated in Australia, where Christ-like images have been frequently present in literature. In both cases, the initiative for a more contextual Christology has often been located in the need to create space for the other and a concern for how difference is embraced. The tendency has been for that difference to be conceived of in terms of race and cultural diversity. The biblical and theological themes of hospitality* and the cross* are combined with the ever-present question “Who is Jesus Christ for us today?” in a range of emerging diasporic and intergenerational understandings.

The organizing principles for these Christologies in context are sometimes taken from Liberation* theology. The more common practice is to draw on cultural symbols or practices, like weaving. There is the isolated christological quest that puts to theological use popular idioms like “for Christ’s sake”; the historical understanding of the antipodes has also been employed for the sake of developing a Christology on the basis of a hermeneutic of living “down under.” The most recent emphasis in Australia has been on soteriology* rather than the Incarnation*. Yet these Christologies are not widely known, because publishing is difficult owing to the small domestic audience and international isolation.

CLIVE PEARSON

Chronicles, Books of, late biblical historical composition describing the history of ancient Israel from the earliest times until Cyrus’s Decree (538 BCE), with many genealogical and geographical lists. Almost half of the material has parallel texts in earlier biblical writings (Pentateuch*, Joshua*, Samuel*, Kings*, Psalms*, Ruth*, Ezra* and Nehemiah). One of the largest compositions of the HB, it is placed last in the Hebrew canon*.

Writing probably in Jerusalem c400–375 BCE, the chronicler evaluates the past from his own historical context and literary theological concerns: he emphasizes the implementations of the priestly codex, the Temple and its services, and stresses the continuity of the Judean tribes as the real Israelites who survived until his times. He encourages Diaspora Jews to immigrate to Jerusalem and Judah.

Immediate personal reward and punishment is one of the core theological principles of Chronicles. Reliance on God and keeping God’s commandments result in victory, peace, and prosperity*; disobeying and neglecting the Lord’s word cause war, disaster, and defeat. The divine promise of the kingdom to David and his descendants is eternal; therefore, the very existence of the Northern Kingdom is intertwined with rebellion against God. The Temple (and royal city, Jerusalem) was captured by “all Israel,” and since then it has been the nation’s center.

Several factors combined to make Chronicles one of the least popular and least studied books of the Scriptures. It was translated relatively late into Greek and Aramaic. The 3rd-c.-CE Syriac version of the OT did not include Chronicles. Despite Jerome’s* comment, “Chronicles is condensed to such an extent and so well abridged, that whoever claims to know Scriptures without having knowledge of Chronicles, would make himself a laughingstock,” the book was almost completely neglected in the Christian tradition, and even excluded from scriptural studies in some communities. Hugh of Saint-Cher states that the Jewish people had a generous attitude toward Chronicles: they ranked the book among the Hagiographa*, while its appropriate place should be among the Apocrypha*.

Generally, Chronicles was better received in the Jewish tradition: verses from the book were integrated into the Jewish liturgy; they were used in the artistic works in the synagogues of Dura-Europus and En-Gedi and quoted in Sefer haZohar and in disputations with Christians. There are several medieval commentaries on the book. Yet Spinoza* suggested that the book be excluded from the canon. In more recent decades, there has been increasing scholarly interest in Chronicles.

ISAAC KALIMI

Chrysostom, John. See JOHN CHRYSOSTOM.

Chrysostom, Liturgy of St. John, formulary for the celebration of the Eucharist* used by Eastern Orthodox* Churches and Greek Catholic Churches. It is the second most commonly used Eucharist formulary (the Roman Catholic Mass* being the first). The primitive part constituted by the anaphora* is a recasting of a more ancient text, the Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles, composed by John* Chrysostom during his episcopate in Constantinople (398–407). This anaphora is a classical example of Antiochene* anaphora. Its ancient characteristics include the absence of the reiteration command (“Do this in memory of me”) and the inclusion of the (recently) deceased in the prayer of commemoration of the saints. Before the 7th c., the Liturgy of Chrysostom (this primitive nucleus, enriched by other prayers) was used only occasionally and not as much as the Liturgy of St. Basil*. The Liturgy of Chrysostom prevailed only in the context of the post-iconoclast liturgical reform (late 9th c.), and possibly as a consequence of the spiritual movement that began at the Studios* Monastery in Constantinople in favor of everyday Communion.

STEFANO PARENTI

CHURCH, CONCEPTS AND LIFE, CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Church, Concepts and Life: Doctrines of the Church

Church, Concepts and Life: Feminist Perspectives

Church, Concepts and Life: Names for the ChurchChurch, Concepts and Life: Types of Ecclesiastical Structures*2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices*Church, Concepts and Life: In African Instituted Churches*Church, Concepts and Life: In Asia*Church, Concepts and Life: House Churches*Church, Concepts and Life: In Latin America*Church, Concepts and Life: In Latin America: Brazil: Base Ecclesial Communities (CEBs)*Church, Concepts and Life: In Latin America: Ecuador: Base Ecclesial Communities (CEBs)*Church, Concepts and Life: In North America*Church, Concepts and Life: In Western European Theology*1) Introductory Entries

Church, Concepts and Life: Doctrines of the Church. Ecclesiology, the doctrine of the church, is one of the most widely discussed topics in contemporary theology, although it was only with the Reformation* that it became a separate chapter in Christian theology, when the question of the true church came into focus.

The biblical term ekklesia (Gk “congregation,” “assembly”) denotes in the NT both the local and universal church. While the church came into existence at Pentecost as a result of the pouring out of the Holy* Spirit (Acts 2), the “founding” of the church is attributed to Jesus (Matt 16:18, a disputed verse). Among NT images for the church, the most often used are “people of God,” “body of Christ,” and “temple of the Holy Spirit.”

Early creeds connect the church with the Holy* Spirit, forgiveness* of sins, and the coming of God’s Kingdom*. The Nicene* Creed (4th c.) gave a definitive understanding of the church as one, holy, catholic, and apostolic. As the body of Christ, the church is one and holy, because its Lord is. Catholicity (Gk cath-holou, “according to the whole”) means that the church not only is spread everywhere but also possesses the whole gospel*. All affirm these “marks* of the church” – one, holy, catholic, and apostolic. Yet their exact meaning is disputed. For example, should holiness be located in the Lord or in the members? Should apostolicity be in terms of apostolic* succession of bishops or in terms of adherence to the apostolic word of the gospel?

The Christian Church has undergone several major splits. Several Oriental Orthodox* churches* (e.g. Syriac*) disagreed with the Eastern Orthodox* and Roman* Catholic churches’ adherence to the Council of Chalcedon* (451). The 1054 split between the Western Church (Roman Catholic) and Eastern Church (Eastern Orthodox) resulted from the Filioque dispute and other ecclesiopolitical factors. The 16th-c. division split the Western Church into Roman Catholic and Protestant churches. Luther*, then other Reformers (Zwingli*, Calvin*, the English Reformers), began their activities with no intention of splitting the church; this schism became definitive only after the Council of Trent* (1545–63) and the founding of Protestant churches. The Radical* Reformers, out of which came Anabaptists* (e.g. Mennonites*), pushed an even more radical reform agenda with the idea of believers’ baptism* and the separation between church* and state. In 17th-c. England, the Baptist* Movement arose to continue this agenda. The independent* church movements (postdenominational or free churches) that rapidly grew in the late 20th c. and early 21st c. owed their beginnings to Baptists and Anabaptists. The rise to prominence of the Pentecostal* Movement (since the early 20th c.) and later of the Charismatic* Movement were a radical challenge to all churches in that they powerfully called them to be more receptive to the power and presence of the Holy* Spirit with charismata* and spiritual manifestations.

For the Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches, the ecclesiality of the church is based on the sacraments*, especially the Eucharist*, the legitimacy of which is guaranteed by a bishop* who stands in the apostolic succession. The Eastern Orthodox Church speaks of the Church as the image (see Icon; Iconography) of the Trinity* and as a mystery* (sacrament*), emphasizing its mystical and cosmological characters. Vatican* II (1962–65) similarly anchors the church in the Trinity and, unlike in the past, regards the earthly church as less than perfect; the church is on its way to perfection. The laity is given a more prominent role, and the local churches have been endowed with greater significance.

Protestant churches regard church structures and ministry patterns as optional: the two determining indicators are the celebration of sacraments* and the preaching* of the gospel*, with distinctive doctrinal and polity* emphasis according to the denominations; in practice, however, they increasingly function as voluntary associations.

For independent* postdenominational churches, the determining factor for ecclesiality is the gathering of believers. While sacraments are celebrated and the Word preached, personal faith* is necessary. Believers' baptism* makes the church a voluntary society; the church gathers "the called-out ones" (plausible etymology of ekklesia, though not emphasized in NT usages). Evangelism* and mission* are highly emphasized. Independent churches also insist on the separation between church and state. The biggest independent church movement, the Pentecostal*/ Charismatic* Movement, understands itself to be restorationist, with a desire to reclaim the charismatic life and worship of the apostolic church. The empowerment of all church members by the Holy Spirit is emphasized. Even when the Word is preached and hymns are sung, "encountering" the Lord is the aim, with signs following encounters, such as healings*.

In the early 21st c the Christian Church is undergoing a transformation as its center of gravity moves rapidly from North to South, with the majority of church members residing outside Europe and North America. The Roman Catholic Church comprises one-half of all church members, Pentecostal/Charismatic and other independent churches a quarter, and Orthodox plus Reformation churches the remaining one-fourth. New challenges include, among others, the inclusion of women*, the questions of liberation* and equality, the promotion of the ministry (priesthood*) of all believers, and the acknowledgment of the missionary* nature of the church.

VELI-MATTI KÄRKKÄINEN

Church, Concepts and Life: Feminist Perspectives. What are the terms of involvement of the female members of the church, anywhere in the world? To what extent are they free to speak, contribute, teach, preach, and lead?

The fact that there are limitations for women reveals the inherent inequalities within the church structure, power, and leadership. Feminist concerns regarding the concept of "church" are tied to the understanding of the names for and nature of the Triune God*, by whom and for whom the church exists (see God, Christian Views of, Cluster: In North America: Feminist Understandings). Regarding church practice, feminists ask: Why are the voices of women considered less important or relevant than those of men? What are the implications for the church that its Scriptures* were written by – and primarily benefit – men? How can we counter the systemic neglect or dismissal of women (and other marginalized people) and their voices, perspectives, and contributions? It is not enough to pardon the past; past values and the structures and roles they created are still at work in our churches today.

While some question whether "feminist" and "church" can coexist, the reality is that people are interested in making it so. Thus feminist voices and concerns need to be attended to by the church.

JENNIFER BIRD

Church, Concepts and Life: Names for the Church. The NT word for “church” is the Greek ekklesia, which was the common word used for an “assembly” of citizens and of people in a group. In the NT, ekklesia simply refers to an “assembly” of believers. The Syriac idhta is very close in meaning to ekklesia, although it is also used for the building, along with haykla, a common word for palace or temple (with rich symbolism). Both the Greek ekklesia and the Latin ecclesia are also reflected in the Romance languages (chiesa, église, iglesia, igreja). The term gereja, used for “church” in Bahasa Malaysia and Bahasa Indonesia, comes from the Portuguese igreja.

The German Kirche, Swedish kyrka, and English “church” are derived (through the Gothic) from the Greek kyriakon, signifying the “Lord’s house” or “community.” The Celtic domnach is similarly derived from the Latin dominicum, “domain” (of the Lord).

There are many other names for “church” in various languages related to particular cultures. For example, the Romanian biserica comes from the Latin basilica. The Chichewa (Malawi) kachisi is the word originally used for African* Religion traditional shrines. The Chinese jiao-hui, a term foreign to Chinese culture, was coined by missionaries, combining jiao (teaching or religion) and hui (an assembly of people or a place).

Church, Concepts and Life: Types of Ecclesiastical Structures. When one considers the way in which authority* is exercised, one can distinguish five types of Christian churches.

1. Episcopalian (based on the NT references to bishops*). Authority is exercised within a hierarchy, with the bishop at the apex of the pyramid, as in the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Orthodox churches, although they differ significantly.

The Roman Catholic Church is highly centralized, with the pope* as the supreme head of a global organization (elected in a conclave of cardinals) and with Rome as the center of administrative authority.

The Anglican Communion (including the Church of England) is much less centralized. It is organized in dioceses, each with a bishop, grouped in provinces, each with an archbishop (elected by both clergy and lay leaders), who presides over a synod deliberating on policy, ritual, and organizational matters of the Church but who does not have jurisdiction over dioceses other than his or her own. The Lambeth* Conference of Anglican Bishops (in London, every 10 years since 1888) deliberates on matters of mutual concern, but with no juridical authority over bishops and dioceses; yet the consensus affirmed by its resolutions is authoritative.

The Orthodox* churches, headed by patriarchs*, are organized in dioceses under bishops that function autonomously but in communion with each other. Autocephalous* Orthodox churches, such as the Russian Orthodox Church, are “self-headed,” with their own patriarchs and synods of bishops, an administrative independence that does not deny spiritual unity.

2. Presbyterian (based on the NT references to elders*). The Council of Elders (Presbyters) exercises church authority. From the local to the national level, there are layers of representation, culminating in the General Assembly, where policy decisions are made. The moderator of the General Assembly is elected for a limited period (one to five years). National Presbyterian churches, e.g. the Church of Scotland*, are joined together in the World* Alliance of Reformed Churches. Though they have bishops, Lutheran churches (and their World* Lutheran Federation) and Methodist churches (and their World Methodist Council) nevertheless have chains of authority that are related to the Presbyterian type; the bishops’ authority is derived from and is exercised along with the representative body (synod or conference).

3. Congregational (based on the NT references to local churches functioning by consensus as the body of Christ; e.g. 1 Cor 12; Rom 12). Authority is vested in each specific congregation, which periodically “constitutes itself as a business meeting” to make decisions on the governance of all aspects of the church. The pastor is hired, dismissed, remunerated, and disciplined by the congregation. Baptist churches as well as those with the label “Congregational” belong to this group.

4. Charismatic Leadership (based on NT texts such as Acts 2; 1 Cor 12). In this model, despite those texts that emphasize the charismata of all believers, authority is vested in a charismatic leader. When the leader loses charismatic power, the leadership role is immediately withdrawn and handed over to another leader in whom the congregation recognizes significant charismatic gifts. Many African Instituted Churches (AICs) have this charismatic leadership structure and are associated with specific charismatic leaders or founders, e.g. the Deliverance Church and the Redeemed Gospel Church (Kenya), the Kimbanguist* Church (Democratic Republic of Congo), and the Church of Prophet Harris (West Africa). Many megachurches* in the USA, tropical Africa, Central America (e.g. Tabernaculo Biblico Bautista – Baptist Tabernacle, El Salvador), and South Korea also have this charismatic leadership structure.

5. Charismatic*/Pentecostal (based on NT texts such as Acts 2; 1 Cor 12). Authority emanates from the Holy Spirit and is vested in any believer who is moved by the Spirit and receives charismatic gifts for the edification of the community. The Charismatic leadership is thus decentralized, counting on the Spirit-driven leadership of many of its members – who play important roles as leaders of cell groups – rather than that of a single leader. Such is the case of thousands of small Charismatic churches, and also of the biggest megachurches, such as Yoido Full Gospel (Seoul, South Korea) and Mision Elim Internacional (Ilabasco, El Salvador).

These five types of ecclesiastical organization are based on NT patterns, although none actually replicate the apostolic church, because their organization reflects the cultural context in which they developed. The Roman Catholic Church places great importance on central authority not only because of NT models, but also because it took over imperial authority when the Roman Empire declined. Anglicanism was established in defiance of papal authority by King Henry VIII. The Church of Scotland adopted the Presbyterian polity*, in conformity with a nonhierarchical Scottish culture. Congregationalist churches flourish in individualist cultural settings (among the rising middle class in early-17th-c. England, and spreading to North America). Charismatic leadership and Charismatic/Pentecostal churches are the most inculturated* – be they African Instituted Churches, US megachurches proclaiming a Prosperity* Gospel (see Word-Faith Movement, Its Theology and Worship), or Korean or Salvadoran mega-Charismatic churches that call people to faithfully live the full gospel by expressing it in terms of elements of their cultural and religious heritage. See also POLITY.

JESSE NDWIGA KANYUA MUGAMBI

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Church, Concepts and Life: In African Instituted Churches. AICs are Christian bodies in Africa (c60 million members) “instituted” as a result of African “initiatives” in search of “independence” from missionary domination.

Three types of AICs can be distinguished. Ethiopian churches, the earliest, originated in the 19th-c. pan-African “Ethiopian Movement” (Ethiopia representing noncolonized Africa; Ps. 68:31); they emphasized African leadership, and thus “independence” from missionary churches, while keeping most of the theological views and practices of these churches. The much larger Zionist churches, with roots in US Pentecostalism, quickly had an exclusively African leadership and are more thoroughly inculturated*, drawing on African* Religion. Apostolic churches (or Prophetic churches) were and are “initiated” by Spirit-inspired African apostles, such as Simon Kimbangu* in Congo* (both DRC and Congo-Brazzaville, from 1921) and John Maranke in Zimbabwe (from 1932).

Today most AICs are independent and indigenous Charismatic* churches. They emphasize the importance of Spirit possession, dreams, visions, and speaking in tongues*; they practice healing* and exorcism* of evil spirits and other evil powers. Because of their inculturation* (whether or not they practice polygamy* and African dietary taboos), AICs appeal to Africans through their interpretation of Scripture* (both OT and NT) and their worship using African symbols, music, and dance.

TABONA SHOKO

Church, Concepts and Life: In Asia. The concept of “church” in Asia has been shaped by both external and internal factors, such as movements for national independence, the necessity of interreligious dialogue with neighbors of other religious traditions, and the ecumenical experience in the context of mission.

The struggle for independence triggered a reconceptualization of the church as local and suffused by the cultural context. The May Fourth Movement and the socialist experience in China*, for example, led to the understanding of church as self-governing, self-propagating, and self-supporting. The indigenous church movements in other parts of the continent moved in the same direction.

The experience of Asian Christians with neighbors of other faiths has led to the realization of the church as a “community in dialogue*.” The Federation of Asian Bishops’ Conferences has turned dialogue into a key element for understanding the church in Asia, and according to it, the church fulfills its mission through a threefold dialogue with Asian religions*, Asian cultures*, and the Asian poor*. The minority situation in which almost all Asian churches find themselves (except in the Philippines*) has led them to a self-understanding of their life as that of a “little flock” (Luke 12:32) and their mission as that of salt and leaven (Matt 5:13, 13:33). This self-understanding of the church has served as a great force in overcoming the historically inherited division of churches and moving toward various kinds of ecumenical union. It is significant that in the context of mission the unified Church of South* India (1947) was formed from three churches that are nowhere else in union. From a theological point of view, the understanding of church in Asia has been enriched by the institution of family* – so central to the Confucian* tradition – the experience of Buddhist* sangha (community) of equals, and the Hindu* concept of vasudevakudumbam (the family of the Lord).

FELIX WILFRED

Church, Concepts and Life: House Churches.

See CHINESE CONTEMPORARY INDEPENDENT AND HOUSE CHURCHES.

Church, Concepts and Life: In Latin America. The life of the Roman Catholic Church in present-day Latin America can be understood when one keeps in mind that it has gone through four political periods: predominance of liberalism, populism, predominance of dictatorships, and openings toward democracy.

Beginning in the late 19th c., the role of the Roman Catholic Church in colonial times was challenged by liberal governments and by Latin American societies influenced by modernization and laicization*; debates started in the press and in parliaments. The national states, economically liberal and politically conservative, sought to reduce the sphere of influence of the Church to private life. The life of the faithful tended to be limited to family, parish, and denominational schools. During this period, lay leaders gathered primarily to argue about the marginal role of the Church in the modern world.

In the 1920s, the existing orientation toward social issues deepened. Social organizations, unions, and Catholic political parties were established more or less successfully in different countries, achieving a massive mobilization of lay Catholics as members of Catholic organizations – first Catholic* Action, then Specialized Catholic Action movements for youth, university students, workers, and peasants; these movements provided opportunities for participation, formation, and social commitment. The radical commitment of lay Christian groups to sharing in the struggle of the poor*, the workers, and the often landless peasants led them to resist the bloody repression unleashed by the military dictatorships of Latin America starting in the 1960s, often supported by the Church hierarchy. The resulting breakup between hierarchy and laypeople of the Roman Catholic Church led to a long and difficult reorganization of the laity that began with the arrival of democracies.

The democratic context favored the pluralization of the religious sphere. Different church groups – neo-Christian or para-Christian groups; Protestant* (or “Evangelical” in Latin American terminology), Charismatic* and Pentecostal* (in Latin America, the latter term is the inclusive designation for all Charismatics and Pentecostals), Native* American, and African* American churches, as well as Orientalist and New* Age groups – gained an unprecedented visibility starting in the 1980s. This pluralization is also found inside the Roman Catholic Church, with the rise of lay movements with different liturgical, doctrinal, and theological positions, reflecting their various social milieus. All these movements within the Catholic Church are themselves quite diversified, and they include various groups of militants; yet their members remain deeply identified and committed to their movements, which occupy a growing position within the overall Roman Catholic Church and project with force their claims in the public sphere.

VERÓNICA GIMÉNEZ BELIVEAU

Church, Concepts and Life: In Latin America: Brazil: Base Ecclesial Communities (CEBs). (Portuguese, Comunidades Eclesiais de Base). During the 1960s, a “communitarian wave” swept over the Roman* Catholic Church in Brazil, in reaction to the strictly institutional conception of the Church that predominated. This new conception of “church” entered Brazil through the Movement for a Better World and its teaching aimed at renewing pastoral practice along three axes: affirming the value of the laity* and the ministry of laypeople, decentralizing parish responsibilities (previously centered on the parish priest), and gathering authentic Christian communities characterized by faith, worship, and charity (social work). This ecclesiological ideal was widely welcomed in Brazil. It was implemented in some traditional ecclesial communities but developed beyond these after becoming an explicit objective of the 1966 United Pastoral Plan of the National Conference of Brazilian Bishops (CNBB) following the Second Vatican* Council.

Base ecclesial communities became more independent in the 1970s, frequently connecting traditional communities (e.g. “rural chapels*”) with the action of all kinds of “modern pastors” (bishops, priests, sisters, laity formed for Catholic* Action, theologians, and sociologists). The CEBs are small groups, normally established in a neighborhood, slum, village, or rural zone, whose members regularly gather to pray, sing, celebrate, commemorate, read the Bible, and discuss it from the perspective of the life experience and struggles of that population. As Harvey Cox says, its objective is not to reconstruct the traditional communities (with their closed and authoritarian structures), but to bring about a new type of community that embodies the most important “modern freedoms.”

The members of the communities cultivate a new relationship with the Holy One, by developing a new consciousness of the struggles of the people around them and a new ethical and political commitment to participate in their struggles. A CEB can be recognized by the following: (1) Sunday celebrations without a priest, (2) communitarian leadership, (3) biblical reflection groups, and (4) action aimed at transforming life in its context in partnership with social movements. See also BRAZIL; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: VARIOUS ENTRIES ON BRAZIL. SÉRGIO COUTINHO

Church, Concepts and Life: In Latin America: Ecuador: Base Ecclesial Communities (CEBs). Base Ecclesial Communities (Spanish, Comunidades Eclesiales de

Base) are cell groups within the parish that make room for missionary laypeople and their creativity. Formed by families from neighborhoods in communion with the parish priest and the bishop, CEBs believe that the Roman Catholic Church is not merely the hierarchy or the institution. Faith guides CEBs as instruments for the transformation of culture*, for living out a prophetic stance by denouncing organized injustice and proclaiming a new hope for and with the poor*. CEBs promote the spirit of prayer, which is understood to be the key to conversion*. Although all members are facilitators, they work with leaders who are approved and qualified by the communitarian process to serve the CEB. CEBs started in the Riobamba Diocese (1962). At present, they are active in at least 10 ecclesiastical jurisdictions in Ecuador. There are also specialized groups called "Extension Teams of CEBs" (1985). CEBs are not juridically considered movements within the Roman Catholic Church, because their dynamics vary, depending on the families and communities involved. Although some fear them, CEBs have taken a position against "diseased apostolic fervor" that leads to sectarian cults rather than to a church as a communion of members. Indeed, CEBs see as part of their mission rediscovery of the Catholic Church.

LUIS MARÍA GAVILANES DEL CASTILLO

Church, Concepts and Life: In North America. The word "church" has three meanings in North America that reflect the operative conceptions of church in contemporary society.

1. The USA and Canada* have no official state religion. The term "church" is sometimes analytically paired with "state" (as in "church* and state") to denote the relationship of all religious entities and belief groups to the state apparatus. In both societies, religious beliefs and associations are protected from governmental interference. Americans and Canadians highly value the separation of church and state, religious liberty, and the right of private judgment in moral matters.

2. "Church" also denotes a body of associated Christians who share ecclesiastical governance, on either a national or transnational basis. Thus Roman Catholics in North America refer to "the church" as the worldwide church headed by the pope; Presbyterians, Baptists, or Mennonites would typically use the same term to refer to their own denominations within a single nation. North American Christians often express concern about the church, by which they mean the chaotic organized life of Christian bodies above the level of local congregations. This phenomenon began in the 1960s; before that time, denominational expressions of Protestantism and national expressions of Catholic bodies were held in high esteem and collectively were remarkably effective in setting a religious tone for public and private morality without violating the principles of church-state separation.
3. By far the most common meaning of the word "church" in contemporary North America is that of a local congregation of believers. In contemporary North American culture, neither is one born into a church by law, nor does a territorial conception of parish* membership operate. Christians are accustomed to thinking of themselves first and foremost as members of a particular congregation, and refer to themselves as members, e.g., of St. Matthew's Church or New Life Christian Fellowship. This local identification has come at the expense of enduring association with theological and ecclesial traditions. Thus in this mobile culture, people may choose to belong to a Lutheran Church in one location and join an Episcopal Church in another without ever identifying themselves as Lutheran or Anglican. While the clergy of the respective Christian traditions continue to be more associated theologically with the tenets of those expressions of faith, "church" for the laity has become increasingly a matter of a voluntary association with a particular gathered congregation.

JAMES HUDNUT-BEUMLER

Church, Concepts and Life: In Western European Theology.

The Roman Catholic Hans Küng's The Church (1967) elaborated on many key insights of Vatican II's Lumen Gentium, including the idea of the church as the people of God, church-in-the-making, work for the unity of the church, and the call to open up to society and world religions. The Reformed* Jürgen Moltmann's The Church in the Power of the Spirit (1977) similarly advocated a participatory, nonhierarchical, charismatically structured, and open view of the church. In "relational ecclesiology," the church never exists for itself but is always in relation to God and the world; therefore it is a serving, missionary church. Both Küng and Moltmann underline the charismatic* structure of the church and the charismata/charisms* of its members. For Moltmann the church is a "charismatic fellowship" of equal persons, without division between office bearers and people. Moltmann's ecclesiology searches for equality and justice among church members and also among all men and women. The Triune God as a society of equals is the model. While a hierarchical notion of the Trinity* leads to a hierarchical view of the church, an open Trinity enhances openness, mutual respect, and loyalty.

Building on the biblical and patristic tradition, the Greek Orthodox John Zizioulas's Being as Communion (1985) argues that all true personal existence happens in relationality, communion. Even the mode of the existence of the Triune God is relational. Thus becoming Christian means a move from "biological individualism" to an "ecclesial personhood." Communion ecclesiology soon established its place as an ecumenical conviction across denominational borders.

The Croatian Miroslav Volf entered the most foundational debate in contemporary ecclesiology: What is the ecclesiality of the church? What makes the church, church?

The extreme views are represented by catholic churches (Roman and Eastern) and free or independent* churches. Unlike the former, independent churches do not require a bishop (or a priest ordained by a bishop) to ensure the presence of Christ; the presence of Christ is "ensured by faith response" apart from any officers. In the Roman Catholic tradition, Christ's presence is mediated sacramentally*, and the bishop or priest is needed to preside over the Eucharist; by contrast, independent churches speak of Christ's unmediated, "direct" presence in the entire local communion. Volf's own "ecumenical" free church view holds that while Christ's presence cannot be tied to either offices or sacraments (catholic churches), the mediation of faith is also not individualistic or absolutely unmediated. The mediation of faith happens in the community, via tradition and all church members, and not merely via ordained persons. For faith to be personal, there must be a genuine appropriation of the faith of the church.

The former missionary bishop Lesslie Newbigin has been a key voice in developing the emerging ecumenical idea of the church's missionary nature. Rather than being one of the tasks of the church, mission* is the very being of the church. When the church takes seriously its faith in the gospel as "public truth," mission flows out of its confident, yet humble and respectful sharing of the good news to all people. The flip side of the "logic of mission" is that the church that keeps the good news for itself compromises its own being as the bearer of the gospel. For Newbigin the missionary church by its very nature advocates the unity of the church. The Lutheran Wolfhart Pannenberg's Systematic Theology, which includes a significant ecumenical ecclesiology of contemporary times, argues that unless the church reconciles its divisions, it has little hope of convincing the world and other religions of the supremacy of the gospel.

VELI-MATTI KÄRKÄINEN

Church Discipline is the exercise of the "power of the keys" (Matt 16:19), the power to "bind* and loose" (Matt 16:19, 18:18). Excommunication* seems originally to have resulted in permanent expulsion from the community for the sake of its purity; Hermas* claimed a special revelation permitting one repentance* for serious sins, and this became the practice of the early church (see Penance and Forgiveness).

In Celtic Christianity,* the conviction arose that no sin was beyond penance* and restoration, although the penalties listed in the so-called penitentials* were severe. The practice of secret confession, engaging in penitential acts, and being readmitted to Communion spread throughout the Western Church; uniformity was achieved at the Fourth Lateran* Council (1215). Church discipline became especially severe under the Inquisition*, whose stated purpose was to identify heretics* and seek their full repentance.

At the time of the Reformation*, Luther* reaffirmed the need for repentance but reconceived it with his doctrine of justification* by faith. In the Reformed* churches, discipline was often made a third “mark of the church,” along with the proclamation of the Word and the right administration of the sacraments; here discipline was exercised by the consistory* or session*, which included lay elders* as well as the minister.

Wherever a single church is recognized and supported by government, church discipline has serious consequences in everyday life. Under conditions of religious freedom*, however, civil courts usually do not interfere with the disciplinary judgments of religious bodies. Church membership* means that one places oneself under the discipline of the religious body, but it is always possible to renounce its jurisdiction and transfer to a different denomination. Discipline remains an important feature of church life, especially for ordained ministers, whose work and livelihood depend on remaining in good standing within the denomination.

EUGENE TESELLE

Church of the East, or Assyrian Church.

This branch of the Syriac Christian Church traditionally traces its roots to Addai, a 1st-c. disciple of the apostle Thomas, who was said to have come to Mesopotamia (according to the Doctrine of Addai, c400) and to have authored an important early liturgy, still in use in this church (see Addai and Mari, Liturgy of). In any case, Syriac-speaking Christians were well enough established to hold a synod at Seleucia-Ctesiphon (Persia) in c325, and another in 410, where they declared independence from the Church of Antioch* and organized themselves under the leadership of their own catholicos*. The 5th-c. christological controversies hardened this jurisdictional division into a theological one when the Church of the East allied itself with the School of Antioch – Diodore* of Tarsus, Theodore* of Mopsuestia, and Nestorius* – whence the erroneous designation of this church as “Nestorian.” These Greek theologians’ writings had been translated into Syriac by Ibas* of Edessa (early 5th c.). After the condemnation of Nestorius (Council of Ephesus*, 431) and the closing of the school of Edessa* (489), the last teachers joined the school at Nisibis*, where they refined and developed Nestorius’s Christology (Jesus’ humanity and divinity were joined by will, not by nature or hypostasis; yet the conjunction is so intimate that Jesus and the Word become one person, not two) and other doctrines in dialogue with the poetry of Ephrem* (praising the mystery* of the Incarnation*) and other traditional Syriac exegetical and liturgical materials. Another refugee from Edessa, Barsauma*, bishop of Nisibis, then catholicos, summoned a synod (Beth Lapat, 484), which affirmed Nestorius’s teaching and advised monastics and clergy to marry. Despite efforts to stress monastic life and the teachings of Origen* (late 6th c.), the Antiochene Christology prevailed in the form articulated by Babai the Great (d628).

The Church of the East survived and prospered under Persian and Abbasid Muslim rules, producing scholars learned in medicine, philosophy, and science. Their translations from Greek to Syriac and later into Arabic provided the basis for later Muslim scholarship. A prolific missionary church, it had branches in India*, China*, and central Asia, and produced writings that constituted early evidence of attitudes toward other religions.

A 15th-c. dispute over the patriarchal succession led to overtures to the Roman Catholic Church, resulting in a uniate* branch of the Church of the East, the Chaldean* Church. Political tensions after World War I led to the relocation of the patriarchate to the West (presently in Chicago); many members of the Chaldean Church still reside in Middle Eastern countries, although less and less so in Iraq*.

KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Church of England. See ANGLICANISM CLUSTER: ANGLICAN COMMUNION AND ITS THEOLOGY.

CHURCHES AND DENOMINATIONS

See ADVENTISM; AFRICAN AMERICAN CLUSTER; AFRICAN INSTITUTED CHURCHES CLUSTER; AMISH; ANABAPTIST MOVEMENT; ANGLICANISM CLUSTER; ASSEMBLIES OF GOD; BAPTIST CHURCHES CLUSTER; BOHEMIAN BRETHREN; BRETHREN; CHALDEAN CATHOLIC CHURCH; CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER; CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST); CHRISTIAN SCIENCE; CHURCH OF THE EAST OR ASSYRIAN CHURCH; CHURCH OF GOD IN CHRIST; CONGREGATIONALISM; EVANGELICALS/EVANGELICALISM CLUSTER; FRIENDS, RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF; GERMAN CHRISTIANS; HOLINESS MOVEMENT; HUGUENOTS; HUTTERITES; JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES; KIMBANGUISM; KIRISHITANS AND HIDDEN CHRISTIANS IN JAPAN; LATTER-DAY SAINTS, CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF; LUTHERANISM CLUSTER; MALABAR CHRISTIANS; MARONITE CHURCH; MEGACHURCH MOVEMENT; MELKITES; MENNONITES; METHODISM CLUSTER; MORAVIAN CHURCH; NAZARENE, CHURCH OF THE; NORTH INDIA, CHURCH OF; OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH; ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER; ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER; PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENT; PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENT CHURCH; PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER; REFORMED CHURCHES; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER; SALVATION ARMY; SCOTLAND, CHURCH OF; SCOTLAND, FREE CHURCH OF; SHAKERS; SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION; SOUTH INDIA, CHURCH OF; SYRIAC CATHOLIC CHURCH; SYRIAC ORTHODOX CHURCH, UNIVERSAL; UNIATE CHURCHES; UNIFICATION CHURCH; UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THE PHILIPPINES; UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (IN THE UNITED STATES); WALDENSES; WORD-FAITH MOVEMENT

Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), formed in 1886 in eastern Tennessee; quickly became Pentecostal and a “channel for Pentecostal revival.” It claims to have a worldwide membership of more than 6 million (2004) with a presence in nearly 150 countries. See also PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENT, ITS HISTORY AND THEOLOGY; PENTECOSTAL WORSHIP.

Church of God in Christ, a global denomination, in 58 countries (in Africa, Asia, South America, and Europe) and a major presence in the USA, has 3 million members worldwide (in 2000). Beginning in 1897 as a Holiness* fellowship among black Baptist churches in the “mid-South” USA (as the middle southern states are called in the South), it was led by Charles Price Jones, Charles Harrison Mason, and Walter S. Pleasant, who preached the doctrine of sanctification*. “Disfellowshipped” by the Baptists (1899), these leaders organized independent congregations. From 1899 to 1906, the fellowship grew throughout the mid-South and surrounding states and elected Jones (1906) to head the Church of God in Christ, a nondenominational Holiness fellowship of more than 110 congregations.

Mason, dismissed from Jones’s fellowship (1907) after embracing Pentecostalism*, organized the Church of God in Christ as a Pentecostal* body, being elected its first “general overseer.” Lizzie Woods Robinson, appointed (1911) by Mason, organized and led the “Women’s Department,” a laywomen’s auxiliary and a council of women evangelists and missionaries.

Initially, Mason’s Church of God in Christ (COGIC) consisted of interracial networks. Mason led the central network of predominately black congregations and permitted four white-led networks of white congregations to associate with COGIC (1909–32), although one white network left to form Assemblies* of God (1914). Education has played an important role for COGIC, which has sponsored schools and colleges in the USA and various other countries. The C. H. Mason Theological Seminary (established 1970), an affiliate of the Interdenominational Theological Center, was the first Pentecostal graduate-level seminary in the USA; in the UK, COGIC has sponsored the Calvary Theological College. Throughout the 20th c., COGIC participated both in the Civil* Rights Movement (primarily at the local level) and in various ecumenical ventures (at all levels).

Theologically, the Church of God in Christ stands within the Pentecostal Holiness tradition and holds a range of theological perspectives, ranging from Black Evangelical to Wesleyan, Liberationist*, and Womanist* theology. Scripture* as the authoritative Word of God, salvation* as conversion*, sanctification as a work of grace*, and the baptism* of the Holy Spirit are key to COGIC theology, along with the doctrine of the Trinity, which is focused on the unity of God with the Father as the Creator, Christ as the Savior and

Redeemer*, the Holy Spirit as the Deliverer and Empowerer. Doctrines concerning the Christian life as discipleship*, the church* as the family* of God, and eschatology* (second coming of Christ) are also central. DAVID D. DANIELS III

Churching of Women, attendance at church by women after childbirth for rites of thanksgiving and purification (cf. Lev 12:1–8; Luke 2:22–24).

Church Orders Early Christian writings (e.g. the Didache*, the Apostolic* Church Order, the Didascalia apostolorum*, and the Apostolic* Constitutions) with directions for worship, ordination, and church discipline.

Church of South India. See SOUTH INDIA, CHURCH OF.

CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Church and State Relations

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Church and State Relations in Africa: Central Africa (Malawi)

Church and State Relations in Africa: Islamic Tropical Africa

Church and State Relations in Africa: South Africa

Church and State Relations in Africa: Western Africa

Church and State Relations in Asia: China

Church and State Relations in Asia: The Philippines

Church and State Relations in Eastern Europe: Orthodox Perspective

Church and State Relations in Europe: The Roman Catholic Church and Politics

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Argentina

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Brazil

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Chile

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Colombia

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Cuba

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Mexico

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Uruguay

Church and State Relations in the United States

1) Introductory Entry

Church and State Relations. The Persian conquest of Babylonia (538 BCE) set an influential pattern for the relations between government and religion, institutionalizing religious pluralism. Exiles from Judah were allowed to return, with the priests being responsible for governing the Jews in the Persian Empire (Ezra 1:1–5, 5:13–14, 6:3–5; Isa 44:28, 45:1–14). The so-called millet system applied to other religious groups as well. Greek and then Roman conquerors of the East inherited this pattern and thus grudgingly tolerated Judaism, despite its rejection of all other cults. After the Islamic conquests, the millet system was adopted, tolerating the “peoples of the Book.”

Christians tried at first to utilize the rights that Jews already had, but when the Romans became aware of their differences, the persecutions* began. After Constantine’s* legalization of Christianity, three alternative approaches to “church and state” emerged (4th c.): differentiation, the state withdrawing from religious issues and offering freedom of religion; state over church, the state regulating religion to preserve public order (traditional Roman views of government authority, augmented by the growing ideology that rulers had been chosen by God); and church over state, the church asserting its freedom from the state, refusing to tolerate what it declared to be paganism* or heresy*, and exercising discipline over baptized emperors as “sons of the church.”

In the West, these three basic approaches were explicitly debated from the time of Charlemagne* and Louis* the Pious. A differentiation of church and state was based on their different tasks and modes of governance; royal supremacy, reinforced by the anointing* of rulers, often achieved important reforms of church life; and papal supremacy grew from the time of Gregory* VII until the excesses of Boniface* VIII, resulting in a new differentiation championed by Dante*, Marsilius* of Padua, and William* of Ockham.

The Reformation* was often carried out by civil authorities. The Erastian* theory (the state should carry out the functions of Christian discipline) gave to civil magistrates many of the powers previously exercised by the church, and in the Church of England the ruler was declared "head of the church" (see United Kingdom). Where Protestant churches were persecuted, especially in France and the Netherlands, self-government by the church and differentiation from the state emerged. In the Catholic world, papal authority came to be limited by Gallicanism*, by the growing theory of "indirect power," and by Patronato* in colonial regions.

A fully secular* state emerged after the French Revolution, with parallel developments in the USA that ended the "establishment*" of religion and guaranteed religious liberty* to all. Today religious conservatives often accuse the secular state of promoting its own religion of "secular humanism" and claim that religious freedom can be preserved only if the state supports religious institutions. The liberal response is to champion religious pluralism* in a secular state. See also POLITICAL STUDIES OF CHRISTIANITY; POLITICAL THEOLOGY.

EUGENE TESELLE

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Church and State Relations in Africa: Central Africa (Malawi). The African* Religion usually does not perceive a radical divide between politics and religion, seeing them as two sides of the same coin. Therefore, the separation of church and state is not an African idea; it came with colonialism* and imperialism.

Under colonial administration, missionaries often represented the people in the councils of government; consequently, conflicts arose. Certain missionaries challenged and exposed the injustices perpetrated by Western colonialists against African peoples. Thus government officials began to look at missionaries with suspicion. However, African Christian leaders, like John Chilembwe and Elliot Kamwana, who worked independently of the missions in Nyasaland (now Malawi*), were viewed as most threatening. John Chilembwe eventually led an armed attack on white settlers, and Kamwana was arrested and deported.

In Malawi, under the one-party rule (1964–94), the churches were told by President Hasting Kamuzu Banda not to engage in politics, because their function was a spiritual one. The Jehovah* Witnesses refused to support the party and were exiled. When the oppression worsened, the churches spoke out, led by the Catholic bishops (1991). Negotiation with the government led to a democratic multiparty political system (1994); since then, as Malawians like to say, "the power of the church has been recognized and feared."

Democracy* has empowered the churches to take prophetic stances toward the state, and the state seeks to have the churches on its side by trying to bribe church leaders with personal gifts. Claiming to be apolitical because they are concerned with spiritual matters only, some churches are passive and thus support the status quo, while others respond to the state in reactionary ways for lack of theological grounding. But whenever the churches have acted truly prophetically, they have provided a viable alternative voice for liberation*.

AUGUSTINE MUSOPOLE

Church and State Relations in Africa: Islamic Tropical Africa. Relations between church and state in Islamic tropical Africa are as varied as the doctrinal and ideological persuasions of the various denominations and groups of both Christianity and Islam*. Significantly, these relations are dependent on local and wider political contexts.

In theory Islam is a "complete way of life"; there is no separation between private and public, sacred and secular, mosque and state. Conscious and aggressive attempts have been made to implement this teaching, an example being the Islamic theocratic states established by the jihadists (18th–19th c.) in West Africa. The most famous was the Sokoto Caliphate in present-day Northern Nigeria. In today's Islamic tropical Africa, even though the theocratic model remains an attraction to radical Muslim groups, all countries with a Muslim majority have secular constitutions. Nevertheless, unlike the early 1960s, because of the Muslims' new political awareness it is now almost unthinkable to have a non-Muslim head of state in any of the majority-Muslim countries in tropical Africa.

On the Christian side, the Biblical dictum "Give to Caesar what belongs to Caesar and to God what belongs to God" remains theoretically operative as the basis for the separation between church and state or secularism. In practice, although all majority-Christian countries in tropical Africa have secular constitutions, there have been instances of very close relations, if not marriage, between church and state. These include countries like Ethiopia* with its long intertwined relationship between the Orthodox Patriarchate and the imperial monarchy; the relationship between the Dutch Reformed Church and the apartheid regime in South* Africa; and Frederick Chiluba's presidency in Zambia* (late 1990s). Many African heads of state and church leaders have had and continue to have "opportunistic relationships." On the whole, the church and the state function as partners in development in tropical Africa.

JOHN ALEMBILLAH AZUMAH

Church and State Relations in Africa: South Africa. With the transition from apartheid to democracy (1994) led by President Nelson Mandela, in most instances the way the churches related to the government shifted from resistance (to the apartheid government) to assistance (of the democratic government). Through critical solidarity, the churches support initiatives that promote justice*, peace*, and democracy*, while continuing to protest unjust policies and protecting the vulnerable and minority groups. Critical solidarity, based on Liberation* and Reconstruction* theologies and the preferential* option for the poor*, led churches to participate through their members in the nurturing of democracy as part of their quest for a political system closer to the principles of God's household, where justice, peace, dignity, and equality are upheld. Consolidating democracy also included embracing the liberal constitution, establishing a secular state that protects South Africans from both theocracy* and antireligious atheism*.

Critical solidarity also calls churches to obey the country's laws only if they are not contrary to God's laws (Acts 4:19, 5:29). The churches also base their participation on Ps 24:1: "The earth is the Lord's and all that is in it," bringing together ecclesial and societal issues.

The churches interact with the state through the South African Council of Churches and through the National Religious Leaders Forum, which includes representatives from most religious bodies. The churches' pastoral responsibilities include accompanying the newly established democratic nation through a crucial process of confession, forgiveness, healing, reconciliation, transformation, and reconstruction. Yet there is always the danger that churches will be coopted by the state, a danger overcome when they are totally committed to championing the needs of the poor, to being sensitive to their aspirations, and to helping restore their hope and dignity by holding the state and its representatives accountable to basic principles of good governance and democracy.

SIMANGA R. KUMALO

Church and State Relations in Africa: Western Africa. The advent of Christian churches in West Africa is closely related to colonialism*; Africans perceived church and colonialism as mutually reinforcing. Indeed, for both colonizers and missionaries, everything about the African peoples' culture* was satanic and worthless. At this stage, the state was run by colonial masters whose attitudes reinforced those of the missionaries. Church and state were in a mutual and cohesive relationship; the church rarely challenged colonial injustice (see Mission Cluster: Mission and Imperialism).

During the 1950s, agitation for nationalism and political independence had a profound effect on African conceptions of Christianity as a foreign imposition. While Western African nationalists were struggling for autonomy from colonial rule on the political and economic scene, African Christians sought ways to reinterpret the Christian message through their African cultural heritage. These goals were reached more rapidly on the spiritual plane; African Christianity came to the fore before political independence in most Western African nations. Significant changes took place in the 1990s with the emergence of political liberalization in many Western African nations (including Nigeria). Most mainline churches (especially the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Methodist churches) actively campaigned against human rights abuses, corruption, and injustice perpetrated by military regimes.

Pentecostal, Charismatic, and African Instituted Churches have distanced themselves from institutional political and social involvements. With their emphasis on faith* and salvation*, they indirectly challenge political structures that are too materialistic. Some of these churches have women as founders and many have women as highly placed leaders, in contrast with the mainline churches, which are male dominated. The African Instituted Churches place great emphasis on the African cultural and religious heritage, still often despised by both the secular administration and the mainline churches. The forces of global capitalism are a great challenge to both church and state in West Africa and elsewhere.

OYERONKE OLAJUBU

Church and State Relations in Asia: China. Relations between church and state became an issue in China only after the establishment of the People's Republic of China (1949). Despite efforts at indigenization during the republican period (1911–49) – Pope Benedict XV's policy of "Sinification" (ordaining Chinese nationals as priests and bishops) and the Protestant "Independent Church Movement" stressing Sinicization and advocating the "Three-Self" principle (self-governing, self-supporting, and self-propagating) – the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches in China remained identified with Western powers.

With the establishment of the People's Republic of China (1949), the Chinese churches were cut off from their connections with foreign congregations or missions, and became self-reliant and autonomous. At first the Chinese Communist Party espoused the Marxist* view of religion as "the opium of the people" that would gradually die out as history progressed. Therefore, the Party denied that religion had any positive value and endeavored to bring about its annihilation, despite the Party's claim to guarantee the free exercise of religion. This tension was exacerbated during the Cultural Revolution (1966–76).

After 1979 the religious situation improved rapidly in an era of reform and openness. The Chinese Communist Party acknowledged ("Document No. 19," 1982) that it had erred on matters regarding religion and was willing to learn lessons from history. Churches were reopened, collective worship was resumed, and the number of believers rapidly grew.

After 1990 the Chinese Communist Party urged government at all levels to fully implement the policy on freedom of faith, to handle religious affairs in accordance with the law, and to actively guide every religion to adapt itself to the socialist society. The implementation of the separation of church and state in China means that churches are not allowed to intervene in any administrative or judicial matters (including marriages*) or in public education, and must confine their practices to religious places; conversely, the state cannot use its authority to establish or repress a religion. Religion is exclusively a personal matter left to each citizen. Religious organizations, as nongovernmental organizations, are operated entirely by the believers themselves. Thus while the Chinese churches cannot impinge on political and economical affairs, they can exert their influence in moral and cultural areas. Churches can exercise religion within a framework constructed by Chinese law. In order to be protected legally and constitutionally, their activities must be patriotic and lawful. See also HONG KONG.

WANG XIAOCHAO

Church and State Relations in Asia: The Philippines.

Relations between church and state in the Philippines have repeatedly changed. During the colonial* period (16th–19th c.), the Roman Catholic Church and the Spanish* government were united under the Patronato*, which gave the Spanish monarchy “the responsibility of promoting, maintaining, and defending the Roman Catholic religion” (De la Costa). This gave civil power to religious authorities, leading to numerous abuses. Separation of church and state was finally introduced during the struggle for independence from Spain (1898). The Malolos Congress (1911), during the US occupation, affirmed, “The State recognizes the freedom and equality of all religions, as well as the separation of Church and State” – an affirmation reflecting a US perspective. The separation of church and state was reaffirmed with Filipino independence (1945). Nonetheless, churches continue to exercise significant political influence, specifically regarding human* rights and development projects. Religious instruction in public schools is an option that can be chosen by parents. The Roman Catholic Church continues to oppose the legalization of abortion* and divorce*, and discourages governmental endorsement of artificial birth* control in family planning and anti-HIV/AIDS campaigns. While Protestant and other non-Catholic churches publicly endorse political candidates during national elections, those elected are consistently Catholic.

VICTOR AGUILAN

Church and State Relations in Eastern Europe: Orthodox Perspective.

The religious map of contemporary Europe still reflects 12 centuries of developments. In the mid-9th c., the Eastern (Byzantine) Roman Empire devised a way to maintain its universal character: the peaceful conversion of neighboring “pagan*” populations to Byzantine* Christianity (Cyril* and Methodius’s mission). Slavo-Byzantine clergy translated the Byzantine ecclesiastic culture into Slavonic. Thus they transmitted the ecclesiastical understanding of the role of the state and its relation to the Eastern Orthodox* Church. The Byzantine ecclesiastical control over Slavic and Romanian* churches in the Middle Ages created the paradoxical situation in which the Church was connected to a state (Constantinople and its emperor) outside the political organization of each region – a situation resisted by local rulers. When the Balkan* States aspired to attain imperial status (13th–14th c.), they tried to replicate Byzantine church–state relations. They borrowed late Byzantine canonical sources (diverging from earlier Byzantine political theology) that described the church as an institution parallel to, or even above, the state (Matthew Blastares’s *Nomocanon).

After the Ottoman conquest of the Balkans, while Eastern patriarchates established a political agreement with the sultan, which allowed a certain degree of ecclesiastical autonomy, Moscow emerged as the political leader of Orthodoxy and gradually developed a particular theory of church–state relations, in which the czar (starting with Peter the Great) was considered head of the Church. This new policy, inspired by Western protestant models, was legitimized by reference to the (initially marginal) concept of “Third Rome,” a representation of muscovite statehood as continuator of Constantinople (“New Rome”). This formula combines ecclesiastical and political organization in an undistinguishable unity (which for Western scholars was already characteristic of Byzantium in the form of “caesaropapism”). This view of the collaboration between church and state was best summarized by Dostoyevsky* (The Brothers Karamazov, Book II, Chap. 5): “The Church is not to be transformed into the State. That is Rome and its dream, the third temptation of the devil. On the contrary, the State is transformed into the Church, will ascend and will become a Church over the whole world [...] the glorious destiny ordained for the Orthodox Church.” Even in the 20th c., the newly autocephalous Orthodox churches in Balkan countries (Greece*, Serbia*, Romania*, Bulgaria*) promoted a mode of close collaboration between (Orthodox) Church and nation-state known by the legal term “symphony,” Orthodoxy becoming part of national identity.

PETRE GURAN

Church and State Relations in Europe: The Roman Catholic Church and Politics. During the 19th and 20th c., i.e. since the Enlightenment* and the French Revolution, church and state relations have undergone fundamental changes. In the context of a pervasive trend from a Christendom* paradigm to the secularization* of politics, a shift occurred from a close church–state relationship, with one privileged church in each state, to a situation of religious pluralism*. Accordingly, the state, at least as a matter of principle, has come to treat all churches and religions equally.

A guiding principle throughout Christian history has been Christ’s saying (Mark 12:17, par.), “Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s and to God the things that are God’s.” In the Roman Catholic tradition, the various interpretations of this teaching agree on a common core: the church is not meant to replace the state (theocracy* is excluded), but the state’s claim to obedience is strictly limited. The state must leave room for the “obedience of faith” toward God. In the 20th c., this aspect came to the fore in the opposition of the Roman Catholic Church to the totalitarian regimes of the Soviet bloc and Nazi Germany.

However, the road to championing modern democratic* values was a long and troubled one. The 19th-c. relations of Catholics with politics in European countries reflected anti-democratic habits and alliances with reactionary forces that hampered the process. Conversely, many governments (Protestant or “liberal” anti-clerical ones) passed hostile legislation encroaching on the rights of the Roman Catholic Church. Lay Catholics then often took advantage of the possibilities of a state’s liberal constitution. They formed pressure groups or even political parties to promote Catholic positions in matters such as education*, marriage* and divorce* or the activities of religious* orders.

Relations with the different governments were not uniform, though the starting position of the Roman Catholic Church in the aftermath of the French Revolution was bleak everywhere. Napoleon Bonaparte was an unlikely benefactor. However, in his design to fortify imperial France, he enlisted the authority of Pope Pius VII in the Concordat* of 1801. He pressured the pope to redraw the map of France’s dioceses* and reduce their number. The long-term upshot was an unprecedented acceptance of the pope’s jurisdiction by Catholics, even in local affairs (“Roman centralization,” Ultramontanism*, the First Vatican* Council, 1870). It meant that, henceforth, should any nation wish to obtain concessions or agreements from its Catholics, its government would have to deal with Rome (*Kulturkampf). In the 20th c., concordats loomed large, notably the 1929 Lateran Agreements between Pope Pius XI and Benito Mussolini (which created Vatican City as a tiny independent state within Rome) and the ambivalent Concordat of 1933 with Hitler (see Germany).

Meanwhile, changes were under way in the thinking of European Catholics. World War II stimulated the commitment to democracy* as the political system most in accord with human* dignity and rights. The cold war brought the eastern half of Europe under the domination of the Soviet Union and underscored the evils of totalitarianism. During the pontificate (1958–63) of Pope John* XXIII, contacts were made even with the Kremlin. The breakthrough, however, came with the pope from Poland (1978–2005), John* Paul II. During his pontificate, the unexpected took place: the Iron Curtain fell. By the year 2000, the European Union (EU), encompassing many Eastern and Western European states, came into being. All nation-members of the EU are committed to “freedom of thought, conscience and religion.” The European bishops* had insisted on this in line with the Second Vatican* Council and its historic Declaration on Religious Freedom (1965). See also CHRISTIAN DEMOCRATIC PARTIES.

PAUL MISNER

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Argentina. Ecclesiastic and political powers have been interconnected in a fluid way in Argentine life. The demands that the institution of the Roman Catholic Church placed on the state required, in reciprocity, the legitimating recognition of political authorities by the Church. This interaction continues in the present.

Although Roman Catholicism has not been established as the “state religion,” this has not prevented the Catholic Church from being an active presence in the political sphere, especially since the 1853 Constitution, which protects “freedom of worship” (Articles 14 and 20). In this limited sense, the “patronage” policy (see Patronato) continued until 1966. The autonomy of the Roman Catholic Church, including freedom to appoint its own bishops, does not mean that the Church is detached from its context, and is not subject to pressures from public opinion and the state (as was the case in the 1970s). Conversely, with the end of Patronato, the Roman Catholic Church gained institutional independence, yet kept its overall goals, which it pursued, when necessary, by pressuring public authorities.

This type of relation between the Roman Catholic Church and the state continued in the 1970s following the law (No. 21,745), under General Videla’s military government, that demanded the national registration of worship services (1977, still enforced) as a way of bureaucratically controlling religious groups, especially those that were not Catholic. Yet the 1994 constitutional reform (Article 76) abrogated the requirement that to be president one must “belong to the Catholic communion,” although the fact that the Argentine legislation does not stipulate religious freedom suggests that the Roman Catholic Church still has a privileged place in the life of Argentina. From this perspective, the state constitutionally guaranteed “support of the Roman Catholic and apostolic worship” (Article 2). See also ARGENTINA.

HUMBERTO HORACIO CUCCHETTI

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Brazil. Understanding the relationship between Catholicism and politics first requires recognizing that the Roman Catholic Church is an institution. As Scott Mainwaring shows about Brazil, different “church models” lead to different conceptions of the institutional interests of the Roman Catholic Church. Internal changes in the Church bring about changes in church models that result from conflicts among groups with different conceptions of the Christian faith and of the mission of the Church. The relationship between church and state varies accordingly.

The first phase of the institutional history of the Roman Catholic Church in Brazil (1500–1822) took place under the Padroado* system. In this political regime, granted by the popes, the control of the ecclesiastical sphere – the control of the Church as an institution – was in the hands of the Portuguese sovereigns. Since the political sphere had control over church matters, in turn church leaders sought to influence political authorities. During the process of independence (1822, and the consolidation of the Brazilian Empire, under the constitutional monarchy of Pedro I), some of the clergy initially were strongly influenced by liberal and Gallican* thought and defended the special rights of the monarch with respect to the Brazilian Church and the Church’s administrative independence from Rome. Yet the Brazilian Episcopate defended a greater autonomy of the Church from the state in pastoral questions and closer ties with Rome. Despite their conflicting church models, both groups defended the monarchy as the best political system to promote and maintain social order.

After the establishment of the Republic (1890–1945), the influence of the Roman Catholic Church declined; basic teachings were modified, in part, to protect the traditional interests of the Church in society. Most importantly, political struggles, including those during periods of dictatorship, and broad social movements contributed to the transformation of the "faith-vision" of sizable sections of the Church (1964–95). Deep concerns for the poor* and for social* justice* became an integral part of these groups' new vision of the mission of the Church, aimed at transforming the social order, mainly through Base* Ecclesial Communities.

However, as a result of the process of re-democratization in Brazil, the crisis of socialism, and the centralization promoted by the Roman Catholic Church, another model of church and state relations seems to have emerged in the 1990s and the beginning of the 21st c. See also ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: BRAZIL (VARI-OUS ENTRIES). SÉRGIO COUTINHO

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Chile. Relations between church and state in Chile reflect the historic weight of the Roman Catholic Church, its close ties with the state, and the progressive move toward the autonomy of the state and toward religious pluralism* (20th c.). During the colonial period, the Roman Catholic Church depended on the Spanish crown through the regime of the Patronato*; Christianity legitimized the colonial state, and the state supported and contributed to evangelism. The wars of independence divided the Church, but the new republic maintained the Patronato* and the union of church and state (1833). The conflicts between the Roman Catholic Church and the state (19th c.) stemmed from the Liberals' efforts to guarantee freedom of worship and of education, and civil registry of births, marriages, and deaths, all of which were monopolized at that time by the Roman Catholic Church. The 1925 Constitution separated church and state, but the national culture continued to function as if the Roman Catholic Church were the official state church. The growth of Evangelical churches led to the recognition of religious pluralism during Allende's government (1970–73). After the military state (1973–90), with the process of re-democratization of Chilean society, the government of Eduardo Frei Ruiz Tagle promulgated (1999) the new law that recognizes equal autonomous legal status for all churches.

CRISTIÁN G. PARKER

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Colombia. Colombia is one of the Latin American countries in which the conservative wing of the Roman Catholic Church resisted most powerfully the development of a secular state. The first attempts by the Liberal Party to establish a secular state through a politics of laicization* (1850s) were dismantled by the Conservative Party in 1886. This rejection of laicization was ratified by the Concordat* of 1887 (an agreement between the Roman Catholic Church and the state that is still officially in force, with some modifications). These political structures gave to the Roman Catholic Church as an ecclesial institution numerous social, economic, and political privileges, with an authority comparable to that of modern states in the exercise of their own functions. This privileged situation of the Church and its undeniable authority over citizens contributed to the creation of a state of Christendom*, in which state authorities negotiate with Roman Catholic institutional authorities on equal terms.

In 1936 Liberals tried to modify this confessionalism by instating a separation of church and state that involved suppression of the Roman Catholic Church's privileges and its statelike functions. Yet the Conservatives and the clergy reacted so vehemently against these reforms that by the end of the 1940s these measures had been dismantled. Following these years of painful conflict, the confrontation between Liberals and Conservatives shifted away from religious issues, to the point that both political parties could recognize the Roman Catholic Church as the official religion of Colombia. This agreement between the two parties was confirmed in 1957 by a plebiscite that inaugurated a period of Colombian history known as the National Front, during which Liberals and Conservatives constitutionally decreed that they would alternately govern during four presidential terms. From then on, both parties agreed to dedicate the country to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and to keep the name of God in the preamble to the Constitution.

In spite of this formal recognition of Roman Catholicism as the official religion of Colombia, Colombian society underwent a cultural process of secularization* in the late 20th and early 21st c. that led to a new laical* constitution (1991) that respects religious pluralism*. Thus Catholicism has become one of the religious options in a diversified religious world where the Pentecostal*/Charismatic* Movement plays an increasing role. Nevertheless, the Roman Catholic Church continues to have considerable political power to defend its corporate interests and the political status quo, as well as the place of Catholic morality in Colombian life. See also COLOMBIA.

HELWAR FIGUEROA

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Cuba.

The Roman Catholic Church has not been persecuted in Cuba, contrary to what occurred in the former Eastern European socialist countries. The Cuban Communist regime was more tolerant. Since 1968 the Roman Catholic Church's position has evolved from anti-Communist to detached critical observer. The 1968 Latin American Episcopal Conference in Medellín* and the birth of Liberation* theology made it ideologically possible to link Christian faith and social change. In 1986 the National Cuban Church Meeting took place, and for the first time the Roman Catholic Church agreed to work within the socialist context. At the Fourth Congress of the Cuban Communist Party (1991), the decision was made to abolish all forms of religious discrimination; and in 1992 the constitutional change became a reality, promoting the disassociation of the state from any form of atheism. In November 1996, Fidel Castro had an interview with John* Paul II at the Vatican, followed by the successful visit of the pope to the island (January 1998). During and since this visit, the tone of the relationship between church and state has evolved from one of confrontation toward reconciliation.

ARMANDO LAMPE

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Mexico.

For three centuries, the relations between church and state in Mexico were governed by the Patronato* system, the policy of royal patronage through which the Roman Catholic Church granted sovereignty to the monarchs of Castile over Mexico, including the legal authority and jurisdiction over the Church and its mission. As Mexico began to move toward autonomy, the Constitution of Apatzingán (1814) emphasized the official role of the Roman Catholic Church. Yet since 1821, ongoing tensions have existed between the state and the Church, as modernization promoted by governmental elites has met with resistance from the Church hierarchy.

During the construction of the Mexican state (1821–67), the debate over the legal status of the Roman Catholic Church reflected the conflict between two Masonic lodges (see Freemasonry and Christianity). The Yorkino (Yorkist) Lodge viewed religion as a private matter and envisioned the Roman Catholic Church as a corporation authorized by the state, somewhat as it was under Patronato. The Escoceses (Scottish) Lodge fought for a centralist republic (or monarchy) that would protect the Church and guarantee its central place in the state through a concordat* with the Holy See. Thus in different ways both parties sought to maintain the state-church union; yet subsequently and for different reasons, both favored a separation of church and state.

The 1824 Constitution affirmed the Catholic Church as the state church, with some religious tolerance for other churches. Such tolerance was soon eliminated by the Seven Laws (1836) and the 1842 Constitution, but was restored after the US invasion (1848), but in a way that followed the French model of separation of church and state. The Conservatives, influenced by Ultramontanism*, fought for an actual separation of church and state (though with governmental support for the church) that would free the Roman Catholic Church from the forces of Liberalism and their hegemonic pretensions. The Liberals were influenced by Gallicanism*, the North American views of freedom of religion, and antireligious European thought.

The “reform” of 1856–60 in Mexico was preceded by a period of civil war, during which the Roman Catholic Church was alone able to hold the people together; its hierarchy was respected, immensely rich, and financed by the different governments. Thus after the revolution of Ayutla (1854) that began the “reform,” for economic and ideological reasons the Liberal governments sought to eliminate the dependence of the Church on the Holy See, arguing that it was impossible to be loyal to two sovereignties. They nationalized the Church’s material possessions, removed its status as state church, and limited its presence in daily life. From the perspective of conservative canon* lawyers, these laws transgressed basic liberties. After the promulgation of the Republican Constitution of 1857 – discreetly secular and tolerant – some Conservatives hoped to establish a Catholic monarchy that would reestablish the role of the Catholic Church in protecting the national identity from the threats posed by diverse ideologies and other confessions. But Maximilian of Hapsburg ratified the Laws of Reform, which later (1873) were declared “constitutional” by the victorious Liberals.

Porfirio Díaz’s regime (1876–1910) revived Roman Catholicism and opened the country to new Christian denominations. Catholic* Action inspired by the social doctrine of the Church participated in the political life of Mexico; in addition, the National Catholic Party was founded (1911). But this Catholic political involvement was resented by constitutional Jacobins, who succeeded in establishing a new, secular, anticlerical constitution (1917). Yet the eradication of religion from national life was prevented by the “Cristeros” uprising (1926–29; see Mexico). Thus despite the Constitution, a modus vivendi (until 1980) allowed the Roman Catholic Church to function with its buildings, hospitals, schools, and orphanages, although these were legally nonexistent. During the pontificate of Pope John* Paul II, the anticlerical laws were modified (1992, during the Salinas government) to allow for the legal recognition of religious groups and the civil rights of priests and pastors. These laws recognized that the Mexican state was incomplete if it did not recognize the necessary relationship between the state or society and the churches.

MONICA URIBE and

MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH

Church and State Relations in Latin America: Uruguay.

Relations between church and state became an issue in Uruguay only with the secularization* of the country during the first capitalist modernization (1870–1930; after the Patronato* system). Secularization as the separation of church and state was a reform from the top down, until becoming a national process (early 20th c.). Yet it had deep roots in the 19th c., e.g. in the school reform led by José P. Varela (1877). As José P. Barrán notes, “The secularization of mentalities, customs, institutions, and education (a rapid process) is the primary multi-faceted cultural symptom of early Uruguayan modernity.” The radical transformation of church and state relations through secularization* took two forms:

1. The marginalization of the religious, gradually relegated to the private sphere, was an expression of the modern separation between state and civil society, and between public and private spheres.
2. Official positions strongly critical of any religious hegemony (in this case by the Roman Catholic Church) combined with the transfer of the “sacred” from religious institutions to political institutions progressively brought about a civil religion, with its alternative symbols, doctrines, and rituals, and with civic liturgies aimed at reinforcing national identity and social order.

These two factors quickly transformed the relations between the Roman Catholic Church and the state, and indeed those among religion, politics, and society for Uruguayans. During the past decades, there have been indications that the 19th-c. triumphant Jacobin secularization is losing its credibility for many Uruguayans. Yet nothing indicates that any of the alternatives is more pluralistic and libertarian; actually, the opposite seems to be true. Neither the predominance of a “neo-Christianity” invested by the media with orthodoxy and authority, nor the empire of a New* Age with its individualism prone to a lack of solidarity, nor “pseudo-multiculturalism” with its “everything goes” attitude would be better than the present secularized separation of church and state. GERADO CAETANO

Church and State Relations in the United States are based principally on language in the First Amendment to the Constitution: “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” The Constitution did not create a Christian nation: government is based on the will of “We the People of the United States” (Preamble). The “no establishment principle” means there should be no formal relationship, either positive or negative, between religion and civil authority. Government should neither aid nor hinder religion. All religions, Christian or not, and people of no religion are equal before the law.

The “free exercise principle” means government power may not inhibit or prevent the practice of religion. Not only can citizens believe what they want, but they can put those beliefs into action by attending worship, evangelizing, contributing money, or engaging in religiously motivated social action, all without government interference. Thus religious groups or individuals may try to influence government policy. People of no religious faith can abstain from religious activity. However, government may intervene if religiously motivated behavior is harmful to individuals, groups, or the society as a whole. Because separation of church and state, or religious freedom, is a constitutionally guaranteed right, disputes between religions and government units are settled by courts, the final arbiter being the US Supreme Court. In 1940 (Free Exercise Clause) and 1947 (Establishment Clause) decisions of the Supreme Court applied these federal constitutional principles to state and local laws as well.

Beginning about 1965, considerable political turmoil erupted over the scope of the Establishment Clause, a controversy that continues. The principal issues are prayer (and other religious exercises) in public schools and government aid to religious schools. The Court had declared that both violated the “no establishment” principle. The emergent “Christian Right Movement” wanted much more religious involvement in government, as a way of improving public morality, and sought ways to erode the separation of church and state and to blunt, if not overturn, decisions in the school issues. Late in the 20th c, a much more conservative Supreme Court began to accommodate that view. In reference to free exercise, the Court decided that government could be much more intrusive in religious practices than had formerly been the case. In the continuing cultural dispute, “separationists” argue that separation of church and state is compatible with Christianity; “accommodationists” claim it is not.

RONALD B. FLOWERS

Church Struggle in Germany (1930s) resulted from the Nazi policy of Gleichschaltung (literally “Synchronizing”) that brought under Nazi control all aspects of society, including religion. German Roman Catholics, fearful of Russian Communism, capitulated to Hitler through the Concordat* of 1933. The Protestant churches battled harder to maintain their independence. Their principal antagonists were the “German* Christians,” who espoused an intrinsic link between Christianity and Nazism and sought to establish a Reich Church under state control. The high point of Protestant resistance was the Barmen* Declaration (1934). In the ensuing years, however, internal divisions undermined this resistance. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH AND POLITICS; GERMANY.

MARK R. LINDSAY

Church Unions, the rejoining of churches that have been separated by controversy. Some schisms* between the Eastern and Western churches were temporary (e.g. the Acacian* schism, 482–519, as well as the controversy over the Three Chapters* and Iconoclasm*, 726–87, 813–43), while the schism of 1054 became permanent despite the efforts of the Council of Florence*. A number of Eastern churches have joined with Rome (see Uniate Churches). Protestant reunions have been most numerous in Great Britain, the USA, and the Commonwealth of Nations.

Churchwarden, lay officer assisting the pastor* and representing the laity of a parish*.

Ciborium, receptacle for the reserved* host*.

Cimade, an ecumenical mutual aid service association created by the French Protestant Youth Movement (1939), inspired by Karl Barth* and the Suzanne de Dietrich Biblical Renewal Movement. Originally created by Madeleine Barot* and others to help the populations of Eastern France displaced by the war, the Cimade soon worked among foreigners and Jews in internment camps, engaging in active resistance and organizing clandestine welcome centers and underground escape networks. After World War II, the Cimade participated in social reconstruction and reconciliation services in France, Germany, and Algeria. Today it helps refugees* by providing legal assistance and supporting them morally, e.g. in illegal-immigrant centers and prisons, in cooperation with churches and numerous associations in Europe and wherever there are migrants. See also REFUGEES AS A THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT AND AN ETHICAL ISSUE.

JACQUES STEWART

Circle of Concerned African Women Theologians (“the Circle”) gives African women from the continent and the diaspora a forum for engaging in theological dialogue with cultures, religions, sacred writings, and oral stories that shape the African context and define the women of the African continent. Members of the Circle belong to African* Religion, Christianity, Islam*, and Judaism*. In 2006 the Circle registered 616 members: 465 Anglophone, 93 Francophone, and 59 Lusophone. The criterion for membership is the commitment to research, write, and publish on issues affecting African women and women of African descent.

Mercy Amba Oduyoye is the founder of the Circle, launched in Accra, Ghana (September 1989), during a conference entitled “Daughters of Africa Arise,” when the Circle also inaugurated the Biennial Institute of African Women in Religion and Culture.

The title of the second Pan African Circle conference (Nairobi, 1996) was “Transforming Power: Women in the Household of God.” Musimbi R. Kanyoro was the first elected coordinator of the Circle. Mercy Oduyoye became the full-time director of the Institute of African Women in Religion and Culture.

The title of the third Pan African Circle conference (Addis Ababa, 2002) was “Sex, Stigma, and HIV/AIDS: African Women Challenging Religion, Culture and Social Practices.” Isabel Phiri was the second elected coordinator of the Circle, and the list of publications by members of the Circle multiplied. See also THEOLOGY AS HUMAN UNDERTAKING CLUSTER: AFRICAN WOMEN THEOLOGIAN DOING THEOLOGY BY MAKING CONNECTIONS. ISABEL APAWO PHIRI

Circumcellions, Latin label applied to violent supporters of Donatism* and the Donatist “Church of the Martyrs” (4th–5th c., North Africa), notorious for destroying what they viewed as pagan statues, seizing Catholic churches, attacking Catholic clergy, and seeking martyrdom. The label “Around the Cellae” may refer to an association with Donatist martyr shrines; the evidence comes almost entirely from hostile sources. Scholars have often identified Circumcellions as rural laborers and their rebellion as having economic or social causes; but Augustine* of Hippo and his biographer Possidius impugned their asceticism*, and their motives seem to have been fundamentally religious. It is plausible to consider them an early type of rogue monk. DANIEL F. CANER

Circumcision, Feast of the, observance of Christ’s circumcision (Luke 2:21) eight days after Christmas*. Often called the Feast of the Naming of Jesus.

Cistercians, a Catholic religious* order. The Monastery of Cîteaux in Burgundy was founded (1098) by Robert of Molesme (d1111), who was inspired by the idea of a return to monastic origins characteristic of many new 11th- to 12th-c. monastic orders. Cistercians claimed to follow the Rule of Benedict* literally, cutting back the liturgical accretions of previous centuries, dressing in undyed habits, and renouncing tithes and benefices. Such claims led them into controversy with the Cluniacs*, whom by 1153 they supplanted with more than 300 Cistercian monasteries throughout Europe and in the Holy Land. This rapid expansion is partly attributable to the great Cistercian monk and preacher Bernard* of Clairvaux. The agricultural success and prosperity of the order (e.g. as sheep farmers in the British Isles) were attributable largely to the labor of lay brothers* who were a part of the order from earliest times. The organization of the order was regulated by the Carta Caritatis. The first Cistercian nunnery was created in 1125. Starting in the 14th c. the order was repeatedly reformed; the Strict Observance (Trappists) emerged in the 17th c. By 2000 there were more than 200 Cistercian houses (including convents) worldwide. MARILYN DUNN

City. It is often said that the Bible begins in a garden (Gen 2:8) and ends in a city (Rev 21:1–2). Cain founds the first city (Gen 4:17); cities like Babylon, Nineveh, and Sodom and Gomorrah are punished; and the Israelites in the wilderness are warned not to return to the cities of Egypt (Num 14:1–4). Yet Jerusalem is called God’s dwelling place (Ps 122, 137) and becomes a symbol of the “Jerusalem above” (Gal 4:26). The people of God are told to seek the welfare (shalom) of the earthly city in which they dwell (Jer 29:5–7). When Augustine* interpreted the human story in terms of the city of God and the earthly city, he was drawing on a rich symbolism* in the Bible, augmented by Greek thought, in which the polis was the classic form of political organization and one of the means (along with philosophical and religious contemplation) of human fulfillment.

While Jesus’ ministry was mainly in the countryside and small towns of Galilee, the Christian movement quickly became urban, first in Jerusalem, then in Caesarea, Antioch, and Rome. Congregations were urban, and it is still the custom to name bishops for cities, not territories. Although monasteries were usually rural and the feudal* system was a major factor in the early Middle Ages, the life of cities became steadily more important after the 12th c. They were the locale for developments like the Lay* Piety Movement, the mendicant* orders, the Beguines*, and the universities*.

Cities as the dominant context for life raised new ethical issues. Even rural life has been affected by this commercial context, by the growing trade in commodities, and by the tendency to think of land itself as a commodity, bought and sold without regard to traditional rights. People thrown off the land have gathered in cities, offering cheap labor but living under conditions of poverty*, disorganization, and alienation from social and religious traditions. The “urban problem” became an explicit concern to the churches, which they have tried to meet through evangelism*, social ministries, house* churches, and base* ecclesial communities and advocacy for more just public policies. See also SOCIAL GOSPEL MOVEMENT.

EUGENE TESELLE

Civil Constitution of the Clergy, legislation of the French Constituent Assembly, July 12, 1790, essentially creating a national church. Its four sections reorganized diocesan boundaries, established direct election of bishops and clergy by laity, mandated clerical salaries paid by the state, and attempted to stop clerical absenteeism. An oath to support this act was required of all clergy by a decree of November 27. Approximately half of the clergy and two bishops took the oath, resulting in a Catholic schism. The Constitutional Church continued in modest form until the Concordat* of 1801 between Napoleon and Pius VII. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH AND POLITICS.

DALE A. JOHNSON

Civil Disobedience is an intentional, nonviolent* violation of law*, exercised as public protest on behalf of “higher” ideals that the law is thought to ignore or contravene. It is not a uniquely Christian mode of public resistance; it is also found in Judaism*, Greek culture, Jainism, Hinduism*, Buddhism*, and secular traditions. Civil disobedience campaigns launched by the distinctive figures of Mohandas Gandhi and Martin Luther King*, Jr., evidence the interreligious and intercultural provenance of civil disobedience.

As NT scholar Walter Wink has argued, however, Jesus and early Christians taught that non-violence practiced to the point of suffering* and even death was not just political strategy, but also a “direct corollary of the nature of God” and, hence, constitutive of Christian living. Other cases of Christians’ civil disobedience include: Christians’ refusal of emperor worship, Mennonites* and Quakers* work to abolish slavery* and war*, Christians’ support of the Underground Railroad against slavery, the US Civil* Rights Movement, sanctuary movements for “illegal” immigrants, and Christian soldiers’ refusing deployment orders. Christian ethicists and theologians often debate civil disobedience in relation to Christian responsibility to state powers.

MARK LEWIS TAYLOR

Civil Registry. Recording of births, marriages, and deaths by public officials, replacing the practice under which parish churches kept such records. The transition came during the French Revolution and was spread throughout Europe by Napoleon. In Latin America, liberal parties championed civil registry to reduce the Roman Catholic Church's influence.

Civil Religion is the religious dimension of political and civic life. In the ancient Near East, Greece, and Rome, religious ceremonies were part of public life; officials often filled priestly roles; people supported these ceremonies for the sake of social unity. The Jews* and then the Christians, because of their monotheism*, refused to take part in this older type of civil religion.

After Constantine*, however, and especially after Theodosius*, Christianity became the civil religion of the Roman Empire and of many successor states in Europe and their colonies. Each government favored a particular version of Christianity, enforcing religious uniformity and offering financial support to the state* church.

After the secularization* of Western governments, civil religion of a different sort emerged. Robert Bellah's classic essay (1967) analyzed the rhetoric of US presidents and found a civil religion based on the shared religious tradition of the West, evoking natural rather than revealed religion (cf. "nature and nature's God" in the US Declaration of Independence) and tending to promote a rather austere sense of national responsibility and readiness for sacrifice. Prayer on public occasions in the USA tends to emphasize what the religious traditions have in common.

In the non-Western world, the Chinese* rites controversy was a major test of civil religion and the degree to which Christians might participate in it. While the Jesuits' position (that participation in traditional rituals was merely a manifestation of social unity, not adherence to a different religion) was defeated in the 18th c., the Vatican adopted much the same position as the Jesuits in the 20th c. concerning Shinto* and other traditional rituals. In the USA, customs such as prayer at the opening of legislative sessions have often been defended on similar grounds, as tradition rather than a specifically religious act, or as an inculturation* of Christianity. It must be asked, however, whether such practices have any place in a secular and religiously pluralistic state.

EUGENE TESELLE

Civil Rights Movement, a church-based movement that began with the leadership and involvement of Martin Luther King*, Jr., Ralph D. Abernathy, and other clergy in the Montgomery, Alabama, bus boycott (1955–56) and extended up to the planning of the Poor People's Campaign, the Memphis, Tennessee, sanitation strike, and the death of King (1968). King's Dexter Avenue Baptist Church, the First Baptist Church, the Holt Street Baptist Church, and other local black congregations in Montgomery afforded the initial context for launching the movement. In 1957 King and a hundred other clergy organized the Southern* Christian Leadership Conference, and that organization became the operational base from which they sought to mobilize the resources of black and white churches in the interest of social justice*, equality of opportunity, and peace. Although the full power of the churches was never mustered on behalf of the movement, especially in terms of material and physical resources, the Black Church became the rallying point and source of inspiration in a moral and spiritual quest to eliminate racism*, poverty* and economic injustice, war*, and human destruction. The Ebenezer Baptist Church of Atlanta, Georgia, the congregation in which King was nurtured from childhood and the one he served as co-pastor (1960–68) with his father and brother, Martin Luther King, Sr., and Alfred D. King, became a benchmark for local congregational activism and was commonly called the Mecca of church-centered civil rights protests. Other churches became equally important in terms of providing a power base, a de facto platform, or a social and political base for the movement, including the Shady Grove Baptist Church in Albany, Georgia, the First Baptist Church, Capitol Hill, in Nashville, Tennessee, the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Alabama, and the Brown Chapel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Selma, Alabama. Movement activists drew heavily on the spiritual disciplines of the church, uniting a prophetic Christian witness with the prayer circle and the picket line. From Montgomery to Memphis, the churches served as dispatch centers where bus boycotters waited for rides, became the focal point of mass meetings and prayer vigils, and provided food, funds, meeting places, staff, demonstrators, and lodging for the movement. The symbolic importance and influence of the church did not escape the Ku Klux Klan and other opponents of the Civil Rights Movement, and numerous churches were burned or bombed in Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, and other Southern states.

LEWIS V. BALDWIN

Civil War in the United States. Fought between April 1861 and June 1865, the American Civil War was a conflict between Northern and Southern states (620,000 soldiers died; c400,000 wounded) rooted in divisions over the morality of plantation slavery*, the extent of states' rights to self-govern, and a growing divide between industrial and agricultural economies.

The war had a profound impact on Christianity in the USA, precipitating theological crises. Both Northern and Southern pulpits drew on Scripture*, tradition, and experience to validate the claim of each that God was on their side, producing numerous and theologically weak "God's-eye views" of the war. Christian theology followed politics; abolitionist theologians and preachers emerged in the North, while theology and Scripture were used to defend slavery* in the South. Massive Protestant church divisions followed; Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Anglicans in the North and the South turned against one another.

The war dealt a savage blow to the US Christian notion of being a "redeemer nation" aligned with Providence. Yet Abraham Lincoln, the wartime president (not a member of any church), offered a subtle interpretation of the war in his second inaugural address. He evoked a tragic vision of the war that acknowledged neither the triumphalism of the Northern theologians nor the self-righteous "lost cause" rhetoric of the Southern. Lincoln acknowledged the irreconcilability of the Northern and Southern positions, and insisted on the inscrutability of Providence, calling on both sides to seek peace and healing rather than divine vindication. This progressive apophaticism* was a sociopolitical benchmark that set the stage for the rise of the postbellum Social* Gospel theologies.

The war also provoked a hermeneutical crisis. Literalist* interpreters had to acknowledge (willingly or not) that some biblical cultures seemed to sanction slavery, raising the question among Northern ministers of whether mirroring biblical culture was the best way to order society. Some liberal abolitionist theologians contended that since the Bible endorsed slavery, the Bible itself should be dismissed as archaic and irrelevant, while moderates suggested that the spirit of the text, not the literal meaning, was the key interpretive principle for using the Bible in contemporary contexts.

The war shook the foundations of US Protestant theology and Bible* interpretation, deeply altering the way theology and Scripture could figure into the national discourse. Postmillennial* exuberance gave way to Premillennial Dispensational* pessimism, and literalist hermeneutics moved to the margins of national discourse, from which it later reemerged as fundamentalism*. CALEB J. D. MASKELL

Clapham Sect (c1790–c1830), an influential abolitionist group of Evangelical Anglicans to which William Wilberforce* belonged. See also HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AFRICA.

Clare of Assisi (1193/4–1253), first female follower of Francis* of Assisi; founded the Second Order of St. Francis (Clarissas or Poor* Clares), wrote the first monastic rule by a woman for women. Born in Assisi, Italy, to minor nobility, she fled an arranged marriage and was tonsured by Francis (1211), appointed abbess of St. Damiano (1215), founded or inspired various convents, and was canonized in 1255. Clare's devotion to Christ on the cross as a "mirror" for lay devotion led to her insistence on the "privilege of absolute poverty*" for female Franciscans. As Mueller says, "She had been inspired by Francis, who had shown her the way to live peacefully by owning nothing in a world racked with violence and litigation." Although she accepted Francis's direct request for monastic enclosure, differentiating the Clarissan lifestyle from that of the male mendicants, she struggled against the imposition of the Benedictine* Rule after the Fourth Lateran prohibition of new monastic orders. Her rejection of the ownership of property led to continued battles with Gregory IX over whether enclosure (without assurances of charitable response from the community) or poverty was key to the Clarissan vocation. Her rule, based on that of St. Francis for his community, was approved two days before her death. JESSICA A. BOON

Clare of Montefalco, or Clare of the Cross (c1268–1308). Professed as a tertiary*, claimed by both Augustinians and Franciscans, abbess of the Augustinian Convent of the Holy Cross (1290), canonized (1881 on the fourth attempt). She was known as a devotee of the Passion, an extreme penitent, and a visionary during her lifetime. Her fellow nuns followed her directions to dissect her body after her death. Her cult in Umbria stems from the miraculous discovery through this “autopsy,” confirmed by the local bishop, of the cross, crown of thorns, nails, and lance engraved on her heart, and a three pellets in her gallbladder, symbolic of the Trinity. See also MIRACLE. JESSICA A. BOON

Clarissan. See POOR CLARES.

Clark, Septima Poinsette (1898–1987), transformative African American teacher and selfless political organizer, who established (late 1950s) citizenship schools for teaching adults to read, a requirement for African American voters in Southern US states. These schools served as centers for the 1960s Civil* Rights Movement. Born in Charleston, South Carolina, she became a member of the African* Methodist Episcopal Church and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and director of education at Highlander Folk Center, where she expanded her Christianity to work with Jewish supporters. She had learned from her father to bring the spirit of Christ into her life, so she could see others as Christ saw them.

CYNTHIA STOKES BROWN

Class Meeting, the weekly meeting of a small group of Methodists*, under a class leader, to monitor conduct and spiritual progress.

Claudius, Roman emperor (41–54) who was friendly toward Herod Agrippa* and the Jews in Alexandria* but expelled Jews from Rome, c40 (cf. Acts 18:2).

Clement of Alexandria (c150–215), teacher, philosopher, elder, Apologist*, teacher of Origen*. Among the first to employ philosophy in defense of the Christian movement, he proclaimed Christianity the true philosophy, and Jesus the model of reason* and justice*, and appealed to Greeks to exchange what he viewed as corrupt pagan practices for the virtuous Christian life. Born in Athens to pagan parents, he converted to Christianity under the influence of Pantaeus (c180), succeeding him as head of the “Alexandrian* school” (190–202). Only three of his writings survived: Exhortation to the Greeks, The Tutor, and Miscellanies. Septimus Severus’s persecutions forced him to go to Cappadocia, where he died.

WAYNE C. KANNADAY

Clementine Literature, pseudonymous writings under Clement* I of Rome that relate his travels with Peter*, who trails and refutes Simon* Magus, especially the Recognitions and the Homilies (both early 4th c.), whose common material derives from an earlier (lost) version entitled The Circuits of Peter (also called the Basic Writing).

The Circuits of Peter was an ingenious novel written by an educated Syrian Jewish Christian around 220 CE. With broad learning and skillful rhetoric, the author argued that his or her Jewish Christian faith, originally taught by Peter, offered the true answers to the dilemmas of both polytheists and Gentile Christians. The brilliance of The Circuits of Peter led to the adoption of its framework by the Recognitions and the Homilies to convey their perspectives as the Roman Empire was becoming Christian. Later translations, epitomes, and rewritings kept the novel current through the ages in the East (hagiography) and in the West (here Simon eventually becomes Faust).

The early versions lift the veil on the “missing link,” Jewish Christianity (e.g. its anti-Paulinism), and on the interface of educated Christians with their cultured intellectual environment. Clementine literature survived on the basis of its intriguing account of how God aids upstanding humans in coming to terms with life.

F. STANLEY JONES

Clement of Rome, a leader in the Church of Rome, known chiefly for his epistle to the Corinthians (c96), urging them to resolve their conflicts and recalling that Peter and Paul were martyred in Rome because of excessive zeal. Some passages are similar to the Epistle to the Hebrews*, which may have been written at the same time and place. Clement says that the apostles appointed “bishops and deacons” from among their first converts and that others should succeed them. He does not differentiate bishops* from presbyters*; thus the former title may apply to presbyters in their collective function of oversight. If Clement had a unique role in the Roman Church, it may be that mentioned by Hermas* as “corresponding secretary” between Rome and other churches. Clement is also the alleged author of the Clementine* Literature, actually a product of the 3rd and 4th c.

Clerestory, the space above the aisles of a church, with a series of windows admitting light into the structure. See also HIEROTOPY: THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Clergy (Gk kleros, “lot,” “portion,” “task”), designation for those set apart for special ministries, differentiated from the laity* (Gk laos, “people”).

Clerical Garb. In the early church, bishops and presbyters were not distinguished by their dress; if anything, they sought simplicity. Many wore the tribonion or pallium of the philosophers, a cloak of rough wool; subsequently (4th c.), clergy used the tunic that was worn by artisans and farmers, somewhat in the fashion of the worker* priests with their turtle-neck sweaters. While leading worship, they merely added an early version of the stole*.

When the church was favored by the Roman Empire as the only valid religion (early 5th c.), the clergy began wearing the garb of imperial officials to indicate their social equality with them and their spiritual superiority. (This practice is analogous to that of some Protestant churches until the mid-20th c., when ministers and ushers wore morning coats during Sunday morning services.) During the early Middle Ages, when Germanic mercenaries and invaders wore trousers and grew long hair and moustaches, the clergy in Rome kept their traditional garb, which gradually changed from being old-fashioned to being priestly, or hieratic; liturgical garb became more elaborate, and each element was given symbolic meaning.

During the Middle Ages in the West, a variety of dress developed. New religious movements sought simplicity, such as the rough brown or gray garb of the Franciscans*. The cassock* (derived from the tunic and the Roman robe) became the primary garb of the clergy.

In Eastern Christianity, there are two types of cassock: a simple inner cassock and an outer cassock (or Rason). Monks always wear a black cassock. The color of the cassock of non-monastic clergy varies (black is most common; blue or gray and sometimes white during the Pascha*/Easter* season are also seen).

In the Roman Catholic Church, the cassock was prescribed for Catholic clergy after the Council of Trent*. It was only in the 17th c. that black became the standard color for Roman Catholic clergy, and gradually the clerical or "Roman" collar was required of all clergy.

The churches of the Reformation retained the custom of distinctive dress for the clergy, almost always black. While leading worship, many of them adopted the black academic gown, covered by the alb* in the case of the Lutherans*, while the Reformed* invented the white "Geneva tabs" at the neck.

Recent decades have seen two contrasting trends in all the traditional or historic Western churches: decreasing concern for distinctive garb in everyday contexts and increasing use of liturgical garb during worship. EUGENE TESELLE

Clermont, Council of (1095), pursued the agenda of the reform papacy and called for support to liberate the Eastern churches and Jerusalem from the control of the Muslims, leading to the First Crusade*. See also URBAN II, POPE.

Climate Change and Christianity. Contemporary Christian leaders increasingly emphasize the moral imperative to address risks of catastrophic climate change from global warming. This is a long-term rise in the earth's average surface temperature, which can alter weather dramatically. Global warming is caused by "greenhouse" gases that trap heat in the atmosphere. Burning of fossil fuels (especially petroleum and coal), deforestation, large-scale livestock production, and land use changes have increased atmospheric concentrations of greenhouse gases (carbon dioxide, methane, and nitrous oxide). Oceans absorb carbon dioxide, and trees, marine phytoplankton, and other plants transform it into oxygen. The destruction of tropical forests and changes in ocean temperatures and acidity accelerate global warming, threatening biodiversity and food chains.

Global warming is likely to bring droughts, altered rainfall patterns, melting polar ice, declining snowpack, hotter summers, heat waves and extreme temperatures, and rising sea levels and storm surges that flood coastal areas and islands. Forest fires, crop failures, water shortages, and the spread of diseases can result.

There is a strong consensus among scientists that human-induced climate change is already under way and that, if it continues, the effects will be devastating. An Evangelical* Christian, Sir John Houghton, led the most authoritative scientific assessments of the evidence for the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change in 1988–2002. Scientists continue to research and debate causal interactions and probabilities in climate change scenarios. Some conservative Protestant groups, especially in North America, criticize the evidence and emphasize doubts about climate science* (see Creationism; Science and Christian Theology; Scopes Trial). Dispensationalists* may interpret climate changes as signs of end-time apocalypse foretold in the Book of Revelation*. Other Evangelicals disagree with these eschatological interpretations and affirm theologies of environmental responsibility. By 2008 climate change initiatives had emerged within almost every major Christian tradition.

Ecological concerns are prominent in the OT and NT (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster). Three major biblical principles inform emerging Christian responses to climate change.

1. Stewardship of God's Creation*. The extinction of many species and loss of biodiversity are likely effects of climate change. Many theologians identify this massive degradation of the world that God created as a sin*. They emphasize that, in Genesis, "dominion" does not mean domination or destruction (see Creation; Creation, Ecology, and the Orthodox Church).

2. Social Justice*. The inseparable link between justice and ecological sustainability is fundamental to Christian environmentalism (see Justice, Christian Theological Views and Practices, Cluster). Climate change will have the greatest negative impact on the poor* in developing countries. Famines, floods, fires, and other environmental disasters destroy life and create social turmoil, suffering, and displaced "environmental refugees*."

In the 1960s and 1970s, Western environmentalists emphasized reducing population growth, which alienated Christians who saw this as advocacy for birth* control or abortion*. Contemporary environmental theory recognizes consumption patterns as more significant than simple population size. Industrialized nations, which represent only a minority of the world's population, produced about 80% of the greenhouse gases that humans have put into today's atmosphere. "Luxury emissions" differ from "survival emissions" of the poor, who use fossil fuels to meet basic needs for food and shelter. Many Christian writers emphasize the responsibility of wealthier nations (in most of which Christianity is the major religion) to promote climate change solutions and "clean" energy to help poor nations improve their quality of life without aggravating climate change (see Poverty Cluster).

3. Ethics for Healthy Societies. The climate change crisis results from economies based on burning polluting fossil fuels rather than developing locally appropriate sustainable energy sources, as well as cultures that pursue identity, status, and happiness through material consumption. Scriptural lessons of personal responsibility and simplicity affirm moral values that prioritize spiritual, not material, wealth in relations with others and with God (see Economy and Christianity Cluster).

Many theologians and environmentalists see climate change as a spiritual issue, because it forces humanity to confront basic questions about our place in the world. Its global scale, complexity, and long-term effects on unborn generations require unprecedented international cooperation, intergenerational commitments, and far-reaching solutions. As the world's largest community of ethical practice, Christianity has great influence in shaping how humanity responds. BETH A. CONKLIN

Cloister (Lat claustra), practice of "enclosing" monks and especially nuns; the rectangular central area of a monastery, surrounded by roofed walkways.

Clotilde (c472–545), Burgundian princess, Catholic from birth and brought up in a religious setting. After she married Clovis*, ruler of the Salian Franks (492/93), she urged him to become Christian (she would later be called "the new Esther*"). The death of their first son after baptism was one obstacle to his conversion, although her other children were said to have survived through her prayers. Perhaps in penance for violent acts by her sons, Clotilde entered a cloister in Tours and was known for her sanctity and generosity; various heroic legends were later added to her story.

Cloud of Unknowing, a book of contemplation describing how "a soul is oned with God" by an anonymous 14th-c. British author (possibly a Carthusian* monk), who also wrote the Letter of Privy Counselling, Letter on Prayer, and On Discerning of Spirits and translated De mystica theologia (The mystical theology) by Dionysius* the Pseudo-Aeropagite. The Cloud of Unknowing, a classic of mystical theology, adopts the "affective Dionysianism" of Thomas Gallus and the Victorines (13th c., Paris), who interpreted the classic texts of Dionysius from a more cataphatic* or affective stance than the previous apophatic* interpretations (e.g. by Eriugena*).

PETER TYLER

Clovis (c466–511). Chlodevich (later Ludwig and Louis), king of the Salian Franks (from 481), was the first of the "barbarian" rulers to convert to the Catholic faith, probably through the influence of his wife, Clotilde* (496, or as late as 506 or 508). France thus became the “eldest daughter of the [Roman Catholic] Church.” Conversion enabled Clovis to establish stronger ties between his area of strength, in the Rhineland and the Low Countries, and the Catholic bishops in the rest of Francia. He drove the Visigoths out of Southwestern France (507). The newest son of the Church, he was the only Roman Catholic ruler of the time; in the East, the emperors were following the Henoticon*, and in the West the other rulers were Arian*. Ruthlessly eliminating rivals, he ensured the survival of the Merovingian dynasty; the Salic Law was compiled at his direction. After the fashion of Constantine, he built a Church of the Apostles Peter and Paul in Paris, in which he was to be buried with Clotilde.

Cluny, Benedictine* abbey in Eastern France, founded by William of Aquitaine (910), who renounced all authority and placed it immediately under the pope. Its abbot had direct authority over other houses, which were thus priories, not abbeys. Under a series of capable and long-lived abbots, it played a major role in the 11th-c. reform (see Religious Orders, Roman Catholic, Cluster). But the Cluniac houses became wealthy, prompting criticism, and the Cistercians* offered a dramatic alternative.

CNBB. See ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF BRAZILIAN BISHOPS (CNBB).

Cocceius, Johannes (1603–69), Reformed theologian. Born in Bremen, he studied in Holland and taught in Bremen, then in Holland. He preferred a biblical theology based on the theme of covenant* (hence the term “federal theology” from Lat foedus, “alliance” or “covenant”), with the “covenant of works” being succeeded by the “covenant of grace” (see New Covenant). In mid-17th-c. Holland, there was rivalry between the followers of Voetius* and of Cocceius*, both influenced by Ames and other precursors of Pietism*, but with opposing theologies. Voetius emphasized the scholastic* method, sabbatarianism*, and prayers for the dynasty of the House of Orange, while Cocceius used biblical method to develop his theology, a less legalistic practice, and prayers for the States General (the parliament of Holland).

Code of Canon Law. See CODEX IURIS CANONICI.

Codex, a book with pages bound so that they can easily be turned. In the ancient world, most books were scrolls; the codex was used chiefly for keeping financial records. Christians were the first to utilize it for copies of the Gospels and Epistles.

Codex Iuris Canonici, the Code of Canon Law, is the primary governing document of the Roman Catholic Church. Promulgated by Pope John Paul II (1983), the current Code replaces the Church’s first universally binding code organized by Pietro Cardinal Gasparri and promulgated by Pope Benedict XV (the 1917 Code). The 1983 Code operates alongside the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (see Uniate Churches) promulgated by Pope John Paul II (1990).

The 1983 Code consists of 1,752 numbered canons (many with subdivisions) treating a wide variety of ecclesiastical governance topics, including the rights and duties of Church members, ecclesiastical structures and offices, conduct of mission and teaching activities, celebration of sacraments, Church property, ecclesiastical crimes and penalties, and administrative and judicial procedures. Notable topics not treated in the 1983 Code include most areas of liturgical law, international relations of the Holy See, and moral theology.

Most canons of the 1983 Code reflect a long history of the interplay between law* (especially ancient Roman law) and Roman Catholic theology. Ecclesiastical tribunals have very limited authority to interpret individual canons (see 1983 Code, 16). Instead, private scholarly commentaries play an important role in the development of canonical principles and interpretation.

See also CANON LAW. EDWARD N. PETERS

Cohabitation, living together, usually without marriage.

Cold War and Eastern and Western Christianity. After the defeat of Nazi Germany, the USA and the Soviet Union entered a period of conflict, which dominated world politics until the Soviet Union and its empire collapsed (1992). Although without direct military confrontation – thus “cold war” – the two antagonists understood themselves to be in “total” conflict as the representatives of two different ways of life: liberal democracy, market economies, and individual freedom vs. socialism/communism, government-controlled economies, and equality. A bipolar political structure – NATO vs. the Warsaw Pact – was underscored by strategies of nuclear deterrence.

The cold war had an impact on Christian churches because for socialist thinkers, following Karl Marx*, religion* was “the opium of the people," a very effective weapon in the class struggle invented to manipulate the masses (see Marxism and Christianity). Accordingly, the socialist governments in Central and Eastern Europe launched an attack on Christianity ranging from replacing religious teaching in schools with courses in scientific materialism, to the introduction of secular rites and events; the dissolution of monasteries, convents, and religious orders; propaganda trials against church leaders; and censorship, threats, arrests, and the use of force.

In the Soviet Union, Stalin almost destroyed the Orthodox Church during the 1930s. Yet World War II proved to Stalin that he needed the Church (see Russia). Similarly, other socialist regimes eventually acknowledged that religion, and Christianity in particular, could not be entirely suppressed; thus they sought to neutralize its impact by keeping it inside the churches and by controlling its leaders. Consequently, Christianity was arguably the only "official" opposition within socialist states. This is why the election of the cardinal of Cracow, Karol Wojtyla, as Pope John Paul II became a crucial turning point in cold war history.

In turn, Christian leaders in Western Europe had a hostile attitude toward communism. In 1949 Pope Pius* XII confirmed a ruling of the Holy Office stating that Catholics could neither be members of Communist parties nor advocate communism. Catholic priests were not allowed to administer sacraments to such people, thereby effectively making all practicing Christians in socialist states appear to be disloyal to their governments. While Protestant and Orthodox leaders found dialogue with socialist states somewhat easier after Stalin's death (1953), the Catholic position did not change until the election of John* XXIII (1958). The Second Vatican* Council (1962–65) directly addressed pressing political problems of the cold war era and in the process introduced significant changes to Catholic dogma. Partly in response to requests from bishops and cardinals from Central and Eastern Europe, the Declaration on Religious Liberty (1965) recognized religious freedom as an inviolable right of the human person, thereby departing from the old dogma that there cannot be liberty to teach error. The encyclical Pacem in Terris (1963) abandoned the ancient Christian notion of a just war*, because, it argued, just wars had become impossible in a nuclear age.

The cold war politicized religion but also led to a marked influence of religion on politics

(see Church and State Cluster). Ever since the Puritan* settlers had arrived in New England with the explicit purpose of building the "New Jerusalem" (Rev 21:10), US foreign policy was infused, to various degrees, with the notion that the USA was a "redeemer nation" with a universal, millennial* role. The cold war, then, positioned the "New Jerusalem" against Moscow, which according to a 16th-c. prophetic tradition was to be the "Third Rome" after the fall of Rome and Constantinople (see Russia), and thus the imperial representative of a message of salvation for the entire world. Though atheist in outlook, Soviet imperial policies were in striking accordance with this tradition.

STEFAN ROSSBACH

Colenso, John William (1814–83), Cambridge mathematician who became the first Anglican bishop of Natal, South Africa, and missionary to the Zulus (1853). A Broad* Churchman who believed in the universal knowledge of God and ethics in human cultures, and who raised the issue of the uniqueness* of Christ, Colenso published the first Zulu dictionary, grammar, and Bible translation and wrote commentaries on Romans and the Pentateuch challenging scriptural inerrancy* and engaging with Zulu culture. He fought for the rights of the Zulu people against colonial* aggression. His excommunication after a heresy trial, declared invalid by the Privy Council, led to a crisis in the Anglican Communion and the first Lambeth* Conference (1867).

JONATHAN A. DRAPER

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor (1772–1834). The youngest son of a clergyman-schoolmaster, Coleridge acquired a lifelong admiration for Hebrew poetry and awareness of the prophetic intent of the Bible. Not a Pietist or irrationalist, but a post-Kantian* with a predisposition toward faith, he thought that attacks by Deists and skeptics on the authority of Scripture* and Christian doctrine should be answered by reasoned argument, including deeper investigation of reason* and the human need for religion*.

As a student at Cambridge, and as a young poet and lecturer, Coleridge shared the democratic fervor of the time, and held Unitarian* and progressivist views. This optimistic outlook had weakened by the time he wrote The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1797), his best-known poem. After a winter at Göttingen (1798–99), over two decades he worked out the trinitarian position that became the basis of major works. He did not publish his most original writings on the Bible, because the public, uneducated about historical* biblical scholarship, first needed to reconsider claims for the infallibility* of Scripture*.

His prose work Church and State defended the national role of the Church* of England. Many in the Broad* Church party regarded Coleridge as an ally, and US Transcendentalists* admired his Aids to Reflection for its emphasis on the individual's self-knowledge of one's need for faith*.

ANTHONY JOHN HARDING

Collect, short prayer, derived from early Roman liturgy, comprising an address to God, a description of God's character and activity, the petition, and the goal of the petition.

Collegiality, the doctrine that bishops* are "colleagues," being a collegium of which all are a part. It was emphasized in Conciliarism* and reasserted by the Second Vatican* Council.

Colombia. In the northwestern part of South America, with coastlines on both the North Pacific Ocean and Caribbean Sea, Colombia has the third-largest population in Latin America (after Mexico and Brazil), with approximately 90% claiming to be Roman Catholic (although the percentage of those who attend Mass* is much lower) and a small but active Protestant population.

When the Spanish arrived, several indigenous nations inhabited the country, the majority belonging to the Chibcha linguistic family. The newly baptized so-called Indians were exploited without mercy by the encomenderos seeking slave labor for their plantations and mine exploitation. Juan del Valle, Popayan's first bishop, and the Jesuits Pedro Claver and Alonso de Sandoval (1576–1652) denounced as contradictory to the gospel the injustice of the slavery* of indigenous and African people. Colonial* Christianity evolved in two ways: through Christendom* and through popular religiosity.

Christendom was related to the official development of the Roman Catholic Church that began with the Franciscans* in 1508 on the Caribbean Coast. By that time, women's religious orders were also present in Colombia; especially in the 18th c., women's convents played an important role in developing Christian religious tradition and social, economic, educational, and religious networks in colonial society. They also consolidated the model proposed by the Council of Trent* (1543–63) that generated a devotional form of architecture, painting, sculpture, and music, which were the base of the cultural movement known as baroque.

On the other hand, popular religiosity was based on mestizaje and syncretism* (see Inculturation Cluster; Popular Christian Practices Cluster). The biological and cultural "mestization" process was completed in the Andean region by the 17th c., and it set the stage for syncretism, or inculturation, in the religious field. The gods of the old cults were "baptized" as saints* and celebrated in chapels built on the very sites where the temples of these gods had been destroyed. When the destruction of the old beliefs and the process of acculturation were profound, indigenous people "went white" to form a new and inferior stratum of colonial society and therefore of Christendom. By the mid-17th c., Colombia had a vibrant religious life and had progressed both intellectually and spiritually. Clergy were educated in convents and seminaries in the metropolitan see* and in the three suffragan dioceses.

In the 19th c., the clergy were at the center of the political confrontations that marked seven civil wars between Liberal and Conservative parties. In the second half of the 19th c., Liberals, followers of French Jacobinism, violently persecuted the Roman Catholic Church and brought Presbyterians into the country to break down the Catholic monopoly. Owing to the economic and political failure of Liberal governments, politicians turned back to the Catholic Church to promote it as the official church (end of the 19th c.). They gave the Church many state responsibilities, including the oversight of education, health care, and social assistance, "civilization" of the borderlands, and control and registration of the population (birth, marriage, death) through the sacraments. The Liberal reaction to these developments resulted in new civil wars; the last one, from 1899 to 1902, the "Thousand Days' War," devastated the country. One in five persons between the ages of 18 and 30 was killed. This was the starting point of the 20th c. in Colombia.

Conservatives and Catholics reacted with intransigence, controlling the country until 1930. New Protestant missions arrived during this period. Some modernization began and, with it, new social movements and urban transformation. Owing to economic and social factors, but also to the disagreement among bishops over who should be the Conservative presidential candidate, Liberals returned to power and attempted to take total control of society; this resulted in new confrontations, particularly in the countryside. Catholics once again used an intransigent anti-Liberal and anti-Protestant discourse, as if they were calling for a new crusade.

The period from 1948 to 1953, euphemistically called la violencia, was the last civil war with a strong religious basis. Catholic buildings and institutions were targeted in Bogotá. In the countryside, Protestants were persecuted for their Liberal affiliation. In 1957, in accord with the "National Front" agreement, political power was divided between both traditional parties, and they agreed to recognize the Roman Catholic Church as a fundamental element of the Colombian social order; however, neither political nor religious leaders, obsessed by the division of political power, ever took into account social conflicts. The intransigent religious discourse was no longer viable, but intransigence was retrieved in lay political discourse with a cold war mentality.

The growing political conflict forced populations to move from rural to urban areas. Among many displaced people, Protestant groups developed new churches and movements centered in the cities, particularly in shantytowns. Meanwhile, new missions, particularly Pentecostal*, arrived; they would grow in the following decades, and many national Charismatic* churches would appear on the scene. The urbanization provoked by violence boosted the industrialization and modernization process, and gave rise to new cultural and social patterns that produced a loss of identification with traditional institutions, including the Roman Catholic Church and all political parties. The institutions with some social control broke down, and no alternative cohesive social mechanism arose to take their place.

After World War II, Liberals and Catholics joined forces against communism. Furthermore, Vatican* II accepted democracy and modern values; thus North American religious diversity came to be seen by Catholics as something positive. In addition, the Latin American Episcopal Conference gathered in 1968 in Medellín*; it called for the study of Latin American realities. Youth Catholic* Action movements, constituted by workers and students, began to denounce unjust institutional violence. They were aware that the only way to resolve the social conflict was through political decisions. They also appealed to the masses to increase their awareness of their own situation through literacy programs and social movements and organizations, and tried to organize a new political party. A Catholic Left began to appear among students, workers, and peasants led by the priest Camilo Torres.

Protestants also shared the concern for social issues; they made use of social sciences to find ways to transform society, establishing a trend. Among them was the group La Rosca, made up of Presbyterians such as Orlando Fals Borda, Gonzalo Castillo, and Augusto Libreros. Mennonites* began to undertake many social activities. The ecumenical dialogue helped the pacification process promoted by the National Front, but particularly opened the door for many encounters among progressive Catholics and Protestants. This context made possible the collaborative work and friendship of Camilo Torres and Orlando Fals Borda, founders of the School of Sociology at the National University of Colombia.

The Colombian Catholic hierarchy, bound to the National Front, could not find ways to assimilate the new doctrine or to emulate the transformations that took place in other episcopacies in Latin America or in other parts of the world. This situation caused a rift between the hierarchy and bishops, priests, religious men and women, and laypeople, who asked for new political leaders to take care of the poor. There was a radicalization on both sides, with slogans such as "Liberalism is a sin" and "Refraining from revolution is a sin" and the start of the "sacred socialist revolution."

The confrontation was strong within the Colombian Church in the 1960s and 1970s; many Catholics were repressed by both the Church and the state. Something similar occurred with Protestants; the movement "Evanangelismo a fondo" actively sought to mobilize Protestants in an anti-Communist crusade. However, religious men and women continued to seek clearer and more determined action against social injustice and in support of human* rights activities. Consecrated religious women took very seriously the preferential* option for the poor and went to live in shantytowns and rural areas. Not merely in theory, but through action, they developed, in the 1980s and 1990s, a Liberation* theology from a women's perspective and also, through Base* Ecclesial Communities, they pushed the development of "Indian" and Black* theologies and of Bible reading from a feminist* perspective.

The National Conference of Religious developed (early 1980s) a Commission for Justice and Peace. The Jesuits founded (1970) the CINEP (Centro de Investigación y Educación Popular), a research center on social and political reality, and promoted literacy campaigns and popular awareness of social situations. As an academic center, CINEP sponsored research projects and publications (notably in 1970s and 1980s) in order to open a dialogue with the Colombian intelligentsia, mostly liberal and Marxist and strongly anticlerical. These research projects enabled some bishops to begin to understand the economic and social roots of the growing political conflict. CINEP also started its Peace Program (mid-1980s).

Social and armed conflicts (from the 1970s) pushed the governments from Turbay Ayala (1978–82) to Uribe (since 1998) to look for solutions through conflict resolution that ranged from a peace process to war intensification. The presence of the Catholic bishops in negotiations has clearly increased, as the shift in the process of negotiations has indicated. The bishops' involvement in Turbay's Commission for Justice and Peace was minimal, whereas today the bishops are strongly committed to the defense of human rights and to a political and negotiated resolution of the conflict.

The Colombian Catholic hierarchy had much difficulty moving away from its very narrow perspective on social and political matters. In the 1970s and 1980s, the hierarchy was still arguing that social and political problems were caused by the presence of foreigners – a perspective close to that of the National Front and post-National Front governments. Under the leadership of Bishop Alfonso Lopez Trujillo, the Catholic hierarchy did not support Betancour's peace negotiations, because they saw them as a movement toward surrender to subversive groups. This may have been related to the hierarchy's ties to the government and to the privileges it received, but also to the papacy's stance, which changed from a neutral position with Paul VI to a strongly anti-Communist position with John* Paul II, shaped by events in Eastern Europe.

In the meantime, bishops in rural areas began to develop another perspective on social and political issues, and looked for some kind of agreement among armed groups, as Msgr. Luis Serna did in Florencia, Caqueta. When the pope visited Colombia (1986), he talked about the need for an episcopal engagement in the search for peace in the country. Subsequently, the National Conference of Bishops created the Commission for Life, Justice, and Peace. Two conservative and controversial cardinals, Alfonso Lopez Trujillo and Dario Castrión, were called to Rome (and therefore their direct influence was reduced). Other bishops, with better knowledge of the rural situation, assumed important positions in the National Conference of Bishops. The Conference adopted a more committed stance (end of the 1980s);

it asked the bishops to thoroughly research the causes, dimensions, and characteristics of the conflict in each diocese, to formulate possible ways of correcting the situation, and to propose different ways of mediation.

The Constitution of 1991 recognized the multicultural and ethnic composition of the country, thanks largely to indigenous leaders. It recognized religious freedom, as a result of pressure from Protestant leaders organized in the Colombian Evangelical Confederation. Non-Catholic Christian churches received the same privileges as the Roman Catholic Church through the signing of new agreements between the state and the different churches and congregations. But these concordatos (small concordats) excluded all non-Christian religious institutions and reinforced the Roman Catholic Concordat*. Under the Gaviria government (1990–94), the bishops and Roman Catholic Church institutions played an active role in the search for a peaceful resolution to the political conflict and openly defended human rights. During the presidential campaign, while the Samper government (1994–98) was concerned with defending itself against charges of money laundering, the Roman Catholic Church, bishops, priests, and men and women religious took a stand to try to resolve the social crisis of displaced people from rural areas, where the civil war continued to intensify. They investigated this matter and denounced the situation. Meanwhile, Cardinal Rubiano, archbishop of Bogotá, criticized Samper's attitude and denounced drug trafficking as socially destructive, financing war, and promoting an extralegal culture with easy money that caused corruption. At the same time, through organizations to which church institutions were committed, such as the Permanent Assembly for Peace, and with the help of the German Bishops' Conference, the church leaders initiated a peace process with the National Liberation Army.

This change of perspective of the Catholic hierarchy reinforced the action of many laypeople, men and women religious, and priests, usually with a Liberation theology perspective who were working for the defense of human rights and organizing communities and social movements. The organizations that contributed to this process included the dioceses of Barracabermeja, Socorro y San Gil, Uraba, Mogotes, and Quibdo, and the Feminine Popular Organization, which started the national social movement of women, a pacifist and feminist movement. However, the political and social awareness of religious leaders and the Roman Catholic Church still needs to find a path for promoting the organization of civil society, as well as democratic values and tolerance.

Protestant and Pentecostal/Charismatic churches offer different ways to face the social and political conflict. The more active minority of "historic" Protestants is committed to a negotiated peace and the defense of human rights. In the 1990s, the Conference of Evangelical Churches organized a commission on human rights and the peace process. This commission has done much research into the complexity of the conflict. Also in ecumenical endeavors, they have worked with the Roman Catholic Church in several projects on development and peace that included the civil society in the process of peace building. Some fundamentalist Pentecostal churches used to believe that secular authority comes from God and that therefore there is no room for criticism of the state. However in the past decades, the political participation of Pentecostal/Charismatic churches (more and more of them locally led Charismatic churches) has changed; they formed at least five different political parties during the 1990s, and some of their leaders have been elected members of the Senate and Council. Recently, they have also been involved in a paramilitary political scandal; several of their leaders were jailed for having associated with right-wing extremist and illegal paramilitary groups.

Pentecostals/Charismatics have played an active role in the resocialization of internally displaced persons in the slums of the big Colombian cities, although their work (always resulting from grassroots initiatives) has not been very systematic or organized. Forced displacement is also a main concern of the Roman Catholic Church; according to the National Conference of Bishops, the number of displaced people in Colombia between 1985 and 2005 is 3.8 million, reflecting a new wave of displacement that began in the 1980s partly because of the expanded drug market, which led to the multiplication of common criminals, guerrillas, and paramilitary groups.

By 2000, the commitment of all Christian churches to the peace process was growing. Both Catholics and Protestants criticized Plan Colombia and its implementation, but owing to the history of disagreements and violence among these churches, it is still difficult for Catholics and Protestants to join in a united ecumenical front. The human cost of the churches' involvement in the peace process has been extremely high, although this has not discouraged them. Among Catholics, 1 archbishop, 3 bishops, more than 50 priests, 9 men religious, 2 missionaries, 3 women religious, and many lay members of the church were killed in the first years of the 21st c. Many have been kidnapped, and even more have been threatened. Among Protestants the situation is no better; in the same period, more than 50 pastors were killed, and many were kidnapped. The Vatican news agency says that Colombia has the highest rate of religious murder in the world. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: COLOMBIA; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: COLOMBIA; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: COLOMBIA.

Statistics: Population (2008): 45 million (est.). Christians, 96% (Roman Catholics, 90%; Protestants, 6%; other Christians, 1%; as many as 20% of Christians can be viewed as Charismatics); adherents of indigenous and African-related religions, 1.5%; small Jewish and Muslim communities; nonreligious, 1.4%. (Estimate based on the 2003 census and Bidegain, Historia del cristianismo en Colombia.)

ANA MARÍA BIDEGAIN

Colonialism and Imperialism and Christian Theology. If Christian theology* is "thinking about God," oriented by a symbol*, Jesus Christ, and carried by its mythologies* and rituals, then Christian theology has played key roles in both colonialism and imperialism. Theology has functioned in diverse, contradictory ways within what Edward Said has called the "imaginative culture" of colonialism and imperialism.

Colonialism and imperialism are closely related phenomena. Both are complex forms of organized power, and both predate Christianity and its theologies. Colonialism involves three interactive processes: (1) a society's will to dominate people of another society, setting up structures for controlling those people; (2) rationalizing this domination by marking dominated peoples as dissimilar and inferior, usually in terms of race; and (3) masking both the domination and the racism by claiming a necessary or virtuous vocation to "Christianize," "civilize," or "develop" the dissimilar and inferior others.

Imperialism is a society's ability to project transnational power to achieve political rule over other societies. This rule is achieved by a combination of economic and military power to make war and enforce subordination. Imperial power has usually been necessary for colonial domination.

Christian theology has played reinforcing and resisting roles in relation to both colonialism and imperialism.

Christian Theology and Colonialism. Christian theology as thinking about God, the creator and sustainer of the whole of life, bequeathed to colonizing cultures a myth* and ethos* of universal visioning. Colonizers drew on this universalizing discourse to support their global designs for domination.

One of the most influential examples of Christian theology's global design for colonialism is found in the T and O maps of medieval periods. These maps place Asia at the top of a circle (maps faced east, the direction of rising sun, before the invention of the compass), above a T (the horizontal line of the T representing the Nile River as an extended line dividing both Europe and Africa from Asia; the shorter vertical line representing the Mediterranean Sea, separating Europe from Africa). The entire land-mass organized by the T was positioned at the center of a circle (surrounding oceans). Three worlds were thereby divided and named after the three sons of the biblical figure Noah: the fair and favored Japheth (Europe, on the lower left), Shem (Asia, extending across the top), and the cursed Ham (Africa, on the lower right). In the 16th c., a "fourth continent" (the West Indies or Americas) was interpreted as the enlargement of Japheth (Gen 22:9). Japheth (Europe) thus had religious sanction for laying colonizing claim to the Americas. Here theology provides, as Walter Mignolo says, an "overarching geopolitical imaginary for the modern/colonial world system."

The same sacred text, Genesis, however, could be used to resist European colonizers' global designs. Especially those segments teaching that persons qua persons were made in the image of God (Gen 1:27) cut against colonizers' aims to treat and exploit some societies as inferior. Thus even though Christian missionaries often supported colonizers, philosopher Albert Memmi noted that colonizers were also often fearful of Christians' conversionist strategies because they could suggest full and equal assimilation of the colonized. Theological notions of "the image of God" or of God being "no respecter of persons" (Acts 10:34), not showing favoritism, could help fuel resistance to colonialism.

Christian Theology and Imperialism. Christian theology's discourse about God, however, not only provided to colonizers a mythos and ethos for a global design, a universum for colonial power. It also proffered a hierarchical ordering, a dominium, for imperial power.

Especially with the rise of Constantinian theology, political rulers could be seen as representative of God, the transcendent ruler over all creation. In the modern/colonial world system, spawned from the 16th c. on, God has routinely been associated with political rule, anchoring what Michael Hardt and Antonio Negri refer to as the "transcendental apparatus" of colonial and imperial domination. The all-ruling and transcendent Ruler conveys to earthly rulers a transcendence of command, bestowing on them a divine right to imperial rule.

Again, however, Christian theology generates a discourse of resistance to imperial power. Numerous studies confirm that Jesus' life and teachings in 1st-c. Israel have to be viewed against the backdrop of Jewish people's suffering and resistance. Familiar NT terms used by Paul and Jesus (e.g. kingdom*, faith*), which theologians have used in traditionally depoliticized forms, actually take on fuller and more adequate meaning when seen within the early Jesus movement's resistance to Rome's imperial power. This explains why Christian theology still generates theologies of resistance to empire.

In the late 20th and early 21st c., Christian theologians had just begun to acknowledge and study the diverse functions of their beliefs in the Western history of colonialism and imperialism. The theological initiative for turning to colonialism and imperialism has come largely from Christian thinkers in colonized regions of the world, and especially Liberation and postcolonial theologians. See also DECOLONIZING THEOLOGY; LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER; POSTCOLONIALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY. MARK LEWIS TAYLOR Colors, Liturgical. The use of specific colors for vestments* and paraments* developed during the 12th c. and was standardized much later: violet for repentance* (Lent*, Advent*, although blue for hope is also used during Advent); white for purity and joy (Christmas*, Easter*, Trinity* Sunday, All* Saints' Day, Nuptial* Masses); black for mourning (All Souls'* Day, Requiem* Masses); red for blood and fire (Pentecost*, feasts of martyrs, more recently Palm* Sunday and Good* Friday); and green for life (after Epiphany*, after Pentecost).

Colossians, Epistle to the, written in the name of Paul*, c70–80, in Asia Minor to a general audience. Colossae is most likely a pseudo-addressee. The letter represents Pauline tradition, which releases Christians from Jewish laws of ritual purity, for a new generation.

Most scholars contest the authenticity of Paul's authorship, because of differences with the language, theological concepts, and ways of thinking found in Paul's undisputed letters (Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Philipians, 1 Thessalonians, Philemon), although the text has the typical form of Paul's letters. Colossians exhorts its readers to hold fast to their faith* in Christ and warns of deviant teachings (2:16–23). Its opponents practice a sort of “angelic worship,” “dwell on visions,” and demand that believers observe Jewish purity rules (Moses' Law*), but their identity is obscure. Scholars often regard their teaching as a kind of heresy* and Colossians as part of the “pure” teaching of the NT. The author and his opponents may, however, merely represent competing early Christian traditions. The opponents may have been among those Jewish Christians who wrote Revelation* and Jude*. Alternatively, the author may simply have sought to protect the Pauline heritage. The letter's exhortations include a household* code (3:18–4:1) reinterpreting this aspect of the patriarchal Hellenistic culture (see Hellenistic Religious Traditions and Christianity's Self-Definition).

The writer is acquainted with Paul's letters, and imitates his style in order to refer to the apostle's authority, but now describes Christ as the head of all earthly and heavenly rulers. Therefore, believers in Christ are free from “angelic worship” and strict regulations. The author thus releases Christians from the purity laws more categorically than Paul did (cf. 2:20–21; Rom 14:3).

Colossians was included in the Pauline letter collections early on and was thus accepted into the NT canon* and respected by many church fathers (e.g. John Chrysostom*). Its descriptions of Christ influenced the development of Christology*.

OUTI LEPPÄ

Colporteurs (French), peddlers of devotional literature; specifically, men and women who sell the Bible at a nominal price (often giving it away for free) and promoting its use. During the 19th c., they traveled great distances, often under difficult conditions, to bring the Bible to people who had no access to it.

Columba (521–97; Lat for Gaelic Colum Cille, “dove of the church”), Irish monastic leader, member of the Ui Neill clan, founder of monasteries at Derry and Durrow. He was exiled from Ireland* after the Battle of Cul Dremne (561) and settled at Iona* (c563). From there, Columba traveled throughout Scotland, where he is credited with having attempted to Christianize the Picts. The main source for his activities is the Life composed by Adamnán, ninth abbot of Iona (d704). Columba's relics were shared by Scotland and Ireland in the early Middle Ages, reflecting his influence and veneration in both countries.

MARILYN DUNN

Columbanus (543–615), Irish monastic leader (590s). He arrived in France, an “exile for the sake of Christ,” where he founded the triple monastery* (including monks, nuns, and tertiaries*) of Luxeuil-Annegray-Fontaines. He was expelled from France (c613) and died in Italy (615).

His pastoral success in France aroused episcopal hostility; initially welcomed by Merovingian rulers, he was later driven out by Queen Brunichildis. The subsequent creation of family monasteries under the influence of his successors at Luxeuil formed a cornerstone of 7th-c. aristocratic power in Northeastern France. In Italy he founded Bobbio and campaigned against Arianism* and the Three* Chapters controversy. Columbanus's letters and sermons reveal his spiritual background and struggles; his brief Rule for Monks reflects his charismatic style and the influence of Basil* and Cassian* on Irish monasticism; his Communal Rule and Penitential demonstrate Irish penitential practice. Elements of Columbanus's rules were combined with parts of the Rule of Benedict* and others in the 7th-c. “mixed” monastic* rules.

MARILYN DUNN

Columbarium, an assemblage of niches in a church or churchyard, designed to house the cremated* remains of deceased members.

Comenius, Johannes Amos (1592–1670), theologian, philosopher of education, linguist, diplomat, bishop of the Bohemian* Brethren (Unitas Fratrum). Born in Moravia, educated in the schools of the Brethren and at Heidelberg, he was ordained (1614) and was active as teacher in Prerov and as a priest in Fulnek. In 1628 he led a group of Brethren into exile in Lissa, Poland, and traveled extensively seeking an end to the Thirty* Years' War. His educational innovations included the use of pictures in textbooks and a graded curriculum. His life-long project was a “pansophia” to collect and classify all human knowledge. He revised the Brethren's Ratio Disciplinae (1660), which later inspired Zinzendorf*. He died in Amsterdam, never having returned to his homeland.

OTTO DREYDOPPEL, JR.

Comity Principle (the), often adopted by Protestant mission organizations, is a principle of interchurch relations emphasizing reciprocity: extending courtesies to other missions, especially recognizing their validity, with the expectation that those missions will reciprocate. In accord with this principle, areas are apportioned to various missions that agree not to compete in a region in which another mission organization is already working.

Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, partnership of Protestant churches in the USA, growing out of a conference in 1913, for the coordination of mission efforts. Because Latin America was predominantly Catholic, US Protestants saw the continent as a mission field. They became active there during World War I, especially after the Panama* Conference in 1916.

Common Good (also commonweal or commonwealth), the purpose of life in society and the chief task of the state (Aristotle*, Thomas Aquinas*, Leo* XIII's 1879 encyclical Rerum Novarum). John* XXIII defined it as "the sum of those conditions of social life by which individuals, families, and groups can achieve their own fulfillment."

Common Prayer, Book of (the "Prayer Book"), the only legal liturgy* in the Church of England from 1549 to 1554, 1559 to 1645, and 1662 until the 20th c., it shaped subsequent Anglican liturgical books. It was the most elaborate and directive liturgy used by any Protestant Church during the Reformation*. After experiments with vernacular* worship (1540s), Thomas Cranmer* presided over the Prayer Book's compilation, which had been authorized by Parliament (1549), adding an ordination service (ordinal*) in 1550. Influential Protestants criticized its compromises with traditional rites; thus a Reformed* Prayer Book was authorized in 1552. Elizabeth I's religious settlement (1559) brought back the 1552 book, slightly modified to accommodate Lutheran views. A Catholicizing version for Scotland prepared by High Church Scottish bishops (1637) caused an uproar among the Scots, culminating in open war with England (1638). Subsequent wars throughout Britain saw the English Prayer Book abolished by the Westminster* Parliament (1645). Charles II's Restoration brought a 1662 modified Reformed version that kept the general shape and Cranmer's* prose style (with Miles Coverdale's version of the Psalms). It has been unaltered since, although alternative books have been used in the 20th and 21st c. Despite its Reformed origins, its ceremonial style and stability over time have contributed to the theological bridge-building ethos central to Anglicanism*. See also ANGLICANISM CLUSTER: ANGLICAN WORSHIP AND LITURGIES.

DIARMAID N. J. MACCULLOCH

Communion (Gk koinonia), referred to in 1 Cor 10:16–17 as fellowship or participation in the Body and Blood of Christ by sharing the bread and cup of blessing.

Communion is historically restricted to the baptized. Some churches delay the Communion of baptized children. Penitents* under discipline may be excommunicated* or prohibited from receiving Communion. Some churches restrict Communion to their own members or to the churches with which they are in fellowship.

By late antiquity, the frequency of receiving Communion declined because of the requirements of abstinence and fasting*. The Fourth Lateran* Council (1215) required Christians to receive Communion once a year at Easter, after making a confession*. Both Protestant and Catholic reformers urged more frequent reception. In the Reformed* tradition, the whole congregation received Communion together four times a year. In all Christian traditions, the frequency of receiving Communion has increased in modern times.

Communion practices vary among churches. In some, Communion is received at the altar* individually or in groups, standing or kneeling; in others, it is received by individuals in their seats. Some celebrations use a broken loaf and a common cup or chalice; others use small wafers and individual cups. Some use unleavened bread and wine; others use leavened bread and grape juice. Communicants with wheat allergies may receive rice bread. Alcoholics may receive only bread. See also EUCHARIST CLUSTER.

FRANK C. SENN

Communion in Both Kinds, reception of both bread and wine (both species*) at Communion*. The cup, withdrawn from the laity in the 13th c., was restored by the Hussites*, the Reformation* churches, and the Second Vatican* Council.

Communion of Saints, one of the affirmations of the Apostles* Creed ("I believe in the Holy Spirit, the holy catholic church, the communion of saints . . ."). How does the communion of saints differ from the church*, which is also affirmed? It is variously understood to be the union of all the faithful (on earth, in purgatory*, and in heaven), the union of the elect, or the sharing of holy things (especially the sacraments; see Communion), in which case it can include unbelievers (who share the visible signs but not the grace signified by them). See also SAINTS; SAINTS, DEVOTION TO, IN THE ORTHODOX TRADITION; SAINTS, DEVOTION TO, IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC TRADITION.

Communion Table, eucharistic* table, made of wood in Protestant and Low Church Anglican churches, versus the stone altar* in High Church and Catholic churches.

Communion Tokens, metal tokens given to those who attended the preparatory* service in Puritan* or Presbyterian churches, indicating their fitness to receive Communion.

Communism and Christianity. See COLD WAR AND EASTERN AND WESTERN CHRISTIANITY; MARXISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Compassion, suffering* with another; deep sympathy or empathy for another; sorrow or concern for the plight of a needy person, leading to words or deeds that are meant to help the person. For Christians, Jesus is the epitome of compassion. He did not just feel with those who suffered; he gave his life for them. He was not just concerned about individuals' earthly existence; he also sought to heal humanity's broken relation to God. His compassion was not limited to friends; it also embraced those who persecuted him and sought to kill him. See also AGAPE; LOVE; MERCY. LEROY H. ADEN

Compatibilism, theological view that freedom* is compatible with the totality of factors that influence one's decisions: God's will, external circumstances, and one's own inclinations. The Jesuit theory of "middle* knowledge" is one way of showing how freedom of choice is compatible with grace* and predestination*.

Complementarity, a term applied to the relation between men and women as "made for each other" for mutual support (cf. Gen 2:18, 24 and Mark 10:8; Eph 5:28–33). It is contrasted with both patriarchy* and equality*.

Compline, the night prayer of the Roman Catholic Church, may be recited by supplicants privately or communally before going to sleep, asking for a "perfect night and peaceful death." Anglican evensong* has incorporated some elements of this office. KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ Complutensian Polyglot Bible, the first multilingual edition of the Bible, in six volumes (1514–17), prepared at Alcalá (Lat Complutum) under Cardinal Ximénes* de Cisneros. The OT contains, in parallel columns, the Hebrew text, the Latin Vulgate*, and the Greek Septuagint; the NT contains the Greek text and the Vulgate.

Concelebration, joint celebration of the Eucharist by two or more priests, restored by the Second Vatican* Council.

Conciliarism, the movement in the Roman Catholic Church that holds that a council has jurisdictional authority in the Church and can act independently of the pope* in an emergency. In the midst of the Great* Schism of 1378–1417, when two rival popes claimed authority, two German scholars residing in Paris, Conrad of Gelnhausen and Henry of Langenstein, put forward (1380) the notion of rescuing the Church by convoking a council independent of both rival popes, which was supported by Paris scholars, including Pierre d'Ailly and Jean Gerson* (1383), and ultimately by the cardinals who had elected the rival popes. These cardinals jointly called the unsuccessful Council of Pisa* (1409). The high point of Conciliarism came with the Councils of Constance* (1414–18) and Basel* (1431–49). Gallicanism* made similar claims about the authority of councils. When Angelo Roncalli was elected pope in 1958, he said, "My name shall be John." This was not only an allusion to the statement of Zechariah (Luke 1:63); it was a revival of Conciliarism, in at least a moderate form, for there had been no pope named John since the anti-pope John XXIII, deposed in 1415. One of his first acts as John* XXIII was to call the Second Vatican* Council. EUGENE TESELLE

Conclave, the place of assembly where the cardinals* meet to elect a pope*; hence the name of the assembly itself.

Concord, Formula of, and Book of Concord. Disagreements among Lutherans over the interpretation of the Augsburg* Confession led the "authentic Lutherans" to state their position more explicitly. The Solid Declaration and the Epitome (adopted 1577) constitute the Formula of Concord, which denies that human merit and free will have any role in justification* yet rejects antinomianism*, as it deals with various topics, including the relationship between law* and gospel*, Christology*, and adiaphora*. These, along with the classic creeds*, the Augsburg Confession (1530), the Schmalkaldic Articles (1537), and Luther's two catechisms (1529), were published together as the Book of Concord (1580). It was adopted by most of the German and Scandinavian rulers, but not in Nassau, Hesse, or Branschweig, which retained the Augsburg Confession alone. When Lutheran institutions bear the names "Concordia" and "Augustana," they may indicate loyalty to one or the other tradition.

Concordat, an agreement between church and state, specifically the Roman Holy See* and a government. (For the importance of concordats, see especially Church and State Relations Cluster: In Europe: The Roman Catholic Church and Politics.)

Concubinage, the cohabiting* of a man and a woman without marriage, often for social reasons.

Concupiscence, inordinate desire for temporal things (Rom 7:7; Gal 5:6; Jas 1:13–15), often understood to be the result and chief manifestation of original* sin.

Confessing Church (the) was founded during the German Church* Struggle as German Protestantism's answer to the Nazis' attempt to bring Christianity in line with National Socialist ideology. Protestant resistance was galvanized around two main issues: the attempt by the German* Christian Movement to create a united Reich Church under state control and the imposition in November 1933 of anti-Semitic legislation – the Aryan Paragraph – onto the German Church. The Pastors' Emergency League, under Martin Niemöller*, was the first major resistance movement organized by German Protestants. However, key leaders such as Karl Barth* and Dietrich Bonhoeffer* argued that the German Church was in statu confessionis* and that the only remaining option was the publication of a common confession of Christ against the Nazi heresy. This occurred in January 1934 when delegates of 167 Lutheran, Reformed, and United communities gathered in Barmen. In the process, they established themselves as the Confessing Church. The Barmen* Declaration (May 1934) was the high point of the Confessing Church's resistance. The presence of the Confessors enabled German Protestants to successfully resist coordination by the Nazi state. Yet members of the Confessing Church never agreed on the extent to which the Church should engage in political, as well as theological, resistance.

MARK R. LINDSAY

Confession, acknowledgment of sin* by the congregation in a general way (see Confiteor) or by an individual by him- or herself before God (as in Protestants churches) or to a priest as an act of penance* (as in the Roman Catholic Church). See also SEAL OF CONFESSION.

Confessions. See CREEDS, SYMBOLS, AND CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Confessor, in the early church, a person who suffered for the Christian faith without dying, thus not a martyr*.

Confirmand, a candidate for confirmation*.

Confirmation, a ritual prayer for the coming of the Holy* Spirit through which a believer is empowered to witness for Christ. The word has its origins in Gaul (5th c.), where bishops juridically confirmed the baptisms* administered by presbyters, deacons, and others, using some ritual elements of initiation: hand laying, anointing, and/or prayer. Theologians then linked the practice to two passages from Acts (8:14–17; 19:5–7), in which Peter, John, and Paul imposed hands on previously baptized disciples.

By the Middle Ages, the Western Church had made confirmation a ceremony distinct from baptism, administered by a bishop, during which he anointed a previously baptized Christian with chrism*. Chrismation became the equivalent of confirmation. When a bishop baptized, on rare occasions he administered confirmation in the same ceremony. When heterodox Christians were received back into the fold, the ceremony also included confirmation.

Throughout this time, the Eastern Church maintained a different pattern. The presbyter who baptized also chrismated in the same ceremony (see Chrismation).

In time the word "confirmation" took on the meaning of "strengthening," and it came to be seen as an expression of one's Christian maturity.

The 13th-c. Western Church included confirmation among its seven sacraments*, but Martin Luther* excluded it from the list, preserving only baptism and the Lord's Supper. The Reformed churches regarded confirmation as a personal expression of faith made by those baptized as infants. It usually concluded a period of comprehensive catechesis.

The Roman Catholic Church calls confirmation one of its sacraments of initiation. When a priest baptizes an adult, he administers confirmation immediately. Usually this ceremony takes place at the Easter vigil. Most Catholics are baptized as infants, however, and a bishop confirms them after they have completed a period of catechesis. The recommended age for confirmation varies considerably throughout the Catholic world; in the USA alone, the age ranges from about 7 to about 16. Some are confirmed much later; others never. When other Christians become Catholic, a priest confirms them immediately upon receiving them into the full communion of the church.

In the Orthodox churches, chrismation*, a sacrament, is conferred on the newly baptized (adult or infant) by the priest immediately after baptism* to impart the gift of the Holy* Spirit.

The meaning of confirmation, sometimes with other titles, varies among other Christian groups. Many see it as a person's reaffirmation of baptism in the presence of a church leader or community.

PAUL TURNER

Confiteor (Lat "I confess"), mutual confession and forgiveness of sins by the priest and congregation at the beginning of the Roman Mass, a practice that originated in monastic communities.

CONFUCIANISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

Confucianism and Christianity: Confucian and Christian Perspectives

Confucianism and Christianity in Hong Kong

Confucian Classics and the Bible

Confucianism and Christianity: Confucian and Christian Perspectives. The term "Confucianism" was introduced by Jesuit missionaries in China as a neologism for a scholastic tradition rooted in Chinese culture and philosophy that is variously referred to as rujia (school of the literati), rujiao (traditions of the literati), rujue (teachings of the literati), or simply ru (literati). While the ru tradition itself predates Confucius, the ethical vision of Confucius (c551–c479 BCE) and his followers has come to define and enrich this tradition.

The point of convergence of various schools within Confucianism is the existential questions regarding the ultimate values that shape human living. Confucius and his successors answered these questions by presenting an ideal person who is adept at relating to others and able to trust in the validity of these relations for familial and social harmony. In the Analects, Confucius called this ideal person a junzi (exemplary person), and the highest existential virtue that this exemplary person embodies he called ren (humanness).

The classical Confucian paradigm for virtuous living is the proper self-cultivation of the "Five Constants" (wu chang), i.e. ren (humanness), yi (appropriateness), li (ritualized propriety), zhi (wisdom in thought and action), and xin (keeping to one's word). Confucians insist that one must go beyond merely knowing these virtues in an intellectual sense; one must engage in the actual personal self-cultivation of the Five Constants. Complementing the Five Constants are the "Five Relations" (wu lun), which define the five foundational relations of a Confucian society on which the complex, interlocking human relations in Chinese society are constructed: parent–child, ruler–subject, husband–wife, elder–younger siblings, and friend–friend. The first four relations are hierarchical, whereas the fifth is a relation of equals. The Confucian conception of society presupposes that there are no strangers in society, defining the basic social relation as at least friend-to-friend (compare with friendship* in Christianity).

For Confucians the proper relational ordering of society as a human macrocosm takes the family as its inspiration and starting point. Society is ordered and harmony is promoted at all levels based on filiality, the source of order and harmony within a family. Ritually, filiality is expressed through ancestor* veneration offered by son to father, by scholar-gentry to Confucius as ancestor par excellence, and by emperor to his ancestors and to tian (heaven) for the well-being of the nation. Because filiality together with its public ritual expression of ancestor veneration became the glue that held religion, culture, and society together in imperial China, the attempts by some 17th- and 18th-c. missionaries to prohibit Chinese Roman Catholic converts from participating in ancestor veneration were viewed as attacks on filiality and on the very cohesion of Chinese culture and society, triggering the Chinese rites controversy*.

The Jesuit missionary to China, Matteo Ricci* (1552–1610), was convinced that the core teachings of Confucianism did not conflict with the Christian gospel. In an early work, Jiaoyou lun (On friendship), he sought to reassure the Confucian literati with his appreciation of the social significance of friendship and other foundational human relations within the Confucian Five Relations framework. His magnum opus, Tianzhu shiyi (True meaning of the Lord of Heaven), is grounded on the premise that the “original” Confucianism of Confucius, rather than the neo-Confucianism of Zhu Xi (Chu Hsi), enshrined an incipient monotheism and moral and ethical truth that were compatible with Christianity. History remembers two of Ricci’s Chinese students, Xu Guangqi (1562–1633) and Li Zhizao (1565–1630), together with Yang Tingyun (1557–1627) as the “three pillars of the early Chinese Church.” All three remained staunch Confucians, seeing no profound conflict between the Christian gospel and their Confucian way of life and asserting that Christianity replaced their earlier Buddhist practice (buru yifo). A student of Ricci, Xu Guangzi (Paul Hsu Kuang-ch’i) is best remembered for his summary of the fundamentals of Christianity in a letter he wrote in a powerful defense of Christianity, revealing a brilliant synthesis of Confucian and Christian ideas: “The service of Shangdi [the Sovereign Above] is the fundamental principle; the protection of the body and the salvation of the soul are of utmost importance; loyalty, filial piety, compassion, and love are accomplishments; the reformation of errors and the practice of virtue are initial steps; repentance and the purification [of sin] are the prerequisites for personal improvement; the true felicity of celestial life is the glorious reward of doing good; and the eternal misery of hell is the recompense of doing evil.”

Contemporary scholars and theologians have continued the dialogue between Confucianism and Christianity. For example, Yao Xinzong and Kim Heup Young have explored the intersection of ren and agape and considered their theological ramifications, while Yeo Khiok-Khng is interested in rereading biblical texts through a Confucian–Christian hermeneutical lens. Other theologians have proposed constructive Confucian–Christian Christologies of “Jesus as the Eldest Son and Ancestor” (Peter Phan) and “Jesus as the Crucified and Risen Sage” (Jonathan Tan). John Berthrong and Robert Neville are proponents of “Boston Confucianism,” asserting that Confucianism transcends its Chinese sociocultural roots to speak to a Western audience.

JONATHAN Y. TAN

Confucianism and Christianity in Hong Kong.

These two traditions encountered each other almost immediately after the colonization of Hong Kong. Two events particularly shaped their subsequent encounters. The first was James Legge’s arrival (1843). Both a missionary and a Sinologist, he completed the first translation of the Confucian classics into English and thus introduced Confucianism to the West in a sympathetic way that also, however, aroused serious debates. The second event ties in with the neo-Confucian manifesto on the crisis in Chinese culture published in 1958, which elicited serious local Christian responses. This later event evidenced a change in the basic motive of the encounter between the two traditions from a sociopolitical one (e.g. for national salvation through theological indigenization or inculturation*), which was prominent on the mainland, to the cultural motive of the diasporic Chinese Christian communities striving to define their identity.

SIMON SHUI-MAN KWAN

Confucian Classics and the Bible. The Confucian classics and the Bible are “classical” or “canonical” (regulative) in that they embody the normative and communal wisdom of two great civilizations. Yet the ideals and precepts of these “scriptures*” (shengjing) or “sacred books” (shengshu) transcend the historical circumstances of their origins and shape the modern world.

Beyond historical differences in linguistics, thought patterns, and content, the Confucian classics and the Bible have much in common, which is elucidated by the study of their genre, their moral and spiritual teachings, the process of their redaction, and the commentaries written on them throughout history. The varied contents of the texts allow for multiple points of dialogue and resonance.

The Confucian classics are called the Four Books (Sishu) – the Great Learning (Daxue), the Doctrine of the Mean (Zhongyong), the Analects (Lunyu), and Mencius (Mengzi). They contain a comprehensive understanding of the moral, philosophical, and political worlds of human endeavor in China*. In addition to proverbial sayings, the Four Books also contain history, oracles, poetic texts, dialogues, and debates. The complementarity of Confucian classics and the Bible (see Bible, Canon of; Bible Interpretation Cluster; Bible, Texts and Manuscripts) becomes apparent when one holds their radical differences in tension (cf. Doctrine of the Mean) – a challenging, interpretive move that highlights the incompleteness of both Confucian and biblical texts, while holding them sacred (cf. Ricoeur’s* textuality) (see Scripture).

The Judeo-Christian Bible holds to the cosmogonic belief that the universe is theocentric; the cosmos is initially created and sustained by a divine power of goodness. The Confucian “heaven” (tian) as a naturalistic cosmos lacks personal narrative, yet the transcendent nature of heaven is thought to be ren (benevolence) of the moral order. The immanent nature of heaven is expressed in human nature as virtues. Thus human virtues are anthropocosmic. A balanced worldview that is both theocentric and anthropocosmic is most beneficial; otherwise, religion becomes divorced from ethics, alienating divine grace from human endeavor.

Although Confucian classics assume neither Adam’s fall* (*sin) nor one’s existential estrangement from tian, both scriptures seek to overcome social conflicts, moral collapse, and spiritual chaos. The difference between the two scriptures lies in the Confucian virtue of self-cultivation and the biblical faith in God’s grace*. However, the Confucian self-cultivation ethic grounded on ren (benevolence) and li (ritual propriety) can be subsumed under a biblical ethic that is based on the Holy* Spirit; together, these two traditions encourage a complete obedience of faith*.

The cyclical history of the Confucian classics and the linear eschatological view of the Bible can mutually critique each other’s interpretive assumptions about space and time, held in each case as “either space or time.” Such mutual critique can move toward a more holistic and dynamic understanding of a multidimensional universe envisioned as a spiral movement.

The biblical understanding of love* as cruciform (i.e. exemplified by Jesus’ cross) fulfills the Confucian ideal of ren; in addition, Confucian ethics on propriety (li) and music (yue) supplements the biblical theology that lacks detailed ethical explication.

The relationship between human nature or goodness and divine grace in the Bible is antithetical to that in Confucian classics, yet both scriptures agree that only the love of neighbors expresses concretely how to be fully human (Analects 15:9) or holy (Lev 11:44; Matt 5:48; 1 Pet 1:16).

The scholarly tradition of rujia (Confucianism) and God’s Messiah as the suffering servant in the Judeo-Christian Scripture emphasize that living the Way (Dao) or living God’s love is to love others as oneself, who is loved by God.

An intertextual reading between these two scriptures fulfills the intertextuality inherent in the Confucian classics and in the Bible – an intertextuality resulting from the plurality of texts each canon includes and puts in dialogue (Fishbane).

YEO KHIOK-KHNG

Congo, Democratic Republic of (DRC). Since 1482 (when Roman Catholics arrived), Christianity has become greatly diversified owing to different levels of inculturation* in the complex cultural, political, and religious context in what is now the Democratic Republic of Congo. Political independence was achieved in 1960, and since that time, the political and socioeconomic climate has been one of turbulence, to which some Christians have contributed even as others have been victims. The dominant Roman Catholic Church in the Congo (51% of the population) took prophetic positions against colonialist* practices and in favor of independence (since 1956), experienced a renewal movement, developed a pastoral option for "Small Christian Communities," and now has its own inculturated* rite, the Zairian or Congolese Rite, for the Mass (approved by the Vatican in 1988; see Malula, John). In the meantime, all the churches arising from Protestant missions (since 1878) have been united into a single Protestant Church, L'Église du Christ au Congo (Church of Christ in Congo, since 1970, 21% of the population), while 23% of the population are members of the Kimbanguist* Church (originating in 1921; as of the early 21st c., there were about 8 million members in the DRC) and other independent churches that developed remarkable Congolese forms of Christianity.

The Congolese Horizon. The DRC, successively named Independent State of Congo (1885–1908), Belgian Congo (1908–60), Republic of Congo-Kinshasa (1960–64), Democratic Republic of Congo (1964–71), and Republic of Zaire (1971–97), now named the Democratic Republic of Congo (since 1997), is a large tropical African country that has more or less retained the political boundaries of the 1885 Berlin* Conference, and has about 60 million inhabitants, belonging to more than 365 ethnic groups, with more than 200 distinctive languages, including a majority of Bantus (who arrived from Nigeria and Chad more than 1,000 years ago), as well as Sudanese and Nilotics from Ethiopia (who arrived more recently) and the Batwa ethnic groups (Pygmies; the first occupants of the DRC).

Congolese people were socially and politically organized in families, villages, clans, ethnic groups, kingdoms, and empires (at least since the 8th–9th c. CE). Religion* was an integral part of these sociopolitical systems and the most conspicuous feature of life. Religion was life, and life was religion. Solidarity was the most ethical virtue sustaining individual and community life. People believed in one God, creator of everything, and they could interact with God through ancestors*. Beginning in the 15th c., contacts with Europe progressively undermined the traditional sociopolitical and religious harmony. Sociopolitical organizations based on ethnic affinities were replaced by new structures, which led to turbulence that was caused by poor management and that culminated in repeated wars, including one that claimed more than 3,500,000 lives between 1996 and 2006.

Christian Origins and Developments in the DRC. Christianity arrived with the Roman Catholic Church in 1482, followed by the Protestant churches (since 1878), the Kimbanguist* Church (1921), and other independent churches.

Roman Catholic Church. In 1482 the Portuguese explorer Diogo Cão landed at the estuary of the river Congo. Franciscan missionaries arrived sometime later and baptized the first Congolese Christian, Chief Manuel Mani of Soyo, on Easter Sunday, 1491, followed in the ensuing months by the baptism of Prince Mvemba a Nzinga, who took the name Dom Afonso, and the baptism of his father, the king of Mbanza Kongo (the kingdom at the mouth of the river Congo, now partly in Angola), Nzinga Nkuwu, and his wife (1491), who took the names João and Eleonora, respectively (the names of Portugal's King João and Queen Dona Eleonora). Subsequently, many people flocked to get baptized. Because of this early Catholic presence, Congo has been called the "elder son of the Church in black Africa" (Beeckmans). This first phase of Catholic evangelization was interrupted in 1835 with the departure of the last priest.

The second phase of the Catholic evangelization (1880–1980) started with the arrival of the Scheut missionaries (Congregatio Immaculati Cordis Mariae, a congregation from Belgium) at Boma (in Bas-Congo, original capital of the Belgian Congo) and ended with the celebration of its centenary. During this colonial* period, the Catholic Church enjoyed a privileged status, but it faced a series of challenges: juridical conditions for missionary establishments; competition with Protestants; integration of local cultures; church–state relations, especially at the time of independence (1960); anticlericalism during the disintegration of Congolese society; the murder of 200 sisters, brothers, and priests (1960–65); and (during the presidency of Mobutu) the nationalization of all foreign-owned institutions, and thus Catholic schools and institutions (1971). Amazingly, this period witnessed a significant growth of the Catholic Church in terms of basic structures and number of Congolese lay leaders, priests, and sisters – a growth that endured beyond the colonial period, in part owing to the 1956 declaration by the Catholic Bishops of the Congo (and Rwanda and Burundi) denouncing colonialist practices and expressing support for independence. This growth of the Catholic Church was also manifest in the lives of Congolese Catholics, including Isidore Bakanja (1885–1909, beatified in 1994), a young mason killed for refusing to stop functioning as a catechist, and Anuarite Nengapeta (1941–64, beatified in 1985), a sister murdered during the 1960–65 upheavals as she resisted rape; the erection of the first Catholic university (1957); the birth of African theology (1960); and the launching of the pastoral option for Small Christian Communities (1961) that developed inculturation* theology, the focus of the “Kinshasa school of thought.” Proponents of this school argue for a church whose theological thinking, liturgical celebrations, and community life should be “incarnated” in Congolese culture. Inculturation is found in numerous theological books and articles, in dialogued and sung Masses, and in the life of self-supportive Small Christian Communities, including the Jamaa (Swahili, “family”) Movement (from 1953), which started in the mining region of Katanga, was initiated by the Belgian Franciscan missionary Placide Tempels, and includes as many as 200,000 members. This renewal movement within the Congolese Catholic Church – a most impressive attempt to Africanize Christianity – consists of communities of married people (except for a few priests, nuns, and widowers or widows) who practice their Christian faith following an African lifestyle and conception of community life, and who commit themselves to growing in this faith-practice through ongoing instruction led by members of the Jamaa. By 1980 approximately half of the population of the DRC was Catholic; there were about 50 dioceses with many schools, medical centers, and philanthropic centers, run by mostly Congolese personnel.

The third phase of the Roman Catholic evangelization began in 1980. The first decades consisted of harvesting the fruits of previous efforts. The Congolese Catholic Church was affirmed by the successive beatifications of two Congolese Christians (Anuarite and Bakanja) by Pope John Paul II and the 1988 Vatican’s approval of the “Roman Missal for the Dioceses of Zaire,” commonly known as “Zairian or Congolese Rite.” In addition to cultural elements like songs, dances, and traditional symbols for kingship, the Mass in Zairian Rite includes, in the invocation of saints, the invocation of good ancestors*. The ritual of reconciliation, symbolized by the shaking of hands, takes place immediately after the sermon instead of being performed before the Eucharist, as it is in the usual Roman missal. Though culturally and theologically significant, these particularities do not make the Zairian Rite a different rite in the technical sense of canon law.

In spite of criticism from Liberation* and Reconstruction* theologians, inculturation has moved beyond the DRC and become a key aspect of the mission of the Catholic Church in Africa, alongside evangelization, dialogue*, justice and peace, and media. All these aspects might overlap at some points, but they can be summarized as the main concerns of an incarnated church. For the sake of the Roman Catholic Church, some bishops have sacrificed their life to defend human* rights, though others were accused of complicity with the warlords. However, the Episcopal Conference of the Congo issued many declarations, appealing for a stop to the war and promoting human dignity. This testimony of the Episcopal Conference displays the diaconal and prophetic roles so highly valued by ordinary Christians.

Protestant Church. There is a single Protestant Church, L’Église du Christ au Congo (Church of Christ in Congo), recognized in the DRC since 1970. The history of Protestantism in Congo can be divided into two phases: before and after 1970.

In 1878 the Baptist missionaries H. Craven and Strom arrived in Palabala (Bas Congo) and founded the first Protestant stations along the river Congo (Braekman). They were members of the Livingstone Inland Mission (named for David Livingstone*, who had reached the Congo in 1869), later replaced by missionaries from the American Baptist Missionary Union and Svenska Missions Förbundet and eventually joined by other Scandinavian Baptists. American Southern Presbyterians concentrated more inland in Kasai Province (in Luebo, where they built a hospital), and the Disciples of Christ went farther north (to Bolenge, where they replaced the American Baptists in 1899). The African Inland Mission established itself in the northeastern part of the DCR (1912); Methodists established themselves especially in the south-east (Katanga Province, since 1918, where they have a seminary) and were followed by Pentecostals (in different parts of the country). Educational and social joint organisms, and particularly the Protestant Council of Congo (since 1924), coordinated all these diverse missionary activities, until all these developing churches were replaced by the Church of Christ in Congo in 1970.

The second and ongoing phase of Congolese Protestantism began in 1970 with the creation of Church of Christ in Congo under the influence of Rev. Bokeleale* and Revs. Makanzu, Masamba, and Bossekota, among others. Despite the opposition of the Evangelicals, the government supported this unification in order to control Christians in three churches: the Roman Catholic Church, Church of Christ in Congo (Protestant), and Kimbanguist Church. Since 1970, the Church of Christ in Congo has taken many initiatives for socioeconomic growth, increasing its participation in education, health, social development, microfinance, and business enterprises (like industrial fishing and printing presses).

On the theological front, Congolese Protestant theologians produced a great deal of contextual theology and addressed the role of the Church of Christ in Congolese society, e.g. by emphasizing the importance of women not only in social work but also in the ordained ministry. An example of Congolese contextual theology is the "psycho-pastoral approach to witchcraft*", a main concern for Joseph Kufulu Mandunu, a Congolese Protestant theologian. Unlike many pastors and theologians who prefer to ignore witchcraft, proponents of the psycho-pastoral approach admit the reality of this phenomenon and suggest a pastoral care based on the biblical practice of healing* and exorcism*. While articulating Reconstruction* theology to respond to the appeal of the All Africa Church Conference, other Congolese seek a new theological paradigm that claims to go beyond inculturation and liberation. Yet exactly what such a unifying paradigm, capable of mobilizing contributions from different individuals and perspectives, would be is still not clear.

The Kimbanguist Church. The Kimbanguist Church (see Kimbanguism) started in 1921 as a popular and messianic movement led by the prophet Kimbangu*. After his death in 1951, his followers spread out and formed different sects inspired by his teaching. In 1956–57, Joseph Diangenda, the prophet's youngest son, succeeded in unifying these diverse Kimbanguist sects and created the church officially known as the "Church of Jesus Christ on Earth by the Prophet Simon Kimbangu." MacGaffey (1992) described the Kimbanguist Church as "the largest African-founded Protestant Church." It became a member of the World* Council of Churches (in 1969), 10 years after its official recognition by the colonial government (1959). However, the Church of Christ in Congo (since 2002) and then the Roman Catholic Church (since 2004) suspended ecumenical relationships with the Kimbanguists. The Kimbanguist Church nevertheless continues to preach the gospel and maintain its ecclesial structures.

From an outsider's perspective (for an insider's perspective, see Kimbanguism), the Bible seems to be the most important heritage that Kimbangu left to his followers. He is reported to have said, "I do not leave you orphans, I leave you with the Bible." In addition to the Ten Commandments, the Kimbanguist Church has an ethical code, which includes the following rules: (1) Respect the government (Rom 13:1–3). (2) Love everybody, even your enemy (Matt 5:43–45). (3) Do not smoke either tobacco or hemp. (4) Do not imbibe alcohol. (5) Do not dance or attend dances. (6) Do not bathe naked or sleep naked. (7) Do not quarrel. (8) Do not use charms or magic. (9) Pay taxes. (10) Do not harbor resentment. (11) Admit your wrongdoing before witnesses. (12) Do not eat monkey or pig. The basic theology of the Kimbanguist Church confesses Kimbangu as the prophet of Jesus and someone who was with God since the creation (John 1:1–18). Baptism is practiced without water, but in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, who descended upon Kimbangu. In a later theological development, Kimbangu's three sons have been confessed as (being like) the three persons of the Trinity. Nkamba, Kimbangu's native village, is a symbolic New Jerusalem. The social engagement of the Kimbanguist Church includes loyalty to the government and self-support campaigns. Kikongo is the official language of the Kimbanguist Church.

Other Independent Churches. The history of independent churches in the DRC can be dated from 1704, when Dona Beatriz Kimpa Vita (c1682–1706) founded her own church, known as the Antonian Church. She used Christian symbols but revitalized traditional Congolese cultural roots, questioned the traditional view of the cross, and preached a black Messiah and a kind of Prosperity* Gospel. She was captured and burned at the stake for heresy at the instigation of Catholic missionaries. Since the 1970s, the phenomenon of African* Instituted Churches has significantly increased in the DRC. More than 2,600 independent churches are found in Kinshasa City alone. They are inspired by the Charismatic Movement, reformism, Pietism, Gnosticism, Millennialism*, thaumaturgy, and utopia. They build their communities on the basis of practices selected from Catholicism, Protestantism, Kimbanguism, African traditional beliefs, and oriental religions. For example, "liberal Catholics" relate to some Catholic traditions, "Evangelical sects" are associated with Protestantism, while the "Ngunzists" claim to be part of the Kimbanguist heritage. Generally, independent churches preach the gospel of prosperity or of purity, and their theologies are popularized through audio- and videocassettes. These theological principles easily reach the majority of Congolese Christians, while those of the denominational churches are limited to elites who study or teach at theological institutions. The "new churches" literally dominate the world of Christian music.

Statistics: Population (2000): between 52 and 60 million. Christians: 96% (Roman Catholics, 51%; members of African Instituted Churches (including Kimbanguist*) and independent Charismatic churches, 23%; Protestants, 21%; marginal Christians, 1%); African Religionists, 2.4%; Muslims, 1.6%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

JEAN-CLAUDE LOBA-MKOLE

Congo, Republic of (Congo-Brazzaville), is situated in the western part of the Kongo kingdom, where Christianity flourished in the 15th and 16th c. Yet when Holy Ghost missionaries arrived (late 19th c.), they found no Christians. The present Congolese statistics on Christianity depend on the 1978 definition of sect* as any association or church not recognized by the Marxist state. Three denominational churches and two African* Instituted Churches (AICs) were recognized: Roman Catholics, Evangelical Churches of the Congo, Salvation* Army, the Kimbanguist* Church, and the Lassy Zepherin Church. Other AICs were viewed as sects. When these are included, there are 2.7 million Christians in a population of 2.9 million (1.5 million Catholic, 0.5 million Protestant, and 0.37 million members of AICs). Many Christians (0.59 million) are Charismatics.

The lower Congo culture is the cradle of messianic-prophetic movements (ngunza) inspired by charismatic leaders who suffered imprisonment and/or death in colonial hands. Kimpa Vita led the Antonian Movement in the 17th and 18th c. to reunite the Kongo. Simon Kimbangu*, Baptist catechist in Congo-Leopoldville, led a politicoreligious revival in 1921 that became the Kimbanguist* Church; and André Matsoua, who died in Brazzaville prison (1942), provoked a nativistic liberation movement, Matsouanism. These movements espouse political liberation*, health*, and deliverance from occult forces. "Witchcraft*" (kindoki), the ambivalent power or knowledge to heal or destroy, dominates narratives of clan and national disorder, economic and political success or failure. In this context, the Catholic Charismatic Movement, Protestant revivals, AICs, and nativistic sects combat Evil (as a transcendent power). Through trance, prayer, confession, the imposition of hands, and the administration of "revealed herbs" or holy water, prophets, shepherds, and pastors divine, heal*, exorcise*, and impose change in personal moral and social behavior. They displace and denounce the traditional nganga (healer), whose therapeutic field they justify and occupy. The practice of African* Religion is rare. But the importance attached to healing and exorcism, and to ancestral and messianic founders' tombs, authenticates ancestral cosmology (see Ancestor Veneration and Christianity Cluster: in Africa).

Since the civil war of 1993–94, Congo-Brazzaville has been scarred by ethnic conflict despite the sovereign national government. References to diverse religious phenomena escalated as distress and anxiety increased; conversely, the religious movements and churches reinforced the political power of various groups and the national government.

Ecumenism is highly developed; however, the 1998 massacre of church representatives who were killed as they attempted to reconcile the warring factions weakened the sociopolitical impact of the movement. The Catholic majority (six dioceses and one prefecture) is retraining its laity to assume civic responsibilities through "Basic Christian communities," especially in the south. The Charismatic Movement, fraternities (mabundu), youth associations, and other groups fill the vacuum created by social fragmentation and provide mutual aid and witness to the faith.

See also EXORCISM.

Statistics: Population (2000): 2.9 million (M). Christians, 2.7 M, 91% (Roman Catholics, 1.5 M; Protestants, 0.5 M; members of African Instituted Churches, 0.37 M); African Religionists, 0.14 M, 5%; Muslims, 1%; nonreligious, 2%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ELOCHUKWU EUGENE UZUKWU, CSSP

Congregatio de Auxiliis (Lat “Commission on Divine Aid” [given by grace]), appointed (1597) by Pope Clement VIII because of intense intra-Catholic debate over grace* and freedom*. Because the Jesuits*, following Miguel de Molina*, affirmed free will* despite the role of grace, they were accused of Pelagianism*. Because the Dominicans, following Domingo Báñez*, defended predetermination (thus predestination*), they were accused of Calvinism*. Pope Paul V exonerated both, leaving the debate unresolved (1607).

Congregation. In the Jewish and Christian traditions, a religious gathering (Heb qahal; Gk synagoge and ekklesia; Lat congregatio). In Roman Catholic usage, a community or order not required to take solemn vows; a group of monasteries; one of the permanent committees of the College of Cardinals in Rome. In Protestant churches of the Congregational* type, the local body responsible for calling and ordaining to all ministries.

Congregationalism. Congregationalism, an ecclesiological reform movement, grew out of the Reformation*. Its radically independent and proto-democratic church polity sought to enable a faithful approximation of the style and structure of the NT church in the social context of European Protestant society. The Congregational model took root among Dissenters* in England, France, and the Netherlands; it was most thoroughly incorporated into the social fabric of Puritan* New England, where it remained the official ecclesiology* for more than 200 years.

While Congregationalism does not have a specific creedal formulation, given its emphasis on the autonomy of each congregation, a few characteristics of the movement can be discerned.

Congregationalism is against ecclesiastical hierarchy, denying that there is an “official” church through which salvation* is administered. Rather, each congregation possesses within itself all that is required to be a fully realized Christian Church, namely the preaching of the gospel and the administration of the sacraments (baptism* and Communion*) by a settled minister, called to a church by a vote among the members.

Congregational theology is covenantal* and, historically, Calvinist*. The covenantal relationship within the Trinity and the covenantal relationship between God and God’s people (as understood in the Westminster* Confession of Faith) are the exemplars by which Congregational churches classically seek to relate. Each church has its own covenant by which incoming members testify to God’s saving work in their lives and commit to one another in fellowship, discipline, and mission.

Congregational churches are also voluntarist*; fellowship is not determined by geographical parish* but by the decision of the individual member to join the covenant community. Voluntarism was a strike against ecclesiastical hierarchy and also an attempt to form a community of “visible saints,” in which all members are mature Christian believers. In Congregational New England, such communities became quasi-theocratic*; only members of the church voted on town issues, which lent credence to the notion that the vote of the church represented God’s will. The aspiration to maintain God-centered civil societies as an example for the world was crystallized in John Winthrop’s famous sermon, “A Model of Christian Charity,” regularly invoked by US politicians to this day.

While Congregationalist contemporary theology tends to have little to do with theocracy and leans away from the Reformed beliefs of its early adherents, the ecclesiology of sacramental, autonomous covenant community remains the same. See also CHURCH, CONCEPTS AND LIFE, CLUSTER.

CALEB J. D. MASKELL

Congregatio de Propaganda Fide. See PROPAGANDA FIDE, CONGREGATIO DE.

Congress of Asian Theologians, a movement that organizes regular congresses (1997, Korea; 1999, India; 2001, Indonesia; 2003, Thailand; 2006, Hong Kong; 2009, Philippines) of Asian theologians related to the Programme* for Theology and Cultures in Asia and its founding bodies. Each of these congresses, attended by about 100 theologians and ecumenical leaders, promotes the formation of networks of Christian theologians throughout Asia, so that they may “come together to share life and work, project together concerns for the future, and help in the renewal and reinvigoration of the life and mission of the Church and of the ecumenical movement in Asia." SIMON SHUI-MAN KWAN

Consanguinity, a specified relation by descent from a common ancestor. Specified degree of consanguinity is an obstacle to marriage* in Scripture*, canon* law, and civil law.

Conscientious Objection, refusal on moral grounds to obey certain laws or to participate in carrying them out. It has its roots in the Stoic* position that natural law takes precedence over the laws enacted by the state. Early Christians were "conscientious objectors" to the Romans' demand that they offer incense to the traditional deities or the image of the emperor. At the time of the Reformation, conscientious objection took new forms among the Anabaptists* and later in the Society of Friends*. In the USA, those who disagreed with slavery* and the Fugitive Slave Law openly engaged in conscientious objection; Henry David Thoreau (see Transcendentalism) articulated many of its principles in his essay on civil disobedience*, which was then studied and effectively adapted by Mohandas Gandhi in India's struggle for independence and by Martin Luther King* during the civil rights struggle.

Members of the traditional "peace* churches" have been given the right, throughout US history, to abstain from active participation in war, often being given "alternative service." New legal controversies have been occasioned by conscientious objectors who are not members of the peace churches but act on their individual convictions, religious or nonreligious, and by "selective conscientious objection" to particular wars but not to war as such. See also NONVIOLENCE; PACIFISM AND CHRISTIANITY; PEACE MOVEMENTS; PEACE AND PEACE-MAKING. EUGENE TESELLE

Conscientization (Portuguese, conscientização), consciousness raising, a term coined by Paulo Freire (Pedagogy of the Oppressed, 1970) to refer to the process of learning to recognize social, political, economic, cultural, and ideological structural powers and the action that can lead to liberation from their oppressive elements. See also LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER: LIBERATION AND THEOLOGY.

Consecration (from Lat consecrare, "to render a person, place, or thing holy" [sacer/sacra]). In the OT, there are references to consecrations or dedications of altars (cf. Exod 40), the firstborn (Exod 13:2), the Temple (cf. 2 Chr 5–6), kings (1 Sam 10; 2 Sam 2), and prophets (Isa 6:5–13; Jer

1:5; cf. Rom 1:1; Gal 1:15, Paul "being set apart" as an apostle).

In Christian history, consecrations developed for churches, altars, altar stones, chalices, and patens, these being dedicated for sacred use unless subsequently "reduced" to profane status.

The ordination* of priests* as bishops* is traditionally called a "consecration." The profession of vows by men and women religious is likewise a "consecration," though not an "ordination" (the sacrament of holy orders is not involved).

Roman Catholics sometimes make personal "consecrations" to various devotions, such as the Sacred Heart of Jesus or the Immaculate Heart of Mary. Roman Catholics also speak of the "words of consecration," pronounced by the priest to change the bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ. The Eastern Orthodox, however, usually regard the invocation (epiclesis) of the Holy Spirit or the entire eucharistic prayer (anaphora) as effecting the change of the bread and wine rather than the words of consecration alone.

ROBERT FASTIGGI

Consensus Tigurinus (Lat "Zurich Agreement"), the declaration of faith, in 26 articles, agreed upon in 1549 by Calvin* and Bullinger*, representing the Reformed churches of French and German Switzerland, respectively. Its chief purpose was to reconcile the conflicting eucharistic* doctrines of Zwingli* and Calvin, rejecting both the Roman Catholic and the Lutheran positions.

Consequentialist Ethics emphasizes the effects (consequences) of choices and actions, especially their effects on others, and the intentionality of actions. In contrast to deontological ethics, which emphasizes conformity to moral norms, consequentialist ethics (the most common ethical approach in business) is goal oriented and thus also called "teleological" or, with John Stuart Mill, "utilitarian." Theological consequentialist ethics can be most directly concerned with the question: For the sake of whom are we acting? (our neighbors), and therefore with the question: What is desirable for others? (By contrast, deontological ethics is concerned with the negative imperative: "harm not.") It is an ethical approach particularly helpful in an eschatological perspective (a "Kingdom* ethics"). See also DEONTIC, DEONTOLOGICAL ETHICS; PERFECTIONIST ETHICS.

Conservatism in Christianity: A Sociological Perspective. Sociologists study the relations between religion and society. A sociological approach to the study of contemporary religion divides adherents of world religions into traditionalists (or conservatives), who reject significant aspects of modernity, and modernists (or liberals), who accept modernity.

The "Christian Right" (taking various forms in different religious and cultural contexts) embodies religious conservatism. The Right seeks to create a Christian society where the state enforces the morality propounded by the Right; other religions are not respected; and the Right's "Christian" worldview dominates all of culture. The Right espouses "ordered liberty": people should be free only to do what is "right."

There are various explanations for the appeal of conservative Christianity. One is that people are attracted to strict rules: strictness conveys a desirable seriousness (Kelley, 1977) and eliminates "free-riders," allowing congregations to more effectively reward participants (Iannaccone, 1994). Another possible explanation is that conservative Christianity survives because it is more helpful than conventional Christianity to the poor and powerless; e.g. it allows them to feel good about themselves as members of a spiritual elite (Tamney).

Conservative Christianity may grow in the future because of this appeal and because conservatives tend to have large families and to be more successful than liberals at retaining the loyalty of their youth (Greeley and Hout). Moreover, many throughout the world are attracted by the Pentecostal* and Charismatic* forms of conservative religion, which combine indigenous, Shamanistic*-like elements and Christianity, and are thus able to offer premodern people continuities with their past and a bridge to modernity (Gifford).

As conservatives in the North Atlantic world become middle class, some develop a modified form of conservatism, more adapted to modernity. This "modernized conservatism" is appealing because people value traditional gender roles or rituals that evoke religious experiences, or because they fear being on a slippery slope to "moral relativism." See also POSTMODERNISM AND THEOLOGY.

JOSEPH B. TAMNEY

Consistory, a place of meeting; now the meeting of church officers: in Catholicism*, the pope* and cardinals*; in Protestantism, the bishop and clergy, or congregational officers.

Constance, Council of (1414–18), the major achievement of the Conciliar* Movement, occasioned by the Western Schism (or Great* Schism, 1378–1417), when there were rival popes in Avignon and Rome, and the election of a third pope by the Council of Pisa* (1409–15). The call to the Council was issued at the demand of Emperor Sigismund. The Council functioned as a kind of Congress of Europe, with representatives of rulers, bishops, and universities; the voting was by nations. As a "general council," it was able to deal with questions about the schism, the reform of the church, and heresy*.

About heresy, there was little disagreement. Although Sigismund gave a safe-conduct to Jan Hus*, the Council imprisoned him and urged him to recant; however, Hus refused and was burned at the stake (1415).

The schism was resolved when the Pisan pope, generally termed "antipope," John XXIII, tried to dissolve the Council and then fled. The Council took a Conciliarist* view and adopted the decree Haec sancta (1415), declaring that it had direct authority from Christ and that persons of every rank, including the papal, were obliged to obey it in matters of faith, the extirpation of the schism, and the reformation of the church in head and members. From 1415 to 1417, no pope was recognized; the Council held supreme authority in the church, and a series of reforming decrees was passed, including Frequens (1417), requiring the pope to convene general councils at regular intervals.

The Council, losing its momentum, decided to elect a pope and chose Martin V. He immediately contravened some of its measures. Not prepared to depose the pope it had just elected, the Council adjourned (1418); Pope Martin was in control. Haec sancta remained authoritative, since the legitimacy of the popes depended on it. Further councils were held in accordance with Frequens, especially the Council of Basel*.

EUGENE TESELLE

Constantine (272/73–337), first Christian sovereign of the Roman Empire. Born in Naisus (modern Serbia), Constantine served as a military tribune, then lived in Nicomedia (303–5). His father, Constantius, had become Western emperor (305). Constantine was in Britain when his father died (at York, 306). The army saluted Constantine as emperor of the West. Constantine marched against Maxentius, who also claimed to be emperor (312). On the eve of battle, Constantine had a vision in which he was promised victory under the sign of the cross. He adopted this insignium (the Chi-Rho monogram), defeated Maxentius, and entered Rome a monotheist, if not yet a Christian. He gave the Lateran basilica to the pope and ordered a new structure built over the tomb of St. Peter.

Constantine and Licinius, one of two competitors for the Eastern throne, met in Milan (313), and the two sent letters to provincial governors repealing the persecution of Christians, which was being prolonged by Licinius's rival Maximinus Daia. After the defeat and death of Maximinus, Licinius ruled the East as Constantine's ally. Yet Constantine invaded his dominions under the pretext of resisting a barbarian invasion (316). Alleging heavy taxation and persecution of Christians, Constantine deposed Licinius, then (324) moved the capital from Rome to Constantinople, the "Second Rome."

Because of the unrest caused by the Arian* controversy, Constantine called and dominated the Council of Nicaea* (325; see Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy; Trinity in the Western Tradition). In his religious policy, especially toward the Donatists* and the Arians*, he punished intransigence. Having already governed the church as a Christian in the West for some years, he now passed laws that favored Christians, though probably suppressing only what he viewed as the most immoral "pagan" cults and religious intolerance. He ruled as sole emperor for 13 years, waging successive wars for the protection of Christians outside the empire – a threat that engendered persecutions of Christians as "pro-Roman," e.g. in Persia (see Church of the East, or Assyrian Church) – and died on the eve of a campaign against Persia, receiving baptism on his deathbed.

In Constantinople he had prepared a shrine to the Twelve Apostles, with his tomb in the center, both to share their honor and to receive their merit (thus Eastern Christians called him "the equal of the apostles"). After his death, he was deified in the traditional Roman manner, which Christians were able to interpret in their own way. Thus in death as in life, Constantine was at the boundary where classical Greco-Roman and Christian traditions met, both Christianizing the former and adapting the latter to the growing spirit of imperial absolutism.

MARK J. EDWARDS and EUGENE TESELLE

Constantinople, Councils of, four general councils that met in present-day Istanbul during the church's first millennium. They were preceded by the Homoian Council of Constantinople (360), which should not be ignored.

The Homoian Council of Constantinople (360), called by Constantius II, the Roman emperor of the East, reaffirmed, against Nicaea* I (325), the moderate Arian* view that the Son is "like" (homoios) the Father while avoiding saying that he is "of the same essence" (homoousios). Like the following council, it was attended almost exclusively by bishops from the East and is often ignored because of its theological position (deemed heretical* by its opponents), although it is an important reminder of the fact that Arianism remained a very strong movement in the Christian Church until the 6th or 7th c.

Constantinople (381), one of the ecumenical* councils*, called "Constantinople I" by those who reject the Homoian Council, completed the work of Nicaea I, once again rejecting Arianism*. It formulated the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed (what is commonly known today as the Nicene* Creed), which reaffirmed Jesus' full divinity and extended Nicaea's minimal language on the Spirit to say that Christians believe "in the Spirit, the holy, the lordly and life-giving one, proceeding forth from the Father, co-worshipped and co-glorified with Father and Son." Although no Western bishops attended, Pope Damasus I (366–84), who did not send delegates, accepted the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed. It said only, "The Spirit proceeding forth from the Father." *Filioque ("and the Son") was added later and became standard in the West. Eastern bishops objected to this addition because Eastern theology on the whole held that the Spirit proceeds from the Father alone, adding to the East–West split.

Constantinople II (553) addressed the continuing confusion concerning Jesus and Mary, specifically the Nestorian* position that Mary was the mother of Jesus the human being (Christokos), but not the mother of God's Son (Theotokos). The Council condemned the "Three Chapters," referring to the essays of three men – Theodore* of Mopsuestia, Theodoret* of Cyrrhus, and Ibas* of Edessa – who seemed to sympathize with Nestorianism*. The weak pope Vigilius* (537–55) hesitated. While he had been supported by the Byzantine empress Theodora*, he had leaned toward Miaphysitism. But after her death, the Byzantine emperor Justinian* overshadowed Pope Vigilius. Vigilius ultimately endorsed the decrees of the Council, but only after issuing inconsistent public and private statements. The Council's creed provides a useful summary of a half-millennium of Christology*, Mariology*, and Trinitarian* theology.

Constantinople III (680–81) resolved the remaining question of how many wills Jesus had. Monothelism* argued for one, saying the human and divine wills had merged in Jesus' unique person. The Council condemned this position, holding that Jesus is one person with two natures and two wills (one human and one divine). This position meant that the Council had also to condemn a prior pope, Honorius I (625–38), who had followed the monothelites. Later arguments would be made that Honorius had held this position as an individual Christian but not as a pope, that he was well-meaning but misguided, or that he did not hold the position but had failed to oppose it.

Constantinople IV (869–70), the least prestigious of the West's 21 general councils, is typically not accepted as a general council in the East. It was more a local political event than a theological summit, despite its repetition of the theology and creeds of the prior seven general councils. The Council concerned itself with the competing claims of two bishops, Photius* and Ignatius, to be patriarch of Constantinople, who alternately held the see, a situation complicated by the assassination of one Byzantine co-emperor by the other – a possible reason for the repeated assertion of the ultimate authority and honor to be accorded bishops over secular rulers. Several Roman popes were involved before, during, and after this meeting, inappropriately, according to some in the East. In subsequent years and centuries, popes and Eastern bishops rejected or accepted this Council.

CHRISTOPHER M. BELLITTO

Constantinople, Patriarchate of. See ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE.

Consubstantiation (Lat for “with another substance”), Lutheran doctrine of the Eucharist*, according to which after consecration the Body and Blood of Christ are “in, with, and under” the elements.

Consultation on Church Union (COCU) grew out of a joint proposal by Episcopal Bishop James Pike and Presbyterian Eugene Carson Blake in 1960. In response, nine US main-line denominations committed to agreeing on and manifesting a form of unity faithful to the NT and effective in carrying out common mission* today. From 1962 to 2002, scholars and laypersons from these churches – African* Methodist Episcopal Church, African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, Christian* Church (Disciples of Christ), Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, Episcopal* Church, International Council of Community Churches, United Presbyterian Church in the USA (Presbyterian Church USA, after 1983), and Methodist Church (United Methodist after 1968) – worked out a theological consensus on ministry and forms of church order, united worship, and ways to combat racism* and discrimination against disabled people (see Disability and Christianity) and women (see Feminist Theology Cluster: In North America: various entries). Fellowships involving shared eucharistic worship and common mission including thousands of people emerged. Plans to achieve full communion were accepted by eight of these churches; the Episcopal Church did not vote on this proposal. After each church accepted all the others, the work of COCU passed to an association, “Churches Uniting in Christ,” for completion and implementation.

GERALD MOEDE

Contemplation, Contemplative Prayer and Life. Disciplined dedication to prayer is a feature of all religions. The roots of Christian contemplative life are both biblical and Hellenistic. Contemplation was not a distinct path in the life of the early church, but it was inseparable from its missionary and communal life.

In the 4th-c. Roman Empire under Constantine*, Christendom emerged both as a religious and as a secular force. This shift led radical Christians (especially those practicing asceticism*) to seek holier lifestyles on the margins of the Empire. The traditions of contemplative life as a distinct form of Christian commitment therein emerged. The deserts in Egypt*, Palestine, and Syria* were the first cradles of the contemplative monastic* movement (see Eremitic Monasticism; Monasticism Cluster). The focus of the monks and nuns in this movement was an inner journey, a personal search for God.

In many sources, the term “contemplation” means “intellectual vision” or speculation. This sense of the term fails to grasp the full meaning of religious contemplation and mysticism*. Contemplation is not merely a matter of analogical* knowledge of the infinite (e.g. in a personal search for the reality of God), but one of immediate intuition (see Apophaticism; Heteronomy [as kenosis*]). Realizing the love of God is a central aim of Christian contemplation; therefore, emotions, as well as intuition, are central to it. Contemplatives' search aims not at the extraordinary, but at the ultimate reality that gives meaning to our lives.

Contemplatives sought (and still seek) solitude and silence, and forsook mundane preoccupations in order to hear the Word of God. Thus the deserts gave way to different paths of institutionalization, to spaces and structures such as monasteries and hermitages, and to monastic orders and rules of life (see Monasticism Cluster: Monastic Rules). Multiple traditions emerged in Byzantine and Latin Christendoms, which in turn produced different schools of spirituality (e.g. Byzantine and Eastern Orthodox* monasticism*, Cistercian*, Carmelite*). The monastic movements usually began as an initiative of the laity*, not of clerics. Many mystics have been women, laity, and nonordained religious. The early emphasis on withdrawal was later balanced with models combining the active life and the contemplative life. Modern spirituality also promotes the flourishing of contemplation in the midst of the secular city.

From the Sayings of the (Desert) Fathers (Apophthegmata Patrum*) down to writings by Thomas Merton*, the tradition has amassed a vast corpus of literature that aids in the contemplative enterprise, combining asceticism, theology, spiritual psychology, and mystical phenomenology. Great masters, such as Teresa* of Ávila, John* of the Cross, Ignatius* Loyola, and, among Protestants, Sebastian Franck, Valentin Weigel, and Jacob Boehme*, have played important roles as spiritual directors. Even though contemplation is a personal journey, it is recommended that one receive guidance in view of the psychological effort demanded.

Today, many lay Christians are seriously interested and involved in contemplation. Persons outside the church also seek spiritual insight by examining the wisdom of the great Christian mystics. Finally, the fruitful dialogue between contemplatives of different religions has demonstrated the interreligious ecumenical potential of contemplation (see Dialogue, Ecumenical; Interfaith Dialogue). See also PRAYER OF THE HEART.

ANA MARÍA BIDEGAIN and JUAN SANCHEZ

Contextualization, a term introduced into the theological vocabulary by the Theological Education Fund (World* Council of Churches) in 1972, as an outgrowth of the work of its leader, Skoki Choe of Taiwan. Contextualization is built on the assumption that, consciously or not, all theologies are born out of a social condition and the needs of a particular context.

Contextualization reverses the direction from which theology is approached. Rather than assuming theological truths and then finding cultural language with which to formulate these truths, contextual theology starts by studying the context and its historical, socioeconomic, political, cultural, ethnic, racial, and religious dimensions. It then uses these dimensions to articulate a theology at once appropriate to that situation and pointing to a universal reality.

Contextualization is important for three reasons (Robert Schreiter). (1) Methodologically, while Christian hope is rooted in the Bible, it is shaped by language and the cultural specificity of both the Bible and the interpreter's culture. There is a dialectic relationship between text and context, each helping the other to elucidate the hope that seeks expression. (2) Sociologically, the environments in which we find ourselves play a critical role in the way our theologies develop. (3) Perhaps most importantly, Christian theology is based on an incarnational God, who became manifest in a particular time and place. A docetic* theology is as unhelpful as a docetic Christology*. A theological response to God's initiative must be as particular as the initiative itself was.

Contextual theology came to the fore with the global perspective common today. As we become aware of the universal dimensions of humanity, how local context shapes that humanity becomes apparent to us. Well-crafted contextual theology addresses local situations and in so doing contributes to global conversations without suppressing other voices from other contexts.

However, while context is the medium through which theology must be articulated if it is to have substance, context is not without flaw. Christianity assumes that sin* is pervasive; we are both too broken and too finite to speak definitively of God. The Christian message has a critical prophetic edge that speaks of an alternative vision of a world as God intends it. Doing contextual theology requires the use of a hermeneutic* of suspicion. Just because something is contextual does not mean that it is inherently good. Each theology must be tested by the gospel message and alternative voices. See also INCULTURATION CLUSTER.

DAMAYANTHI M. A. NILES

CONTEXTUAL THEOLOGIES

See AFRICAN AMERICAN CLUSTER: THEOLOGIES; ASIAN THEOLOGY, TRENDS IN; ASIAN AMERICAN THEOLOGIES; BLACK THEOLOGY; COLONIALISM AND IMPERIALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; CREATION THEOLOGY IN SCANDINAVIA; CRISIS THEOLOGY; DALIT THEOLOGY; DECOLONIZING THEOLOGY; DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY; FEMINIST THEOLOGY CLUSTER; GAY AND LESBIAN THEOLOGIES; INDIAN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGIES; LATIN AMERICAN THEOLOGIES; LATINO/A THEOLOGIES; MINJUNG THEOLOGY; PALESTINIAN LIBERATION THEOLOGY; RECONSTRUCTION, AFRICAN THEOLOGIES OF. See also CHURCHES AND DENOMINATIONS AND THEIR THEOLOGIES CLUSTER.

Contraception. See BIRTH CONTROL AND CONTRACEPTION, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF.

Contrition, sincere sorrow for one's sins, based on love for God (contrasted with attrition*).

Convent, a building in which nuns (members of a Roman Catholic women's* religious order) live. The community is ruled by the mother superior, considered God's representative, who reports to her major superior in the mother house, which in turn reports to the Vatican.

Conventicle, in British law, a private, clandestine, or illegal religious gathering, e.g. of Nonconformists* or Dissenters* in England or Covenanters* in Scotland.

Conversion (from Lat conversio, "turning around" or often "turning toward") is not designated by a particular term in the Bible, although the Hebrew shuv and the Greek epistrephein sometimes convey the "turning toward" God that characterizes conversion, in contrast to repentance*, which emphasizes the "turning away from" evil. As the process of radically rejecting evil and embracing a relationship with God through faith*, conversion is commonly viewed as involving radical alterations in people's beliefs, behaviors, and affiliations, as A. D. Nock emphasized, contrasting conversion in Christianity and Judaism with conversion in other religions. Although conversion is often experienced as a sudden radical change, and although some scholars and Christian traditions limit it to such a sudden experience, other scholars and Christian traditions affirm conversion as a process; the sudden experience is the experience of a paradigm shift. As a process of religious change, conversion is cumulative and contextual, taking place "in a dynamic force field of people, events, ideologies*, institutions, expectations, and orientations" (Rambo). Thus the study of conversion benefits from social scientific approaches (psychology, sociology, anthropology), as well as from theological and missiological inquiries.

The scholarly study of Paul's* conversion as presented in Gal 1:11–17 (and Phil 3:3–14) exemplifies this diversity of views. For traditional Western scholarship that emphasizes "Paul the theologian proclaiming justification through faith," conversion established for Paul a totally new relationship with God through faith, a complete rejection of his Pharisaic Judaism and of his evil behavior as persecutor of the church. Following this model, most Western missionaries in Africa, Asia, and Latin America preached a gospel demanding from converts a total rejection of their former religious and cultural traditions by turning "from darkness to light" (see, e.g., Mission Cluster; Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions; Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions).

By contrast, following Stendahl, scholars of the "New Perspective" underscored that Paul's experience was not a "conversion" in this traditional sense. Paul remained a Jew, e.g. holding to fundamental beliefs in the God of Abraham and to the Jewish Scripture, and proclaiming a Jewish message about Jesus as Messiah. His radical experience was rather a call to a prophetic role as missionary to the Gentiles* or Nations, as Jeremiah (1:5) and Isaiah (49:1) were before him. According to this perspective, conversion is a process through which the gospel finds expression in continuity with the very religious and cultural views and practices that it transforms for converts. And conversion is a call to contribute to a transformative mission in a particular context and is always inculturated*, as the church already recognized in the Hellenistic* period or during its early expansion in Africa (see Orthodox Churches, Oriental, Cluster: Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church), China*, and later in Latin America (see, e.g., Mexico; also Culture Cluster: Culture and Christianity; Inculturation Cluster).

Still other scholars underscore that in all cases conversion is the experience of being freed from bondage. They take note of the apocalyptic character of Paul's message (a messianic message) and its emphasis on the power of sin (in its many forms) to keep humans in bondage. While affirming the specificity of his own experience (Gal 1:11–17), Paul describes his readers' conversions as a liberating experience similar to his own. This transformative experience makes believers in Christ "a new creation" (6:15). Conversion as a foundational liberating experience has been underscored through the centuries in the Eastern Orthodox* tradition, with its view of sin as a disease and the conversion process leading to a theosis* (the making of a new creation), Christians becoming agents of this ongoing transformation in the world. Similarly, Liberation theologies emphasize that liberation from all forms of sin, including structural sin through which people are oppressed, is a fundamental conversion experience that call those who are free to contribute to the liberation of others. See also LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER. DANIEL PATTE

Conversos (Spanish, "converted"), Spanish Jews who converted to Roman Catholic Christianity after undergoing severe persecution (late 14th–15th c.). Suspicions against these "New Christians," still viewed as Jews by the populace (also referred to by the derogatory term marraños, "pigs"), led in part to the establishment of the Spanish Inquisition* (1478). The Inquisition accused conversos of secretly observing their Jewish faith and ordered the execution of many. The civil and ecclesial rights of conversos and their descendants (Christians with Jewish ancestry) were severely curtailed by 15th- to 16th-c. laws, although many or most conversos, including Roman Catholic saints such as Teresa* of Ávila and John* of the Cross, practiced an orthodox Catholic faith. See also SPAIN.

Conviction. While this term designates a juridical process (someone being convicted of a crime) that can refer to true and false beliefs (convincing a person of error, compelling a person to admit the truth), in theological perspectives that question the limits of rationalism*, conviction has become a helpful concept in referring to the state of being convinced, free of doubt – a primordial experience (Gadamer*) housed in language (Heidegger*). Conviction as the state of being convinced is at the center of Quaker* worship. A conviction as a truth perceived by believers to be self-evident, "pro-riocceptive" (arising within the organism), or "intuitive, vocational, mystical" (von* Hügel) imposes itself on believers and drives their lives. Directly related to faith as trust (see Faith #2) and as primordial religious experience (see Faith #4), conviction precedes understanding but can be brought to understanding through theological reflection (fides quaerens intellectum [Anselm*]) and then questioned. See also APOPHATISM; GADAMER, HANS-GEORG; HERMENEUTICS; METAPHOR; MODERNISM; ROMAN CATHOLIC; MYSTICISM; MYSTICS; SYMBOLISM. DANIEL PATTE

Cooperative, a voluntary association engaged in economic activities, committed to democratic control and equitable sharing of assets and profits, and championed by socialists, liberals, Catholics, and liberal Protestants. A cooperative enables small operators to increase their bargaining power and efficiency through joint action, whether in marketing or buying products (agriculture, fishing, manufacturing), providing services (transportation, utilities), or gaining mutual security (health care, insurance, savings, housing). The Rochdale Pioneers (1844) formulated classic cooperative principles; a major modern example is the Mondragon network (France), founded by a Basque priest (1956).

Cope, long cloak of semicircular cloth worn by clergy in processions or at vespers*, when the chasuble* is not used.

Copernicus, Nicolas (Niclas Kopernijk; 1473–1543), astronomer, mathematician, medical practitioner, clerical administrator. Born in Torun (Thorn), Poland; studied in Krakow, Bologna, Padua, and Ferrara. He formulated the first successful mathematical version of heliocentric astronomy. However, he delayed publication of his theory, in part because it challenged the literalist* scriptural interpretation (several biblical passages mention the sun's motion or the earth's immobility). He was presented with a copy of his De revolutionibus orbium caelestium on his deathbed. At first regarded simply as a useful mathematical device, the book soon incited growing opposition among theologians, culminating in the condemnation in Rome of the Copernican worldview as "contrary to Scripture*" (1616). ERNAN McMULLIN

Coptic Orthodox Church. See ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER: COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH.

Corinthians, 1 and 2 Epistles, collections of letter fragments (perhaps eight) written by Paul to the church at Corinth over several years (c42–56) that record Paul's turbulent relationship with a diverse congregation and defend his apostolic ministry.

Initially Paul and his colleagues stayed in Corinth for more than 18 months (Acts 18:11), converting both Gentiles (1 Cor 12:2) and a significant minority of Jews (1 Cor 16:19), including the former "ruler of the synagogue" Crispus (Acts 18:8). For the first time, the Pauline mission succeeded in crossing social class boundaries. Most converts were from the lower classes (1 Cor 1:26–28). But converts from the upper strata functioned as patrons of the Christian community and included Gaius, "the host of the whole church," and Erastus, "the treasurer of the city" of Corinth (Rom 16:23; 1 Cor 1:14). For these few upper-class Christians, "learned eloquence" held an attraction (1 Cor 1:17; 2:1, 4); they admired the learned and eloquent Apollos (Acts 18:24–28; 1 Cor 1:12, 3:4) and instigated factions. To such elite Christians, Paul was an embarrassment owing to his weakness, the defects of his oratory, his vulgar occupation, and his gospel focused on the "crucified Christ." Thus they welcomed rival Jewish Christian apostles who questioned the legitimacy of Paul's apostleship. Seeking to reestablish his authority, Paul made a second visit to Corinth, with disastrous results: one of the leaders of the church "did Paul wrong" (2 Cor 2:1–11, 7:12). In response, Paul composed the "painful epistle" (now 2 Cor 10:1–13:10), then pursued reconciliation through a conciliatory apology (now 2 Cor 2:14–6:13, 7:2–4) and through Titus's* mediation. Paul eventually celebrated the Corinthians' repentance (2 Cor 1:1–2:13, 7:5–16, 13:11–13) and their contribution to the collection for the poor in Jerusalem (2 Cor 8, 9).

Paul draws on the primitive Christian kerygma of Jesus' sacrificial death (1 Cor 1:18–31, 11:23–26; 2 Cor 5:14–15) and resurrection (1 Cor 6:14, 15:1–11) to deepen the Corinthians' understanding of their experience. For Christians of Jewish origin, Paul cites the Scriptures of Israel: presenting typological/midrashic* interpretations of Israel's wilderness wandering (1 Cor 10) and of the veil of Moses (2 Cor 3). For Paul the Jewish Scriptures are authoritative, yet he reverses the direction of hermeneutical inference; the meaning of events in Israelite history is determined by the Christians' contemporary experiences (1 Cor 10:11). His portrayal of Moses as a deceiver (2 Cor 3:13–16) anticipates Marcion*.

Paul's appropriations of traditions from Greco-Roman culture are most significant. Beyond citing comic writers (e.g. Menander in 1 Cor 15:33), he adapts religious, political, and theatrical discourse, e.g. the "proof" of the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor 15), modeled on the "proof" of the immortality of the soul (Plato's Phaedrus and Cicero's Tusculan Disputations), or the "fool's speech" (2 Cor. 11:1–12:10), based on the speeches of fools in farce and mime.

The gospel of the "crucified Christ" nullifies the cultured elite's values, but empowers the weak and lowborn (1 Cor 1:18–31). This divinely ordained reversal of values requires a self-limiting regard for others, especially the poor and the weak, for whom Christ died (1 Cor 8:11), a discernment of the needs of others, and the sharing of possessions (1 Cor 11:17–34; 2 Cor. 8, 9). Christian existence is a paradox of "power made perfect in weakness" (2 Cor 12:8–10), of "life manifested in death" (2 Cor 4:7–12). Christians are given the "ministry of reconciliation," to "live no longer for themselves" (2 Cor 5:11–21).

LAURENCE L. WELBORN

Cornelius, a centurion of the Italian cohort living in Caesarea, who was associated with a synagogue* as a God fearer*. After a vision he sought out Peter*, who had also received a vision declaring the acceptability of Gentiles* who had not been circumcised* as followers of Christ (Acts 10). For Peter and for Christians today, this was evidence of God's inclusiveness of all people.

Cornelius, Bishop of Rome. See POPES, ROMAN CATHOLIC, AND THE PAPACY.

Corporatism, the political theory that the state should balance the organized interests of all sectors of society (agriculture, labor, industry, the professions, the arts) for the common good. The encyclicals Rerum Novarum (1891) and Quadragesimo Anno (1931) envisaged justice being achieved through neither capitalism nor socialism, but through negotiation among representatives of these "corporations." While these social* encyclicals assumed that corporations would be autonomous, in fascism* they were controlled by the state.

Corpus Christi, Feast of, a commemoration of the Eucharist* on the Thursday after Trinity* Sunday. See also JULIANA OF LIÈGE.

Corruption (from Lat “disintegration” or “destruction”), the physical disintegration of the body; moral deterioration through sin*.

Cosmology, the study of the universe as a whole, using the methods of philosophy, theology, and/or the natural sciences. See also WORLD.

Cosmos. See WORLD.

Costa Rica. Christopher Columbus arrived in Costa Rica during his fourth voyage (1502) in the territories inhabited by Huetares, Brunecas, and Chorotegas. The first Catholic parishes were established in San Blas of Nicoya (1544) and Cartago (1562). But the Bribries and Cabécares of the Talamanca region resisted until the 19th c., after repeated efforts by the Spanish governors and the Franciscans to conquer and evangelize them.

Near Cartago, Juana Pereira, a mulatto woman, discovered on August 2, 1635, a dark stone bearing an image of the Virgin. Since then the “Negrita,” or “Virgin of los Angeles,” has been much venerated.

With independence from Spain (1821), a concordat* with Rome stipulated that Roman Catholicism would be the exclusive religion of the country (signed by Pius IX in 1852). The Constitution of 1871 tolerated other religions but reaffirmed the position of the Catholic Church as the state church. Following the expulsion of the Jesuits and of Bishop Bernardo Thiel, however, laws passed by Liberals limited the legal jurisdiction (e.g. regarding civil registration, matrimony, cemeteries, education) of the Catholic Church (1884).

Protestantism first arrived following trade agreements with Great Britain; an Episcopal Church was established in San José (1864) for members of the embassy and merchants. Then Jamaican workers arrived on the Atlantic Coast (at Limon) to construct a railroad; new Protestant churches were founded by the Jamaica* Baptist Missionary Society (1887) and the Methodist Church of Jamaica (1894). Until 1940 Protestants sought to develop, in addition to religious services, medical, educational, and agricultural programs with the support of North American organizations such as the Central American Mission, the Latin American Mission, and Methodist Churches.

The archbishop of Costa Rica, Victor Manuel Sanabria, supported both Calderón Guardia, president (1940–44) and leader of the Republican Party, and Manuel Mora, leader of the Communist Party, in order to ensure passage of social legislation establishing, among other things, social security and medical insurance for workers.

Struggling for religious freedom, the Protestant churches founded a federation of churches, Alianza Evangélica Costarricense (1950). From 1940 to 1960, Protestantism spread throughout the nation, with a steady increase in Pentecostal* missions. The Charismatic* Movement of the 1970s, among both Catholics and Protestants in Costa Rica, was animated by the Cuban Pentecostal Pastor Gerardo of Avila, the Argentine pastor Juan Carlos Ortiz, the North American priest Francis McNutt, and Sr. Cecilia Arias. The Charismatic Movement deeply influenced many Catholic communities and was one of the reasons for the interruption of the broadcasting of “Radio María” (early 2000s) and for the crisis during the last years of the tenure of Msgr. Arrieta (Román Arrieta Villalobos) as archbishop (1979–2002). Protestants constituted 4.3% of the population in 1960, but 18% by 2000, with more than half of the Protestants in Charismatic* (Pentecostal) churches.

Another movement, Liberation* theology, was initiated (early 1970s) by the group “Exodo”; its journal, Exodo, is read in schools and seminaries, including the Ecumenical School of Religious Studies (Escuela Ecueménica Ciencias de la Religión), the Latin American Biblical Seminary, and the Department of Ecumenical Studies (Departamento Ecueménico de Investigaciones).

Statistics: Population (2000): 3.8 million. Christians, 89% (Catholics, 70.1%; Protestants, 18% [the larger Protestant churches: Assemblies of God, Seventh-day Adventists, Church of God]); other religionists, 1.8%; nonreligious, 9.4%. (Source: 2000 census.)

JAIME ADRIÁN PRIETO VALLADARES

Côte d'Ivoire. The geographical and historical portals to Côte d'Ivoire were the northern Sahel, gateway to Islam* (since the 18th c.), and the southern Atlantic Coast, gateway for Christianity.

Trading posts for ivory and slaves, established by the Portuguese in the 15th c., initiated the first contacts with Christianity, but no attempts to evangelize were undertaken until 1637, when French Catholic missionaries settled there. The inhospitable climate, however, soon took its toll.

Active evangelization resumed more than two centuries later, when Côte d'Ivoire became a French colony in 1893.

In conjunction with colonization, Catholic missionaries settled along the coast, forming the first and major Christian denomination. The largest Christian worship center on the African continent is the basilica Notre Dame de la Paix in Yamoussoukro. The Roman Catholic Church celebrated the centenary of evangelization there in 1995.

In 1960 Côte d'Ivoire gained its independence. Before that, from 1913 to 1936, other Christian denominations from Europe and North America sent missionaries. Methodists* attained prominence among the mainline Protestant churches. In 1927 Evangelical* churches began to take root. Among the most recent groups to achieve missionary success have been the Assemblies* of God and Jehovah's Witnesses*.

Until the late 1970s, Côte d'Ivoire experienced remarkable economic growth. The influx of immigrants from many West African nations brought with it African Instituted Churches. Two major examples are the Harrist Church, founded by William Wadé Harris from Liberia, who personally traveled to Côte d'Ivoire in 1912 to establish the denomination there, and the Celestial Church of Christ, which was founded in 1947 in Benin by Samuel Biléou Oshoffa and has spread throughout Côte d'Ivoire since 1975.

Among the major Christian churches (Catholic, Methodist, Harrist), there has been a long tradition of cooperation, understanding, and hospitality, particularly within leadership circles. Côte d'Ivoire is noted for having established a Ministry of Cults to maintain harmony among all religions.

The number of Roman Catholics and members of African Instituted Churches has nearly tripled since 1970. There has also been a significant increase in the number of Christians who identify themselves as Charismatics*. According to 2005 estimates, Christians comprise 20–30% of the population, Muslims 30–40%, and indigenous religionists 25–40%. Migrants (one-third of the population) are estimated to be 70% Muslim and 20% Christian. Such statistics, however, are as fluid as the boundaries between African* Religion and Christianity or Islam. Syncretism* and inculturation* are challenges or opportunities for Christian churches. Moreover, since the beginning of the North–South civil war in 2002, religious positions have become entwined with political struggle.

Statistics: Population (2000): 14.8 million (M). Christians: 4.7 M, 32% (Roman Catholics, 2.2 M; members of African Instituted Churches, 1.34 M; Protestants, 0.8 M); African Religionists, 5.5 M, 38%; Muslims, 4.4 M, 30%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

FRANÇOIS ROSSIER

Council, Synod, an assembly of bishops convened to regulate doctrine or discipline. "Council" (derived from Latin) and "synod" (derived from Greek) have the same meaning, but the former term is often applied to ecumenical* councils and, in the West, to gatherings of bishops representing the entire Roman Catholic Church (listed by their location, e.g. Vatican* II). The early councils, especially in the West, followed the procedures of the Roman Senate and city councils. The term "synod" is usually used for regional or less solemn gatherings of bishops in the Roman Catholic Church and in autocephalous* Orthodox* churches, and of representatives or delegates in Protestant churches – for which, in several cases, "synod" is also the designation of a regional level of administration.

Counsels of Perfection, not binding on all Christians, but rather advice to those who have the gifts of grace* necessary for complete dedication to God (especially poverty*, chastity*, obedience*). See also MONASTICISM CLUSTER: MONASTIC VOWS; VOWS.

Counter Reformation, the repressive, anti-Protestant measures of the Roman Catholic Church (e.g. in Spain*) following the Council of Trent* (meeting in three periods between 1545 and 1563). It is best understood as part of the broader Catholic* Renewal.

Courtly Love. The tradition of romantic love that developed in the 12th c., expressed in the poetry of the Provençal troubadours, the French trouvères, the German Minnesänger, and Dante*. It exalted the "lady," expressed emotions of longing and self-denial, and encouraged genteel manners and "chivalrous" behavior toward women. While it had some connections with the Albigensian* Movement, it was also promoted among Roman Catholic clergy (especially Andreas Capellanus, Andrew the Chaplain); it stimulated scholastic debate over the nature of love*, especially whether it is self-seeking or self-denying; and it influenced the language of Christian devotion and spirituality, especially among the Beguines*.

Covenant (Heb berit), biblical covenants that originated as political treaties. Their ratification by a slaughtered ass among Hittites gave rise to the language of “cutting a berit,” preserved in the Bible. The two main types of Hittite treaties, suzerainty–vassal and parity, consisted of (1) historical prologue, (2) stipulations (what each party commits itself to doing), (3) provision for deposit and reading, (4) witnesses, (5) blessings and curses, and (6) ratification.

The P source in the Pentateuch* mentions covenants between God and Noah*, Abraham*, and Moses*, each sealed with a visible sign (rainbow, circumcision, Sinaitic legislation). Another tradition refers to a covenant with David*, its sign being a scepter. Among ordinary people, covenants were often broken. The divine promise to Abraham was distorted into a concept of privilege, leading Amos* to insist that election* was a call to assume responsibility toward others and leading Jeremiah* to prophesy a new* covenant of flesh and blood, a responsive heart-mind to replace one of stone, the Decalogue. The checkered history of Israel gave rise to various groups who considered themselves the true people of the covenant. Outside mainstream Judaism, Covenanters withdrew to the vicinity of the Dead* Sea, while Christians saw themselves as recipients of Jeremiah’s promised new heart and called their sacred writing kaine diatheke, the new covenant (later Latinized as “testament”).

See also ELECTION; NEW COVENANT.

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Covenanters, Covenanting. Scottish Protestants often bound themselves by oaths to defend their religion, first against the papacy, then against bishops and royal supremacy, finally against patronage*. The first covenants were drawn up during the reign of Mary (1556, 1557, 1559). The King’s Confession of 1581, designed to prevent a revival of Catholicism by excluding all doctrines not in accord with the Scots* Confession (1560), was signed by James VI and by the clergy and many of the people (reaffirmed, 1590, 1595; incorporated into the National* Covenant, 1638). The Solemn* League and Covenant (1643) sought to establish Presbyterianism in Scotland, England, and Ireland (accepted by the Westminster* Assembly and Parliament). Later Covenanters resisted attempts to impose episcopacy on Scotland. With the removal of the Stuart regime (1688), the “Cameronians” dissented from the Revolution Settlement (1689–92) because it did not require the Church of Scotland to adhere to the National Covenant and the Solemn League and Covenant. Their Reformed Presbyterian Church refused to participate in any government that failed to acknowledge, by covenant, the “crown rights” of Jesus Christ as head of both church and state. In the USA, the Reformed Presbyterian Church similarly objected to a constitution that did not acknowledge God and Christ.

Cranmer, Thomas (1489–1556), England’s most prominent early reformer. Born in Nottinghamshire, he studied and taught at Cambridge University. Archbishop of Canterbury from 1533, he facilitated Henry VIII’s marriage to Anne Boleyn. Though closely allied with Thomas Cromwell* in religious reform, he continued to enjoy Henry’s esteem despite Cromwell’s execution (1540) and conservative hostility. He spearheaded Edward VI’s Protestant reforms, including two English Books* of Common Prayer (1549, 1552), his lasting memorial being their sonorous prose. Judged a traitor by Mary’s* government (1553) for supporting Jane Grey’s royal succession, he was convicted of heresy* (1554). Just before his burning in Oxford, he dramatically recanted his earlier abject return to Catholicism.

DIARMAID N. J. MACCULLOCH

Creastianism, the theory that each soul* is newly created by God, either at conception or at some stage in the development of the body. Alternatives are preexistence* and traducianism*.

Creation. Christians commonly affirm, following Gen 1, that God created the heavens and the earth. God’s creation of the world is first among the acts of God recounted in the ecumenical creeds*, and Christians often express such a belief in the routine course of worship, e.g. in the thanksgiving portions of eucharistic* prayers or when renewing baptismal vows. Beliefs about creation are clearly important, then, to Christians, but that does not mean their sense is equally clear. Among the questions in dispute are the following:

1. Does God’s creation of the world refer specifically to the world’s origins, in ways that might bring Christian belief into conflict with scientific descriptions of how the universe began? Many Christian theologians believe, to the contrary, that the world is God’s creation whether the world had a beginning and whatever its manner of origination. To say the world is created is to say that the world exists in dependence on God, and this relation of dependence holds, however the world began, and even if the world has no beginning and always existed.

2. Did God create from something or nothing? Creation ex nihilo has been the dominant Christian view, but many theologians now argue that this view distorts the biblical record and is impossible to square with contemporary understandings of natural processes. If God works on or with something that God does not create, does that mean, however, that there are limits to God's power and therefore to Christian hopes for the world's future?
3. Does God create everything? If so, how can one account for evil in the world? Most theologians distinguish sharply between the way God is responsible for the good as its creator and the way God is involved in evil (e.g. by merely permitting it or maintaining in existence those solely responsible for their own sinful acts). But how can one make such a distinction without compromising the common claim of the universal extent of God's creative work?
4. Finally, if God creates ex nihilo the world alone and by fiat, is not this an unhealthy model for human imitation, a charter for absolute human power? Theologians hoping to deflect this charge must provide some alternative account of what is at stake in the creation ex nihilo, e.g. not power so much as a concern for the universal beneficence of a God intimately related to absolutely everything. KATHRYN TANNER

Creation, in the Bible. There are several distinct creation stories in the Bible, including Gen 1:1–2:3; Gen 2:4–25; Isa 40–55 (especially 40–48); various Psalms (e.g. 8, 19, 104); Prov 8:27–29; creation by God as a potter (Isa 29:15–16, 45:9–13; Jer 18; Rom 9:20–21); and creation by the Word (Gen 1; Ps 33:9, 148:5; John 1:1–3; Heb 11:3; 2 Peter 3:5–6). With this diversity of biblical views, one should not be surprised to find through the centuries a diversity of Christian understandings of the Apostle Creed's statement about God as "creator of heaven and earth." See also METAPHYSICS AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

Creation, Ecology, and the Orthodox Church. Creation, the Orthodox believe, is a manifestation of God's love for humankind and all creatures; creation should be in harmonious relation with the Creator. Thus rather than being either servants or rulers of creation, humans should approach creation as priests and ministers. Created in the image and likeness of God, they offer back to God with love what is given to them with love. With this ministerial attitude, creation will survive. Indeed, through the risen Lord, creation can enter into eternal life. The liturgical life and ascetic* practices of the church teach us to respect rather than exploit the material world. Consequently, for the past generation, the Orthodox Church has consistently emphasized the urgent need to address the ecological crisis and has taken concrete steps to do so, e.g. by calling for the use of environmentally conscious agricultural methods in monasteries and by establishing September 1 as the Day of Creation. The Ecumenical Patriarchate initiated church services, conferences, encyclicals, and books for the preservation of creation. The ecological crisis is to be viewed in terms of the Fall and sin*; it calls all humans to repentance (metanoia), to a change of mind, abandoning purely utilitarian attitudes to adopt a ministerial attitude toward creation. See also CLIMATE CHANGE; ECOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER. TAMARA GRDZELIDZE

Creationism. Historically, creationists have been distinguished by their belief that God created each and every thing, rather than by any contingent statement as to how this was achieved. Since Darwin's* day, however, an increasing number of so-called creationists, rejecting evolution as a creation method, have campaigned to equate creationism with their belief in the miraculous origin and fixity of living "kinds" according to Genesis. This narrow creationism – based mainly in the USA, where populist values have long shaped biblical* interpretation and many Evangelical* Christians readily call themselves fundamentalists* – at first accepted modern geological evidence of an ancient earth. But "old-earth creationism" (from the 1920s) was challenged by a minority of Evangelical exegetes and scientists who believed a yearlong catastrophic global flood, according to Genesis, had reshaped the earth's crust and lent it the appearance of great age. "Young-earth creationism," positing that the earth is only some tens of thousands of years old, took root among believers, some of whom acquired formal technical and scientific credentials. An early-19th-c. doctrine almost unknown among professional geologists and biblical scholars became the basis of creationists' efforts (1970s and 1980s) to mandate the teaching of "creation science" in US state schools. After judicial defeats, supporters restored some of creationism's historic scope by seeking to rally creationists and Evangelical evolutionists behind the teaching of "intelligent design*."

JAMES E. MOORE

Creation Theology in Scandinavia emphasizes how God's redemptive* work rests on God's prior work in and for the creation. Grundtvig* (19th c.) adopted the phrase "first a human, then a Christian" as expressing this point. G. Wingren and K. E. Løgstrup independently developed (mid-20th c.) an understanding of creation based on concrete phenomena in human life that are positive preconditions for a full theology. The concept of "creation" refers a) to God's works for which redemption takes place and b) to the basis for self-expression of all human life (eventually made explicit by philosophical analysis). This integrative approach is viewed as an alternative to a revivalist* Pietistic theology that fails to affirm the inherent qualities of God's creation after the Fall*. It is important for the Scandinavian national churches, as it partly serves to recognize and affirm the religious stance of their members, despite low regular church activity. JAN-OLAV HENRIKSEN

Crèche (French, "crib"), representation of the infant Jesus' crib, as well as various figures from the birth narratives; initiated by Francis* of Assisi (1223).

Creeds, Symbols, and Confessions of Faith.

A creed is a statement beginning "I believe" (Lat credo). The name "symbol" was given to the Apostles' Creed, shared by believers in different localities, by analogy with the tokens ("symbols") shared by contracting parties.

A "confession of faith" is similar in character to a creed. But "creed" has come to connote a fixed statement of doctrine; confession, a statement that consciously speaks from and to its time. The Reformed* churches proclaim themselves to be confessional but not credal. Congregational* and Baptist churches leave it to each congregation to write its own confession of faith; statements of any bodies broader than the congregation are understood to be expressions of consensus, not requirements.

Creeds and confessions fill a variety of functions, and thus take different forms. The oldest, in rough historical sequence, are (1) liturgical and catechetical, (2) controversial, and

(3) irenic, or church-uniting. The Reformation brought forth new genres of confessional statements: (4) reforming, (5) apologetic, and (6) church-founding.

Liturgical and Catechetical Function. The first of the creeds was the Apostles' Creed or Old Roman Symbol (mid-2nd c.), developed in Rome as a baptismal confession. Used by Irenaeus* (c180) as a convenient summary of the apostolic proclamation, when both the NT canon* and the doctrines of the church were still in formation, it stated the current consensus of the Western Church. The wording varied among local churches. The Apostles' Creed continued to be used in the West for purposes of catechesis* or instruction, first for adult converts, then for all baptized persons as they matured. It has remained the most widespread summary of Christian doctrine for the laity in the West.

Controversial Function. The Apostles' Creed was expanded in the Eastern churches to declare the preexistence* of the second person of the Trinity before the Incarnation*. Adapting the Eastern creeds, the first two ecumenical* councils added language that gave greater definiteness to the doctrine of the Trinity*: the Nicene* Creed (325) and the Niceno*-Constantinopolitan Creed (381). While the latter came to be used in worship (after 489 in the East, after 589 in the West), these creeds originally functioned as doctrinal standards to which bishops and the universal church must conform – hence the rise of "dogma*" (here meaning a "decree" by church authority). The so-called Athanasian* Creed is widely used, for both liturgical and doctrinal purposes, in the Catholic, Anglican, and Lutheran traditions.

Since councils* were usually called to resolve doctrinal disputes, they often made more condemnatory than positive statements. In interpreting creeds emerging from such councils, it is necessary to understand what doctrines were being opposed, and on what grounds. During the Middle Ages, decrees of popes and councils responded to various issues of doctrine and practice, especially the sacraments, and various so-called heresies* were condemned, especially those of the Cathars*, the Waldenses*, Wyclif*, and Hus*.

Irenic Function. Official statements of doctrine became longer and more complex as the Catholic Church engaged in dialogue with the Eastern Orthodox churches. This was an irenic setting in which it was appropriate to emphasize what the two traditions shared. The first comprehensive statements of Catholic doctrine were those adopted by the Councils of Lyons (1274) and Florence* (1439) for reunion with the Greek Orthodox Church. The latter council adopted similar statements intended to achieve reunion with the Armenians* (1439) and the Syriacs*, Copts*, and Ethiopians* (1442).

Reforming Function. The Reformation* occasioned even more extensive doctrinal statements, since the Reformers agreed with the classic doctrines expressed in the creeds but challenged many practices and beliefs that had gained currency in the Middle Ages. Since they looked beyond church doctrine to the authority of Scripture*, against which all ecclesial statements must be tested, they called their statements “confessions of faith,” intended to express their best understanding of what was revealed, while acknowledging its provisional character.

The first statements with a reforming function were written in German principalities and Swiss cities (1520s). But the classic reforming confessions were drawn up in England: the Forty*-two Articles (1553), the Thirty*-nine Articles (1562), and the Westminster* Confession (1643–47), all intended for the reform of the Church of England.

Apologetic Function. When reform movements came under attack, it was necessary to take an apologetic or defensive stance. The Augsburg* Confession (1530) was presented to Charles* V and the Reichstag. The Second Helvetic* Confession was presented to this same body (1566) when the Reformed churches in Germany were under attack from Catholics and Lutherans. Calvin’s* Institutes also had this function, being addressed to the king of France during a period when the Reformed church was on the defensive.

The Reformation had begun as an attempt to reform the Catholic Church (a theme of Conciliarism* from 1380 to 1417). For several decades, there was hope that an ecumenical council would be convoked by the emperor; instead, the pope called the Council of Trent* (1545–63), which rejected most Protestant doctrines, clarified Catholic doctrine, and reformed a number of practices. The Roman Catechism of 1566 summarized Catholic doctrine in a comprehensive way.

Church-Founding Function. When reform of the Catholic Church was no longer thinkable, Protestants wrote confessions of faith with a church-founding role. Reformed confessions were adopted in France (1559), Scotland (1560), and Belgium (1561), along with Presbyterian forms of government. The separate existence of the Lutheran Church in Germany is dated from the Peace of Augsburg (1555) and even more decisively from the Reichstag of 1566. The Lutheran Book of Concord*, which excluded Reformed and Melancthonian* perspectives, took final form in 1580. There were proposals to prepare a common confession for the Reformed churches as well, but instead a Harmony of the Confessions was published (1581). Lutheran controversialists depicted it as a weak substitute, while the Reformed responded that it is of the nature of confessions to speak from their time and place and that harmony is preferable to uniformity.

Controversial Function. As the Protestant churches developed internal disputes, controversial confessions arose. The most dramatic of these came with the Synod of Dort*, when the Dutch Reformed Church condemned the doctrines of the Arminians* and insisted on predestination* and limited atonement*.

Which Statements Are Definitive? The Oriental Orthodox* churches have regarded the statements of the first three ecumenical* councils – those of Nicaea* (325), Constantinople* (381) and Ephesus* (431) – as the only authoritative statements of faith. The Eastern Orthodox churches have regarded the statements of the seven ecumenical* councils – adding Chalcedon* (451), Constantinople* II (553), Constantinople* III (680–81), and Nicaea* II (787) to the first three – as authoritative. The Orthodox Faith of John* of Damascus was regarded as a convenient summary. Contacts with both Catholics and Protestants made it necessary, however, to differentiate the Orthodox perspective from that of these two Western traditions, because Orthodox theology is experiential and doxological rather than doctrinal (see Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster: Introductory Entries). The confession of Cyril Lucaris* (1629) was widely condemned for its Calvinism*. To replace it, confessions were written by Peter Mogila* (1638) and Dositheus* of Jerusalem (1672).

During the Enlightenment* and up to the 21st c., doctrinal orthodoxy fell on hard times. There were strong sentiments against “strict subscription” to the confessions of the churches, justified by the Reformation principles that “God alone is the Lord of the conscience”; and all persons have the responsibility to interpret Scripture for themselves. Romanticism* and idealism* (19th c.) put doctrine on a different footing as an expression of religious intuitions. Historical study also gave a better understanding of the formation of existing doctrines. And as old disputes receded in importance and the gospel came to be understood in new ways, reformulations were often proposed. New confessions of faith were adopted, usually with the purpose of summarizing Christian doctrine in a brief but comprehensive way, using language that would be relevant to 19th- and 20th-c. contemporaries.

In the Roman Catholic tradition, this kind of updating has been done through catechisms*. The Second Vatican* Council decided against any universal catechism in favor of contextual catechisms directed toward adults. Yet the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992) was prepared under Pope John Paul II to supply a "point of reference" for the national catechisms.

Church-Uniting Statements. The irenic function of doctrinal statements is once again seen in the union of Protestant churches, especially those growing out of the British traditions, resulting in the United Church of Canada* (1925), the Church* of South India (1941), and similar "united" or "uniting" churches in Ceylon, Ghana, Zambia, New Zealand, and Australia. Their "basis of union" typically acknowledges the faith and ministries of all the uniting churches and seeks participation from all of them in future ordinations.

Another approach to the diversity of creeds and confessions was taken by the World* Council of Churches in 1948, when it offered membership to all churches that confess Jesus Christ as "God and Savior," leaving all other matters to mutual discussion, which has led to further doctrinal agreements, especially the Lima* Declaration.

Orthodoxy and Orthopraxy. Finally, concerns for doctrinal "orthodoxy" have been joined by concerns for "orthopraxy"* in the Christian life and its relation to social, economic*, and political* structures. This is seen in the Social* Gospel and Christian Socialism* (19th c.) and in Liberation* theologies (20th c.). The Confession of 1967 of the United Presbyterian Church in the USA applied the biblical theme of reconciliation to the racial and economic issues of the time; the Presbyterian-Reformed Church of Cuba (1977) related the Christian tradition to a revolutionary situation.

EUGENE TESELLE

Cremation, burning the body of one who has died; the ashes are sometimes stored in a church's columbarium*. Now permitted in Western churches, it was initially prohibited because it seemed to contradict hope in the resurrection*.

Crisis Theology, or theology of crisis, was a school of theological methodology that emerged in Germany* in the aftermath of World War I, particularly during the 1920s. Key figures included Friedrich Gogarten, Rudolf Bultmann*, and Paul Tillich*, for whom the prevailing cultural and political crises were deemed to have determinative theological significance. Karl Barth* has often been included within this movement, largely because his 1922 commentary on Romans is replete with the word "crisis." However, the crisis of which Barth spoke was not the political calamity facing Germany, but the dialectic of judgment* and grace* revealed always anew in the Word of God.

MARK R. LINDSAY

Croatia. Historically the Croats and the Serbs have been at the crossroads of Eastern and Western, Byzantine and Roman, Christianity since the 4th-c. division of the Roman Empire, reinforced by the Great* Schism (1054).

The beginnings of Christianity in the region of Western Illyricum, the Roman provinces of Dalmatia and Panonia, are still obscure, although Rom 15:19 and 2 Tim 4:10 claim that this area was evangelized in the apostolic era. The Croats, Slavs who migrated and settled the present area (7th c.), were gradually Christianized (7th-9th c.) by Frankish, Roman, and Byzantine missionaries (respectively, from the north, west, and south) – a diversity that contributed to subsequent political, cultural, and religious tensions.

Croatia, united under King Tomislav (925), became for the first time an independent country, reaching its zenith (11th c.) just before submitting to Catholic Hungary. Croats came under the Hapsburgs in 1527 as part of the larger European defense against the Ottoman Turks, being named "bulwark of Christianity" (antemurale christianitatis) by Pope Leo X. They were reinforced by many Eastern Orthodox Serbs who had been invited to settle in its southwestern region. Thus predominantly Catholic and shielded from the Reformation, Croatia gained a considerable Serb Orthodox minority, a source of ethnoreligious tension leading to atrocities during World War II and the recent Croatian war for independence.

At the end of World War I (1918), Croatia became part of the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes (renamed Yugoslavia* in 1929). Following the German invasion (1941), the pro-Nazi "Independent State of Croatia" was created, and after World War II, Croatia was incorporated into Tito's Yugoslavia. During the Communist rule, religion was seriously repressed and many clergy, including the archbishop of Zagreb, Alojzije Stepinac, made cardinal by Pius XII and beatified by John Paul II during the second of his three extraordinary visits to Croatia, were convicted of treason.

Croatia is the only Slavic country in the Western Christian tradition that preserved the Old Slavonic liturgical language (originating with the 9th-c. "apostles of the Slavs," Cyril* and Methodius). Protestants from Germany, where the Croatian Matthias Flacius* Illyricus became famous for his theological writings, produced the first translation of Scripture and other Christian books in the Croatian language. Today, owing to Croatia's joint history with Bosnia*, Muslims are the third-largest religious grouping in the country. Although religious freedom in present-day Croatia is legally ensured, strong identification of ethnicity, culture, and public life with the Catholic Church makes the lives of ethnic and religious minorities tenuous. See also HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: THE BALKANS.

Statistics: Population (2000): 4.5 million (M). Christians, 4.3 M, 95% (Roman Catholics, 4 M; Orthodox, 0.2 M); Muslims, 0.06 M; nonreligious, 0.2 M. (Source: 2001 census.)

PETER KUZMIC

Cromwell, Oliver (1599–1658), of minor Huntingdonshire gentry, led Parliament to victory against King Charles I during the English civil war. He crushed rebellion in Ireland (1649) and Scotland (1651). As commander-in-chief of the army, he dominated the government after Charles's execution and ruled England as lord protector (1653–58). Deeply pious, Cromwell saw himself as an instrument of Providence. He supported liberty for all Protestant consciences, vigorously promoted the gospel, and negotiated for the return of Jews to England. A biographer called him "God's Englishman"; no English ruler was more firmly convinced of his and his country's divine mission.

ROBERT MICHAEL ZALLER

Cross, Sign of, Christians have traced the cross on their foreheads at least since the 4th c. as a private act of sanctification and to ward off the devil* (see Ransom), as well as during the liturgy. After the 4th c., the cross was traced on the breast, from right to left (Eastern churches) or from left to right (Western churches).

Cross and Crucifix. Both symbols denote Christ's crucifixion. The plain or empty "cross" refers to the Crucifixion, while pointing to the Resurrection; the crucifix, a cross with Christ's body affixed to it, focuses on the Crucifixion in and of itself.

Cross and Crucifixion. Jesus' crucifixion under Pilate is a historical fact, supported by Christian, Jewish, and Roman sources. A quintessentially Roman form of execution, crucifixion was noted for its heinous social and psychological consequences. Executed publicly, naked, denied burial, and left as carrion, the crucified attracted vicious ridicule. Roman procedures varied, but typically included a flogging, with victims carrying their own crossbeams to the site of execution, where they were bound or nailed to the cross with arms extended or raised up. Variations in the way victims were crucified served as sadistic entertainment and prolonged life for maximum deterrent effect.

From the outset, interpretations of Jesus' crucifixion differed. Generally, for Rome, it demonstrated Rome's intolerance of attempts to incite rebellion; for the Jerusalem leadership, according to the Gospels, the cross marked Jesus' demise as a religious deceiver and false prophet; and for Jesus, the cross was to be interpreted in relation to his mission, a process that, according to the Gospels, Jesus began while he anticipated his violent death. In the NT, the cross is the means by which God achieved salvation* – understood in various ways, e.g. as sacrifice*, as a demonstration of God's love, and/or as a way of conquering evil. As a pattern of discipleship, Jesus' Passion exemplified service and ennobled undeserved suffering for those who embody the ways of God in a world hostile to God. In addition, the cross is inescapably political: Jesus was crucified because he was a threat to Rome, and his acceptance of his death was a rejection of the politics of coercion and violence.

Attempting to explain how the cross saves, theologians subsequently developed numerous theories of atonement*. The cross also became the focus of Christian piety, evidenced in iconography*, including jewelry; anointing persons and objects by tracing the cross with oil; crossing oneself as an act of dedication or to avert evil; reports of stigmata* (marks resembling the wounds of the crucified Christ); during the medieval era, increasingly morbid dramatizations of Christ's Passion; and the practice of praying the stations of the cross. Identification with the crucified Christ has taken other forms, e.g. as a political weapon sanctioning submissive passivity on the part of others (e.g. the European colonization of Latin America) or as self-mortification (e.g. Opus Dei). Identification with the cross is sanctioned not when it provides religious legitimation of oppression*, but when it serves as an instrument in the struggle against the politics of violence in the name of the politics of the crucified Christ. JOEL B. GREEN

Crowther, Ajai Samuel (1807–91), the first African Anglican bishop. A Yoruba (Nigeria) captured by slave traders (1820) and rescued by British naval forces from Portuguese traders during a transatlantic crossing (1822), he was relocated with other liberated slaves in Sierra Leone. "Convinced of another worse state of slavery, namely that of sin and Satan," he converted to Christianity (c1825). After being educated at the first higher-education school in tropical Africa (the Christian Institution in Freetown), he taught in villages of liberated slaves while helping develop books to teach missionaries the Yoruba language. Following his ordination, he returned to Nigeria as part of a Church Missionary Society team of the Anglican Church (1842), promoting an indigenous African mission among the Yoruba. In 1864 he became bishop. See also ANGLICANISM CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: EASTERN AND WESTERN AFRICA.

Crozier, Crosier, bishop's staff, shaped like a shepherd's crook.

Crummell, Alexander (1819–98), African American theologian, born in New York, brought up as an Episcopalian. As a youth, he was introduced to biblical languages at the Oneida Institute and was ordained in the Episcopal Church, despite having been denied admission to the Episcopal Seminary. He received his bachelor's degree and mastered biblical Greek at Cambridge University (graduated 1853), then took up missionary work in Liberia. His sermons and addresses attempted to reconcile his fervent black nationalism with a Victorian, Anglocentric civilizing mission*. After returning to the USA (1872), he established St. Luke's Church in Washington, D.C. Crummell's theology was a typically American "Arminianized" Calvinism." A solid advocate of African American political rights, he gravitated toward High Church ritual because he was hostile to plantation religion, which he viewed as a slaveholder's conspiracy to undermine the moral and intellectual development of African Americans.

WILSON J. MOSES

Crusades, a series of military campaigns fought by "Latin" (Roman Catholic) Christians against peoples believed to be threatening Christian territory, Christian people, or Christianity itself. Crusades were waged against Muslims, other Christians, and "pagans" in medieval Western Europe (11th–16th c.).

Crusades were generally initiated by the pope. The participants took the religious vow to join a crusading expedition, wore a distinctive badge (a cross), and believed that their participation replaced all penance* due for their confessed sins. Thus the Crusades were very much like pilgrimages* in their spiritual purpose. Both men and women could take the Crusade vow, but starting in the early 13th c., noncombatants were encouraged to make a monetary donation, purchasing an "indulgence*" instead of fulfilling their vow in person.

The Crusades developed from a Western Christian discourse of holy war* rooted in the OT. They derived from the European Christians' defensive wars against Muslim invasions of Southern Europe (8th–9th c.) and the successful expeditions to free the Iberian Peninsula and North Africa (second half of the 11th c.). The Byzantine emperor Alexius Comnenus appealed to the West (1095) to help him recapture Anatolian territories lost to the Muslim Seljuk Turks. At the Council of Clermont (1095), Pope Urban II initiated a military expedition, which recovered former Byzantine territories and also captured Jerusalem*, an important focus of Christian pilgrimage. By the 1130s, the Muslim ruler Zenghi of Mosul used the Islamic concept of jihad (holy war) to unite his subjects against the Latin Christian invaders, though it was not until 1291 that they were finally driven from Palestine.

Giles Constable identifies four scholarly definitions of "crusade": (1) any Christian religious war fought for God (generalist view); (2) a religious undertaking for the masses and/or for warriors (popularist view); (3) military-religious expeditions to recover or defend Jerusalem (excluding other expeditions) (traditionalist view); and (4) any military campaign recruited and organized by the pope (pluralist view).

The Crusades did not succeed in holding Jerusalem, although the crusaders did conquer the Iberian Peninsula, retard the Ottoman advance into the Balkans, ensure that the Baltic States' interests would be oriented toward the West, and provide an ideological basis for Latin Christian expansion into the New World.

In the medieval period, Muslims regarded the Crusades as less threatening to Islam* than the conflict between Sunnis and Shi'ites or Mongol invasions. It was not until Western imperialism impinged on the Islamic world (19th and 20th c.) that Muslim historiographers took interest in the Crusades, depicting them as the cause of modern-day Christian-Muslim conflict in the Middle East. See also HOSPITALLERS; MILITARY ORDERS; TEUTONIC KNIGHTS.

HELEN J. NICHOLSON

Crypto-Calvinism, a term used by opponents of Melancthon* to condemn his teachings concerning the Eucharist*. For the sake of unity with the Reformed* churches, he merely asserted that Christ's Body and Blood are "truly exhibited" by the elements, and did not affirm that the unworthy actually receive Christ's Body and Blood.

Cuba. The sharp tension between the Christian churches (except for Presbyterians and Pentecostals) and the state in Cuba that arose because of the nationalization of education* in 1961 remains, although it has eased up.

The missions of the Franciscans* (1511), Dominicans* (1515), Jesuits (1566), and other orders introduced Catholicism on the island. The Diocese of Santiago de Cuba was established in 1522 (archdiocese, 1803), and that of La Havana in 1787 (archdiocese, 1925). In Santiago there is a national sanctuary where the faithful venerate the image (found in 1604) of the Virgin of Charity, also called Virgin of El Cobre, declared the patroness of the Republic of Cuba in 1916. The Catholic Church has devoted much attention to educational institutions, serving the middle and upper classes.

A few Anglicans arrived in Cuba in 1741. From 1880 onward, Methodist, Episcopal, and Baptist communities were established; in 1884 a Presbyterian Church was founded. The Spanish-American War of 1898 challenged the Catholic dominion and led to the Americanization of Cuban Protestantism. Many North American Protestant missions, including Seventh-day* Adventists, and then Pentecostal* churches were established. Many Protestant educational facilities, serving primarily the middle and upper classes, were established.

After the defeat of Batista's dictatorship (1952–59), the churches were sympathetic to the revolution led by Castro. But the Law of June 6, 1961, which stated that education was to be public and free, and decreed the nationalization of all private centers of learning, brought all the churches into conflict with the state and many missionaries left the island. Only the Pentecostal and Presbyterian churches, though few in number, generally welcomed the revolution. Since 1968 the Catholic Church's position has evolved from anti-Communist to that of "detached critical observer," to openness, and to rapprochement with the government (visit of Pope John* Paul II, 1998). By contrast, the Ecumenical Council of Churches, uniting 14 Protestant churches, maintained throughout this period a positive dialogue with the revolutionary state and society. After 1959, Santería, an Afro-Cuban religion, developed with the support of the Cuban Revolution. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS: IN LATIN AMERICA: CUBA; RASTAFARI MOVEMENT.

Statistics: Population (2000): 11.2 million (M). Christians, 5 M, 44.5% (Roman Catholics, 4.3 M; Protestants, 0.2 M; independents, 0.1 M; marginal Christians, 0.1 M); nonreligious, 4.1 M, 37%; Spiritists, 2 M, 17.9%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ARMANDO LAMPE

Cult (from Lat "veneration" or "worship"). The term refers to many forms of Christian worship of God or veneration of saints*. Often used as a sociological term for a small, dedicated movement with definite beliefs and practices, usually in response to a charismatic leader, and rejecting other forms of belief and practice. "Cult" in this sense most often has negative connotations, to suggest an unusual degree of syncretism, implying manipulation, fanaticism, and heterodoxy*. Yet syncretism* is a complex phenomenon that is actually an aspect of any religion, including Christianity, in the form of inculturation* or contextual* theologies. See also SYNCRETISM.

Culture Christianity, in Scandinavia and other secularized* settings, consists of a Christian-influenced worldview, a concept of the human person, and some basic ethical and existential values deriving from Christianity, together with a preference for using Christian-inspired language in important situations. For Culture Christians, most parts of their cultures are Christian, but others most certainly are not, nor are certain of their religious beliefs, if they have any. Culture Christianity does not arise by itself, nor is it sustained by itself. It presupposes the teaching and rituals of the churches (especially folk* and state churches) throughout the centuries and today. Culture Christians have no ways or rituals of their own for transmitting Culture Christianity to their children. Culture Christianity is the historical result of compulsory confirmation classes (e.g. in Denmark*, from 1736) or religious education. Also what is heard by those attending the rituals of the churches (baptisms, funerals, marriages, and feast days, especially Christmas and Easter) contributes to the upholding of Culture Christianity in the broader population. This prevalent situation in Scandinavia (Denmark*, Norway*, Sweden*) is also found in other secularized contexts (e.g. Bulgaria*) where Christianity is privatized: "I am religious in my own way."

HANS RAUN IVERSEN

CULTURE CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Cultural Studies

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views
and Practices

Culture and Biblical Studies

Culture and Christianity

Culture and Christianity in Eastern Orthodoxy

Culture and Christian Theology

Culture and Worship

1) Introductory Entry

Cultural Studies is a broadly defined scholarly field that draws from new forms of literary* criticism (emphasizing multiple readings over authorship), revisionist Marxist* critiques (with a fundamental suspicion of capitalist economies and deep engagement in the politics of culture and the social), and semiotics* and Lacanian psychoanalysis (underlining signs and representations that proliferate in all forms of media). Consequently, cultural studies is less a methodological discipline than a constellation of critical theories investigating all kinds of cultural practices and their multiple processes of circulation, contestation, negotiation, and accommodation at any one location or across the globe.

Cultural studies had a significant impact on the understanding of Christianity, through, e.g., its theoretical turns toward the material*, the ordinary, and the mass of ordinary believers (see Popular Christian Practices Cluster). Far from H. Richard Niebuhr's* definition of culture as human civilization characterized by essences and values and his interest in Christianity's distinctive place in culture, Kathryn Tanner appropriated the modern anthropological* conception of cultures as everyday life and thereby proposed a new theological agenda. An understanding of Christianity depends not only on abstract concepts and theories about the divine, but also on its material constitution in specific historical and social location and through processes of community formation and concrete religious practices, including the use and reception of symbols, rituals, and beliefs in everyday life. From this perspective, Christianity is as much a product of culture as it is a contributor to historical cultural formation; change and development in Christianity involve as much negotiation and consensus as contestation and disputes. Such an approach challenges the study of Christianity to distance itself from transcendental ideation of the divine good and to focus on a detailed examination of its diversified contextualized practices. Hence the primary sites for understanding Christianity cannot be traditional theology and biblical scholarship, but rather the spontaneity, contradiction, and conflicted daily practices of the Christian masses.

The turn to the material and the popular has put into question not only the subject matter but also the methodological assumption of studies of Christianity. Recent forms of biblical and theological scholarship begin to pay attention to the politics, discursive formation, and power negotiation within and beyond the biblical and theological texts, by following newly emerged themes, such as gender, race, and postcolonial politics. Their aim is to expose Christianity's production and dissemination of hegemony in contemporary culture and to capitalize on the power of difference and resistance in the practices of the diverse Christian communities.

WONG WAI CHING (ANGELA)

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Culture and Biblical Studies. The word “culture” refers to the ways of life (material substance, norms of behaviors, values, and beliefs) that offer systems of meaning and explanation in the life-world of human society. Those who emphasize the social sciences view culture as a “complex whole” that makes up a society or its ways of life. Those who take the humanities approach understand culture as that which “cultivates” virtues and aims at fostering ways of life that lead to human flourishing.

Biblical studies, in its task of interpretation, involves both a methodology and a process of understanding the meaning of the biblical texts, of the authors, and of the readers. The relation between Scripture* and culture is a complex dialectic of values in which interpreters are both recipients, socially constructed persons (as heirs of culture and tradition), and hermeneutic agents – choosers of meaning, negotiators of values. The writer (who is the first reader) and the readers (i.e. interpreters) are co-producers of the meanings of the biblical text.

Cultural biblical studies include Scripture interpretations (reading Scripture through the lens of culture) and culture interpretations (reading culture through the lens of Scripture). “Multicultural” biblical study involves studying of the Bible from various cultural perspectives and resources. “Intercultural” biblical study involves comparative study of the Bible through the engagement of multiple cultural lenses. “Cross-cultural” biblical study has two meanings. Descriptively, the term refers to either (1) the use of cultural resources (e.g. the myths, philosophy, or concepts of the Sumerian, Egyptian, Jewish, or Greco-Roman world) by biblical authors to express their understanding of God or (2) the use of contemporary cultural resources (e.g. indigenous texts or cultural frameworks) by biblical interpreters as interpretive tools for reading Scripture. Prescriptively, cross-cultural study refers to either (1) the relevance of the text to new readers or (2) the ethical obligation of doing biblical interpretation across cultures and with a diverse community of interpreters sustained by the gifts of courage, authenticity, and humility.

Cultural biblical studies advocate contextual and indigenous interpretations of Scripture, noting that the Bible can speak to all cultures. While every interpretation may be legitimate and valid in its context, every interpretation is partial, yet its limitation is overcome by an ever-enlarging spiral process of cross-cultural (global) interpretation. The ambiguities of an interpretation and the contextuality of the interpreter, though culturally conditioned, are partially clarified and expanded through the process of global biblical interpretation.

YEO KHIOK-KHNG

Culture and Christianity. The relationship between Christianity and culture is a perennial problem. In his book Christ and Culture, H. Richard Niebuhr* analyzes the different ways in which this relationship has been conceived. His typology of five conceptions of this relationship is helpful for discerning how Christianity has been appropriated in various cultural contexts, taking Africa as the main example.

Christ against Culture. When Christianity is presented as an alternative to the existing culture, the prospective convert must choose either to follow Christ or to remain in the “evil world” or “paganism.” This is a common conception when Christianity is viewed as an apocalyptic* or sectarian* movement, and also as Christendom*. Most missionaries from the North Atlantic to Africa presupposed this view, without acknowledging that for them Christianity was their own cultural and religious heritage. Since Christianity cannot exist in a cultural vacuum, any claim to preach the “pure gospel” is pretense. Christians are necessarily products of their cultures. When they go out to win converts, they do so from their own cultural backgrounds, using the languages and cultural tools they have accumulated through the process of socialization and education. In practice, portraying Christ as against culture puts in conflict the missionaries' culture with the prospective converts' culture and engenders serious social crisis. The proliferation of African* Instituted Churches is a manifestation of that crisis. Ngugi wa Thiong'o's novel The River Between portrays this crisis in the conflict between Joshua, a staunch Christian, and Muthoni, his daughter, who seeks wholeness in the traditional African way of life. Okot p'Bitek's long poems, Song of Lawino and Song of Ocol portray the same crisis. Kosuke Koyama's Waterbuffalo Theology describes a similar crisis in Thailand, where local people could identify with Christ, while the missionaries portrayed Christianity as a movement against their Buddhist tradition.

The Christ of Culture. On the opposite end of the spectrum, some Christians consider Christ to be the "Son of God" and "Son of man" who comes to affirm the cultural and religious heritage of peoples. The gospel is the fulfillment of culture, not a threat to it, as the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5-7) exemplifies. Christ, the "man for all cultures," helps people discern and live according to God's will in the context of their respective cultural and religious traditions. Thus Christianity cannot be culturally uniform. The churches of the apostolic period presupposed this relationship between Christ and culture. Though Jewish-Christian and Hellenistic-Christian churches were in communion with each other, each retained its unique cultural particularity. One should then expect significant differences among, e.g., African, European, and North American churches.

Christ above Culture. Seeing Christ as above culture is a way of avoiding the conflict between the two preceding perspectives. Making a distinction between the heavenly and earthly cities (Augustine*), Christianity becomes transcendentalist, concentrating on "salvation*" in heaven and the future. In practice, such religiosity becomes irrelevant to the needs and demands of the present.

Christ and Culture in Paradox. Seeing Christ and culture as paradoxical is another way of avoiding the conflict: Christ is both identified with and contrasted with culture. The church is in the world, though it is not of the world – the view of the Protestant Reformation, especially Luther*. The problem is the lack of clarity regarding the circumstances under which Christ is portrayed in support of or against culture. Who has the authority to decide? In the modern Christian missionary enterprise, this authority has been vested in missionaries, who in general are biased in favor of their own cultures and against the cultures where they are guests.

Christ the Transformer of Culture.

According to this perspective, Christ makes all things new (Rev. 21:5). Conversion is viewed as a challenge for converts to change their ways and become new beings. Paul's conversion is often cited as an example. He was transformed from a "persecutor" of Christians to a "perfector" of Christianity. Yet "transformation" presupposes that the earlier way of life is not abandoned; it is transformed through the adoption of new insights and commitments. In practice, the ingredients of transformation are most often taken from the culture of the missionaries; the resulting change is then comparable to any other process of acculturation*. In Africa most cultural changes under colonial rule and missionary tutelage have been of this kind. Thus many of the African elite blamed the modern Christian missionary enterprise for the cultural alienation that Africans have suffered under the pretext of modernization.

These five perspectives on the relationship between Christianity and culture are often simultaneously present in a given cultural context and/or a given denomination, causing tension and confusion and giving rise to factions. This is the case in Africa. Part of the cultural crisis in Africa arises from the lack of consensus among Christians and churches on the most relevant and constructive approach to reconciling Christianity and culture.

JESSE NDWIGA KANYUA MUGAMBI

Culture and Christianity in Eastern Orthodoxy.

The Eastern Orthodox* proclamation and presentation of the eternal Christian gospel has penetrated and transfigured many cultures throughout the world during its 2000-year history. Eastern Orthodox have been very aware of the dangers of imposing a particular culture along with the gospel; thus, they have consciously sought to understand and respect different cultures from their first encounter. Pentecost clearly revealed how the Holy* Spirit infuses every language and culture, and can not only transform culture into a carrier of the Divine, but in fact even lift it up in creative and dynamic ways to discover new expressions and realities.

The Eastern Church's respect for other cultures can be seen during the first centuries in the ways the gospel penetrated and flourished outside the Greco-Roman world, as it helped develop cultures and peoples in Ethiopia*, Armenia*, and Egypt*. How this contrasts with the approach to culture of the Latin Church can be seen in the Latin clergy's attack of the Byzantine missionaries Cyril* and Methodius (9th c.) for their creation of a Slavonic alphabet and translation of liturgical services into the local language, which demonstrated their respect for the Slavic culture. A representative response of these Byzantine missionaries to the Latin belief in limited "sacred cultures" was (quoting Methodius addressing German representatives of the Latin Church): "Aren't you ashamed to accept only three languages [Latin, Greek, and Hebrew] and to say that the other languages are deaf and dumb?... We know that there are many people who read books and praise God in their own languages: the Armenians, the Persians, the Abasgi, the Iberians, the Sogdians, the Goths, the Avars, the Turks, the Khazars, the Arabs, the Egyptians, and others." Western Christianity came to have a similar respect for other cultures and languages in part through the Protestant Reformation seven centuries later, as well as through, e.g., the Jesuit* missionaries and the Second Vatican* Council (1960s).

The Orthodox theological approach when other cultures are encountered is first to try to understand and affirm the good that already exists within this culture and that coincides with the essence of the gospel message. Second, if any elements of the culture fundamentally stand against the spirit of the gospel, the Church rejects these. Finally, those rudiments of culture that are not seen as totally irreconcilable but in need of new meaning and understanding would then be "baptized" with the creative spirit of the gospel and transfigured into something new, while still holding onto the old structures of the culture. See also MISSION CLUSTER: MISSION AND EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

LUKE A. VERONIS

Culture and Christian Theology. Culture in a "high-culture" sense refers to intellectual or spiritual achievement in great works of art, literature, or philosophy. Culture in an anthropological sense refers to the meaning dimension of social action generally, to the beliefs, values, and symbols pervading a whole way of life. Whenever one talks about any human activity, with a recognition of its self-fashioning capacities and its socially and historically conditioned character, one is talking about culture in the latter sense.

Culture in this second sense is central to contemporary ways of doing theology. Culture figures in post-liberal theology's worry that the distinctiveness of Christian witness is diluted by modern culture, in liberal or revisionist theology's effort to show the meaning and relevance of Christianity for new cultural situations, and in Liberation theology's support for contemporary cultural trends toward greater equality and inclusion. Culture in all these theologies identifies the non-Christian "world" that theologians must either oppose or applaud. In the influential terminology of H. Richard Niebuhr*, opposition suggests "Christ against culture"; a more collaborative stance is that of a "Christ of culture."

Moreover, Christian theology is itself a cultural formation in this broad sense of culture, with a number of implications for how theology is done. First, the way theology is influenced by context can be talked about in cultural terms. Christian theology might arise, e.g., in and through the process by which elements of the wider culture are assimilated and revised from a Christian point of view. Second, theological disagreements can be understood in cultural terms, e.g. in terms of the degree to which a Christian way of life requires cultural uniformity, a shared body of basic beliefs and values. Third, thinking of theology in cultural terms allows one to identify theology primarily with beliefs and values that are ingredients in day-to-day Christian life. Rather than being a religious form of literature or philosophy, as the idea of high culture suggests, theology becomes the meaning dimension of socially significant Christian action. All Christian action has a theological dimension by virtue of the way it is permeated by a sense of what Christians believe and value. Theology as a specialized intellectual activity would simply bring this meaning dimension of everyday Christian life to more explicit critical reflection. Finally, thinking of theology in cultural terms foregrounds the practical consequences of Christian beliefs and values, the way those beliefs and actions are bound up with Christian social action. See also INCULTURATION CLUSTER. KATHRYN TANNER

Culture and Worship. The relationship between culture and worship has been popularly called “liturgical inculturation*” since the 1960s (from the anthropological term “enculturation”). Inculturation involves the dialogue between worship and the values, rites, symbols, and customs of the particular local culture. Some of those cultural elements are judged to be worthy of inclusion in the church’s rites and are subsequently incorporated into worship for its enrichment. Although the term is relatively recent, the concept itself is as ancient as Christianity itself. The mere fact that there are four Gospels rather than one suggests something of a cultural need to adapt the Christian message accordingly to particular cultural contexts. From the earliest centuries, the history of Christian liturgy* has revealed an exchange between local culture and worship, especially evident in the Greco-Roman world, where there was much borrowing between Christian ritual and mystery* religions (e.g. Mithraism*). Consequently, there were similarities in liturgical language and initiation rites, post-baptismal catechetical formation, use of liturgical vesture*, and bodily posture. Yet those shared cultural symbols were interpreted differently according to each religious tradition and belief system.

The evolution of the Ambrosian*, Gallican*, Mozarabic*, and Roman rites offer further examples of inculturated worship; each contained strong cultural components of the context and region in which the rite emerged. The church’s missionary* history reveals similar concerns of cultural adaptation. When missionaries arrived in any region, one of the first things they did was to translate* the Bible into the language of that region and advocate the use of local languages for worship. Thus the brothers Cyril* (d869) and Methodius (d885) promoted vernacular worship among the Slavic people, just as Jesuit* missionaries would do among the Chinese (17th c.). Vatican* II (1962–65) called for a recovery of the Catholic Church’s missionary role in the world; its Constitution on the Liturgy, Sacrosanctum Concilium (Nos. 37–40), advocated the importance of culturally adapted worship, especially in mission lands. The 1988 “Roman Missal for the Dioceses of Zaire” (or Zairian/Congolese* Rite) offers a significant example within the post-conciliar church. The Lutheran World Federation’s Nairobi Statement (1996) helps contemporary reflection on inculturation by highlighting four relationships of worship and culture: worship as transcultural or universal; contextual; countercultural; and cross-cultural.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Cure of Souls. See CARE OF SOULS; PASTORAL CARE.

Cursillos de Cristiandad (Spanish), “short courses” conducted during a three-day weekend, preparing participants for “fourth-day” activities in their everyday life. They began in Mallorca, Spain, in 1943–44 in preparation for pilgrimages to Compostela* and received ecclesial approval in 1949. Similar programs include Tres Dias, Via de Cristo, Walk to Emmaus, and Kairos, a program for prisoners.

Cyprian of Carthage, Thascius Caecilianus Cyprianus, bishop of Cathage and martyr; born into a noble family of Carthage in Roman Africa, raised in traditional religious practice, and apparently educated in rhetoric. He never married and no mention is made of siblings. He converted to Christianity (c246) and was elected bishop by the Christian community in Carthage (248). He became the leader of the bishops of Africa and guided the church through a series of crises. In January 250, Emperor Decius enjoined everyone to participate in a sacrifice to honor the deities guiding the Roman Empire. When the bishops stipulated that those who did not resist and “lapsed” must submit to lifelong penance*, some of the confessors* (who resisted the emperor’s order) – anticipating martyrdom and immediate entrance into heaven – offered to win forgiveness for others directly from Christ. Rebellious clergy readmitted the sinners under the martyrs’ patronage, thereby dividing the church against the bishops. The majority of the people remained loyal to the bishops, who then accepted back into communion all those who had lapsed but had subsequently submitted to public penance under their authority. This accommodation provoked a second schism of rigorists, who refused to readmit any apostates to communion.

Cyprian led the African bishops in developing three theological positions during this controversy: (1) that Peter and the apostles, as the original college of bishops, had received from Christ the power to forgive major sins committed after baptism; (2) that the unity of the church derives from God, so that the sin of attempting to divide it was equivalent to apostasy*; and (3) that only bishops legitimately established within the unity of the church could sanctify through baptism and the Eucharist. Thus no one could be saved outside the unity of the bishops’ church (which they viewed as the one Catholic Church). This theology was the foundation for the Donatist* schism in the African Church after the Diocletian persecution, in the early 4th c. Cyprian was expelled from Carthage in the initial stages of the Valerian persecution, in the autumn of 257. He was tried by the Roman proconsul and executed on September 14, 258, the first martyr-bishop of the African church.

J. PATOUT BURNS

Cyprus. A large island in the Eastern Mediterranean. Its importance as well as its misfortunes derive from its proximity to Asia Minor, Palestine, and Egypt. Influenced by both Phoenician and Greek cultures, it also acquired a large Jewish population; it was the birthplace of Barnabas*, and some of the Christians persecuted with Stephen* fled to Cyprus (Acts 11:19–20). It was visited (c 45) by Paul, Barnabas, and Mark (Acts 13:4, 15:39). Barnabas was traditionally considered its first bishop, and his tomb and relics were later found (478). Epiphanius*, the 4th-c. “hammer of heretics,” was archbishop of Salamis (later Konstantia). Cyprus became the first autocephalous* church by action of the Council of Ephesus* (431), making it independent of the patriarch* of Antioch*. The island came under moderate Islamic influence (653–965), then Byzantine (965–1191); during the Crusades*, it was under European control, Frankish (1191–1489) and subsequently Venetian (1489–1571), with Greek Orthodox bishops subordinated to the Roman Catholic hierarchy. After Turkish reconquest, the Orthodox Church alone was recognized, and the Christian community was considered a millet*, with the hierarchy responsible for its obedience. The island was administered by Great Britain after 1878 and gained independence in 1960. Archbishop Makarios, already considered the ethnarch in the tradition of the millet, became the first president. He created controversy by advocating union with Greece*, a policy opposed by the Turkish population. Turkey invaded (1974), and there was a transfer of populations. Today Turks occupy the northern third of the island and Greeks the southern two-thirds, although there is technically one Republic of Cyprus recognized by the United Nations (while a Republic of Northern Cyprus is recognized by Turkey alone).

Statistics: Population (2007): 790,000. Christians 82% (Orthodox, 78%; Maronites and other Christians, 4%); Muslims, 18%. (Source: Cyprus Demographic Report, 2007.)

EUGENE TESELLE

Cyril and Methodius, brothers born in Thessaloniki. Cyril (826–69; also Constantine-Cyril) was a teacher, and Methodius (c815–885) an official in Constantinople. On diplomatic missions to the Khazars (860) and Moravia* (862), they translated the Bible and the liturgy into a Slavic dialect ("Old Church Slavonic") and invented an alphabet (an earlier version of Cyrillic). When they were in Rome, the pope permitted them to celebrate the liturgy in Slavic. Cyril died in Rome; Methodius was appointed bishop of Moravia, but his work was blocked by German bishops. The brothers' influence in the Slavic world continued in Serbia*, Bulgaria*, Poland*, and Russia*.

Cyril of Alexandria (c378–444), a powerful Greek bishop and an eminent patristic theologian. His insightful christological writings emphasizing the dynamic force of the Incarnation* (deification* process, theosis*) had broad effects, influencing the Councils of Ephesus I (431) and II (449), of Chalcedon (451), and of Constantinople II (553).

A native of Egypt, Cyril attended his uncle, Archbishop Theophilus, at the Synod of the Oak (403), which deposed John* Chrysostom. After a violently contested election, Cyril became archbishop of Alexandria (412); his early administration was tumultuous. After 428 Cyril clashed with the archbishop of Constantinople, Nestorius*, who conceived of two centers of operation simultaneously present in the life of Christ: one human and one divine, with one sometimes predominating over the other. Cyril abruptly denounced this as heretical*, insisting that Jesus was wholly and completely divine, thus one single person (the "Miaphysite" view), and that person was God. Scholars wonder whether Cyril overinterpreted Nestorius's language about "two persons" when he understood it as a doctrine of two subjects. Cyril's reputation suffered after the 18th c. (he was depicted as "too much the politician"); very little of his work was translated into English. Yet recent studies have underscored how significant a theologian and exegete he is.

JOHN A. MCGUCKIN

Cyril of Jerusalem (c315–386), bishop of Jerusalem, best known for his "Catechetical Lectures," which provide insights into 4th-c. Christian instruction and initiation. For Cyril's early life and his career, which was punctuated by several exiles, we have only disparate sources, e.g. Epiphanius*, Jerome*, and the 5th-c. historian Sozomen.

After becoming bishop of Jerusalem (c349), Cyril, who defended Nicene Christology (see Nicaea, First Council of), was exiled a first time (357) for his opposition to Arianism* by Acacius, a strong "non-Nicene" Arian and bishop/metropolitan of Caesarea. Despite reservations about the term homousios for its non-biblical provenance, Cyril held a high, de facto Nicene, Christology; Gregory* of Nyssa witnessed to Cyril's correct christological confession before the Council of Antioch (379). Cyril attended the Council of Constantinople (381), where the Niceno*-Constantinopolitan Creed was once and for all ascertained to be the badge of Christian orthodoxy.

Cyril's "Catechetical Lectures" (c350), 18 Lenten sermons to the catechumens preparing for baptism*, deal with sin* and God's pardon; how the water* of baptism cleanses the body, and the Holy* Spirit cleanses the soul; true faith; and the Apostles'* Creed. The later five post-baptismal mystagogical* lectures provide fascinating details about the 4th-c. Palestinian liturgy. Cyril was probably the originator of "Holy Week," reliving the events day by day in their historic setting. PAUL CHANG-HA LIM

Czech Republic. The beginnings of church organization in the Czech Republic are associated with the Byzantine mission of Cyril* and Methodius (diocese established and the Old Slavonic liturgy approved by the pope, 869). But very little survived the fall of the Moravian Empire (906) and Christianity ultimately spread (in its Latin form) from the West (Bishopric of Prague, 973).

The successful development culminating during the reign of Charles IV (Archbishopric of Prague, 1344; Charles University, 1348) was interrupted by religious wars following the execution of popular preacher Jan Hus* in Constance (1415). The independent Hussite Church was formally recognized in 1436, with distinctive features of vernacular Mass and Communion "under both kinds" (both the loaf and the cup – hence the name Utraquists*). Several other churches emerged, of which the Bohemian* Brethren (also called Unitas Fratrum, Unity of the Brethren, 1457) became most prominent. Its contribution to learning and cultural life is most significant; its translation of the Bible (the Kralice Bible, 1579) was accepted as the standard in the Czech language.

The 16th-c. Reformation further contributed to religious pluralism (Lutheranism* in German-speaking areas, Anabaptists* and other radicals elsewhere), but the Hapsburg victory (1620) ultimately led to a ban on non-Catholic confessions. After several waves of exile – in the 1620s (including the exile of Comenius*, bishop of the Brethren, and his followers) and 1730s (exile of the Moravians*) – the country became predominantly Catholic. After passage of the Act of Toleration (1781), only 2% of population left the Roman Catholic Church.

While in the 19th c. most of the population remained Catholic, national leaders and intellectuals glorified the Hussite Movement and stressed the resistance against Germans and Rome as its legacy to the nation. This contradiction is understood by some to have been the starting point of the secularization of Czech society. The foundation of the independent Czechoslovak Republic (1918) strengthened this trend, when several Protestant churches based on the Hussite tradition were established.

The Communist regime in Czechoslovakia (1948–89) launched a severe antireligious campaign, marked first by open attacks on churches (show trials of church leaders, closures of monasteries, etc.), later by focusing on education and propaganda (religion as something irrational and old-fashioned compared with a rational and modern worldview).

A substantial part of Czech society today sees itself as secular* and antireligious. In 2001 only approximately one-third of the population declared a religious affiliation, but there are persisting doubts about these figures (reflecting the participants' common distrust of the census and the notion that religion is exclusively private). Other surveys suggest that many people seek the supernatural outside of traditional church structures ("believing with no belonging"), a reason for the stagnation of membership in traditional churches, in contrast to the relative growth of Charismatics and Jehovah's Witnesses. See also JEROME OF PRAGUE; SLOVAK REPUBLIC.

Statistics: Population (2001): 10.2 million (M). Religious affiliation, 1921: Roman Catholics, 82%; other Christians, 9.4%; Jews, 1.3%; atheists, 7.1%. 1950: Roman Catholics, 76%; other Christians, 16.3%; Jews, 0.1%; atheists, 7.2%. 1991: Roman Catholics, 39%; other Christians, 4.7%; others, 0.2%; without religious affiliation, 39.9%; unknown, 16.2%. 2001: Roman Catholics, 26.8%; other Christians, 2.9%; others, 2.5%; without religious affiliation, 59%; unknown, 8.8%. (Source: 2001 census.)

MARTIN ELBEL

D

Dalit Theology, an influential strand of Indian contextual* thinking, collectively reflects on the ongoing Christian activity of resisting oppression and advancing liberation among outcaste communities (Dalits) dehumanized under the comprehensive, contemporaneous, cumulative, and apartheid-like caste* system. The Indian Christian community consists predominantly of Dalits (and Adivasis*). Yet it was only beginning in 1981 that these oppressed communities became self-reflective participants in the development of Christian theology. Dalit theology derives from the effects of caste* oppression; it is a protest against the dehumanizing consequences of the long, weighty, and widespread subjugation of the Dalits by the caste communities. As a counter-theology (in contrast to other Indian Christian theologies developed since the early 1800s), it unveils the legitimizing role of traditional Hinduism* and resists the co-opting predilection for inculturation* by Hindu-Christian theologies.

Dalit theology is remarkably original in its constructive contribution. It strives to collect and circulate Dalits' special knowledge about God, the world, and human beings. It reclaims for Indian Christian theology the Dalit outlooks, themes, motifs, and revelations from and about the Divine, received and preserved in media other than the written text. Because Dalits were forbidden access to the Hindu Vedas and their recitation in temples for fear that the Dalits would pollute the holy scriptures and pure Hindus, Dalits imaginatively used drums, dances, oral narratives, paintings, and sculptures to register and recall their sustaining and healing experiences with the Divine.

Deeply affected by the person of Jesus and passionately aligned with the liberating work of Christ, Christian Dalit theology is a specialized discipline that arises from reflection, by Liberation-identified Dalits and Dalit-identified Liberationists, on the interlocking of divine and human things that are relevant now and will affect the future of Dalit communities. Thus Dalit theology is based on the "pathetic" experience of specific Dalit communities, filtered through the inspirational person and work of Jesus Christ and integrated into the lives of all oppressed peoples in its goal of funding and finding life in all its fullness. As a contextual Liberation theology in India, it is collective and comprehensive in scope, humanizing in objective, profusely (even if naively) dependent on God for help and support, deeply rooted in Jesus' liberative teaching and practice, connected with the natural world of earth, wind, and water, and hopeful that life before death is both a gift from God and a right of all peoples.

SATHIANATHAN CLARKE

Dalmatic, knee-length vestment with wide sleeves and two stripes, used by deacons* during High Mass* and by bishops* on certain occasions.

Damian of Alexandria (d605), patriarch, theologian, 35th pope of Alexandria (578–605). Of Syrian origin (Edessa), he was contemporary with four Byzantine emperors, Justin II (565–78), Tiberius II (578–82), Maurice (582–602), and Phocas (602–10). A vigorous and reforming pope of the Coptic* Church, he revived the authority of his office, especially by disentangling the various strands that troubled his argumentative and factious church. He first had to deal with burning problems of an ecclesiastical and doctrinal nature with Antioch, becoming involved (c586) in a stormy controversy with Peter* of Callinicus, patriarch of Antioch (581–91), over a problem that arose during the tritheist controversy. Peter accused him of Sabellianism* because in refuting tritheism* he had declared that the characteristic properties of the divine persons, i.e. fatherhood, sonship, and procession, were the hypostases* themselves. Thereupon Damian accused his critic of tritheist sympathies. Damian claimed that the tradition stemming from the Cappadocian* Fathers legitimized the notion of the persons of the Trinity as "subsistent relations" and believed that tritheism must be refuted by a restatement, a "repristination," of the divinely inspired traditional teaching. He claimed that he was contributing to the clarification of patristic teaching.

RIFAAT EBIED

Damnation, the consciousness of bearing divine condemnation for eternity*. In one sense, damnation is simply existence in hell*. As compared with hell, however, “damnation” (from Lat damnum, “loss”) emphasizes the pain of loss (absence from God) more than the pain of sense (endured physically). Augustine* speaks of a double damnation: in the present life and after death*. As all life is punitive, those who reject God suffer now. Then there is the interim period, when the disembodied soul* suffers alone. After the resurrection*, as Augustine says, the souls of the damned receive their flesh back “not to alleviate, but to aggravate” the suffering (non ad beneficium, sed ad supplicium). Damnation can also be the condition of those living but predestined for hell in theological systems like Calvin’s* with double predestination*. Augustine regards the most severe punishment as exile from God (Enchiridion 112). Calvin concurs: it is “being estranged from all fellowship with God”; “those to whom the Lord will thus publicly manifest his anger will feel that heaven, and earth, and sea, all beings, animate and inanimate, are, as it were, inflamed with dire indignation against them, and armed for their destruction” (Institutes 3.25.12).

Damnation, like hell, is not only a threat, a deterrent, but also the worst conceivable fate. Death camps, gulags, and natural disasters evoke these theological terrors. Sickness, depression, and injustice can elicit a despair, a forsakenness, akin to damnation, a self-contraction so profound that one doubts God’s presence and one’s ability to escape hell. Cassian* called this “sadness” (tristitia), Luther* Anfechtung. This is the call de profundis (Ps 129 [130]), the “abyss” for Hadewijch* of Brabant, the pit of Dante’s* Inferno, and the dark night of the soul in John* of the Cross. The return from the depths, a spiritual rebound, reverses the threat of despair. See also JUDGMENT; PURGATORY.

ALAN E. BERNSTEIN

Dance, already a part of religious ceremony at the time of the Paleolithic cave paintings, is mentioned in the OT in connection with Miriam* (Exod 15:20), David* (2 Sam 6:14, 22), and praise in the Temple (Ps 149:3). In Judaism dancing on the Sabbath, the Feast of Tabernacles, and the Day of Atonement continued, and in Hasidism dancing was encouraged.

In Greek theater, the chorus (choros, which originally meant “dance”) was generally circular, with the leader in the center. Philo* says that the Therapeutae* engaged in song and dance; circular dance is mentioned in two Gnostic* texts, symbolizing the harmony of the original and restored creation*. Platonist philosophers likened the turning of the chorus toward the center to the circling of the heavens around the One or to the turning of distracted and fallen souls toward the One; among Neoplatonists and in Augustine*, conversion* (epistrophe) meant this positive “turning toward.”

Dance came to acquire negative connotations because of its association with banqueting and lascivious stage plays. Usually excluded from worship and the sanctuary, dance was nevertheless associated with marriage* ceremonies, feasts held at the tombs of Christian martyrs, and with popular celebrations (e.g. in the West at Christmas*, Mardi Gras, and Carnival). Most 19th- to early-20th-c. Protestant missionaries forced indigenous people to give up their dance traditions as pagan*, idolatrous, or lascivious.

Nevertheless, religious dancing was encouraged in the USA by the Shakers* and at times by Pentecostal* and Holiness* groups. Since the late 20th c., it has commonly occurred in many Charismatic* and other churches in Africa, Asia, and Latin America (e.g. members of the congregation dance as they bring their offerings to the altar).

In North Atlantic mainline denominations, liturgical dance came to be performed after a more positive attitude toward the human body* developed (19th–20th c.) through the influence of Ruth St. Denis (1877–1968). Dance may be narrative (e.g. dancing the parable of the prodigal son), interpretive (interpreting Ps 23, the Lord’s Prayer), thematic (portraying the creature before the Creator), or expressive of various religious feelings. The song “Lord of the Dance” (words by Sydney Carter, 1963, set to a Shaker hymn tune) brought the metaphor of dance into many hymnals.

The Second Vatican* Council, in its Constitution on the Liturgy, encouraged popular participation in worship with “acclamations, gestures, and bodily attitudes” as well as the adaptation of indigenous rites of passage.

EUGENE TESELLE

Dance of Death, originally a late medieval morality play featuring a dialogue between Death and all classes of human beings; subsequently, a visual representation of Death as a corpse or skeleton, leading all humans in a dance to the grave.

Daniel, Book of, belongs to the third division of the HB, the Writings, coming apparently too late to be ranged among the Prophets. Numerous allusions (especially Dan 11) to Antiochus IV's persecutions (2nd c. BCE; a historical "premiere") may indicate Daniel's date. Conservative interpreters, however, antedate Daniel (6th c.), with God inspiring the seer with the events of 168–67 BCE (see also 1 Macc 1:41–67; 2 Macc 6:1–7:43).

Chapters 1–6 are stories about Daniel and his companions exiled in Babylon; Chaps. 7–12 are an apocalypse on the end-times. The book is bilingual: Chaps. 2–7 in Aramaic; 1 and 8–12 in Hebrew. There are also Greek words in Dan 3. The structure follows a dual 1:5 pattern: one Hebrew chapter followed by five Aramaic ones; one Aramaic chapter followed by five Hebrew ones. The Greek versions include five additions (apocrypha).

In Dan 2 and 4, Daniel interprets dreams and accedes to the highest position at the royal court. The central apocalyptic* part, a genre present in Isa 24–27 and Ezek 38–39, deals with "the manifestation of secrets unknowable by natural means" (Theodotion* on Dan 2:19), especially about the end-times. In the midst of the persecutions of the faithful, the apocalyptist sees the coming of the "son* of man" (Dan 7) and forecasts the resurrection* of the just (Dan 12), two major breakthroughs in biblical revelation. The perspective is marked by historical pessimism, dualism*, and determinism, but also by a total faith* in the divine ultimate intervention. Then human history ends and the Kingdom* of God (e.g. 2:44, 4:3, 6:26) comes. Thus the final historical cataclysm entails coincidentally the ultimate theophanic redemption*. From being historical, as among the prophets, eschatology* has become suprahistorical.

ANDRÉ LACOCQUE

Dante Alighieri (1265–1321) rapidly rose to a position of political power in Florence, becoming a member of its governing council, the signoria. Internecine strife resulted in his expulsion in 1301. During his peregrinations in exile until his death, he composed fundamental works, including The Divine Comedy. This work, written in the vernacular, is responsible more than any other for establishing the Florentine dialect as the literary and eventually the national language of Italy.

The Divine Comedy is an incomparable summing up of the medieval Roman Catholic vision of the universe. The poem recounts the journey of its author through the three realms of the afterlife – hell*, purgatory*, and paradise* – where all truth, human and divine, is revealed in an eschatological* perspective. Dante's dialogues with the dead reveal the depths of the human soul, for good and for ill, along with the unfathomable dispensations of Providence for bringing the drama of history to a just end. Adapting epic tradition, especially Virgil's epic of imperial Rome (the Aeneid), Dante personalizes the form, incorporating romance and lyric modes. This poetic summa constitutes a veritable encyclopedia of culture drawn from all the arts and sciences, as well as from world history and contemporary chronicle. All these elements are melded into a quest for total knowledge and ultimately the vision of God.

Dante thereby founds a tradition of Christian epic that continues in such authors as Tasso, Spenser, Milton*, Blake*, and even Joyce. This sub-biblical genre constitutes a literary extension of Christian revelation* based on the claim that poetry can be a vehicle of divine vision, a disclosure of truth of a prophetic order that may be in tension with priestly, ecclesiastical authority*. Dante's theological poetics and his exemplary figure as poet-prophet thus open the path for literature to become an original discovery of divinity, as well as of human life and the universe, as seen through the optics of God that a poet may gain access to through exceptional grace and by virtue of his or her special art and discipline.

In exile (1301–21), Dante composed fundamental works of political philosophy (On Monarchy) and literary theory (On the Vulgar Tongue) and, above all, The Divine Comedy. Other vernacular works include the story in poetry and prose of his love for Beatrice (The New Life) and his digest of philosophical knowledge (The Banquet). See also AESTHETICS AND THEOLOGY; ITALIAN LITERATURE AND CHRISTIANITY.

WILLIAM FRANKE

DAOISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

Daoism and Christianity: Daoism and Christian Perspectives
Daoism and Christianity: Daoist Canon and the Christian Bible
Daoism and Christianity in Neo-Confucian Korea

Daoism and Christianity: Daoism and Christian Perspectives. Daoism, one of the two major native religious traditions of China* (along with Confucianism*), traces its original insights from Laozi (the name of both a person and a book). According to tradition, Li Er, subsequently known as Laozi (an honorific name, “Old Master”), was a native of Southern China during the 6th c. BCE. During the Tang dynasty (618–907 CE), Daoism was highly valued because Laozi was regarded as the ancestor of Li Yuan, the founder of the Tang dynasty. According to the tradition, the book Laozi, or Book of the Way (Dao) and Its Virtue (Dao De Jing), was edited in the 3rd–4th c. BCE. Laozi’s thought was further developed by Zhuangzi (4th c. BCE), who contributed a concrete teaching on apophatic* contemplation: “sitting in forgetfulness” and “fasting of the heart.” While the literary style of Laozi is sober and poetic, the sentences written by Zhuangzi are long and prosaic, and the book contains many allegorical, witty, and humorous stories.

Laozi and Zhuangzi initiated the concept of wu (nothingness, nonbeing), emphasizing the limitation of human reason*. Since the Dao has no shape, no smell, and no color, we have to go beyond our ordinary perception and stay in the quiet state of emptied mind. While “being” (you) signifies nameable individual objects, the source and foundation of all of these is “nonbeing” (wu). Against Confucianism, Laozi and Zhuangzi pointed out the limitation of social norms and propriety. Laozi and Zhuangzi’s philosophical tradition was later incorporated, along with other traditions, by leaders of Daoist religious orders and schools.

Historical Encounters of Daoism and Christianity. The first encounter occurred in 635 when Alopen, an Assyrian* Christian (often inappropriately called “Nestorian*”), came to the capital city of Tang, translated the essence of Christian teaching, and dedicated it to the emperor. The emperor Taizhong permitted missionary activity, and Syriac monks placed portraits of succeeding emperors on the wall of the monastery and prayed for them. This 150-year-long Syriac mission to China and the names of priests (in both Chinese and Syriac) became known through the “stele of the propagation of the Luminous Religion” (built in 781, buried in 845 during the Huichang persecution, unearthed in 1625), which expresses how Daoism was employed as a bridge to Christianity.

Syriac and Assyrian missionaries did not hesitate to use Daoist terms. They translated YHWH Elohim as the “Heavenly Lord” (Tianzun), adopting the Daoist name for the highest divinity, and explained that God is empty and calm, but transforms myriad things in mysterious ways. They portrayed the Christian Trinity as “our triune and mysterious God” (Sanimaoshen) who is the “lord of silence and truth” (Wuyanzhenzhu). “Emptiness” and “silence” are characteristics of the Daoist Heaven rather than of the Christian God. Similarly, they introduced Jesus as a “heavenly immortal” (tianxian) – the highest level of immortals in Daoism – who ascended to heaven before his disciples after he opened the gates of faith, hope, and love and composed 27 sacred books. Jesus’ death on the cross is not mentioned.

The second encounter between Daoism and Christianity was very different from the first. Daoism had lost its influence during the Ming dynasty. When Jesuit missionaries came to China (16th c.), the dominant ideology was neo-Confucianism. Thus Matteo Ricci* criticized Daoism as superstitious and nihilistic (as he did Buddhism) and claimed that Confucianism was closest to the truth.

Contemporary Encounters between Daoism and Christianity. Daoist classics and Daoist masters can be rich resources and good dialogue partners for contemporary Christians because of both parallelisms and differences between the two traditions.

1. Both traditions conceive of ultimate reality as the source of life and value. The Laozi (Chap. 42) states that all things originated from, and are nurtured by, the Dao, the mother of myriad things. The Dao is compassionate and forgiving (Laozi Chaps. 63, 67), as God is (Luke 17:20). Yet for Daoism, ultimate reality is primarily immanent in each being as its nurturing principle, while for Christianity, God forms a personal relationship

(a covenant*) with humans. When dealing with ecological* issues, Christians would benefit from learning from Daoism about the immanence of ultimate reality. In turn Daoists can be stimulated by the Christian understanding of God as relational.

2. Both Daoism and Christianity recognize the importance of revelation*. For example, both oral and written revelations played a significant role in the establishment of new Daoist schools. Christian scriptures are full of revelations from God through Abraham, Moses, the prophets, and finally Jesus Christ. Differences concern the way of transmission: words are valued in Christian revelation, wordless signs of heaven and earth in Daoist revelation.
3. Both traditions developed rich contemplative* methods as a way to attain eternal life or immortality. Daoist immortals are said to have completely transformed their life energy through the exercise of "inner alchemy," and so returned to the purity of the Dao (in some schools, with invisible bodies). Christians also hope for eternal life when the death of the body is overcome; revelation (of Christ as sacrament, a channel of salvation who makes what is invisible visible) and contemplation lead to purification that is necessary for union with God. But while Daoism classifies immortals according to the level of their "contemplation," the Christian notion of eternal life relies heavily on God's grace and depicts the "communion* of saints" as egalitarian.
4. Both Daoism and Christianity try to stay near the people, fulfilling their needs for healing, blessings, and peace. The possibility of becoming an immortal or a saint is open to everyone. Both traditions aspire to establish a society of equals and have concern for the poor.

SUNG-HAE KIM, SR.

Daoism and Christianity: Daoist Canon and the Christian Bible. The Daoist

Canon, or Daozang, is a comprehensive collection of numerous, diverse scriptures that is several hundred times the size of the Christian Bible. It came about through successive compilations of Daoist texts that date from the beginning of the Tang dynasty (618–907 CE). The Ming Canon of 1445, Zhengtong daoze (Daoist Canon of the Zhengtong Reign Period), which includes almost 1,500 texts (among them, texts produced under the Tang, Song, Jin, and Yuan regimes), lies at the heart of all modern editions of the Daoist Canon.

Following the example of the Buddhist Tripitaka, the Daoist Canon had originally been divided into "Three Grottoes" (Sandong), "Four Supplements" (Sifu), and "Twelve Divisions" (Shi'er bu). The present-day Canon preserves these core divisions, yet considerable variations occurred owing to later additions of commentaries, revelations, and texts elaborating on the core divisions.

Daoism does not have a single, standard view of scripture* or of its origin and roles (as is also the case for Christianity). Daoism is characterized by complexity and flexibility, qualities that are reflected in its view of scripture, which encompasses the diverse views of other religious traditions.

Generally speaking, in Judaism*, Christianity, and Islam*, scripture is considered to be a record of revelation from and about the Absolute, i.e. from and about God or Allah; consequently, these traditions attach the highest value to their own scriptures (although each has several, very different views of the roles of scripture). In other religious traditions, including Buddhism* and Confucianism*, scriptures are construed as human texts produced by human deliberation. Thus Buddhism and Confucianism emphasize an individual's (a sage's) authentic religious experience and wisdom more than they do revelation from a divine being, and strive to implement the sage's valuable teachings in deeds of their religious and daily life.

Daoist views include these diverse understandings of scripture and its roles. Roughly speaking, a group of traditions, such as the Great Purity Tradition, Numinous Treasure Tradition, and Celestial Masters Tradition consider their scriptures to have a divine origin and divine power. For such traditions, scriptures are literal expressions of the Dao, i.e. the primordial chaos of nondifferentiation. They believe that scriptures are sacred in that they manifest the Sacred itself and possess sacred power themselves. These traditions grant absolute authority to their scriptures.

In contrast, a group of Inner Alchemy (Neidan) traditions, such as the Complete Reality Tradition, lend more weight to the practical value of scripture than to its absolute authority as literal revelation. For these traditions, their scriptures present a gateway to the Dao, but are distinguished from the Dao itself because of their inherent limitations owing to the fact that they employ human language. In this context, scriptures are an auxiliary means to accomplish the religious goal.

Different attitudes toward scriptures are linked with different understandings of religious language and of salvation, i.e. whether salvation is attained via divine power or through human effort. Daoism has permitted the free interpretation of scriptures. As a result of such flexibility, an ongoing process of editing has led to broad variations and the continuous re-creation of the Daoist Canon. The tolerance and flexibility of Daoism occasionally threaten its identity.

SOOBIN CHOI

Daoism and Christianity in Neo-Confucian Korea. Korea is greatly influenced by both Confucianism and Christianity. Although Confucianism originated in China, Korean society was thoroughly structured by neo-Confucianism – a Confucianism in which Daoist thoughts are deeply embedded. Yet in this neo-Confucian country, Christianity is a major religion (at least 30% of the population is Christian), in contrast with other traditionally neo-Confucian countries – China, Hong Kong, Japan, Taiwan, and Vietnam – in which less than 3% of the population is Christian.

The success of the several branches of the Presbyterian Church in Korea – becoming during the 20th c. the largest Reformed Church in the world – is due in part to the strong similarities in the thought of John Calvin* and Korean neo-Confucianists, culminating in the work of Yi T'oegye (1501–70). Despite their distinctive premises (God vs. Heaven), both traditions claim a transcendental anthropology (the human being as the image of God [imago Dei] or the mandate of Heaven [T'ien-ming]), an ontology of co-humanity (agape or jen), a rigorous discipline of humanization (sanctification vs. self-cultivation), and the priority of piety (pietas or ching) and order.

The Confucian–Christian relationship in Korea does not fit any Western Christian categorization pertaining to the relationship between Christianity and other religions, such as exclusivism, inclusivism, pluralism*, or syncretism*. Korean Christians cannot adopt a hermeneutical distance from the indigenous tradition that governed Korean life for more than a millennium. In the family, most self-identified, churchgoing Christians still practice neo-Confucian moral norms and social customs. This distinctively Confucian–Christian context conjures up an intriguing issue concerning dual religious identity.

Although Daoism as a religion takes popular forms such as Shamanism* and folk religions, Daoist thought is influential and deeply embedded in neo-Confucianism. The Dao, the normative-generative way of life and of the cosmos, has been the all-embracing root metaphor of East Asian thought. The first Korean Christians conceived of Christ as the intersection of the heavenly Dao and the human Dao (cf. John 14:6). The Dao was taken to be a more biblical notion than the Logos because the first name of Christianity in Greek is hodos, “the way” (Acts 16:17, 18:25–6). Some argue for the adoption of the Dao as an alternative theological metaphor (theo-Dao) to both the problematic Logos (theo-Logos) and the reductionistic praxis (theo-praxis).

HEUP YOUNG KIM

Darby, John Nelson (1800–82). Ordained in the Church of Ireland (1825) and instrumental in the development of the dissident Plymouth* Brethren Movement, he advocated the dissolution of existing churches (1842). Convinced that a clear separation of Israel and the Christian Church should be maintained and that a clergy separated from the people was unbiblical, he energetically espoused a Dispensationalist* reading of Scripture* and church history that led to his conviction that a “secret rapture*” would signal the end of the present age. His teachings mark the beginning of the contemporary Dispensationalist Movement in Evangelical Christianity and are the basis for the popular belief in a Premillennial “rapture.” See also MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER.

STEPHEN E. LAHEY

Darwin, Charles Robert (1809–82), naturalist, originator of the theory of evolution* by natural selection. He rejected the Bible as a scientific authority and explained the origin of living species by natural laws given by God. For his devotion to science and his upright life, he received England’s highest religious honor when scientists joined churchmen and politicians to inter him in Westminster Abbey.

Born to wealth and christened an Anglican, Darwin attended Unitarian* services with his mother. His father, a freethinker, sent him (1825) to study medicine at Edinburgh University, where Robert Grant, an evolutionist and unbeliever, stimulated his interest in natural history. Abandoning medicine, Darwin entered Cambridge University (1828) to prepare for ordination in the Church of England. He accepted his professors’ beliefs about an ancient earth formed according to God’s laws, the fixity and divine design of living species, and the authority of the Bible. But a botanist, Rev. John Stevens Henslow, got him a place on the survey ship HMS Beagle during a five-year voyage around the world. In South America, impressed by nature’s power and diversity, he began to see how the appearance of new species in time and in space could be explained by laws, just as Christian geologists explained the formation of the earth’s crust.

Darwin saw that humans, too, were subject to God’s laws – as Unitarians believed, laws of material perfecting. Just as the races descended from one another and belonged to one family, so all species were “netted together.” It was “more humble...and true” to believe that humans were “created from animals.” He devised a theory of creative evolution that he called “natural selection” (1837–39), working on it privately for 20 years, giving up faith* in the Bible and then in Christianity after his father’s and eldest daughter’s deaths.

His Origin of Species (1859) showed that he remained a strong theist, though in later years he sometimes considered himself “agnostic.” In The Descent of Man (1871), Darwin stated that “our minds refuse to accept” evolution “as the result of blind chance” and that “the highest form of religion” was “the grand idea of God hating sin and loving righteousness.” In accepting his body for burial, the church reclaimed its own. See also EVOLUTION AND CHRISTIANITY.

JAMES MOORE

Darwinism, a loose label for the various interpretations of Darwin’s* theories about evolution* and natural selection in Origin of Species (1859). His work posed many challenges to Christians and is still a subject of intense controversy (with Process* Christian theologians integrating evolution into their theology; Cobb).

For fundamentalists* and other literalist* interpreters of Scripture*, Darwinism conflicts with the creation story in Genesis*. For liberal Christians, geologists and biblical historians had already undermined the Genesis cosmology. For biologists, Darwin seemed to complete a program already victorious in the physical sciences: a rejection of final causation, or of any purposeful agency, in the explanation of physical processes. Physicists had continued to believe in a creator God who ordered the universe, but they did not include God in their descriptions of transformations in nature. Yet there was a great deal more dynamite in Darwin’s theory.

One reason is that Darwin developed a historical, not a mechanical, explanation. Thus Darwin seemed to be explaining the origin of new life forms in much the same language as the Bible. What God had seemed to do, “natural selection” did just as well, though the process depended on random variations. The theory was most disturbing for those people, including many theologians, who had always found the best “proof” for the existence of a God in the complex biosphere or in the wondrous adaptations noted by Darwin. One could still assert that a God was behind the evolutionary process, but such an assertion was gratuitous, with no explanatory role. For such people, theism itself was at stake.

Darwin’s theory was also threatening because it encompassed humans. For Christians, The Descent of Man was the most challenging of Darwin’s books. By narrowing the perceived differences between humans and other primates – the gradual evolution of language and self-consciousness explained human distinctiveness – Darwin seemed to leave no place for a human spirit or soul*. For Darwin and his very high estimate of higher mammals, this was not depreciating humans; but it was so to many critics. It seemed more so when some of Darwin's disciples, not always against his wishes, used his theory to support undisciplined forms of capitalism or heinous types of eugenics. In time the term "social Darwinism" often became identified with these purported social or economic implications of his evolutionary theory. See also BERLIN CONFERENCE; RACISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN WESTERN EUROPE.

PAUL K. CONKIN

David, king of Judah and Israel (10th c. BCE). In 1 Sam 16–31, David is presented as having been chosen by God to replace Saul* as the anointed king of the people of Israel*. After triumphing over the Philistine Goliath and escaping from Saul's wrath, he ruled as king of Judah, then of all Israel. After his conquest of Jerusalem*, which became his capital, David established a vast kingdom of Israel. Though condemned for his adulterous relationship with Bathsheba*, blamed for the death of her husband, Uriah, and politically weakened by the revolt of his son Absalom*, David was the recipient of a divine promise that his dynasty would never disappear.

Although there are no contemporary, extra-biblical sources on David's life, the general historical background of the early Iron Age in Israel (12th–10th c. BCE) has been described archaeologically. The rise of the Philistine city-states is well documented, although the biblical descriptions of David's wars with Israel's other neighbors may be shaped by later conditions. Yet the Tel Dan Inscription seems to indicate that, by the late 9th c. BCE, the name "David" was firmly associated with the ruling dynasty of Judah.

Throughout the books of Samuel and Kings, David's heirs are regarded as the sole legitimate, divinely appointed rulers of Israel, whose faithfulness or not to the covenant* profoundly influences Israel's fortunes. The expectation of a Davidic messiah* features prominently in prophetic literature (e.g. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel); in Psalms, Chronicles, and later Jewish literature, the image of David becomes more a religious archetype than a political model.

In the NT, Jesus is repeatedly presented as a direct descendant of the Davidic line and as a messiah of the Davidic type. Church fathers and particularly Augustine* regarded the life of David as an allegorical* or typological* precursor of the earthly ministry of Christ. NEIL SILBERMAN

Day, Dorothy (1897–1980), born in Brooklyn, New York, founder of the Catholic* Worker

Movement. Though active as a young adult in radical secular movements, she was drawn to Christianity. To express her gratitude for the birth of her daughter Tamar, she arranged for the infant's baptism in the Roman Catholic Church. Soon after, she herself became a Catholic (1927).

In 1932 Day met Peter Maurin, whose vision of a social order "in which it would be easier for men to be good" inspired her. In response to his proposal, she started a newspaper to publicize Catholic social teaching. On May 1, 1933, the first copies of the Catholic Worker were handed out on Union Square, Manhattan.

The paper soon led to the creation of the first Catholic Worker "house of hospitality" (185 such houses in 2006), where food was served to the homeless and unemployed, clothing made available, and a welcome given.

On her 75th birthday, the Jesuit magazine America devoted a special issue to Day as the individual who best exemplified "the aspiration and action of the American Catholic community during the past forty years." The Archdiocese of New York proposed her canonization. The Vatican has given her the title "Servant of God."

JIM FOREST

Deacon, Diaconate (from Gk diakonia, "service"; diakonein, "to serve"). Words based on diakonia appear 102 times in the NT, a frequency that indicates that the early followers of Jesus were deeply impressed by Jesus' person and ministry as ones of service. Diakonia is, in the NT, the major characteristic of all ministries; it does not refer simply to the ministry of a deacon.

By the middle of the 1st c. CE, particular individuals serving in a local church were called "deacons." In early Christian texts, the role of such deacons was neither uniform nor evident in every community. Early data indicate that the service of the deacon was in part liturgical. Deacons were officially ministers during the Eucharist*: reading the gospel, preparing the gifts, and assisting at Communion. Deacons were liturgical ministers in baptism*. Often, deacons went into the water with the one to be baptized and asked the person, "Do you believe in the Father? the Son? the Holy Spirit?" The deacon with his hand on the person's head submerged the person in the water. In a few recorded instances, a deacon also served as the minister of reconciliation and even celebrated the Eucharist and preached. Beyond these liturgical duties, the deacon was often the major pastoral minister (see Pastoral Care) for a Christian community, providing for the poor*, the sick, orphans, and others in need; he was frequently the financial administrator for a community. Christians generally had limited contact with the bishop or priest; on a daily basis, it was the Apostolic* Tradition (c215), which cites an actual ordination ritual. Thus "ordination" as a ministerial entry rite began only in the late 2nd c. (theological descriptions of earlier such ordinations are conjectural), and this in a specific geographical area (around Rome; not necessarily in other areas). It is only from the 4th c. that one can speak more generally about ordination rituals. In the Western Church, the pastoral ministry of deacon began to disappear starting in the 6th c., leaving the diaconate as an order through which one passed on the way to priesthood*. Only a few permanent deacons are mentioned in church literature from the 8th to the 12th c. In the Eastern* Church, the role of the deacon remained strong down to the present age – a role primarily liturgical but not exclusively so.

The renewal of the permanent diaconate after Vatican* II is not a renewal of the diaconate as it existed in the ancient church. The contemporary permanent diaconate has been established to meet the pastoral needs of the third millennial church – pastoral needs that reflect the liturgical, pastoral, and social needs of the Catholic Church today.

Two issues remain the same. First, all ministries in the Christian Church center on Jesus the deacon, the one who came to serve and not be served (Mark 10:45) and the one who washed the feet of the disciples (John 13). These words and actions of Jesus are the benchmark for all Christian ministries: episcopal, presbyteral, diaconal, and lay.

Second, pastoral needs rather than a theological position have been the seedbed from which all church ministries have developed. The structures and forms of church ministries have changed in the course of history in response to specific pastoral needs. Ordained ministries, in their historical development, show adaptation. The current permanent diaconate needs to measure itself by the actual and serious pastoral needs of present contexts.

KENAN B. OSBORNE, OFM

Deaconess, title for female deacons. In the earliest church period, women were called deacons*, the same title given to men (Rom 16:1–2; probably 1 Tim 3:11); they were most likely delegates or representatives of local churches and later assistants to church leaders. Pliny the Younger (Letter 10.96 to Trajan) refers to two slave ministrae in Bithynia-Pontus, who probably have a similar role. From the 3rd c. in Syria, there was a distinctive office for women, as described in the Didascalia (3rd c.) and Apostolic Constitutions (4th c.). The office flourished in the East in the 4th, 5th, and 6th c., witnessed by numerous texts and funerary inscriptions, and survived beyond that. The titles diakonos and diakonissa, with occasional variants such as diakone, seem to have been fairly interchangeable, sometimes varying even within the same text. The office appeared in the West only rarely beginning in the 6th c. in monastic contexts.

The liturgical role of deaconesses consisted primarily of assistance at the baptism* of women, since baptism entailed immersion of the naked candidate and anointing of various parts of the body. It was deemed improper for a male bishop or presbyter to perform this ritual. Women without the title most likely assisted in places where there were no female deacons.

The pastoral role of female deacons was much broader. They prepared women and children for baptism and did the catechetical follow-up afterward. They undertook pastoral visitation of sick women and provided protection and support to female penitents and pilgrims. They served in monasteries as liturgical leaders in the singing of the Divine* Office and sometimes as superior, though the two offices were always kept distinct.

The sacramental ordination* of deaconesses has sometimes been questioned. They do not seem to have been ordained for sacramental ministry, but the language of ordination is generally used in reference to them, e.g. Canon 15 of the Council of Chalcedon*, which legislates that they are not to be ordained until the age of 40. The usually recognized term for ordination, cheirotonia, is used in this text. While most legislation either presupposes or states plainly the expectation that deaconesses will be celibate (virgins or widows*), some surviving funerary inscriptions place them in family relationships. See also BASILINA; JUSTINA; LAMPADION; MARTHANA; OLYMPIAS; PHOEBE; SABINIANA; SOPHIA ("SECOND PHOEBE"); VIRGINITY, THEOLOGY OF.

CAROLYN OSIEK

Dead, Prayers for the. Praying for the dead is controversial among Christians, both historically and today. At the heart of the disagreement is defining the relationship between the living and the dead, whether the living can have any effect on the dead, and whether the dead can change.

Evidence of praying for the dead in the early church is ambiguous; the extant materials can be interpreted in different ways. The evidence is as varied as early graffiti at martyr* shrines that asks for the martyrs to keep the living in mind (in habite mente), the early-3rd-c. martyr account of Perpetua* containing a story of efficacious prayer for her dead brother, and Augustine's* differentiating between the dead who remember us before God and the dead for whom we pray.

The practices of praying to the saints* and for other dead multiplied in many ways in the second millennium, including the articulation of the doctrine of purgatory*, the saying of (Requiem*) Masses for the dead, and an increasing emphasis of the dependence of the dead on the living.

In the 16th c., a primary protest of Luther* was the misuse of these practices, especially indulgences*. Many Protestants claimed the dead were beyond change and engagement with the world, thus making prayers for the dead irrelevant. They forbade prayers to the saints* because they were a denial of the sole mediatorship* of Christ; thus a chasm developed between the living and the dead, which was challenged by the Catholic* Renewal.

In the 20th and early 21st c., the harsh dualism of Protestant and Catholic stances has been diversified by ecumenical agreements and inculturation*, especially as Christianity is shaped by cultures where ancestor* veneration has expanded categories of thinking. At the same time, the veneration of saints has found new adherents beyond Catholicism and has been influenced by interfaith conversations.

LIZETTE LARSON-MILLER

Deadly Sins. Gregory* I's list of deadly sins – pride, covetousness, lust, envy, gluttony, anger, and sloth – draws on Evagrius* of Pontus's eight "evil thoughts" quoted by John Cassian*.

Dead Sea Scrolls. In 1947 Arab Bedouins found an ancient Jewish library in a cave on the northwestern shores of the Dead Sea. Subsequently, 10 other caves were found to contain scrolls belonging to a group of Jews living nearby and identified by many scholars as Essenes*, who were "prepar[ing] in the wilderness the way of the Lord" (Isa 40:3), i.e. God's coming as the final act in the process of fulfilling the promises in the Scriptures*.

No fewer than 930 scrolls (dating from c250 BCE to 68 CE) belonged to the library of this Jewish community, which was led by a prophetic figure, an anonymous "Righteous Teacher" revered for his genius and revelatory power. Following his lead, the community emphasized that God was trustworthy and just and had established "a new* covenant" in Israel: the community living at Qumran*.

The scrolls, hidden from the conquering Roman armies led by Vespasian (c68 CE), represent not only the beliefs, ideas, and aspirations of the Qumran community, but also those of other Jews of Galilee* and Samaria*, and were held by Jews contemporaneous with Jesus of Nazareth.

The Dead Sea Scrolls include the following:

1. All the books of the HB except Esther. The large Isaiah Scroll proves that biblical books had been carefully copied over a period of more than a thousand years. Some scrolls appear to be expansions of the Bible or "Rewritten Bible." The canon* was not yet closed (c70 CE); scribes continued to alter, expand, or abbreviate the biblical texts.
2. Apocrypha* and Pseudepigrapha* in Hebrew and Aramaic previously known only in late medieval copies, notably the Damascus Document, Books of Enoch* or 1 Enoch, and Jubilees*.
3. Previously unknown works indicative of the life of the Qumran community, most importantly the Rule of the Community; the Thanksgiving Hymns; a scroll about the final battle between "the Sons of Light" and "the Sons of Darkness," the War Scroll; an explanation of how to interpret Torah, entitled "Some Works of the Torah"; and commentaries of the prophets, the Pesharim.

The authors of the Pesharim* (1st c. BCE) stressed the fulfillment of the prophecies of the HB in events surrounding the community and within it. These interpretations, inspired by the Holy Spirit*, focused on how the history of the group reflected and fulfilled prophecies, demonstrating God's trustworthiness. God did not disclose to the prophets the "secret mysteries"; now God revealed to the Righteous Teacher all the mysteries of the words of the prophets (Habakkuk Pesher).

The Jewish group at Qumran emphasized the Holy* Spirit, anticipated the coming of the Messiah* (sometimes two messiahs, a priestly and a kingly messiah), and emphasized that their time was “the latter days,” or the end of time. They stressed that all humanity was divided into the Sons of Light and the Sons of Darkness. The Sons of Light, the Qumran group and other Essenes, were the elect* of God and drank salvific water that provided full or eternal life. This prophetic group first conceptualized the Holy Spirit as separate from God, the notion of two messiahs, the doctrine of double predestination*, and the Spirit-inspired interpretation of Scripture*.

This group of Essenes was similar to the group of Jewish followers of Jesus. Both Jewish groups lived in the Holy Land about the same time (although the Essenes had already existed for 150 years). Both emphasized the Holy Spirit, the Messiah, and the prophecies fulfilled in their own time and group. Both groups imagined a future, not far off, when the wicked would be punished and the righteous rewarded. The Jewish followers of Jesus, however, believed that the Messiah had come and was Jesus of Nazareth.

John the Baptizer clearly had some relation with the Qumran Essenes, but he was not one of them. Jesus was neither an Essene nor anti-Essene. His teaching indicates that he was intermittently positively and negatively influenced by the Essenes. The Gospel of John* was influenced, indirectly or directly, by the Essenes. In sum, the Dead Sea Scrolls have revolutionized our perceptions of the origins of Christianity. The Essenes, while not the precursors of the Christians, did influence Jesus and his followers in significant and symbolic ways.

JAMES H. CHARLESWORTH

Dean, originally, title of an official supervising 10 persons in a monastery; now applied to various kinds of subordinate officials.

DEATH, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Death in the Bible and Early Patristic Literature

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practice

Death, Christian Views of, in Africa

- Death, Christian Views of, in Asia
- Death, Christian Views of, in Latin America
- Death, Christian Views of, in Latin America: The Caribbean Cult of the Dead
- Death, Christian Views of, in North America
- Death, Christian Views of, in Western Europe
- Death, Christian Views of, among Western Feminists

1) Introductory Entry

Death in the Bible and Early Patristic Literature. Early in the OT, Israel’s understanding of death was shaped by its covenantal* relationship with God, seen as the giver of life. Since death seemed to be a part of God’s creation*, it could be accepted as a natural culmination of life. Persons who lived a long life and had children to perpetuate their names died a “good death.”

But death meant separation from God. The dead went to Sheol*, a shadowy underworld beyond God’s immediate care. This fate seemed contrary to God’s graciousness. The tension became worse when a personal rather than a communal relationship with God gained ascendancy (Jer 31; Ezek 18). Should not the righteous be rewarded and the wicked punished? This belief collapsed experientially (Job* and Ecclesiastes*), leading to a belief in life after death where the righteous would get their reward. Yet this idea remained nebulous, even in the direct references to something like a resurrection (Dan 12:2–3; Isa 26:19).

In the NT, death is connected causally with sin*. “The wages of sin is death” (Rom 6:23). Paul postulates that through Adam sin came into the world and with sin came death (Rom 5:12). Death cuts a wide swath. It refers to physical cessation but, before this, to anything that diminishes life. It also refers to a cosmic power that subjects all creation to futility and decay (Rom 8:20). Paul suggests different views of the link between sin and death: To sin is to live by the flesh, which is mortal. To sin is to be separated from God, the source of life; this separation yields death. To sin is to incur God's wrath; death is the punishment. Death is the last enemy of humankind and of God to be destroyed (1 Cor 15:26).

According to the NT, Christ takes away the power of sin and of death. Believers still die a physical death, but in all other ways they are alive to new life in everlasting communion with God.

Paul's complex understanding of death and sin led to different views. Within the main trend of the Western Church, Irenaeus*, Augustine*, and Luther* believed that turning away from God (sin as guilt) eventuates in death (as punishment), from which humankind can be rescued only by Christ. The Eastern Orthodox* Church, following Basil* the Great, John* Chrysostom, Athanasius*, and Cyril* of Alexandria, views death as God's enemy, resulting from separation from life with God due to sin as a disease. See also ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER; REDEMPTION.

LEROY H. ADEN

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Death, Christian Views of, in Africa. In African* Religion, "life" and "death" are not mutually exclusive. Death does not end an individual's personality; life goes beyond the grave as the dead become ancestors*, "living dead," who remain alive for the living.

In African cultures, funeral rites are community affairs; visits are paid to the bereaved family by the community. The day before the funeral, the corpse is brought home. A night vigil takes place, often until morning. The dead must be mourned in order to create an environment of tranquility and harmony for both the living and the dead. After the funeral, all wash their hands in cold water, washing away death's "coldness" before the funeral meal, which is a celebration of life and a return to "normal life."

Christians observe these traditional African rites, with their related view of death, introducing Christian perspectives that vary from one denomination to another and from one African culture to another. The night vigil is a time to convey Christian messages, sing vibrant hymns, and share pastoral care that brings healing to the community. The funeral meal is celebrated in the spirit of the Eucharist. Death is sad, but it is not shameful*, when through such rites those who grieve are assured of God's mercy and God's endless glory.

PAUL JOHN ISAAK

Death, Christian Views of, in Asia.

Three dimensions converge in Christian views of death in Asia. First and most basic is the biblical view that acknowledges the reality of death as part of the human condition, which is affected by sin*. God created the life of all beings, and Jesus Christ, through his Resurrection, saves them from the power of death. The Spirit empowers the life of all beings in the universe, individually and collectively.

Second, this biblical view enters into conversation with views of death in Asian cultures and religions, including the Hindu* view of death as a natural process in the cycle of birth, life, death, and rebirth (samsara) and of liberation (moksha) from this cycle; the Buddhist* view of death as a point of awakening from the continuous cycle of death and rebirth in order to renounce and overcome the futile life of desire (and thus attain nirvana); the Confucian* view that "life and death are determined by Heaven" and that a life of compassion, justice, propriety, and wisdom is essential, thereby emphasizing life rather than death (T'ai Ping, "Great Peace"); and the view of Daoism*, which seeks deliverance, immortality, and the state of "living in eternity" in oneness with the Dao.

Third, the scientific and biomedical view of death as the permanent end of the life of a biological organism has evolved with advances in science and technology. Transhumanists, who believe that life (health and longevity) and death (end of the biological mechanism) can be managed by technology, are now seeking to justify their aims in religious terms. A convergence between Asian religious views on death and the modern biomedical understanding of death is desirable on religious grounds in order to deal with biomedical* ethical issues.

Asian Christian theologians view life and death holistically and integrally, and are struggling to understand them in light of war*, political oppression*, poverty* and hunger, disease, violent social conflict, religious cultural conflict, and biological and ecological destruction.

KIM YONG-BOCK

Death, Christian Views of, in Latin America. As in the Caribbean, in the popular psyche in Latin America life and death are inextricably intertwined. The living already experience death. Preoccupation with death is prevalent, and the downturns and sufferings of life are seen as its intimations.

The Spanish colonizers brought with them the austere Roman Catholicism of the Inquisition* and the penitential devotion (see Penance and Forgiveness) characterized by escarmientos, punishments of the flesh. Thus there is much comfort in the sight of a profusely bleeding Christ, fully identified with the human reality of a living death. In death one's destiny is concretized.

Death is also present among the living. In death relatives become saints* in the family circle, and their last wishes have power over the living. They are frequently referred to in quotidian conversations and are considered efficient agents in prayers to God. Their remains are, at times, venerated. In this way they seem not to be dead at all. When life and death are thus intimately conjoined, however, life is devalued.

HEROLD D. WEISS

Death, Christian Views of, in Latin America: The Caribbean Cult of the Dead. The earliest narratives about slavery* in the Americas frequently note blacks' determination to celebrate the funerals of deceased companions. Father Dutertre (17th c.) reported that slaves walked great distances at night to participate in songs and dances at wakes. This devotion did not make any sense to their masters. But if slavery is a social death, the cult of the dead is for the slave a symbolic negation of this social death. Masters sought to reduce funerals to a minimum, signifying that slaves remained merchandise even in death. From this perspective, the cult of the dead is a radical opposition to slavery. Thus one finds this practice throughout the Americas.

The funerary rituals last several days and even years, because of the belief that the dead (their spirits) remain in water* and protect the living members of their family. The rituals link dead individuals to the ancestors*, thus to African divinities and to lost Africa. In the French West Indies, November 2 serves as a day when the community is reconstituted through a dialogue between the living and the dead, and all the cemeteries are illuminated. In Haiti, the November 2 celebration is a national holiday involving the worship of Gede (death divinities), including people possessed in the streets and in the cemeteries. See also THE PRESENT CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA.

LAËNNEC HURBON

Death, Christian Views of, in North America. Like the biblical understanding, the contemporary North American view of death ranges from seeing it as a natural event to seeing it as a catastrophe of human existence. The common thread is that death is not just physical cessation but a wholistic shutting down of life.

Contemporary theologians give more attention to collective death than to individual death by focusing on the end of this world. Some believe that this transformation will come within human history; others that the end means the destruction of the present world in favor of a kingdom beyond human history. Most North American theologians favor the Hebraic understanding of person as an animated body. Thus if they believe in life after death, they believe in the resurrection* of the body*. Yet popular Christian beliefs often favor the Greek idea that a person has a mortal body and an immortal soul*.

Some contemporary North American theologians put the emphasis on what God will do at the end of time to overcome death, while others see Christ's suffering and death as an identification with, and God's salutary answer to, our suffering and death.

LEROY H. ADEN

Death, Christian Views of, in Western Europe.

Christ's* redemption of humans from sin* and from death is the distinctive doctrine emphasized by Christianity according to Western European Christians. They note that, in the HB, death confines all, regardless of character, to a neutral land of the dead, Sheol (Hades), and that during Christ's "descent into hell*," he experienced physical death, invading this land, defeating death, and rescuing the righteous. Furthermore, according to the apocryphal* Gospel of Nicodemus (4th–6th c.), during his descent, Christ cast the wicked dead into Tartarus, abolished Sheol, and separated salvation* from damnation*. Until the second* coming, after a person's physical death there is an interim existence, purgatory*, when the soul* exists separately until, at the general resurrection* of the flesh, the person is reconstituted and judged. While Eastern Christians, citing 1 Pet 3:19 and 4:6, long maintained the possibility of postmortem expiation and even conversion, Protestants deny the existence of purgatory*. Calvin* interpreted this experience as accepting the divine wrath* owed by all humans and a momentary near isolation from life and God*. At the Last Judgment*, there is a possibility of new life, life after death, but also the second death, death after death (Rev. 20:14, 21:8). Damnation* is the only real death. See also ETERNITY; JUDGMENT.

ALAN E. BERNSTEIN

Death, Christian Views of, among Western Feminists.

In her work, culminating in Foundations of Violence, Grace Jantzen outlines the fascination with death, destruction, and violence* that has characterized Western culture from classical antiquity through Christianity and into contemporary postmodern thought. This emphasis results in a repudiation of all that is corporeal and in the present – the body*, the senses, sexuality*, and sensuality – and perpetuates a mystical fascination with worlds beyond the here and now.

In her elaborate genealogy of this Western preoccupation, Jantzen demonstrates that this "necrophilia" is gendered. Our death obsession is largely a male symbolic construct and preoccupation that seeks to repress and veil a masculinist fear and anxiety of the maternal body specifically and of female sexuality generally.

Feminist philosophers of religion like Jantzen refuse this obsession with death and destruction and instead focus on forces of "natality" that celebrate beauty, desire, and the creative impulse over Western "necrophilia." Life and new creation trump violence, death, and sacrifice*; newness, rebirth, transformation, and even redemption are essential to human flourishing. They further argue that unless the West learns to cherish natality, and the feminine symbolic, our obsession with death and destruction will continue to have real consequences in the world and eventually bring about our demise. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRIES; THEOSIS, DEIFICATION.

KATHLEEN O'GRADY

Death of God Theology, from the Greek myth of the dying and rising God ("We don't kill gods, they die") to Nietzsche's* "God is dead" ("We have killed God") through Luther* and Hegel*. The rhetoric of the theme triggered liturgical or historical rather than theological treatment. Conceptualizing the claim that, in God, the Father suffered the death of the Son (3rd c.), patripassianism* was declared heretical; it downgraded the Son's salvific work ("He dies for us"). This condemnation marked the end of an era. The Greco-Roman pantheon and Jewish Temple had collapsed, pointing to a metaphysic* Trinity* and its essentialist soteriological-ontological theism (God as Highest Being; see Heidegger, Martin; Metaphysics and Christian Theology). Given Jesus' option for the primacy of the Kingdom* of God over salvation*, ontological theism was initially challenged in the 1960s by Death of God theology: end-time (eschatic) existence consists not in changing worlds, but in changing the world in which the Word has become flesh.

Highest Being or Clockmaker, a stopgap God is useless and superfluous, an idol*. As with Luther and Calvin's* predestination*, the believer is freed from God as well as by God. There is no temple in the New Jerusalem. The useless and superfluous God is dead. Still, the Death of God theologies maintained by others, for whom we are saved from God rather than by God, appear to be a secular reappraisal of faith wrapped in apocalyptic or humanistic garments.

GABRIEL VAHANIAN

Death Penalty (the), one form of the state's claimed "right to kill," is a punitive form of killing for violation of a rule or law. It has never been completely separable from other uses of state-sanctioned violence, militarily (for war*) or politically (for removing rivals to state power).

New Testament teachings of Jesus on love* and forgiveness* and against revenge, and early followers' vulnerability to lethal force amid the Roman Empire, instilled in them a resistance to Christian support for or exercise of the death penalty. When Christians assumed imperial power (4th c.), however, they codified, sanctified, and wielded lethal and brutal force for centuries, authorizing state killing for both punitive and military purposes. It was also used politically against "heretics*" who threatened religious-political orders.

Christian resistance to the death penalty never died out, persisting among members of repressed, nonviolent heritages: Waldenses*, English radicals, Anabaptists*, Quakers*, and African slaves. Jesus' teachings, and his own death by imperial execution, were used to criticize Christian support of the death penalty and state violence. Christian resistance was strengthened by later, secular currents pressing for abolition of the death penalty. Most formal Christian Church organizations today oppose the death penalty, even if a large number of Christians still support it. See also IMAGE OF GOD.

MARK LEWIS TAYLOR

Deborah. Alluding to "word," "deed" (Heb dabar), and the useful, busy "bee," Deborah clearly evokes positive connotations. She is a leader in Judg 4, which tells of Barak's and her victory over Sisera and his army, and in Judg 5, where Deborah is portrayed as singing and celebrating victory, a rare instance of lyrical poetry in the Bible. One of the few well-known women among biblical characters, she is unique in embodying everything a major or minor judge is supposed to do: achieve military victory, rule, and perform justice, respectively. In Deborah, epic and lyrical poetry come together.

MIEKE BAL

Decalogue. See TEN COMMANDMENTS, DECALOGUE.

Decius, Roman emperor (249–51). After defeating Philip the Arabian, reputed to be a Christian sympathizer, Decius upheld old Roman traditions and civic religion. He required all citizens and noncitizens, males and females to make sacrifices to the traditional deities and obtain certificates. Christians were not required to abandon Christianity, but when they refused to perform the required rituals they were persecuted. The Decian persecutions*, the first to be empire-wide, created a major dispute within the church, centered around Cyprian's* requirement of strict penance* for the lapsed* and those who secured false certificates of sacrifice.

Decolonizing Theology. Theology and colonialism* have been closely related throughout history, although their connection has been investigated only recently. Many of the most significant Christian theological developments took place simultaneously with significant shifts and developments in the political structures of empire and colonialism.

One of the earliest christological confessions, "Jesus is Lord," developed in the context of the Roman Empire (mid-1st c. CE), when all its subjects were to assert that the Roman emperor was Lord. The Councils of Nicaea* (325) and Chalcedon* (451), which shaped the doctrines of the Trinity* and of Christ*, were convened and supported by Roman emperors. Anselm* of Canterbury wrote his well-known Cur Deus homo as the second archbishop of Canterbury, a position instituted by the Normans after the 1066 Norman Conquest. Martin Luther's* 16th-c. Reformation in Germany, and perhaps even his doctrine of justification*, cannot be imagined without the changing politics of empire in Europe. While the opposition by Bartolomé de las* Casas (d1566) to the Spanish Conquest is well known, his theology nevertheless proposes colonialist models that, though milder, were realized in the 18th- to 19th-c. colonialisms of other European nations. The father of liberal theology, Friedrich Schleiermacher* (d1834), was deeply interested in and influenced by European colonialism, as was recently recognized. The relation between the works of 20th-c. theologians and various postcolonial and neocolonial forms of empire remains to be clarified.

The major insight that requires fresh study of these phenomena is that the power of empire and colonialism is not limited to politics and economics. If empire and colonialism have an impact on all areas of life, including the realm of ideas, the exploration of relations between theology and colonialism becomes imperative. This insight does not imply, however, that empire and colonialism are able to control all aspects of life and of theology all the time. Decolonizing theology therefore faces at least two tasks: (1) to explore how theological thought is shaped by empire and to offer a critique; and (2) to identify which aspects of theology resist assimilation by colonial powers and to highlight tensions with these powers and instances of resistance. Such tensions and resistance potentially exist even in the above-mentioned theologies developed in close proximity to empire. As a result of these investigations, theological moves that push beyond empire and colonialism can be identified, and fresh understandings of the contributions of theology to the history of the world emerge. See also COLONIALISM AND IMPERIALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; POST-COLONIALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

JOERG RIEGER

Decretal, Papal, a pope's letter containing a decision regarding a matter of discipline written in response to a specific question or appeal.

Decretals, False (Pseudo-Isidorean), a collection of documents ascribed to Isidore Mercator, including genuine and forged canons* of councils and papal decretals*. Written in France around 850 in order to enhance the bishops' independence from both secular rulers and metropolitans*, the decretals authorized them to appeal directly to the pope. First quoted in 852, they were welcomed in Rome (864) because they enhanced the pope's authority both in the church and in relation to secular rulers. See also POPES, ROMAN CATHOLIC, AND THE PAPACY.

Dedication of Churches, setting aside of buildings used exclusively for worship; in high-liturgical traditions, marked by celebration of the Eucharist* and blessings outside and inside the building.

de Foucauld, Charles Eugène (1858–1916), desert hermit. Born in Strasbourg to an arisocratic family, he served in the French army, joined the Cistercian* Trappists, and went on pilgrimage to the Holy Land. There he conceived of a new model of religious life based on the "hidden life" of Jesus in Nazareth. In Algeria he pursued this life, bearing witness to the gospel among his poor Muslim neighbors until his assassination by Islamic insurgents. His spirituality later inspired the Little Brothers of Jesus and other "fraternities." He was beatified as a martyr by Pope Benedict XVI (2005). See also HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: NORTH AFRICA.

ROBERT ELLSBERG

Deification. See THEOSIS, DEIFICATION.

Deism, Enlightenment* emphasis on God as known through nature. It usually regards revelation* as a reiteration of what can be gained by reason*; it views clergy as unnecessary and parasitic, and God as acting through nature as a whole, without special providence.

de Marillac, Louise (1591–1660), wife, mother, religious founder of the Daughters of Charity (with Vincent* de Paul), 1633; canonized, 1934. In her widowhood, she turned to spiritual pursuits. Vincent de Paul was her spiritual director (c1624), and he increasingly relied on her to visit and maintain the spirit of his Confraternities of Charity. She also guided the formation of young rural women in their service of the poor* (assistance, education, hospital nursing, work with orphans and prisoners), at first in Paris, but eventually most of France. Her spirituality centered on a meditation on the centrality of union with Jesus crucified.

JOHN E. RYBOLT

Demiurge, Greek word for "artisan" used by Plato* and then by early Christians for God as forming the world. Today, commonly used negatively (as among the Gnostics) to refer to the inferior deity they associated with the material world. See also GNOSTICISM.

Democracy and Christianity. The roots of Western democracy can be traced to ancient Athens and Renaissance Italy, but it developed as the polity of modernity only after the European Enlightenment. The relationship between democracy and Christianity is historically ambiguous, dependent on the forms of Christianity that are present. Although democracy is secular in character, four trajectories within Christian tradition have made significant contributions to the development of its theory and praxis, as follows:

1. Notions such as subsidiarity* and the common good*, which emerged when medieval Roman Catholicism brought Christianity into creative interaction with Aristotelian* political philosophy
2. The Calvinist* tradition, which emphasized the need for mutual responsibility before God within a covenantal* relationship of the people of a society.
3. Heirs of the Radical* Reformation, English Nonconformity*, and liberal* Protestantism who affirmed the dignity of the individual, human* rights, freedom of conscience*, separation of church* and state, and religious toleration
4. The Christian Socialist* tradition, which stressed human solidarity, egalitarian participation in the democratic process, and economic* justice* as the basis for the sustainability of democracy

Each of these trajectories rejects tyrannical government in its own way. All acknowledge that human sinfulness* leads to political corruption, even in democracy, although some are more optimistic about human nature than others; and all eschew selfish individualism and seek to develop forms of community as the place within which human beings find fulfillment.

Although Christianity has provided many of the building blocks for democratic theory and contributed to its practical development around the world, Christianity as such does not unequivocally support one particular political system, whether a democracy or not. The Anglo-Saxon world more readily views democracy as related to Christian values (e.g. human rights). Yet democracy has inherent problems. As continental Europe suspected until well after World War II, it can be the harbinger of anarchy and revolution, and it is open to corruption of all kinds. But this does not mean that all systems of government are equally acceptable. Especially after the 20th-c. experience of Nazi and Stalinist totalitarianism, ecumenical Christianity now appears to be irrevocably committed to the retrieval of democracy as essential to its vision of a just world order. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER; POLITICAL

STUDIES OF CHRISTIANITY; POLITICAL THEOLOGY.

JOHN W. DE GRUCHY

Demonic Powers. See DEVIL, SATAN, DEMONS, AND DEMONIC POWERS.

Demonization. In the original sense, demonization means the reinterpretation of pagan* deities as demons by Christian theologians, foremost regarding polytheistic* religious systems in ancient Egypt, Greece, and Rome, as well as among early medieval Germanic, Celtic, and Slavic peoples. In the early modern period, deities of Native* American and Asian peoples were still demonized by Christian conquerors and missionaries.

Other monotheistic* religions were not demonized. However, as Islamic and Jewish believers were not members of the Christian community, they were associated with crime or conjurations in periods of crisis (see Islam and Christianity Cluster; Judaism and Christianity Cluster). The suspicion of support from demons in their supposed evildoing applied to Christian minorities as well. The gatherings of Cathars* and of Waldenses* were interpreted as devil worship. According to the persecution handbook (Practica Inquisitionis heretice pravitatis, c1320) of the French Dominican inquisitor Bernardo Gui, heretics were generally to be seen as allies of demons (see Inquisition).

The most striking example of demonization is the labeling as demonic in origin of popular beliefs in divination, fortune-telling, amulets, and magic. According to Augustine*, these things or acts require at least an implicit pact with the devil*, since believers or practitioners expect an effect they could not produce naturally, and hence implicitly expect demonic support. Augustine's theory of the implicit pact was approved by Thomas Aquinas* and put into practice by late medieval inquisitors, as noted by Henry Kramer (aka Heinrich Institoris), author of The Witches' Hammer (Malleus Maleficarum, 1486), a book that served as the theological foundation of witch-hunting in Europe.

Even contemporaries noticed that marginal people were the main targets of these prosecutions and that they were held responsible for all kinds of misfortune, particularly when moral entrepreneurs or "crusading reformers" (as sociologist Howard Becker has called them) took the initiative.

Demonization is not unique to Christianity or monotheistic religious systems; it also occurs among polytheistic civilizations even if they are open to accepting and absorbing foreign deities.

As an analytical term, “demonization” means the stigmatization of outsiders or minority groups. It prepares the ground for legal prosecution, mob violence, or war. See also DEVIL, SATAN, DEMONS, AND DEMONIC POWERS; WITCHCRAFT, WITCHES.

WOLFGANG BEHRINGER

Demons, in the Greek world, intermediate beings between earth and heaven; in Christian theology, fallen angels* who tempt humans to rebel against God, and evil spirits with the power to possess humans. See also DEVIL, SATAN, DEMONS, AND DEMONIC POWERS.

Demythologization. Bultmann’s* project of using existentialist categories to interpret critically the mythological thinking that frames the NT. As defined by the history* of religion school, mythological thinking is prescientific; the natural world is the theater for supernatural agencies: demons*, evil spirits, angels*, and gods. Bultmann further argued that the NT proclamation about Jesus is framed in Jewish apocalyptic* and Gnostic* mythologies. Because these past mythologies are not Christian and are mutually contradictory, theologians should elucidate their inner meaning: the intuition that our familiar world does not have its ground in itself and that we desire redemption* from guilt and the anxiety that precedes death*. Bultmann argued that Heidegger’s* conceptuality is most adequate for demythologizing because of its philosophical description of human beings as unique in being called by conscience to come out of their “inauthentic” preoccupation with worldly concerns and take responsibility for themselves and their freedom. See also BULTMANN, RUDOLF.

VAN A. HARVEY

Denmark. Arian* and Celtic* Christianity had some influence in Denmark before the 9th c. through Viking warriors who sailed as far as Canada and the Caspian Sea (late 8th–mid-10th c.). The Catholic mission began in 826 with the German monk Ansgar*. Christianization and development of the Danish nation were closely connected (10th–11th c.). Local landlords and monks built 1,800 stone churches in the 13th c. Competition between Roman Catholic bishops and kings came to an end in 1536, when King Christian III expropriated the church and turned it into an Evangelical Lutheran* state church. Since then the church has been governed by the state, although it was renamed a Folk* Church in the 1849 democratic constitution and local congregational boards were instituted (1903). Denmark was unique in Nordic countries in never experiencing the triangular split between state, church, and people. During the cultural and Pietist* religious revivals (19th c.), with Grundtvig* as its leading figure, one-quarter of Danes became “professing” Christians.

Today, 70–75% of Danes are “Culture* Christians,” who use the church for baptism, confirmation, and funerals and sometimes for weddings, though without personal relation to congregational life, creed, or Bible. “Churched Christians” (10–15%) attend church services and activities more or less regularly, and a few “individual Christians” personally relate to Christianity without attending church. Twelve bishops (including one in Greenland and one in the Faeroe Islands) formally supervise more than 2,000 parishes with pastors who are state civil servants and are required to have a master of theology from one of the state universities.

With only 2% of church members attending church on a normal Sunday, Denmark has the world’s lowest religious participation in weekly services. With little competition from the small “free churches,” the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark is thus the weakest “monopoly church” in the world. In the 20th c., old folk religiosity in modern dressing and, through immigration, Islam have become visible alternatives to Christianity. Thus church leaders have become aware that the church can remain Christian only as a church in mission – a difficult proposition when the church is governed by the secular state and most of its members are Culture Christians. See also LUTHERANISM CLUSTER: IN NORDIC COUNTRIES.

Statistics: Population (2003): 5.3 million (M). Christians, 4.6 M, 86.7% (Evangelical Lutherans, 4.5 M; other Protestants, 0.03 M; Roman Catholics, 0.03 M); Muslims, 0.2 M, 3.7%; non-religious, 0.45 M; 8.8%. (Source: Danish Governmental Statistics, 2003.)

HANS RAUN IVERSEN

Denomination, a self-designation first used by English Dissenters* (Presbyterian*, Congregationalist*, and Baptist*) in the early 18th c. to suggest both their differences and their acknowledgment of each other; now often used, in an ecumenical spirit, to designate any church tradition.

Denominationalism, form of religious organization that is preeminent in the USA. Denominations differ from the classic models of church* and sect* in three ways. (1) They presuppose no established religion and put all religious bodies on the same footing. (2) They are both voluntaristic* (like sects) and inclusive in membership (like churches), and do not normally posit an absolute or exclusive claim to possess the truth. (3) Although they are often competitive with respect to membership, they can cooperate with other denominations for broader purposes. Denominationalism emerged in 18th-c. colonial America and became dominant with the collapse of the colonial established churches (19th c. in the USA; later elsewhere in the world).
ROBERT BRUCE MULLIN

Dentière, Marie (1495–c1561), Reformer. Daughter of a noble family (d'Ennetières), she left her Augustinian convent and joined French Reformers in Strasbourg. She married Simon Robert, and the couple followed William Farel* to the Swiss Valais (1528), where she participated in her husband's ministry. Widowed (1533), she married Antoine Froment. The couple moved to Geneva (1535) and worked to establish the Reformed* religion. In August 1535, she exhorted nuns in the Poor* Clares' Convent to leave their order and renounce celibacy. When the Council of 200 exiled Farel and John Calvin* (1538), Dentière wrote a letter to Marguerite* de Navarre, which was published in Geneva (1539) as a Very Useful Epistle. The Epistle's dedication defends women's rights to interpret and teach the Bible. Its "Defense of Women" presents exemplary women from the OT and NT and refutes the notion that women are the source of evil. The final section affirms salvation* through faith* alone, attacks the Mass*, and excoriates Roman Catholic clergy and the papacy. In a 1546 letter to Farel, Calvin reported a confrontation with Dentière, who had been publicly preaching in Geneva. A 1561 copy of Calvin's sermon on 1 Tim 2:8–12 carries a preface in which Dentière criticizes extravagant clothing and cosmetics.

MARY B. MCKINLEY

Deontic, Deontological Ethics (from Gk to deon), the approach to ethics* that emphasizes obligation and duty; a choice is right when it conforms to a moral norm. Deontological ethics calls for a quest for basic moral principles, which many Christians envision as a law* – God's will as revealed in Scriptures* (and/or church tradition*). Yet for Kant* and many theologians, conformity to a moral norm should not be confused with legalism. Through regard for others ("harm not"), pure practical reason both establishes what morality unconditionally demands and determines the will to do it. See also CONSEQUENTIALIST ETHICS; PERFECTIONIST ETHICS.

de Paul, Vincent. See VINCENT DE PAUL.

Descartes, René (1596–1650), mathematician, scientist, philosopher. A key figure in the scientific revolution, Descartes sought to reconcile scientific inquiry with Roman Catholic doctrine. He invented the Cartesian coordinate system and founded analytic geometry. His rationalist epistemology shaped the great debates of modern Western philosophy. The son of a councilor at the Parliament of Brittany, he studied at the prestigious Jesuit* college of La Flèche (1606–14), earned a law degree (Poitiers, 1615–16), joined the army of Prince Maurice of Nassau, then of Maximilian of Bavaria (1618–19), took up residence in Paris (1625), settled in the Netherlands (1628–49), and died in Stockholm in the service of Queen Christina of Sweden (1649–50).

With Mersenne, he rejected final causes and vitalist elements of Aristotelian* natural philosophy, seeking to explain physical phenomena in mechanical terms. However, intimidated by Rome's censure of Galileo* (1633), he chose not to publish his mechanist account of the world and human physiology. Instead, he summarized his conclusions in the Discourse on Method (1637), in which he abandoned his schooling and laid out a vast program of research in physics, metaphysics*, medicine, and ethics*. He intended the Discourse, written in French, to appeal to a broad audience – "even women" – but returned to Latin in the Meditations on First Philosophy (1641) to establish the metaphysical credentials for his mechanist natural philosophy. From one indubitable intuition (cogito, sum – "I think, I am"), he identifies a criterion of truth (clarity and distinction) by means of which he goes on to prove both God's existence and the reality of our perceptions, claiming in this way to overcome the skeptical critique of knowledge popularized by Montaigne and Charron. His correspondence with Princess Elizabeth of Bohemia led him to broach ethics. He tempered Stoic* impassibility in the Passions of the Soul (1649); to live happily, one must channel rather than suppress the passions.

Descartes courted the powerful Jesuits his whole life but never won the approval of the Roman Catholic Church. His assertion of the radical distinction between mind and body (dualism*) contradicted the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation*; his works were placed on the List of Prohibited Books (Index Librorum Prohibitorum*) in 1663. The Jansenist* Pascal* noted the originality of Descartes's cogito with respect to a similar formulation in Augustine's* City of God, yet he dismissed Descartes's confidence in reason as "uncertain and useless." The epistemological questions raised by Descartes proved more enduring than his natural philosophy, which waned in the shadow of Newton's* Principia (1687).

REBECCA WILKIN

Descent into Hell, a clause concerning Christ, based on 1 Pet 3:18–20 and Ps 16:10 (Act 2:27), in the received version of the Apostles'* Creed, recorded by Rufinus* of Aquileia (c400). It has been variously interpreted to mean that Christ (1) conquered death* and hell*, freeing captive souls, or (2) fully experienced the wrath of God against sinful humanity, or (3) continued in the state of the dead until resurrected.

Desert, any deserted place, not necessarily arid; "wilderness" is often a better term. Deserted places, not being subject to human control, symbolize that which is wild, chaotic, and thus fearsome and demonic*. Egyptian monks of 4th-c. eremitic* monasticism* sought deserted areas in order to live apart from others in contemplation and self-discipline, and perhaps to pursue demons into their last places of refuge. Metaphorically, a time of spiritual uncertainty and testing is often called a "wandering in the wilderness," like that of the Israelites before their crossing of the Jordan and their entry into the Promised Land. See also WILDERNESS.

Design, Argument from, an 18th-c. argument that the adaptations of life forms to their environments must be the result of intelligent design. A theory of "external teleology*" rather than Aristotle's "internal teleology" of finite beings, it was dealt a blow by Darwin's* theory of natural selection: that characteristics are shaped by their interactions.

Desire. Early theologians appropriated the Song* of Songs to develop the idea that desire is the link between the human and the divine. They identified the problem of humanity as estrangement from its essential nature and interpreted redemption* as theosis* (divinization) through which desire is purged of attachment to created goods. Desire as longing for and joy in the divine restores fallen human nature. Desire emphasizes the fundamental goodness of human nature and the nonduality of the human and the divine; it underlines the creative and redemptive quality of the divine kenosis* that eternally empties itself as love* and for love. These themes remain prominent in the Eastern Orthodox* Church.

During the Middle Ages in the West, desire was a common trope used by contemplatives* and mystics* to express the relationship between God* and the soul*. Bridal imagery and erotic metaphors gave expression to the joy and intimacy that arises as "self-will" is displaced by the divine will.

In line with a Middle Age trend in Roman Catholic theology (Anselm*, Aquinas*) Protestant theology privileged legal metaphors and interpreted the problem of humanity to be guilt before a cosmic judge. Christ was no longer the divine bridegroom but an atoning sacrifice* (see Atonement #2). *Eros was interpreted to be a selfish and indulgent love in contrast to the gracious power of *agape.

The importance of desire as an important theological theme reemerged in the 20th c., especially in Feminist* and Queer* theology. A juridical model of atonement* and redemption* appeared woefully inadequate in light of the atrocities and oppressions of the 20th c. Desire reemphasizes the love of God for humanity and corrects the negative assessment of the body* and sexuality* characteristic of much Christian moral thought. It unifies God and humanity, body and soul, eros and agape.

WENDY FARLEY

Deus Absconditus (Lat "hidden God"), Luther's expression for God apart from revelation* and grace*, often depicted as arbitrary and wrathful.

Deus Revelatus (Lat "revealed God"), Luther's expression for God as revealed through Christ, gracious and justifying* sinners.

Deuterocanonical Biblical Books are viewed as "also belonging to the canon" (the approximate meaning of "deuterocanonical"), although there was hesitation about including them, as their exclusion from the Jewish canon (the HB) and from the canon of certain churches – especially Protestant churches – exemplifies. Thus what Protestants (and biblical scholars) call "OT Apocrypha*" are viewed as "deuterocanonical books" by Catholics and Orthodox. See also BIBLE, CANON OF THE.

Deuteronomistic History. Martin Noth proposed (1943) that Joshua*, Judges*, 1–2 Samuel*, and 1–2 Kings* were written as a unified history of Israel from conquest to the Exile*, with Deuteronomy* as a preface. He called this work the “Deuteronomistic History.” It explains Israel’s changing fortunes and eventual destruction as a consequence of its disobedience of the laws of Deuteronomy. Noth’s proposal became the standard model for understanding these books. Yet scholars now tend to find a greater level of optimism in the book than Noth did. Rather than a single exilic edition, some now hold that it was twice redacted to express prophetic and legal concerns. Most scholars now date the “Deuteronomistic History” to King Josiah’s reign (late 7th c. BCE) and view it as King Josiah’s charter for his religious reforms. An exilic-era redaction brought the history up to date by blaming the Exile on King Manasseh, whose sins were depicted as so heinous that Josiah’s actions were insufficient to convince God to revoke his judgment. Recently, the very idea of these books forming a “Deuteronomistic History” and the nature of a “deuteronomistic school” has come under closer scrutiny and critique. JAMES R. LINVILLE

Deuteronomy, the fifth book of the Jewish and the Christian canon. Its title in Hebrew is devarim, or “words,” a term from the opening phrase of the book (1:1); titling books in this way was a common practice in ancient Judaism. By contrast the title “Deuteronomy” is a transliteration of the Greek title in the Septuagint* based on a controversial interpretation of Deut 17:18. The Hebrew mishne hatora hazot (lit. “a copy [a double, a second copy] of this law”) is translated in Greek to deuteronomion touto, “this second law,” implying that Deuteronomy is a second, perhaps distinct body of legal tradition rather than a form of the same law (of Moses).

Deuteronomy recounts the journey of the biblical community from Horeb to Moab. In its retelling of the story, Deuteronomy casts itself as Moses’ farewell speech to the biblical community, and it places the people of Israel on the brink of entering the land of Canaan. Deuteronomy has a distinctive method of telling the story about how the people of Israel escaped bondage in Egypt, wandered in and through the wilderness, engaged and defeated their opponents in combat, and were now poised to enter the land that YHWH promised to Abraham*, Isaac*, and Jacob* – figures to whom the literary and cultural traditions of ancient Israel ascribe prominent roles in the history of the biblical community.

Deuteronomy opens with a narrative that places the biblical community just east of the Jordan River (Deut 1:1–5), then begins to cite sermons Moses delivered to Israel (Deut 1:6–4:40, 5:1–11:32). These speeches introduce a large block of legal injunctions that give the people guidelines regarding how they should live once they enter the land of Canaan (Deut 12:1–26:19). Deuteronomy then includes another speech of Moses that delineates incentives for obeying and curses for disobeying deuteronomic legislation (Deut 27–28). Deuteronomy suggests that Moses delivered still another address in which he discusses the journey from Egypt to the land of Canaan and reiterates the covenant* into which YHWH entered with Israel in Moab (Deut 29–30). Miscellaneous items appear in the final chapters, including the “Song of Moses” (Deut 32), the narrative detailing Moses’ blessings of the tribes of Israel (Deut 33), and an account of the death of Moses and the investiture of Joshua (Deut 31 and 34).

Deuteronomy 12–26 contains a compilation of diverse legal regulations, many of which appear in Exod 20:22–23:19. Yet layers of law in Deut 12–26 are absent in Exodus. These legal injunctions deal with the monarch and civil magistrates. They prohibit the presence of images in the Israelite cultic system, centralize the Israelite cultus, and regulate behavior toward social subgroups that existed on the fringes of the socioeconomic structure. Ideology embedded in Deut 12–26 includes the belief that peace, fecundity, abundance of food, well-being, and the keeping of the Law are closely intertwined, a “YHWH alone” theology, and the claim that individuals in the biblical community should love YHWH with all of their heart.

The ideology* in Deut 12–26 is far-reaching. It shapes the reconstruction of history in Joshua*, Judges*, 1–2 Samuel*, and 1–2 Kings*. In fact, it is probable that this ideology played a role in the Josianic* reformation. Moreover, Deut 12–26 and the Book of Jeremiah* share ideas about YHWH, religiosity, and the Israelite cultus. Scholars account for this phenomenon by postulating the existence of a deuteronomic movement at work in the biblical community. While subgroups of tradition in Deuteronomy may come from the Kingdom, during the 8th c. BCE, it is probable that the book of Deuteronomy received its final form during the late 6th c. BCE.

HAROLD V. BENNETT

Devil, Satan, Demons, and Demonic Powers. In the Bible there is mention of evil spirits, sometimes called “demons” (usually using the diminutive, Gk daimonion), resembling the concept of demons (Gk daimon, “spirit”) in Greek philosophy, causing disease or madness; but there is also the dualistic* concept of an evil force in opposition to God, sometimes imagined as an army and in few instances personalized as Satan. The concept of an evil anti-God, which was to become influential in the Christian tradition, can be traced back to the Iranian culture of Zoroastrianism, where God was opposed by “Ahriman,” an evil counterpart. This cosmological opposition was echoed by “Satan” in the Jewish tradition. “Satan” (transl. “the accuser”) originally served as a kind of prosecuting attorney at God’s court and only later developed into a director of evil, without ever becoming too prominent.

Satan started a new career in the early Christian Era. In the period of their persecution, desperate Christians perceived Satan as the “ruler of the world” (2 Cor 4:4). The “leader of the demons” was called “diabolos” (Gk; Lat diabolus), a term that entered the European languages (e.g. French, diable; English, “devil”; German, Teufel). In the central narrative of Christ’s temptation (Matt 4:1–11), the devil is portrayed as acting in person. In the Book of Revelation, he is even “king of hell” (Rev 9:11) and acts explicitly as the Antichrist (Rev 20). But the message of the Bible remains ambivalent, since in some parts of the OT and NT the role of demons is marginal (Genesis, Deuteronomy) or explicitly denied (Acts 23:8).

Although Augustine* (354–430), earlier a follower of Manichaeism*, sometimes described the material world as the realm of the devil – the Civitas diaboli as opposed to the Civitas Dei – the widespread attitude was to downplay the power of demons during the period of Christianization. Since the Christian God had to be powerful in order to attract new believers, and since Germanic and Slavic rulers – in the footsteps of Emperor Constantine* – would convert only to a powerful God, demons were portrayed as less important (from the Carolingian* period to the High Middle Ages). During the period of the European expansion (10th–12th c.), a period of favorable climate and economic and demographic growth, urbanization and the inculturation of Scandinavia, Eastern Europe, Southern Italy, the Iberian Peninsula, and the Holy Land, the image of the triumphant God continued to prevail.

It was only when expansion came to an end, when the climate turned less favorable, and when endemic as well as epidemic diseases led to a shrinking economy and even to decreasing populations, that the pessimistic ideologies of Augustine and Thomas Aquinas* took root. Starting in the 13th c., “demonology” – the science of demons – rose to prominence and began to shape European minds. An increasing number of theologians saw human society on the brink of the Apocalypse*, and the devil with his supposed human allies (minorities like the Muslims in Spain* or the Jews*, Christian heretics* like the Cathars* and Waldenses*, or imaginary terrorists like witches*) seemed to endanger the future of humankind. Pogroms* and the persecution of witches were being interpreted as part of the final struggle between good and evil, as a prelude to the final Judgment*.

However, even at the climax of European witch-hunting (c1600), skepticism concerning the power of demons was widespread. In the worldview of many groups, such as Anabaptists* and Spiritualists*, there was no space for the devil. For leading intellectuals, e.g. Michel de Montaigne, stories of the devil were but fairy tales. In the Reformation* and Catholic* Renewal periods, institutional pressure was too enormous to articulate openly such rejections of demons. It was only the generation of Thomas Hobbes (17th c.) that started to object to the theologians and their views, and this more impolitely owing to the fact that their monopoly of interpretation was over. Subsequently, unbelief in the existence of the devil was equated with atheism*. Nevertheless, it was up to Christian theologians like the Dutch minister Balthasar Bekker (1634–98) to deconstruct the idea of any impact of spirits or demons, let alone Satan, on the material world, thus contributing to the end of the witch-hunt.

From the early 18th c., the figure of the devil was historicized by enlightened authors like Christian Thomasius and Daniel Defoe. Belief in demons was ridiculed by an increasingly strong current of secular* unbelief. Under the impact of the scientific revolution, economic success, political stability, and other aspects of modernity in Europe and the Americas, Christian theologies started to deconstruct traditional demonology accordingly (e.g. from psychological perspectives). In the present, theologians seem to avoid the subject, but Pope John* Paul II repeatedly confirmed the existence of the devil. See also DEMONIZATION; WITCHCRAFT, WITCHES.

WOLFGANG BEHRINGER

Devotio Moderna. This spiritual movement spread in the Netherlands* and the Rhine valley (14th–15th c.). It originated with Geert Groote* (1340–84), was propagated by the Brothers* and Sisters of the Common Life and the canons regular of the religious houses and schools of Windesheim (Netherlands), and had a major influence on Gabriel Biel*, Erasmus*, and Charles* V. The most famous text of the Devotio Moderna is The Imitation of Jesus Christ, attributed to Thomas* à Kempis (d1471). It delineates a form of spirituality for laypeople, underscoring devotion to Christ and to his Passion, devotion to the Eucharist, systematic meditation, and reform of moral life for laymen.

GUY-THOMAS BEDOUELLE, OP

Devotion (from Lat “vowing,” “giving”), solemnly giving oneself to God or Christ (see, e.g., Devotio Moderna), through formal action (monastic vows*, worship*, prayer*), intense informal worship (meditation of Scripture*, private spiritual life), or inward zeal. In popular Roman Catholicism (and Anglicanism), the term “devotion” also designates acts of veneration* associated with shrines, icons*, or places of pilgrimage* dedicated to a saint* or to the Virgin Mary*, as well as special veneration of Jesus (e.g. devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus) or of the sacrament (e.g. adoration of the Holy Sacrament).

Devotional, a written or customary guide to private acts of devotion, aimed at deepening the spiritual* life.

Dewey, John (1859–1952), one of North America’s preeminent philosophers identified with US pragmatism. One of Dewey’s earliest writings, Principles of Psychology, was based on the evolutionary science of his day, especially the philosophy of T. H. Huxley. Dewey’s reconstructive philosophy was a reaction to speculative idealism, rationalism, and classical British empiricism. His was a “radical empiricism.” Thought, reason, intelligence, and categories of knowledge are instrumental and experimental, as is religion. Knowledge is instrumental for seeing the consequences* of existing events and is used as a plan and method for conducting human actions. As with knowledge, religion (ritualized and organized) historically grows from the religious need of traditional societies to manage precarious events in experience. When societies advance scientifically and technologically, the traditional functions that religion once offered will be transcended by creative intelligence, and the religious function of experience will be assimilated into a common, social faith. The works that best describe Dewey’s understanding of religion are The Quest for Certainty and A Common Faith.

VICTOR ANDERSON

Diaconate, the office of deacon* or the period of time a deacon serves.

Diakonia (Gk “service”), a frequently used term in the NT designating the major characteristic of all ministries, including liturgical ministries – that of preaching and serving others (including the poor and the needy) as Christ did. Today the term diakonia most commonly refers to the shared ministry whose purpose is to serve God among suffering people, among the poorest, among those who suffer, among those most in need. Thus diakonia is not simply the ministry of deacons* and deaconesses*, although through their services they often epitomize diakonia. See also DEACON, DIACONATE; DEACONESS.

Dialectic, originally a form of logical argumentation associated with Socrates and dramatized by Plato*, involving refuting an argument by evaluating definitions of concepts and their relationships. Kant* used a “transcendental dialectic” to expose the illusion of knowledge beyond phenomena and possible experience. For Hegel* dialectic is the passing over of a notion into its own negation because of conflict between its inherent aspects. Thus Hegel viewed reason as developing through historical interactions, a notion applied by Karl Marx* to social and economic processes.

Dialectical Theology emerged as a school of theological thought after 1918, primarily as a reaction against liberal Protestantism. It was developed (early 20th c.) chiefly by Karl Barth*, Emil Brunner, Friedrich Gogarten, and Rudolf Bultmann*, who were united by similar assumptions about theological methodology. Inspired by the Kierkegaardian* and, to a lesser extent Dostoyevskian*, use of dialectical method, the dialectical theologians proceeded on the assumption that humanity’s essential condition is one of crisis before God. Humanity and God are separated by a “barrier of death*,” the solution to which is found, not in religion, but in the encounter with Jesus, in whom is revealed both God’s no to human self-sufficiency and God’s yes of grace*.

Barth, whose influence was of pioneering significance to dialectical theology, argued in his 1919 commentary on Romans and again in his famous Tambach lecture, "The Christian's Place in Society," that there exists a "dialectic between time and eternity." For Barth this was essentially a code for his insistence that God and humanity are fundamentally discontinuous, that neither God nor God's revelation can be equated or synthesized with human philosophical or cultural presuppositions. Barth thus sought to emphasize the necessity and yet, from the human side, the impossibility of encounter with divine revelation.

In contrast, Brunner, Bultmann, and Gogarten gradually developed their respective theologies in more anthropocentric directions. For them, following Heidegger, the dialectical character of theology came to be based less on the negation of humanity by revelation than on the dialogic nature of human existence itself. Brunner therefore thought it possible to locate the "point of contact" between humanity and the Word of God, while Gogarten argued that it was both possible and necessary to develop a secular ethics.

The content and objectives of dialectical theology were articulated principally through the journal Zwischen den Zeiten (Between the times), founded by Barth, Gogarten, and Eduard Thurneysen in 1922, when the unity of the dialectical school was still intact. It soon became clear that the major proponents of dialectical theology were heading in divergent directions, leading them to differing political reactions to Hitlerism. Thus by 1933 both the journal and dialectical theology as a school had ceased to exist.

MARK R. LINDSAY

Dialogue, Ecumenical, is the conversation among Christians of different churches or communions; it is "intrafaith" (in contrast to interfaith) dialogue*. Ecumenical dialogue is a conversation of discovery. "In speaking the truth in love" (Eph 4:15), one discovers not only one's ecumenical partner but also oneself. Bilateral or multilateral, dialogue is contextual* and takes place on various levels. Each dialogue is shaped by the identity, culture*, language, and symbolic* order of the interlocutors and of the churches they represent. At the local, regional, national, or international level, one finds either formal official dialogues sponsored by ecclesial authorities or informal dialogues conducted by ecumenical centers and groups. Because of the disparity of ecclesial structures of authority* (see Church, Concepts and Life Cluster: Types of Ecclesiastical Structures), a given dialogue is not always viewed in the same way by different churches.

Dialogue among Christians draws on Scripture* that presents unity as both a gift and a call. Jesus prayed for his disciples' unity: "May all be one . . . so that the world may believe that you have sent me" (John 17:21). Paul grounds the Christian vocation in "one Lord, one faith, one baptism" (Eph 4:5). From its scriptural base, dialogue searches tradition* to find the foundation on which to build ecumenical consensus. The consensus that is sought concerns full visible unity* in apostolic faith*, life rooted in Word* and sacrament*, and missional* witness* to church and world. This unity has come to be understood in terms of koinonia (communion*). The dialogue's task is to identify shared elements of faith, life, and witness and to discern differences, and among these to distinguish between differences compatible with the consensus and church-dividing differences.

Ecumenical dialogue is theological, historical, and pastoral. As theological, it is an encounter among equals, this equality being discerned from the perspective of each tradition's ecclesiological self-understanding. As historical, ecumenical dialogue studies the Christian past so as to explore the variety of understandings of the church's faith, life, and witness, and examines how these findings might assist the churches in drawing closer together. As pastoral, ecumenical dialogue opens the institutional encounter of churches through the personal encounter of individuals. Doing theology* together, interlocutors engage in faith formation by sharing their Christian experience and by praying together.

Dialogue does not exist for its own sake. Nor is its goal merely the writing of interchurch reports. Rather, dialogue serves the people behind the documents and promotes the reception of ecumenical findings in the churches.

LORELEI F. FUCHS, SA

Dialogue, Interfaith. Dialogue between Christians and the followers of other faiths is not a luxury reserved for Christian intellectuals but a daily necessity as globalization* and the mass media bring believers of different religions into frequent contact with each other. Furthermore, political events and acts of violence by fanatics of all faiths (not only Muslims) have made interfaith dialogue a matter of extreme urgency.

Interfaith dialogue as a genuine opening of persons of different faiths to one another with a readiness to share and be enriched by other faiths serves a multiplicity of functions. It helps overcome fear of the “other,” removes misunderstanding of and prejudices against other religions, promotes collaboration with others in areas of life beyond religion, and enhances the understanding and practice of one’s own faith.

The Pontifical Council for Inter-religious Dialogue of the Roman Catholic Church has suggested four modes of interfaith dialogue: (1) the dialogue of life consists in sharing daily life, which fosters mutual understanding, neighborly assistance, and cordial friendship among adherents of different religions; (2) the dialogue of collaborative action brings believers of different faiths together to promote justice, human rights, peace, human development, and ecological well-being; (3) the dialogue of reflection makes possible a deeper understanding of and enrichment by the beliefs and practices of religions other than one’s own; and (4) the dialogue of spiritual experience, the deepest and most transformative, brings people together to pray, each in the way of his or her tradition and later, possibly, to pray together, in a common way. The dialogue between Christianity and Judaism* is unique, governed by a different dynamics and theology, given the special relationship between these two religious traditions.

Interreligious dialogue is often looked on with suspicion by non-Christians. It is feared to be a covert attempt by Christians to convert them, especially when it is presented as part of Christian mission* (as official documents of the Roman Catholic Church often do). Even the widespread view that believers of non-Christian faiths are “anonymous* Christians” (Karl Rahner*), though legitimate from a Christian point of view, may be misunderstood as a theological cooptation of non-Christian religions and as a refusal to encounter the other as other. Interfaith dialogue should not be allowed to eclipse the dialogue that the church must carry out with atheists and nonbelievers who still present a formidable challenge to the Christian faith. See also RELIGIONS AND CHRISTIANITY.

PETER C. PHAN

Diaspora (Gk diaspeirein, “to scatter”) generally connotes the displacement and dispersal of a people from their homeland. The term is used primarily in reference to the Jews, whose separation from Palestine began in the biblical era, becoming a paradigm of much of their existence. Diaspora was often conflated with galut (exile*) and interpreted as punishment for Israelite sins* (Lev 26:33; Deut 4:26–28, 28:63–65; Jer 5:19, 9:15). Long before the destruction of the Second Temple (70 CE), Jews had settled outside Palestine, a principal migration having taken place in the Hellenistic period (after 323 BCE), and most of it voluntarily. Jews lived all over the Mediterranean, usually in Greek-speaking cities, in communities where they could engage freely in a wide variety of occupations, enjoy civic privileges, and maintain their distinctiveness through adherence to the Torah and communal participation in synagogues (1 Macc 15:22–23; Philo*, Leg. 281–83). Paul’s missionary activity regularly brought him first to the synagogues of diaspora Jewry (e.g. Acts 13:14, 14:1, 17:2–3, 18:4, 18:19, 18:26, 19:8–9), the most logical sites for the initial spread of Christianity. Ancient Jews outside Palestine never developed a theory of diaspora and rarely categorized it negatively. Though Jerusalem was their “mother city,” their own communities were their native lands (Philo, Flacc. 46).

ERICH S. GRUEN

Diatessaron (Gk “through four”), created by Tatian* (c170), is a harmony integrating the four Gospels into a single text. Its original language was most likely Syriac, though it survives in translations only.

A onetime student of Justin* Martyr, Tatian, born in Syria, left Rome after being accused of heresy and returned to obscurity in the East. In his Diatessaron, he gave the Oriental Church its first version of the four Gospels. The Diatessaron remained the main form in which, until the late 4th c., Syriac Christianity read the gospel. Yet it was banned (early 5th c.), and the four Gospels were read instead.

In addition to the Gospels, the Diatessaron integrated material from a fifth source, probably an ancient gospel tradition known to the Syriac* Church. Tatian conformed the OT quotations in the Gospels to the Peshitta* (the Syriac version of the OT). This receptivity toward local textual traditions helps to explain the early popularity of the Diatessaron in the East.

The Diatessaron was translated into Latin at an early date, then from Latin into many European languages. Yet these Western harmonies, though used in popular religion, never competed with the canonical Gospels.

Scholars painstakingly recovered part of the original Syriac text of the Diatessaron, giving them access to a version of the gospel text that was older than most other manuscripts and that in some ways throws new light on beliefs and practices of the early church.

JAN JOOSTEN

Didache, a compilation of earlier sources (rather than an original composition), has four thematic sections: a Jewish “Two Ways” instruction (Chaps. 1–6), a liturgical treatise (Chaps. 7–10), a treatise on church organization (Chaps. 11–15), and an eschatological section (Chap. 16). The manual was composed around 100 CE for a Christian congregation in (Western) Syria. What was the purpose of the Didache? The Jewish roots apparent in each section show a community within the larger fabric of Judaism*. Yet certain features in 8:1–3, 9:4, 10:5, and 14:1 typify the manual as non-Jewish. The present text probably reflects a process of transition. By the time the document was created, so many Gentiles had already been adopted into the community that it became sociologically a Gentile Christian group.

The Didache attempts to overcome the tension between non-Jewish and Jewish Christians by establishing an identity separate from contemporary Judaism.

Claiming apostolic authority, the manual was widely known and highly esteemed in the churches during the first five centuries. The influence of the original Two Ways instruction (without 1:3a–2:1 and 6:2–3) lasted even longer: it served as a model for the basic instruction of neophytes and Christian believers through the early Middle Ages. HUUB VAN DE SANDT

Didascalia Apostolorum, a church order written in Syria (first half of the 3rd c.). Modeled on the Didache*, it became in turn the basis of the first six books of the Apostolic* Constitutions. While this work and the Constitutions made use of Jewish sources, it attacked Jewish Christians, drawing a contrast between the original Law (the Decalogue*, identical with natural* law) and the ceremonial “second Law” given as a punishment after the rebellion in the wilderness (cf. the negative views of the Law in Stephen’s speech, Acts 7:42–50, and the Epistle of Barnabas*).

Didymus the Blind of Alexandria (309–94 or 313–98), biblical commentator, theologian, spiritual writer. Blind by the age of four or five, Didymus had texts read to him, memorizing their philosophical and theological arguments. Didymus’s commentaries employ allegorical* exegesis and show his opposition to Manichaeism* and to Arian* and neo-Arian (Eunomian*) theology. His commentaries are important contributions to the Greek exegetical tradition, and his teaching on ascetic* life was highly regarded by Evagrius* Ponticus and other educated ascetics of the 4th–7th c. Didymus’s works were anathematized (553) because he sympathized with Origen’s* teaching on the preexistence of souls. BYARD BENNETT

Dies Irae (Lat “day of wrath”), opening words of a rhymed hymn depicting the soul facing Judgment. Originating in Benedictine* circles and rewritten by a Franciscan* (probably Thomas of Celano), it was used in the Mass* for the Dead at funerals and in the liturgy for All* Saints’ Day. Composers, notably Hector Berlioz and Sergei Rachmaninoff, adopted the initial chanted tones as a musical theme.

Dietary Laws, scriptural or traditional regulations concerning what to eat or not to eat, when to eat, and sometimes how to prepare food.

Diocese, the territory under the pastoral* jurisdiction of a bishop*. Several dioceses form a province*.

Diocletian (245–313), Roman emperor (284–305) who reorganized the Empire by distributing power among four regional rulers and creating a new degree of autocracy. At first he continued the tacit toleration of Christianity, but his loyalty to Roman traditions, encouraged by Porphyry’s* belief that Christians were too exclusive, eventually led him to issue four edicts of persecution* with increasing severity, starting in 303. In 305 he abdicated and retired to Salona. Some persecutions continued; soon edicts of toleration were issued in the West and East (306, 311) and in the Edict of Milan* (313).

Diodore of Tarsus (d c390), bishop, theologian, exegete. Educated in Athens, Diodore was ordained a priest by Meletius of Antioch, founded an ascetic school near Antioch*, and became bishop of Tarsus (378). He was a leading figure at the Council of Constantinople* (381). Diodore attacked polytheism and was a firm opponent of Arianism* and Apollinaris*. He is best known as the dominant figure of the Antiochene* school of exegesis*, insisting on literal* and historical interpretation of Scripture as opposed to the allegorical* method favored in Alexandria. Diodore’s students included John* Chrysostom and Theodore* of Mopsuestia. His Antiochene Christology*, emphasizing the humanity of Christ, is believed to have antici- pated Nestorianism*. ANDREA STERK

Diognetus, Letter to, a 2nd-c. anonymous letter by a Christian to an inquirer, explaining Christians' dissent from the doctrines of both Jews* and Gentiles*. It is notable for its depiction of Christians as sojourners* living in but not of the world, for whom "every foreign place is their homeland, every homeland foreign." Despite this they are "the soul of the world" (Chaps. 5–6).

Dionysius Exiguus (Lat "small," "poor," "skinny") (c470–c545). Born in Scythia (now Romania*), he was a monk in Rome and translated an influential collection of canon* laws from Greek into Latin. While calculating the dates of Easter* for coming years (525), he also developed a chronology of past events and for the first time dated them "before Christ" (BC, now BCE [before the common era], out of respect for other religions) and "after Christ" (anno Domini, AD, or the common era, CE). This system of dating became the standard method throughout Europe after being used by Bede* in England.

Dionysius (Jacob) bar Salibi (early 12th c.–1171), rhetor, polemist, deacon, bishop, metropolitan. Born in Melitene (west of the Euphrates); known as Dionysius, his name as bishop of Mar'ash (Germanicia, 1154), then as metropolitan of Amida (Northern Syria, 1167). He played a major role in the Syriac theological renaissance (12th–13th c.), writing many homilies, liturgical works (on the Syriac Orthodox liturgy, especially baptism), canon law, commentaries on classical and patristic texts (on Dionysius* the Pseudo-Aeropagite and Evagrius* Ponticus), polemical treatises (against Muslims, Jews, Nestorians*, Chalcedonians, Melkites*, Armenians*, and idolaters), theological works, and biblical commentaries. These writings distill the Syriac intellectual tradition of the first millennium, and offer rare and illuminating insight into relations between Christians, Jews, and Muslims, not from the perspective of Western crusaders*, but from within the frequently neglected viewpoint of the Oriental Orthodox* tradition. His Against the Muslims is unique among Christian works on Islam from the medieval period (Griffith). His commentaries on portions of Aristotle's Organon and on Porphyry's Isagoge were prominent in the Syriac theological curriculum; it was said in the East that without them "it is not possible to obtain an understanding of the scriptures." See also ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

RIFAAT EBIED

Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite (5th–6th c.) is the name given to the author of the Corpus Dionysiacum, comprising De divinis nominibus, De mystica theologia, De coelesti hierarchia, De ecclesiastica hierarchia, and some remarkable theological epistles. Throughout the Middle Ages, this author was thought to be the disciple converted by Paul on the Acropolis in Athens (Acts 17:34). The author's quotations and paraphrasing of the Neoplatonist* Proclus (412–80) are among the important clues enabling scholars to establish that he flourished in the 5th–6th c., perhaps in Syria as a Greek-speaking monk. His theological tractates and letters articulate a mystical* theology revolving in good part around the Nameless God of Many Names (see Apophaticism) and the notion of hierarchy in the manifestation of the Supreme Divinity through all the orders of creation. This world picture is a synthesis of Neoplatonic teaching and Christian revelation. Dionysius's writings are fundamental, particularly to later Greek theology. He continued to be recognized as a first-rank authority on angelology, ecclesiology, and negative theology, even after it was disclosed that he had not been the convert of Paul on the Acropolis. He still guides speculation on the limits of theological knowledge, and so reminds us of the "Unknown God" evoked by Paul in his preaching to the Greeks. See also NEOPLATONISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

WILLIAM FRANKE

Diphysites. See DYOPHYSITES.

Diptychs, folded tablets with two leaves listing persons, living and dead, to be commemorated at the Eucharist*. Entry or removal of the names of bishops* in the diptychs was a sign of communion* or excommunication*, respectively. A diptych is also a pair of Byzantine icons* that depict two themes side by side.

Disability and Christianity. Disability can be found everywhere once you know how to look for it. The challenge for Christian theologians has been to develop conceptual frameworks, intellectual practices, and pedagogical awareness that investigate the presence of disabilities rather than perpetuate the "absent presence" of disabilities in texts, teaching, and institutions. Disability is no longer seen as the biological condition of an individual body*, but rather as a complex product of social, political, environmental, and biological realities. Disability studies as a field of interdisciplinary inquiry – including religious studies, biblical studies, and Christian theology – have emerged from three primary sources.

1. The theological imaginings of caretakers of people with disabilities. Religious bodies established many caretaking facilities for people with various forms of disabilities. Chaplains who spent much time with people with disabilities, especially developmental disabilities, began to write about their patients' lives. Brett Webb-Mitchell's theological work relates the struggles and triumphs, frustrations and joys of children and adults with disabilities. Jean Vanier, who began ministering to the disabled in 1964, helped to found an international organization, L'Arche, which creates communities where people with developmental disabilities and those who assist them share their lives. Vanier's writings have been widely influential in their depictions of disability and of theological responses to people with disabilities.
2. Theologians who have a family member with a disability and express their care through formal theological accounts. Thomas Reynolds's disabled son embodied for him the Christian story in which strength always comes from weakness. Amos Yong engages his experience as the sibling of a person with Down syndrome to raise fundamental issues about theological anthropology*.
3. New theological views from people with disabilities themselves. Through his writings, Harold Wilke, who helped with the passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act (1990), advocated full inclusion of people with disabilities in congregations (e.g. by accommodating their needs and acknowledging their dignity as persons and the authority of their voices). His presence as a clergy member often surprised members of the congregations who wondered how he could do pastoral ministry without arms. Nancy Eiesland, both a sociologist and theologian, employed Liberation* theology to frame her lifelong experience with disability and the hidden history of Christianity's "disabled God" (the crucified Son of God). Kathy Black, a theologian and preacher, disputed the common notion that disability is a punishment for sin* (see Atonement #2). Ethicist and theologian Sharon Betcher argued that people with disabilities are a reproach to cultural images of body* and health, to consumerist values, and to global economic* patterns that embody these values. Biblical scholars Sarah Melcher, Hector Avalos, and Jeremy Schipper engage biblical studies in groundbreaking conversation with the wider field of disability studies. Scholars with disabilities are becoming the primary authors of theologies of disabilities.

Recent developments in disability theology and religious advocacy [Editor's note: especially the late Nancy Eiesland's] led to the formulation of the UN Convention on the Rights and Dignity of Persons with Disabilities (came into force in 2008), which includes the right to practice spirituality (a first for rights treaties). The Convention is prompting further exploration of the link between civil society and religion in support of full inclusion of people with disabilities in all areas of life. This can only continue to stimulate research on disability in Christian texts, congregations, and global work. See also PASTORAL CARE; PASTORAL THEOLOGY.

NANCY L. EIESLAND

Discalced (Lat "unshod"), term applied to religious* congregations whose members wear only sandals, a practice introduced in the West by Francis* of Assisi. See also CARMELITE ORDER; TERESA OF ÁVILA.

Disciples of Christ. See CHRISTIAN CHURCH (DISCIPLES OF CHRIST).

Discipleship. Being a disciple of Jesus Christ seems a simple enough concept. Is it not being like the Twelve*, who, according to the Gospels, followed Jesus during his ministry? Yet they are less than reliable models (e.g. Judas's betrayal; Peter's denials; the disciples' misunderstandings). Furthermore, the canonical Gospels (and other NT books) offer different views of discipleship, reflecting particular practices of the Christian life in various 1st-c. church contexts.

Discipleship, as the life practice of followers of Christ, has been and is understood differently according to (1) the aspects of biblical text(s) deemed most significant, (2) the theological views one holds (especially regarding anthropology*, sin*, atonement*, faith*, God's role in life, and ethics*), and (3) the practical life context issues that Christians have to address (see Scriptural Criticism). From this perspective, one can distinguish two broad understandings of discipleship, whose central feature is either

(1) doing God's will, as taught by Jesus, or (2) imitating Christ.

1. Discipleship as Doing God's Will Revealed by Jesus is a matter of obeying the authoritative teaching of Jesus, who calls disciples for a particular ministry – with two variations. First, discipleship involves learning from Christ the basic moral principles (God's will) that should govern disciples' lives and that they should model for others in society. The presupposed basic human predicament (the root of sin) is that humans do not know God's will regarding the "moral life" (here in Kant's* deontological* understanding of it). Then, e.g., the beatitudes (Matt 5:3–10) are read for their teaching of basic moral principles: being poor in spirit, humility, meekness, and righteousness.

Second, discipleship is being called by Christ to play a role in society and being willing to play it. The presupposed basic human predicament is that humans do not want to do God's will (which they already know), because they do not recognize the "consequences" of their actions (cf. John Stuart Mill's consequentialist* understanding of the moral life). Jesus' call (with its promises, e.g. "I will make you fishers of people," Matt 4:19) reveals the positive consequences of choosing a life of discipleship and the negative consequences of not doing so. The beatitudes are then read as a call to discipleship, enticing the hearers to become disciples through their promises (e.g. "theirs is the Kingdom").

2. Discipleship as Imitating Christ (imitatio Christi; see Imitation of Christ as Disciple) posits that discipleship requires a close, intimate relationship with Jesus, through which disciples are progressively trained and equipped to become disciples; when Jesus called Peter and Andrew, he promised to "make you fishers of people" (Matt 4:19), a training completed only when they finally went in mission (Matt. 28:19–20). The presupposed basic human predicament is that humans are neither equipped nor trained to do God's will (even if they already know it and want to do it), as in the Aristotelian perfectionist* view of the moral life that requires apprenticeship (imitating an expert) to acquire character (ethos), virtues, and practical wisdom. Disciples need to be transformed into Christ's likeness. Three variations emphasize different primary transformations.

First, by imitating Christ, disciples are resocialized, acquiring a new identity (character) as they share Christ's "symbolic world" – including his vision of the Kingdom – and thus learn to be children of the Kingdom and children of God (e.g. praying with Christ, "Our father in heaven"); thus disciples are enabled to be like Christ and can accept being "poor in spirit," "meek," and "persecuted for righteousness' sake," as Christ was.

Second, by imitating Christ, disciples share Jesus' discerning faith and receive the ability to discern in society both those who are actually "blessed" by God (not the rich or joyful ones, but the poor and repressed, those who mourn) and other manifestations of the Kingdom that should orient their ministry as disciples.

Third, by imitating Christ, disciples share in his power. Although the forces of evil and oppression seem overwhelming, as they imitate Christ disciples discover that God empowers them to overcome these obstacles, even if they have to go "the way of the cross" following Christ (undergoing various kinds of hardships and eventually martyrdom).

Theologians, churches, denominations, and individual Christians usually display a preference for one of these ways of understanding and practicing discipleship. Yet each choice is grounded in biblical texts and traditions, intertwined with choices regarding other theological concepts, and needs to be weighted in terms of its contextual implications. See also APOSTLE; IMITATION OF CHRIST. DANIEL PATTE

Disciplina Arcani (Lat "teaching of what is secret"), a 17th-c. term that refers to the early church practice of teaching the Lord's* Prayer, the mystery of the Trinity*, and the Apostles'* Creed to catechumens just before baptism (to avoid profanation by pagans; Matt 7:6; 1 Cor 3:1–2) and to the recitation of some eucharistic prayers silently.

Discipline. Both the Roman Catholic* Renewal and the Protestant Reformation* emphasized the importance of communal and personal discipline in forming Christian life and community. Discipline was viewed as preserving the integrity of the church, being a sign of the true faith, nurturing holiness of life, and being necessary for social order (see Ethics and Christianity Cluster).

Discipline in the Roman Catholic Church is associated with the last session of the Council of Trent* (1561–63). It introduced tools to strengthen Catholic public discipline, especially by stressing the sacrament of penance* and enhancing bishops' oversight of confessors so that a moral agenda might be highlighted in the confessional. Archbishop Charles Borromeo* of Milan (1538–84) was exemplary in such efforts. Reform of existing monastic* orders and clerical life (chiefly through seminary training) and support for new reformed religious communities emphasizing moral and ascetic* discipline was also undertaken. Examples were the reform of the Carmelite* order as the Discalced Carmelites (1562) at the initiative of Teresa* of Ávila and John* of the Cross and the founding of the Society of Jesus (Jesuits*, 1540), the Theatines (1524), Barnabites (1533), and Ursulines (1535). Vigorous spiritual practice was encouraged for both religious and lay Catholics. Young people were encouraged in the Catholic life through the establishment of the catechetical Confraternities of Christian Doctrine. The ministry of spiritual direction flourished. Key to spiritual reform were the Jesuits, who in their schools and varied ministries promoted spiritual* exercises (daily examination of conscience, meditation on the life and Passion of Christ) to discipline individuals for service to Christ's church and people. Francis* de Sales's (1567–1622) popular Introduction to the Devout Life promoted a spiritually and morally disciplined life for laypersons that stressed interior prayer, the acquisition of virtue, acts of charity, chaste and spiritually oriented relationships, devotion to the examples of the saints, and active participation in the sacramental life of the church.

Protestant discipline centers on Bible study and prayer and is often individual; Protestant discipline for community life follows a similar pattern, as Bonhoeffer's* book Life Together exemplifies. WENDY M. WRIGHT

Dismas, the name given later to the penitent thief crucified with Jesus (Luke 23:40–43). Dismas Houses, founded (1974) by Jack Hickey, OP, offer transitional housing and support services to men and women recently released from prison or jail in the USA and Ireland.

Dispensationalism, the belief that history is divided into divinely ordained periods, or "dispensations." Joachim* of Fiore (c1135–1202) argued that the history of the world comprised three ages: an Age of the Law*, governed by God the Father; an Age of Grace*, brought on by the Incarnation*; and an Age of the Spirit*, during which the Antichrist* will be defeated and the world renewed. Darby* initiated a renewed Dispensationalist theology (early 19th c.), still influential in Evangelical Protestantism. The Scofield Reference Bible (1909) describes seven dispensations. Progressive Dispensationalists (20th c.) argued for fewer ages. "Ultra-dispensationalists" argued for different dividing points. With the popularity of the Left Behind novels, the movement edged into the mainstream. See also MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRY and IN NORTH AMERICA.

STEPHEN E. LAHEY

Dispersion. See DIASPORA.

Disruption of 1843. Led by Thomas Chalmers, almost 40% of the ministers left the Church of Scotland (forfeiting salaries, manses, and pulpits) and established the Free* Church of Scotland. The cause of the secession was chiefly the issue of patronage*. The split ended in 1929.

Dissenters, official designation for Non-conformists* (Presbyterians*, Congregationalists*, and Baptists*) who separated themselves from the Church of England, especially after the Restoration* and the Act of Uniformity* (1662).

Dissolution of the Monasteries. Henry VIII, in his role as supreme head of the Church of England (see Supremacy, Acts of) and on the basis of several acts of Parliament, confiscated monastic* properties in England, Wales, and Ireland (1538–40). Luther* and others had questioned the legitimacy of monastic vows*, and monks and nuns were widely regarded as unproductive parasites. The monastic communities owned more than one-fourth of the land in England, and confiscation of their properties was presented as a way of reducing taxation. The lands were sold to the nobility for country estates, and buildings were dismantled for their materials. The role of the monasteries in local economies, social services, and learning was lost and not easily replaced. See also ANTICLERICALISM; COLD WAR AND EASTERN AND WESTERN CHRISTIANITY; LAICIZATION; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: FRANCE; SECULARISM AND SECULARIZATION; SPAIN.

Divination, foretelling future events or disclosing by magical methods what is hidden. Condemned throughout the Bible as superstitious* or the work of demons*.

Divine Command Ethics is an ethical theory that grounds judgments of good and evil in God's commands in natural* law and/or Scripture*.

Divine Liturgy of the Orthodox Churches is their primary act of worship. It is a eucharistic* service conducted with great solemnity and joy* and composed of prayers, litanies, Scripture readings, hymns, solemn processions, and participation in Holy Communion.

The Divine Liturgy is regarded as a presentation of and participation in the sacred meal Christ imparted to his disciples, called in Orthodox theology "the Mystical Supper." It is concomitantly viewed as a symbolic* rendering of the life of Christ, an eschatological revelation of the Banquet of the Kingdom*, an imitation of the angelic worship in heaven, and a bloodless sacrifice* (though not a repetition of the sacrifice of Calvary).

The Divine Liturgy has two parts: the Liturgy of the Catechumens*, in which Scripture is read and preached, and the Liturgy of the Faithful, in which Holy Communion is consecrated and offered. The chief versions of the Divine Liturgy are those of St. John* Chrysostom, St. Basil* the Great, and St. James*. These differ primarily in the composition of the anaphora*, the long prayer rehearsing God's wondrous works leading up to the words of institution and the epiclesis (invocation of the Holy Spirit). Because the joyous character of the Divine Liturgy was considered incongruous with a sense of penitential compunction, a separate service called the Presanctified* Liturgy was developed for distributing Communion on weekdays in Lent*.

The Divine Liturgy presupposes involvement by all worshippers in various ways. The Orthodox ecclesial ethos prohibits a clergyman from celebrating the Eucharist in the absence of others. In continuity with the ancient Christian practice of celebrating the Eucharist on the tombs of martyrs*, Orthodoxy requires the Divine Liturgy to be celebrated around the holy table (consecrated with the relics of martyrs*), or at least on an antimension, a decorated cloth into which relics are sewn.

Prosphora (loaves of leavened bread marked with a seal) and sweet fermented wine are prepared for consecration with prayers and ritual actions, along with specific commemorations of the saints of the day and prayers for the living and the departed.

The Orthodox Church regards Communion* as a real reception of the Body and Blood of Christ but does not accept the philosophical commitments inherent in the Latin doctrine of transubstantiation*. Clergy and laity receive both elements; since the 9th c., the laity has been communed by means of a spoon.

ARCHBISHOP DEMETRIOS TRAKATELLIS

Divine Office of the Liturgy of the Hours consists of the liturgical offices that mark the different times of the day (morning, midday, evening, nighttime) and is shaped by the liturgical seasons of the church year. In the East, it was established as a popular office of the laity* with their clergy, whereas in the West it came to be adopted by monastics* and other religious*. Today it has been rediscovered in the West as the prayer of the whole Church. See also LITURGICAL MOVEMENT; LITURGIES, HISTORY OF; LITURGY OF THE HOURS.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Divine Right (ius divinum), doctrine that both state and church authority originate from God (Rom 13:1–2) and are specified by God. The 17th c. was the high point of claims for the "divine right of kings" as well as for claims that episcopal or presbyterian forms of church governance are of divine right (iure divino). The modern concept of sovereignty is somewhat comparable: it can be ascribed to the people, the ruling or executive power, or a diversity of governing agencies.

Divorce, dissolution of marriage, permitted in ancient Israel (Deut 24:1–4) but condemned by Jesus as contrary to God's intention in creation (Mark 10:6–9; Gen 1:27, 2:24). In Mark 10:10–11, remarriage is considered to be adultery as long as the former spouse is living; in Matt 19:9, divorce is permitted in the case of adultery. Paul permits a Christian to separate from an unbelieving partner (1 Cor 7:15). See also SACRAMENTS IN WESTERN CHURCHES.

Docetism (from Gk dokein, "seeming," "apparent"). When Jesus was understood to be the manifestation of a preexistent* divine being, some Christians assumed that his humanity was merely "apparent." This notion, especially among Gnostics*, is opposed in 1 John 4:2–3 and 2 John 7, Ignatius*, and several anti-Gnostic writers. An analogous notion (which later influenced Islam*) was that Jesus was not crucified, having changed places with Simon* of Cyrene. Metaphorically, any way of thinking that relies solely on intellectual or spiritual factors, ignoring social and material factors, can be called "docetic."

Doctors of the Church, “teachers” officially recognized in the Roman Catholic Church because of their contributions to doctrine* owing to their knowledge and insight.

Dogma (Gk “opinion” or “decree”). In the LXX and NT, dogma was usually an “edict” (e.g. Dan 2:13; Luke 2:1). In patristic and medieval Latin theology, “dogma” referred to a “tenet,” whether true or false. Thus the “true” dogmas of the Catholic Church were opposed to the “false” dogmas of heretics*, or the “true” dogmas of the Waldenses* were opposed to the corrupt “dogmas” of the Roman Catholics. Dogmas were summary formulations of the beliefs of a church or movement, such as creeds* and, later, confessions and symbols (see Creeds, Symbols, and Confessions of Faith). Since the 18th c., “dogma” has been a technical term for an authoritative propositional truth taught by the churches as revealed by God and as binding on all members of these churches.

This relatively new use of the term “dogma” posits that certain beliefs may not be contested by believers and thus presupposes a particular view of faith: faith as “believing that” (Augustine’s fides quae creditur) (see Faith #3). This view of dogma can be based on both OT and NT texts (e.g. the Shema*, Deut 6:4–25; the apostolic tradition, 1 Cor 15:1–11) and the early councils that gave authoritative expressions of the “faith” about the Trinity* and Christology*. Yet the relative role of dogma varies among church traditions, according to the emphasis they put on faith as “believing that.”

For Eastern Orthodox* churches, the doctrinal formulations of the seven ecumenical* councils are alone received as dogmatically authoritative. This is so, despite what other see as a lack of specificity of these formulations, in part because Orthodox theology is experiential and doxological in character. With this experiential emphasis on faith, dogmas are not at the center and thus need not be specified further (see Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster: Introductory Entries).

For the Roman Catholic Church and its emphasis on “orthodoxy*” (as correct belief), it was essential to develop always more precise doctrinal formulations in medieval and modern Western councils (including Trent*, Vatican* I, and Vatican* II), against what was viewed as “nonorthodox” or even “heretical” views. Thus Vatican I (reaffirmed by Vatican II on these points) distinguished between two kinds of dogma: “solemn judgments” of popes (thus papal infallibility*, itself a “divinely revealed dogma”) and those taught by the “ordinary and universal *magisterium” i.e. by the bishops in communion with Rome. Heresy is then defined as obstinate doubt or denial of a dogma of the Roman Catholic Church (as Avery Dulles underscores).

For Protestants* the concept of dogma has generally been less central, expressed in confessions* or symbols, if not bracketed out (as for “noncreedal” churches, e.g. Baptist churches). Yet two trends can be distinguished. First, many Protestants who emphasize faith as “believing that” seek to formulate dogmas (doctrines) corresponding to the Reformation*. This means that dogmas must be constantly tested against Scripture* or against the Reformers’ interpretations of Scripture. Thus for Karl Barth* dogmas are doctrinal propositions acknowledged and confessed by the church as contained in the Word of God. In a less sophisticated way than Barth, Protestant fundamentalists* seek to formulate “biblical dogmas.”

Second, with more relational and experiential views of faith (see Faith #1, 2, 5, 6), other Protestants negatively or positively underscored the inculturated* character of dogma. For example, for liberal Protestants, such as Harnack*, (Catholic) dogmas were hellenized deformations of the gospel, and thus were authoritarian and legalistic. Yet 20th-c. ecumenists (e.g. Wolfhart Pannenberg, George Lindbeck, David Tracy, Elizabeth A. Johnson) affirmed the inculturated character of dogma in a positive light; for Lindbeck traditional dogmas were authoritative in their original contexts, but as the cultural setting shifted, dogmas lost their force and had to be replaced by new dogmas or new formulations of these dogmas.

Similarly, because they commonly emphasize orthopraxy*, contextual theologies and the Christian communities out of which they emerge tend to reformulate dogmas so that they might support the effort to address contextual issues (see Contextual Theologies; Feminist Theology Cluster; Liberation Theologies Cluster).

In the contemporary Charismatic* Movement (in its many forms), as in the mystic* and apophatic* movements through the centuries, the amplified emphases on the experiential character of faith pushes dogma (and “orthodoxy” as affirmation of dogma) to the side; it is not central. Even though members of such movements might commonly provide “orthodox” answers when asked what they believe about particular doctrines (answers that seem, therefore, very conservative and completely divorced from their particular life contexts), these beliefs are not what authoritatively shape their faith and their lives as Christians in life contexts marked by specific religious experiences. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER: STUDYING. DANIEL PATTE

Dome of the Rock, Muslim* shrine in Jerusalem*, built (691–92) on the site of the Jewish Temple*, believed to be where Muhammad* ascended to heaven.

Dominic (1170–1221). Born in Caleruega, Spain, he became canon of the Cathedral of Osma. During a journey to Scandinavia, he and his bishop, Diego, were confronted by Cathars* and their heresy* in Languedoc and by non-evangelized people in Prussia. These encounters were for them an apostolic vocation*. Pope Innocent III sent them to preach to the Cathars.

Since, following their doctrine, the Cathars lived in poverty*, the two men adopted evangelical poverty. Their preaching produced some fruit. Before returning to Spain, Bishop Diego founded a monastery at Prouille to shelter converted women (1207). Continuing to preach, Dominic was joined by some companions, the nucleus of a community that was supported by Bishop Fulk of Toulouse. Dominic obtained from the pope the establishment of a new order and immediately dispersed the first brothers to the nascent universities of Paris, Oxford, and Bologna.

Then Dominic divided his time between preaching in Italy (he died in Bologna) and the organization of the order, characterized by the superiors' election, begging, and intellectual formation. Contrary to traditional views, Dominic initiated neither the Inquisition* nor the rosary*. Since he left almost no writing, his spirit must be found in his work, namely the Dominican* Order of the Preachers.

GUY-THOMAS BEDOUELLE, OP

Dominican Order. Friars, nuns and now apostolic sisters, and laypeople (Dominican Laity) form the Order of Preachers. It was founded by Dominic* (early 13th c.) and quickly grew both in number and in quality. Albert* the Great and Thomas Aquinas* gave to the Dominican order a doctrine that became normative in the (Western) Church. Dominican mystics (Eckhart*, Suso*, Tauler*) had a far-reaching influence. During this period, the Dominicans were (among others) put in charge of the Inquisition*.

The 16th c. was a crisis period; the Protestant Reformation* was a harsh challenge for Dominicans, e.g. in England. But long after her death, Catherine* of Siena, OP (d1380), helped the order to overcome this crisis through the enduring influence of her call to reform through "the total love for God" achieved through repentance and renewal. Yet the order had a powerful voice in Spain*, with Vitoria, Las* Casas, and Luis of Granada, and (in the 17th c.) in Latin America, with Martin of Porrès and Rose* of Lima. The Dominican pope Pius V (d1572) enthusiastically led the Catholic reformation movement (see Catholic* Renewal) following the Council of Trent*. A long debate about the doctrine of grace* opposed Dominicans and Jesuits in that period.

The 17th and 18th c. were an age of mysticism* (among French Dominicans) and of prospering missions all the way to China* and the Philippines*, as well as the West Indies (presented in John Baptist Labat's remarkable narratives). The French Revolution was a blow for the Dominican order in France and beyond; while the Spanish provinces partially and temporarily disassociated themselves from the authorities of the order.

The 19th c. was a time of reconstruction, led by Edward Dominic Fenwick in the USA (from 1804) and Lacordaire* in France (c1840). One of Lacordaire's first companions, Vincent Jandel, became master general of the order. Congregations of sisters proliferated everywhere, with specialized apostolates in schools and hospitals. Cloistered monasteries were restored and new lay organizations organized.

The Dominican order participated in the Thomist* revival and founded the École Biblique de Jérusalem with Marie-Joseph Lagrange. In the early 20th c., the brothers were exiled from France* because of anticlerical* laws, while the English province developed under the direction of Bede Jarrett. Between 1920 and 1970, there was a remarkable growth; Dominican theologians (including Chenu and Congar) played an important role at Vatican* II. Yet the order did not escape the crisis that followed. By the end of the 20th c., some Dominican provinces were near extinction, but others are very much alive.

GUY-THOMAS BEDOUELLE, OP

Dominican Republic. Evangelization of the Caribbean began in Santo Domingo through the work of Bernardo Boil (1505), a Franciscan* friar*, previously named vicar apostolic of the new regions discovered by Columbus and conceded to the kings of Spain by Pope Alexander VI Borgia's bull Eximiae Devotionis Sinceritas (1493). Spiritual and temporal powers were so intertwined that the agents of the Inquisition* were commissioned (1516) to pursue Jews and heretics that might have settled in the island. Meanwhile, as early as 1501 and 1510, the first black slaves were brought to work, together with the Tainos (whom the conquistadores called "Indians"), in the gold mines. But after the mid-16th c., the Spaniards regularly brought boatloads of Africans as slaves to work in the sugar plantations and workshops. Church authorities demanded that the masters build chapels to facilitate the slaves' religious practice. In 1622 the bishops of Venezuela* and of Puerto* Rico met in council at Santo Domingo to discuss the baptism of slaves and their religious instruction, which the masters did not favor; this became a frequent source of conflict between masters and clergy.

The slaves' resistance took the form of "chestnut camps" (marronnages) – after the slaves escaped to remote areas in the mountains – as well as numerous, more ambivalent religious associations (e.g. of St. John Baptist, of the Virgin, of St. Cosme and Damiens) through which the slaves reappropriated their beliefs in African divinities by expressing them in the cult of saints, promoted by the Catholic* Renewal.

The slave insurrection that took place in Saint Domingue (now Haiti*) in the wake of the French Revolution (1789) had a great impact on the political and religious evolution of the Spanish colony (which became the Dominican Republic); it was invaded and occupied by Toussaint-Louverture (1801), who proclaimed the liberty of all the slaves, in the city of Santo Domingo.

When the Dominican Republic gained independence from the Haitians (1844), Roman Catholicism was proclaimed the state religion. Thus Freemasonry* and Protestant worship were prohibited (1862). A concordat* (1954) between President Trujillo and the Vatican further established Roman Catholicism as the religion of the Dominican state, which "recognizes the Church as a perfect society." Other denominations were tolerated, but not in public; there were several periods of persecution, especially of Jehovah's* Witnesses. Similarly, Vodou*, which had developed among African slaves since the 16th and 17th c., was rejected as essentially Haitian and foreign, and thus for both racial and nationalist reasons. The Dominican nation conceives of itself as composed of whites and mestizos* (from Spanish and Amerindian [Tainos] origins), and not of blacks – a racist ideology* omnipresent in Dominican society, which nevertheless includes a sizable minority of blacks (11%), in addition to mestizos* (73%) and whites (16%). In 1937 about 20,000 (black) Haitians who came to work in the country were slaughtered at the border, essentially for racist reasons, as were (in 1962) 200 members of a messianic religious movement that integrated Vodou* and the cult of saints. The Dominican national identity was defined during Trujillo's long dictatorship (1930–61) as simultaneously Hispanic, Roman Catholic, and Dominican. This conflated national identity was sometimes contested by the Catholic hierarchy and bishops who called for an alleviation of the regime's repressive practices against opponents. Nevertheless, the Roman Catholic Church remained closely associated with political authorities and tended to be intolerant of Protestants, including Evangelicals and Baptists, and the more numerous Pentecostal*/Charismatic* churches developed in the country after the US occupation (1916–24). See also HAITI.

Statistics: Population (2000): 8.5 million. Christians, 94.5% (Roman Catholics, 88.3%; Protestants [including independent Pentecostals/Charismatics], 5.6%; marginal Christians [Jehovah's Witnesses], 0.6%). (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

LAËNNEC HURBON

Dominus Vobiscum (Lat "The Lord be with you"), liturgical salutation to the congregation, answered by "And with your spirit"; based, respectively, on Ruth 2:4 and 2 Tim 4:22.

Domitian, Titus Flavius (51–96), Roman emperor (81–96), under whom Christians were probably persecuted (cf. Revelation*, Heb 12:4, 1 Clem 7), most likely because they were denied the Jews' exemption from taking part in civil religious ceremonies or the imperial cult. In the imperial cult, Domitian was treated as a "present deity"; temples were dedicated to him during his lifetime. See also PERSECUTIONS.

Domitilla, Flavia (d c100), wife of Titus Flavius Clemens, a possible successor as emperor. Clemens and Domitilla were accused of "atheism" and leading a "Jewish way of life," which could mean that they were Christians or sympathizers; Clemens was executed (95) and Domitilla was exiled. Christians may have begun to use her catacombs before her death.

Donation of Constantine, a forgery in which Constantine* granted to Pope Sylvester supreme authority in the church and temporal rule over Rome (understood, after the 11th c., to mean the Roman Empire in the West). It is usually thought to have been produced in Rome (750–80), but others have suggested it was written in France, perhaps as early as the disputes surrounding Louis* the Pious (830–33). Even when it was assumed that the Donation was historical, some (including Dante* and Marsilius* of Padua) asserted that Constantine never had the right to give the Empire in the West to the pope, or the pope to receive it. Various doubts were expressed about its authenticity, and Lorenzo Valla demonstrated that it was a forgery in 1439.

Donatism, historically, a movement that separated itself from the Western Church in North Africa; doctrinally, any tendency that emphasizes the personal holiness* of ministers and church members, making such holiness the definitive mark* of the true church or the source of the validity of the sacraments*.

The Donatist Movement grew out of the great persecution* (303–5) under Diocletian*. Rigorists denounced as traditores those clergy who had handed over copies of the Scriptures and viewed them unfit to administer sacraments and ordinations. They rejected the bishop of Carthage, Caecilian*, because he had been consecrated by an alleged traditor, and elected a rival bishop, Majorinus, soon succeeded by Donatus.

The Donatists considered themselves the only authentic church. Their zeal for holiness was found in an earlier African, Tertullian*, and they could claim Cyprian* in their support, specifically his demand for the rebaptism of persons baptized by the impure. Ethnic and regional factors played a role: the Donatists were especially strong in Berber areas; they gave voice to economic misery and class inequities, most clearly through the violent Circumcellions*.

Against the Donatists' regionalism, Augustine* insisted on the universality of the church. Against their claim that the sacraments depend on the purity of the minister, he argued that Christ is the principal agent, acting through the sacramental signs and thus bypassing personal failings (see Ex opere operato). Against their self-identification as a pure church, he argued that the church is inevitably a mixture of wheat and tares, with a clear separation being made only at the Last Judgment (Matt 13:24–30).

Reunion was proposed by the Catholic bishops (401), and a decisive conference was held under the auspices of the Empire in Carthage (411). Gradually the Donatists were reconciled with the Catholic Church through a combination of pressure and leniency.

Throughout the history of Christianity, purist tendencies have been called "Donatist." During the Gregorian* reform, Cardinal Humbert* was accused of Donatism because he attacked ordinations tainted by simony* and urged the laity to boycott priests guilty of simony and Nicolaitism*. Other reform movements (e.g. Waldensian*, Anabaptist*, Pietist*, Evangelical*) have been called Donatist insofar as they make personal holiness a test of membership or ordination, or claim to be the only true church. Conciliarists*, Protestants*, and Gallicans* attacked the "Roman Church" for claiming to be the only true church; one task of the Second Vatican* Council was to show that the church is more Catholic than Roman.

EUGENE TESELLE

Donne, John (1572–1631), was born to a prosperous Roman Catholic family. His mother was a descendant of Sir Thomas More*, and her brother was head of the Jesuit* mission in England. Donne was educated at home by Catholic tutors and attended Hart Hall, Oxford, preferred by Catholics. Prevented by his religion from obtaining a university degree, Donne sought patronage and a place at court. In 1593 his younger brother was arrested for harboring a Catholic priest and died in prison. Donne apparently abandoned Catholicism at about this time and later wrote a number of withering satirical attacks on Catholics (Pseudo-Martyr, 1610), especially Jesuits (Ignatius, His Conclave, 1611). Eventually persuaded by friends and King James himself to take holy orders, he did so (1615), ultimately becoming dean of Saint Paul's Cathedral. Renowned during his ecclesiastical career for his exciting sermons (more than 150) and his meditations, Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1624), he wrote "metaphysical" love poems and religious lyrics equally bold in language and metrical effects, marked by wit, conceits, argument, and intellectualism. His erotic poetry often uses religious imagery, and his religious verse is sometimes sexual (e.g. Holy Sonnets 10 and 18).

JOHN PLUMMER

Dormition (Lat "falling asleep"), festival in the Eastern Church that corresponds to the Assumption* of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the Western Church (August 15).

Dort, Dordt, or Dordrecht, Synod of (1618–19). In 1610 the followers of Arminius*, known as the Remonstrants*, including Jan Uytenbogaert and Johan van Oldenbarneveldt, suggested revisions to the Belgic* Confession, softening the Reformed doctrine of predestination*. While the Amsterdam merchants and the States General favored tolerance in doctrinal matters, the ministers and people in less urban areas tended to be zealous Calvinists*; thus religious passions were brought into political life.

The military leader, Maurice or Maurits, harnessed the populist spirit of the Counter-Remonstrants. After his troops occupied towns and expelled Remonstrant magistrates, Maurits forced the States General to call a national synod at Dort in 1618–19, with the Remonstrants attending not as participants but as the accused. It was the most representative of all Reformed gatherings, with representatives from Switzerland, the Palatinate, England, and Scotland, yet its decrees have been adopted only by the Dutch churches of the Netherlands, South Africa, and the USA.

The synod's "five points" asserted unconditional election*, limited atonement*, total depravity, irresistible grace*, and perseverance of saints. Remonstrant ministers were removed; in a parallel trial, Oldenbarneveldt was executed in what historians usually call a "judicial murder", and Grotius* escaped life imprisonment by being smuggled to safety.

Dositheos (Lat Dositheus) (1641–1707), patriarch of Jerusalem. Born in the Peloponnesus, as an orphaned youth he entered the Holy Apostles Monastery in Corinth. Appointed archbishop of Caesarea (1666), then exarch of Jassy, Romania (1667), he was named patriarch of Jerusalem at the age of 28 (1669), serving in that capacity until his death.

Through his extensive travels and prolific publishing efforts (stemming mainly from the print shop he founded in Jassy), Dositheos defended the Orthodox faith against both Protestant and Roman Catholic theologies, notably in the "Twelve Chapters," published posthumously (1715) as a history of the patriarchs of Jerusalem with a strong attack against the pope of Rome.

The crowning glory of Dositheos's career was his convocation (1672) of the Synod of Jerusalem, or Council of Bethlehem, its actual locus; its purpose was to condemn the Calvinistic "Eastern Confession of the Christian Faith"

(1631), attributed by many to the ecumenical patriarch Cyril Lucaris*. In the Synod's acts, the lengthy condemnation (rejecting unconditional predestination* and justification* by faith* alone) was followed by Dositheos's own "Confession of Faith," composed of 18 decrees, four questions, and an epilogue. This Confession teaches the true faith of the Eastern Church and is regarded by many as a symbolic or canonical book of the Eastern Church.

RONALD POPIVCHAK

Dostoyevsky, Fyodor Mikhaylovich (1821–81), a Russian writer, created a new genre of psychological religious novels, including the masterpieces Crime and Punishment, The Idiot, Demons, and The Brothers Karamazov. He saw writing as a religious mission to restore the divine image of fallen humans.

Born to an Orthodox family, he joined the Petrashevsky group of atheists and revolutionaries, was arrested, and sentenced to death. He saw as a kind of resurrection and the beginning of a new life the last-minute commutation of his sentence to four years in Siberia, where the only book he had was a copy of the NT, which he retained until his death.

Dostoyevsky, like a Russian Dante*, offers a journey through a psychological hell, purgatory, and paradise. His "hell" also has a social embodiment – gloomy Saint Petersburg crowded with poor people. Fiery passions, despair, spitefulness, fixed ideas, false theories that justify murder, or the building of an "ideal" society by violence bring hell to one's soul. He believed in natural sin and showed how destructive ideas infect the mind and, consequently, freeze the heart, a psychological punishment. He presented characters in extremes of sinfulness and holiness. We are redeemed and saved through suffering, repentance, and love. Dostoyevsky's Christ-like characters mostly refer to the Russian Orthodox traditions of kenotic* monasticism* and "folly" for Christ's sake (see Holy Fool). Dostoyevsky sees the divine image* in all people, despite their sins. Many of his writings are apocalyptic* and express his belief in the all-forgiving Christ.

ELENA VOLKOVA

Douai-Reims Bible, English translation made for Catholics by the English College, located first in Douai and then in Reims (NT published 1582, OT 1609–10). Based on the Vulgate* rather than the original languages, its vocabulary is highly Latinate; it was utilized but also criticized by the translators of the Authorized* Version.

Double Monastery, religious house with men and women living separately but with a common superior, usually a noble woman (e.g. Macrina*, Melania* the Elder, Hilda*, Etheldreda*).

Doubt, strictly speaking, “hesitation” (Gk distazo, “to be of two minds,” “to hesitate”; in Plato and Matt 14:31, 28:17). It is the opposite of having a firm conviction* or faith*. Thus different views of doubt correspond to different views of faith. (1) Doubt can involve a withholding of assent, a hesitation to commit oneself to faith in the sense of trust. (2) It can reflect a lack of trust, and thus irresolution, which might lead to moral failure. (3) It can be a matter of doubting a belief, i.e. the content of faith (fides quae creditur), because of deliberation or inquiry (as emphasized in the Greco-Roman world) or because of new information or new perspectives in the light of which firmly held beliefs crumble; Victorian Britain gave full expression to this kind of doubt, and the results varied: atheism*, agnosticism*, or revisions of traditional belief. (4) Doubt can entail calling into question the view that faith is the way toward understanding, emphasizing the difference between faith and knowledge. (5) Finally, doubt can refer to a lack of experience of God or to the experience of the silence or distance of God, a kind of doubt that is frequently associated with apophatic* experiences of the mystery of God. In this case, doubt is a part of faith, rather than opposed to faith; thus the disciples worshipped the risen Christ even as they doubted (Matt 28:17, literal translation). Then, with Augustine*, one can find consolation in “I doubt, therefore I am,” or, with Kierkegaard*, one can relish the continued uncertainty and instability. See also FAITH. DANIEL PATTE

Douglass, Frederick (1817–95), best known as an anti-slavery lecturer, editor of abolitionist newspapers, and author of three autobiographies, was licensed as a local preacher of the African* American Methodist Episcopal Zion Church (1839). Douglass denounced Christian slaveholders and the clerics who defended them. He ridiculed a program to distribute Bibles to the slaves as a travesty, arguing that slaves had no legal right to own anything. His religion focused less on vicarious atonement* than on the imitation* of Christ and a belief in a moral government of the universe. His public friendship with the atheist Robert G. Ingersoll, who took public stands against racial injustice, led to accusations of heresy*. Douglass responded by observing that “the loving Jesus” had given proof of “his Messiahship” when he “especially identified himself with the lowest classes of suffering [people].” Douglass’s assertion that geological evidence contradicted the biblical account of creation led to another accusation of heresy; he defended himself in an oration on Galileo, “It Moves, or the Philosophy of Reform” (1884). WILSON J. MOSES

Doxology, glorification of the three persons of the Trinity*, originally added after the recitation of a psalm.

Dowry, payment given with the wife at the time of marriage*.

Dualism, a philosophical or theological doctrine that posits an irreducible “twoness” or duality between God and matter (as in Plato*), or between good and evil (as in Manichaeism*), or between “spiritual” humanity and nonspiritual persons (as in Gnosticism*), or between mind and body (as in Descartes*). Dualism seems to be supported by certain aspects of experience: the differences between male and female, inner and outer, thought and matter, good intentions and bitter defeat, oppressors and victims, or simply “ours” and “theirs.”

Dualism may be resolved by making one factor the source of the other (e.g. God creating* matter), or by interpreting one factor as a transformation of the other (e.g. seeing evil* as a corruption of what is good), or by seeing both as manifestations of an underlying unity (e.g. pantheism or interpretations of mind and body as diverse modalities of the same reality).

The Christian doctrine of the Trinity* seemed to some in the early church to involve dualism: if the Father and the Son are fully divine, this seems to imply two eternal principles, and even three when the Spirit is considered. This potential dualism was resolved by emphasizing that the Father eternally begets the Son, as light comes from the sun, naturally but freely.

Moral dualism may involve contrasts not only between good and evil behavior, but between honor* and shame, purity and pollution. Moral dualism is resolved through the appropriate moral attitude and behavior marked by goodness, honor, or purity.

Modern anthropology* reinscribes forms of dualism that privilege the mind over the body, the spirit over the flesh, by viewing the ideal human person as a rational, individual, autonomous, free subject. Then, as feminist* theological anthropologists* show, this dualism supports views of humanity in which men are connected with such characteristics as reason, will, aggression, and dominance, while women are linked with the body, nature, emotion, and submission. "Binary" thinking privileges one factor over another, since it operates in terms of a and not-a. It is preferable to think in terms of "difference," e.g. a and b. EUGENE TESELLE

DuBois, W. E. B. (1868–1963), is one of the great figures in African American intellectual history. He was a philosopher, sociologist, educator, civil rights activist, and pan-Africanist. DuBois attended Fisk College (1885–88), and was profoundly confronted there by overt racial* discrimination, which he had not experienced during his youth in Great Barrington, Massachusetts. DuBois's experience in the South deepened and solidified his commitment to racial uplift through education, entrepreneurship, and organization. After leaving Fisk, DuBois studied at Harvard, earning B.A., M.A., and Ph.D. degrees. His dissertation was entitled The Suppression of the African Slave Trade in America (1896). His training in philosophy, history, economics, and sociology provided DuBois with critical insight into the US dilemma, the race problem. Among his earliest works in social research is The Philadelphia Negro (1896), based on his research for the University of Pennsylvania. After completing this research, DuBois returned to the South, where he taught at Atlanta University. There he vested himself in the social history of the race as reflected in black expressive and institutional cultures such as in the Negro Spirituals* and the Black* Church. No text is more frequently read in African American cultural studies than DuBois's The Souls of Black Folk (1905). Social reform through civil rights activism dominated most of DuBois's mature life. No controversy catapulted him into radical, racial reform as much as his exchange with Booker T. Washington's conservative reform platform expressed in Washington's Atlanta Exposition speech in 1895. DuBois called it "the Atlanta compromise." DuBois's position on race reform was radical and made him one of the great voices for the NAACP (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People). Most of his writings during the years before his expatriation from the USA to Ghana (1957–1963) survive in The Crisis Writings (1972). The Washington debate demarcated DuBois as advocating a subversive Christianity that promoted political equality, prophetic social witness, and absolute social justice embodied in concrete human relations. From 1957 until his death in 1963, DuBois devoted himself to supporting postcolonial Africa. He died in Accra, Ghana.

VICTOR ANDERSON

Dulia (from Gk douleia, "service"), veneration* of the saints, contrasted with *hyperdulia toward Mary and latria, worship*, of God alone.

Duns Scotus, John (1265–1308), Franciscan* logician, metaphysician, theologian. He was born in Scotland, studied and taught at Oxford University, and taught in Paris (1300–7) and Cologne (1307–8). Major works include his commentaries on Aristotle's* Logic, Metaphysics, and De Anima, Peter* Lombard's Book of Sentences, Quodlibetal questions, and De Primo Principio, a philosophical demonstration of the existence and attributes of God. He was famous for his position on the Incarnation*, univocity of being, rational will*, primacy of freedom*, and contingency of the created* order.

Scotus belongs to the second generation of scholars who were critical of Aristotle*, following the Parisian Condemnation of 1277. As a Franciscan, he reacted against the neo-Augustinian positions of Henry of Ghent on the analogy* of being and the will's freedom. He reacted as well to the intellectualist positions of Godfrey of Fontaines. His teaching on the rational will was inspired by Aristotle's theory of causality and Anselm's* teaching on the two affections in the will. His demonstration of God's existence (De Primo Principio) brings together Platonic* and Aristotelian arguments for a first being.

Scotus's Franciscan identity is evident in his writings. He affirms the primacy of love* for God (Deus diligendus est) as the foundation for natural law. He rejects the intellectualist and naturalist project of post-1260 Aristotelian ethics in order to highlight the rationality of ordered loving. His attention to the particular individual (haecceitas) corrects Aristotelian hylomorphism and defends a unique unrepeatable principle of identity belonging to each created being. His affirmation of the univocal concept being defends the possibility of language* about God without reducing the transcendent to the sphere of immanence. His clarification that theology is a practical science rather than a speculative endeavor continues the Franciscan attention to praxis* as the full perfection of human nature. His defense of the contingency of the created order, the centrality of divine love and freedom, and the Incarnation as independent of original sin offer a Christocentric vision of human history that places divine abundant love at the center of Christianity.

Often mistakenly contrasted with Thomas Aquinas*, Scotus is properly understood as an early-14th-c. theologian who rejected the post-1277 return to Augustinianism* and who sought to refine the arguments in the debates surrounding human and divine freedom, the nature of individuation, and the rationality of faith. His thought was extremely influential in the 14th–17th c., and his legacy can be identified in thinkers like Suárez*, Christian Wolff, Kant*, Charles Sanders Peirce, and Heidegger*.

MARY BETH INGHAM, CSJ

Duplessis-Mornay, Philippe (1549–1623), French Huguenot* statesman, military leader, writer, theologian. An early proponent of toleration for Reformed* worship in France, he pressed for a national council of Protestants and Catholics, whose purpose would be to reform the church in accord with an ancient Gallic model. Duplessis-Mornay also appealed for a European Protestant union to include general synods of Protestant theologians and a military league of princes. He was a lifelong adviser and diplomat in the service of Henry of Navarre, later King Henry* IV of France, and participated in the negotiations that culminated in the Edict of Nantes* (1598) and the end of religious warfare. Duplessis-Mornay wrote several important religious and political treatises. His Traité de l'Église (1578) severely criticized the Roman Church, while De la vérité de la religion chrétienne (1581) explored truths of the Christian faith through a study of classical authors. De l'institution, usage et doctrine du saint sacrement de l'Eucharistie en l'Église (1598) attacked the pope as Antichrist and led to a fiery public exchange with the Bishop of Evreux. He was most likely among the principal contributors to the anonymous Vindiciae contra Tyrannos (1579), an influential political tract that allowed for resistance to a monarch who violated Christian faith.

RAYMOND A. MENTZER

Durand, Marie (1715–76), emblematic figure of French Protestant courage and resistance in the face of religious intolerance and persecution following the revocation of the Edict of Nantes* and the proscription of the Reformed Church of France (1685). Imprisoned in 1730 while a teenager, with many other Huguenot* women who refused to deny their faith, she remained in the Tour de Constance (Aigues-Mortes, Southern France) for 38 years, until 1768, when everyone was released. The word “register” (“resist” in the local patois), which she and other prisoners carved into the prison wall, summarized the meaning of their lives and their faith.

RAYMOND A. MENTZER

Durham, William. See ASSEMBLIES OF GOD.

Durkheim, Emile David (1858–1917), along with his followers, referred to as the Année Sociologique group (Paris), established sociology* as a university discipline. Along with Weber* and Marx*, Durkheim is generally viewed as a founding father of sociology. For him sociology covered a wide range of subjects – theory, method, social division of labor, suicide, law, art, morals, among others. Religion*, however, was of supreme importance; for him it was crucial for understanding any society. Although the son of a rabbi, as a critical rationalist he rejected the truth value of all religions. However, there were no “false religions”: all were true insofar as they were at the heart, and vital to the well-being, of the society in which they were located. They provided society with cohesion, morality, and social energy (dynamism, collective effervescence).

In The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (1912), he defined religion not in terms of a god, gods, or spirits, but rather as a system of beliefs and practices relative to sacred things that unite people in a single community. His notion of the sacred* was that which is determined by society and is inviolable. He contrasted it with the profane*, but both terms were subdivided into beneficent and malevolent forces. His emphasis on the sacred proved particularly fruitful in the analysis of religion and societies. He also emphasized the great importance of ritual*, correcting the overly rational approach to examining religion, which concerned itself mainly with belief. He classified rites as positive, negative, and piacular (atoning). Ritual is contrasted with belief, but it is open to debate which, for Durkheim, was sociologically prior, or whether they had equal significance.

A too simple reading of Durkheim suggests that he equates religion with society. The relation between the two is complex. Nonetheless, stressing the social component of religion has been a most fruitful source approach to the study of religion. Durkheim's disregard of the role of the individual in religion brought criticism, especially from Western Christian theologians.

In the face of the decline of Christianity in the West, Durkheim supported the notion that the emerging religion would be the cult of the individual*, which he held was based on fundamental moral ideas found in Christianity. He wrote little about Judaism and was an admirer of medieval Catholicism. On his deathbed, he declared that he had received no personal consolation from his study of religion. See also SECULARIZATION AND DESECULARIZATION IN EUROPE AND NORTH AMERICA.

WILLIAM S. F. PICKERING

Dwane, James Matta (1848–1916), left the Methodist Church to join Mokone's Ethiopian Church in 1896. He later assumed the leadership of the Church and negotiated links with the American African Methodist Episcopal Church. The latter's failure to recognize African leadership forced his withdrawal, leading him and his church to join the Anglican Church as the Order of Ethiopia. See also SOUTH AFRICA.

MOKGETHI MOTLHABI

Dwight, Timothy (1752–1817), Congregationalist minister, poet, theologian, educator. Grandson of Jonathan Edwards*, Dwight was educated at Yale College, served as a chaplain during the American Revolution, and was one of the founders of the first school of literary criticism in the USA, the "Connecticut Wits." His literary work, marked by millennial* themes, was strongly patriotic in tone, making him a vocal proponent of US exceptionalism. Dwight's most famous poem, The Triumph of Infidelity, was a shrill denunciation of European religious skepticism. In 1795 he returned to Yale as president. Under his leadership, Yale became the premier training ground for pastors and theologians, among them Lyman Beecher* and Nathaniel William Taylor (see New Haven Theology), who would shape 19th-c. Evangelical religion. Though he was not a systematic or highly skilled theologian, Dwight exerted a powerful influence on New England Christianity. Suspicious of the New Divinity theology of Samuel Hopkins* and Nathaniel Emmons, Dwight translated the religious practices of the Puritans and the Calvinist theology of Edwards* into popular language that resonated with westward-moving frontier folk. Dwight's popularity extended well into the 19th c., notably in his five-volume Theology, Explained and Defended, a series of 173 sermons he preached in the Yale Chapel.

JOHN R. FITZMIER

Dying, Care of the, an Eastern Orthodox Perspective. The dying process compels most people to take stock of their lives and confronts them with numerous challenges. With the diagnosis of a terminal illness, spiritual issues, often set aside or ignored for most of life, arise both for the dying person and for many of the caregivers – family, friends, or health care workers. The broad spiritual questions as to life's meaning and/or one's relationship with the Divine often find expression in more specific concerns regarding pain and suffering*, patience and endurance, loneliness and isolation, the dignity and value of every human being, honesty and openness, as well as in questions regarding prayer and its comfort, the meaning of dreams, visions, and other end-of-life phenomena, the actual death, the soul's* departure from the body*, and the afterlife.

The clergy and lay Christians who visit the sick seek to offer insight into the specific spiritual question(s) raised by the dying person, often addressed to family members, friends, or health care professionals. The dying person and those around the person can find hope* and peace when clergy and lay visitors help them to deal with these difficult questions.

The Orthodox Church defines the sacrament* of holy unction as healing and forgiveness. Since physical recovery may not be God's will, the prayer of Christ that God's will be done is at the heart of the sacrament. By the anointing of the sick body, the person's suffering is sanctified and united to the suffering of Christ; the wounds of the flesh are consecrated: strength is given that the suffering may lead not to the death of the soul* of the sick, but to eternal salvation in the resurrection and life of the Kingdom* of God. Healing is not a final goal; it is merely a sign of God's mercy and further opportunity to live for God and for others.

As death approaches, the Orthodox priest recites special prayers for the "separation of the soul and body." The sacrament of holy unction is not reserved for the moment of death; it does not constitute the "last rites" or "extreme unction" (as is sometimes thought). Holy unction is the sacrament for the complete restoration of a sick person, whatever the illness may be.

In contrast, the Roman Catholic Church previously viewed holy unction as extreme unction with emphasis on resolving guilt. However, the newest edition of the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1499–1532, 1997) shows that Rome’s understanding of holy unction falls more in line with Eastern Orthodox Christianity.

MATTHEW P. BINKEWICZ

Dyophysites, advocates of two natures, divine and human, in Christ, opposed by the Miaphysites* (and Monophysites*). For dyophysites in the Western and Antiochene churches, the Council of Chalcedon* (451) supported dyophysitism; Eastern Orthodox Churches did not espouse this interpretation of Chalcedon.

E

Easter, the annual celebration of the resurrection* of Christ, called the Pasch (Gk and Lat Pascha; similar terms in the Romance languages) or Passover. The English term “Easter” and the similar German term are of Anglo-Saxon origin (related to a spring goddess of fertility, Eostre).

Celebrations of Easter. The early church continued the observance of the Jewish Passover, giving it additional meaning (1 Cor 5:7). For several centuries, the Pasch was a single event, celebrating Christ’s death and resurrection, often with an evening vigil followed after midnight by baptisms, since baptism was viewed as a union with Christ in his death and resurrection, renouncing the devil and evil, and making a transition from the society of sin to the society of the redeemed.

The observance of “Holy Week” – from Palm Sunday to the Last Supper, Good* Friday, and the Pasch – emerged in the 4th c. in connection with the holy places identified under Constantine* and Helen*. This became a “historicizing” of the liturgy, an opportunity to relive the events at the place of their occurrence in order to share their power, including Christ’s resurrection as a victory over the power of darkness – hence the joyful proclamation “Christ is risen!”

Easter as the paschal mystery* of human redemption* from evil powers including death* has been celebrated in the Northern Hemisphere with metaphors and symbols of new life related to spring folk festivals, including the old custom of hunting for “Easter eggs.”

Controversy over the Date of Easter. The Quartodecimans* of Syria and Asia Minor continued to observe the 14th day of the lunar month (Jewish Passover). In Rome it was the 16th day; subsequently, it was celebrated only on a Sunday, on or after the 16th day. The Council of Nicaea* (325) decreed that the Pasch was to be observed on the Sunday after the full moon following the spring equinox (between March 21 and April 25).

Controversies over the date continued up to the 7th c.; because of the use of different calendar* systems, observances were sometimes up to four weeks apart. Dionysius* Exiguus (5th–6th c.) calculated much used paschal tables and in the process dated the years before and after the supposed birth of Christ.

The Gregorian calendar (1582), which made a 10-day adjustment in accordance with the actual length of days, led to a new kind of dissension. Catholic Europe adopted the calendar, while the Anglican Church kept the old system until 1752, and the Eastern and Uniate* churches remain divided. See also CALENDARS; LITURGICAL YEAR.

DANIEL PATTE and EUGENE TESSELLE

Eastern Catholic Churches, autonomous (Lat sui iuris) churches, in full communion with the bishop of Rome, the pope. These ecclesiastic branches of various Eastern or Oriental Orthodox* churches maintain the language, liturgy, and canon law of the various Eastern or Oriental Orthodox churches from which they separated in order to unite with the Roman Catholic Church. See also UNIATE CHURCHES.

Eastern Churches, a shorthand designation for all Orthodox churches, including both Eastern Orthodox* churches and Oriental Orthodox* (non-Chalcedonian) churches.

Eastern Orthodox Churches. See ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER.

East Timor. See TIMOR-LESTE.

Eastward Position, position of the celebrant during the Eucharist* in the Roman Catholic Church, standing with his back to the people (the altars of churches usually face east), a tradition that has been observed since the early Middle Ages in France, then elsewhere in Catholicism, until Vatican* II changed the position (the celebrant now faces the people). This was a controversial issue in the Church of England in the 16th and 17th c.

Ebenezer (Heb “stone of hope”), monument erected by Samuel* after the routing of the Philistines (1 Sam 7:10–12) at the same place where Israel had earlier been defeated and lost the Ark of the Covenant (1 Sam 4:1–11).

Ebionites (Heb ebionim, “the poor”), possibly the name of members of the early Christian community in Jerusalem (cf. Gal 2:10). The term came to be applied later to Jewish Christians who continued to observe many features of the Jewish law, rejected Paul and his doctrines, and understood Jesus to be a man on whom the Holy Spirit descended at his baptism. Their relation to the Clementine* Literature and to the Nazarenes*, another Jewish Christian group mentioned in the 4th c., is a matter of continuing controversy and inquiry.

Ebionites, Gospel of the, a Jewish-Christian gospel known through seven fragments quoted by Epiphanius* and possibly through other Jewish Christian writings (e.g. the sayings of Jesus in the [pseudo] Clementine* Literature).

The name does not derive from a legendary founder called “Ebion” (as Epiphanius thought) but from the Hebrew ebionim, “the poor,” an honorific title among pious Jews. These Ebionites* probably lived in Transjordan or Syria.

In the late 2nd c., the Ebionites created a gospel for their own use, which they ascribed to Matthew but which was based on all three synoptic* Gospels (excluding John). The infancy stories were omitted, indicating Jewish-Christian reservations about the virginal conception of Jesus.

The fact that the Ebionites were vegetarians led to other revisions in their gospel: John the Baptist eats “honey cakes” instead of “locusts”; Jesus denies ever wanting to eat meat at the Passover meal (in the new version of Luke 22:15); and Jesus is critical of all sacrifices.

At the baptism of Jesus, the heavenly voice further quotes the second part of Ps 2:7: “Today I have begotten you” (see Luke 3:22). This makes possible an Adoptionist* or even a docetic* interpretation (according to Epiphanius, the Ebionites favored an “angelic Christology*”). See also APOCRYPHA CLUSTER: APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS; HEBREWS, GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE; NAZARENES, GOSPEL OF THE.

HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

Ecclesiastes, one of the Megilloth*, responds to a collapsed moral order by denying that human existence has any meaning. A thematic statement about life’s futility begins and ends the unknown Qoheleth’s reflections, and poems that follow and precede create a chiasmic structure. An opening inscription and two epilogues comment on Qoheleth’s profession as a teacher of wisdom reaching out to ordinary laity.

The book’s language and Aramaic influence, apparent in its vocabulary, grammar, and syntax, indicate a late Ptolemaic or, more probably, a Hellenistic period (c250 BCE) characterized by multitiered government, economic entrepreneurial ventures, and rapidly changing fortune. The fiction of Solomonic authorship seems intended to legitimize unorthodox views: death cancels everything; wisdom cannot achieve its goal; the deity is unknowable; the world is amoral; and pleasure commends itself. Indeed, Qoheleth advances the view that humans and animals share a single fate, but he also urges those who can to enjoy life. Affinities between Ecclesiastes and Greek philosophy suggest that Qoheleth was forging philosophical discourse in a linguistic system poorly equipped for abstract thinking. His apparent Epicureanism and coolness toward a distant deity vexed some readers – hence the epilogue’s orthodox advice: fear God* and keep the Ten* Commandments. Modern nonreligious people are familiar with the refrain “Vanity of vanities, says Qoheleth, all is vanity,” and the poem stating that there is a time for everything.

Early church fathers valued the book for its depiction of existence without Christ, and to offset its pessimism Jewish leaders eventually associated it with the joyful days of Sukkot.

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Ecclesiasticus, Book of. See WISDOM OF BEN SIRA (or Sirach [Gk] or Ecclesiasticus [Lat]).

Ecclesiology, doctrine and discussion about the church* in relation to God, human history, and salvation. See also CHURCH, CONCEPTS AND LIFE CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRIES.

Eckhart, Meister (c1260–1327), philosopher, theologian, preacher, administrator. John Eckhart studied in Cologne, where he met Albert* the Great. A lecturer in the Sentences at the University of Paris (1294), he was recalled to Erfurt to be prior of the Dominican Studium. He returned to Paris (1302) as a master in theology and wrote Questiones parisiensis. Provincial of Saxony in Northern Germany (1303–11), he produced a collection of sermons, Paradise of the Intelligent Soul, an excellent example of Latin meeting the German vernacular. In Paris for a second mastership (1311), he wrote the incomplete Opus tripartitum (“Work of Propositions,” “Work of Questions,” and “Work of Expositions,” surviving in the form of commentaries on the Scriptures). Interpreting Scripture with the help of natural science and philosophy and influenced by Maimonides* Guide of the Perplexed, he came to understand the spiritual or “parabolic” meaning of Scripture. This is shown by his six surviving Scripture commentaries from his time at Strasbourg and Cologne (1313–27), when he gained a reputation as a preacher in the vernacular.

For Eckhart, God is the ultimate “Ground” (Grunt) from which all things flow in trinitarian pattern. His “God-talk,” carefully crafted with hermeneutical depth and precision, is based on the idea of Albert* the Great about the flowing of all things from God. For human beings, the return to God culminates in a breakthrough to simple divinity. In referring to God as one, Eckhart introduces a dialectical way of speaking in which God negates all that is knowable, leading to God as absolute wholeness (following Neoplatonic* views). His collection of sermons provides central metaphors of Grunt/Ground/God and uses the patristic doctrine of the birth of God in the human soul*.

Eckhart’s careful distinctions were not always understood by his audience. Charged with heresy* related to the “Free* Spirit Movement” (1326), Eckhart defended himself in public; his case was moved to the papal court in Avignon. The papal bull In agro dominico (1329) officially condemned him on 28 propositions (17 held to be heretical and 11 “evil sounding,” although they could be given a Catholic meaning). Eckhart denied making them. Yet they are found in his works. In the 19th and 20th c., Eckhart was “rediscovered” as a master of the spiritual* life.

JEREMIAH M. HACKETT

ECOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Ecology and Christianity

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Ecology and Christianity: Eastern Orthodox Perspective

Ecology and Christianity: Ecofeminist Theology

Ecology and Christianity: Ecotheology

1) Introductory Entry

Ecology and Christianity. How do Christians view nature and their relation to the natural world? Christian theology*, like all theologies in any religious tradition, elucidates and posits the foundational theological frame in which believers and interpreters conceive of God, humans, nature, and their interrelations. These foundational frames make room for a variety of interpretations, but limit their range. Thus mainstream Western Christian traditions frame their conception of God*, humans (see Anthropology Cluster), and nature in ways that ascribe very little, if any, theological or spiritual relevance to nature.

As critiques often note, the devaluation of nature is related to anthropocentric presuppositions that frame most interpretations of Scripture and tradition. This anthropocentrism is rooted mainly in the influence of Greek classic philosophy on early and medieval Christianity.

Creation* stories (Gen 1, 2) are often interpreted as a divine command for humans to reign over the earth; in effect, humans are viewed as co-creators with God of the rest of creation (Gen 2:8–20). This perspective might eventually be ecologically sustainable, as foundational for a stewardship* theology; a number of ecologically aware theologians have suggested it. Humans have a unique responsibility to take care of the earth. But this interpretation of the creation stories also easily becomes a justification for a more or less unlimited right to utilize and exploit natural resources and animals to satisfy human needs and interests.

The redemption* theological key concepts – sin*, atonement*, salvation*, and Christology* – are also traditionally framed in an anthropocentric perspective. Sin is primarily a human activity or stance opposed to God or other humans, while human acts against nature and animals are less relevant, if at all. Consequently, salvation concerns humans exclusively. Furthermore, for certain traditions, salvation is envisioned as the rescuing of individuals from the sinfulness of the earth (the evil material “world”) so that they can attain a state of grace in a heavenly or divine realm.

Christology and the Christ event are traditionally viewed by Western theology from an anthropocentric perspective, similarly problematical for ecologically aware theologians. Since God was incarnated in a human being, is it not obvious that humans are especially close to God and that salvation is exclusively for humans? The Gospels' themes of Jesus defeating the forces of nature – further demonstrated by the bodily resurrection – affirm that it is possible (and good) to subordinate nature to humanity.

Some forms of eschatology in the Western Christian tradition are also anthropocentric. They find in the Book of Revelation* and other apocalyptic* biblical texts affirmations that, according to God's plan, earth and material reality should be abandoned for another, nonearthly dimension. Then working for environmental protection and prohibiting the exploitation of nature and animals are irrelevant, indeed against God's will or plan.

It is possible to interpret ecological issues from a Christian perspective in more constructive ways by questioning and reconsidering the theological frames through which Christian tradition is interpreted. Instead of an anthropocentric view, one can readily adopt a creation*-centric interpretation of the creation stories or an interpretation centered on the covenantal* tradition of the HB. Similarly, theology can readily underscore that the Incarnation is an affirmation of the centrality of the created, natural world. Such views are present, e.g., in Francis* of Assisi, diverse mystical* and ascetic* traditions, and theologies beyond the North Atlantic world.

Christian theologians often connect ecology and social justice issues, because the people of the Two-thirds World, among them women, are more directly exposed to water and air pollution (including chemical pollution), the devastation of forestland, water scarcity, floods, and other consequences of climate change. See also CLIMATE CHANGE AND CHRISTIANITY; LAND, THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES AND PRAXIS, CLUSTER; WATER.

MARIA JANSBOTTER-SAMUELSSON

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Ecology and Christianity: Eastern Orthodox Perspective. Each year, on September 1, the commencement of the ecclesiastical calendar, Orthodox Churches worldwide pray for the protection of the natural environment. The practice was established by Ecumenical Patriarch Demetrios in 1989 and was continued by his successor, Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew, whose ministry has focused on environmental issues with annual encyclicals, regular seminars, and international, interdisciplinary, and interfaith symposia focusing on the Mediterranean Sea (1995), the Black Sea (1997), the Danube River (1999), the Adriatic Sea (2002), the Baltic Sea (2003), and the Amazon River (2006).

This concern for nature is deeply rooted in theological principles. Orthodox Christianity underlines the intimate connection between human beings and the natural environment, emphasizing equally Adam's creation "in the image and likeness of God" (Gen 1:26) and "from the dust of the earth" (Gen 2:7). Humanity shared the sixth day of creation with "all the living creatures and creeping things of the earth" (Gen 1:24–26). The environmental crisis is a painful reminder of this reality. In response to this crisis, Orthodox Christianity draws on three characteristic values:

1. Icons* are central to Orthodox spirituality, revealing the eternal dimension of everything. Icons offer a corrective to a secular culture, which values only the here and now. In icons the heavenly God assumes a human face. Thus all humanity is rendered an image of God, while the entire world assumes iconic significance. Everything in this world is a sign of God's presence.
2. The Divine* Liturgy performs in time what the icon achieves in space. Our age is guilty of relentless waste because it has lost the spirit of worship. Maximus* the Confessor (7th c.) describes creation* as a "cosmic liturgy." The Orthodox Church regards this world as a gift from God, which we have polluted by ceasing to relate to the world with a sense of awe and thanksgiving. Isaac the Syrian (7th c.) speaks of acquiring “a merciful heart, burning with love for the whole of creation – for humans, for birds, for the beasts . . . and all of God’s creatures.”

3. In this life, altering the way we perceive the world requires repentance of our practices and redirection of our perspectives. Orthodox spirituality underlines ascēsis (self-restraint; See Asceticism), which enables us to live more frugally, remembering the poverty* of others and rendering human beings more compassionate and the world more inhabitable. Through asceticism*, we move away from what we want to what the world needs, valuing everything as created by God and as intended for God.

See also CREATION, ECOLOGY, AND THE ORTHODOX CHURCH; LAND, THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES AND PRAXIS, CLUSTER; WATER.

JOHN CHRYSOAVGIS

Ecology and Christianity: Ecofeminist Theology. Françoise d'Eaubonne coined the term “ecofeminism” in 1974 to describe a mass movement modeled on contemporary ecological and feminist understandings of human society. Ecofeminist theology takes this as a context for its interpretation of Christian tradition.

While either ecology or feminism* may function as an entry point into this conceptual field, it is their critical interaction and projected integration that defines its theological character. This is marked by a reimagining of the concept of God* from one of patriarchal* domination over others, specifically over women* and nature*, to one envisioned in terms of an evolving relationship between God and the whole community of life on earth. The ecological framework for this relationship presupposes that the planet’s ecosystems and the lives of the organisms they support are constitutively interconnected and interdependent. Therefore, the relationships between us are ideally characterized by cooperation, compassion* and justice*.

Ecofeminist theologians highlight positive religious and philosophical insights offered by Process* theology, Feminist* theologies, and the worldviews of indigenous communities with a strong matriarchal tradition that stress the importance of ecological interdependence and the value of biodiversity in all its forms. This transformative dialectic creates and at the same time exposes the need for models of God that foster a sense of our belonging within the whole community of life on earth rather than within a supposedly closed system of exclusively human salvation*. “The sacred” is seen as a totality that cannot be separated from whatever we perceive as the whole of existence. It is understood as the internal transcendence* of every living being and its environment.

An ecofeminist worldview consistently challenges theological traditions that systematically favor an ontotheology privileging the infinite, immaterial, objective, and rational* over the evolving, material, and emotional aspects of human existence. It demonstrates that granting primacy to spirit* and will* over the body* has led to unquestioned and apparently indissoluble connections being made between sexuality*, sin*, and female fertility. These Christian postulates have in turn served as a religious legitimization of Western hierarchical concepts of mastery over both women and nature.

This legitimized domination reduces the biophysical environment to instrumental or commodity value alone, seeing nature as something external to ourselves that is to be controlled and exploited for our sole benefit. Therefore, ecofeminists unite with social and environmental justice* and peace* movements to counter the destructive effects of global military-industrial complexes on the whole community of life. See also LAND, THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES AND PRAXIS, CLUSTER; WATER.

ANNE PRIMAVESI

Ecology and Christianity: Ecotheology. With its roots in the 1960s and the growing awareness of environmental problems parallel with the growing critique of the Christian heritage as anthropocentric, ecotheology has developed as a distinctive perspective within the theology and praxis of Christian denominations all over the world. Its general aim is to challenge Christian worldviews and ethics that make a strong division between God and nature, and to interpret the Bible and Christian tradition in a way that includes and safeguards the dignity of nature and animals. There is also a post-Christian* field of ecotheology, founded on the presupposition that the Christian heritage is too corrupted by anthropocentrism to be reinterpreted in a constructive way. Among the post-Christian ecotheologies are ecofeminist goddess perspectives. (see the present cluster: Ecofeminist Theology).

Ecotheology can be done by taking biblical texts, e.g. the creation stories, as proof of the divine origin of not just humans, but also of nature and animals. The creation* stories can be read as the foundation of both a covenantal* theology and a theology of spiritual immanence. The covenantal ecotheology takes into account the ancient Hebrew tradition about the covenant relation between God and humanity (including the Noah tradition). Presupposing that God's covenant is with all of creation and not merely with humans, the covenant makes humans responsible for establishing right relations with the earth. In an ecotheology of spiritual immanence, the earth is thought of as a holy interdependent community where God is encountered in humans and nature, although not reduced to immanent features. This view has been articulated primarily within the Roman Catholic and Orthodox traditions (see the present cluster: Eastern Orthodox Perspective). Modern Western Process* theology is one of the strong voices of ecotheology that rearticulates this perspective within Protestant theology. Ecotheology has also found inspiration in Christian medieval mystical traditions and the spiritual heritage from, e.g., Francis* of Assisi and Julian* of Norwich.

Other options include Ecofeminist theology and ecotheology in the liturgical* and ritual movement, often combined with feminist perspectives (see Women's Christian Practices and Theologies Cluster). The rhythms of nature and the human body are included in the language and activities of liturgy and rituals. Significantly, strong voices in ecotheology also come from the Two-thirds World and often combine ecotheology and a social justice perspective. See also LAND, THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES AND PRAXIS, CLUSTER; WATER.

MARIA JANSBOTTER-SAMUELSSON

ECONOMY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Economy and Christianity

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Economy and Christianity: Economic Ethics and Christian Theology

Economy and Christianity: Economic Studies of Christianity

Economy and Christianity: Economic Studies of the History of Christianity in the United States

1) Introductory Entry

Economy and Christianity. Economy (from Gk oikonomia, "administration of the household"; Lat dispensatio) is the social system of production, exchange, distribution, and consumption of goods and services in a community, a region, a nation, or the world. This is the economy that is the concern of the entries in the present cluster. Yet "economy" is also a theological concept. In the doctrine of the Trinity*, the "economy" is God's action toward the world (Eph 1:10, 2:9): creation*, redemption*, and sanctification*. In Eastern Orthodoxy, "economy" means the pastoral administration of canonical* or moral principles, relaxing them for the sake of a greater good as long as essentials are not violated. Casuistically* and humorously, “economizing the truth” means that not everything must be disclosed in every possible situation.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Economy and Christianity: Economic Ethics and Christian Theology. The thought of Plato*, Aristotle*, and Stoicism* conjoined with the Torah*, the Prophets*, and the teachings of Jesus (see Kingdom of God, The Concept of, Cluster) was the substance of patristic and medieval theology’s understanding of economy*. In Christendom* God was considered implicit in economy, and questions of economy were at the heart of theology. The church fathers generally followed Aristotle in extolling the virtues of oikonomia (Gk oikos + nomos = “the law or management of the household”) and derogating the shaping of life according to commerce (“chrematistics”). Human beings are constituted by their associations and the goods their associations serve. The tradition through Aquinas* generally held that human community and the polis/state must regulate economy; the tradition regularly argued, as part and parcel of its doctrine, for fair price, just wage, complex space in which there was a place free of commodity exchange, and the wisdom of sumptuary laws (concerning personal expenditures). This economic perspective also led to the condemnation of usury as the unnatural assumption that an inanimate thing, money, is able to produce anything (as work does).

In the 17th c., Grotius* and Locke* laid the groundwork for a new ethical take on economics that featured a new form of natural* law and individualism, which had been on the rise since the Reformation. From that point, economic theology and ethics* have taken their bearings from the perceived centrality of the market. Although economy is an element of all antique and modern societies, economics is a modern science. Accompanying the rise of economics, there has been a decreasing sense of the involvement of God and faith in the economy. Deism*, as in the case of Adam Smith, highlighted the importance of religion in producing the virtues necessary for the practice of economy but sought to interdict those aspects of Christian doctrine, ritual, and ecclesial structure that squandered wealth or hindered the free play of economic practices

Since the 19th c., the market has loomed ever larger in economic theology and ethics. The old concerns of Christian political economy (the allocation of resources for production, the distribution of what it takes to live and thrive, the relations of those in the household, and the harm done to communities and nature by production, inequitable distribution, and unjust relationships) have been reduced to the modern concern of the science of economics: the allocation of scarce resources to meet “unlimited” human wants through the expression of preferences in the market. Economic theologies and ethics are divided in their views of God and Christian values in relation to the market.

One approach accepts the neoclassical definitions of the market (now perceived by many as an all-encompassing system replacing religion*; see also Idol, Idolatry) and construes the market as the key to understanding and practicing Christianity. The teachings of Jesus exemplify market rules and the human inclination toward competition and accumulation. Faith* is closely identified with individuals’ economic acts of pricing, valuing, and expressing preference. Religion will succeed only if the internal, “natural” laws of the market are heeded. In the “marketplace of Christianity” approach, economic analysis provides the standard of ethics. Neoclassical market theory and Christian faith are not antagonistic but actually collude.

A second approach, the mainstream approach, however, focuses on the limits, failures, and deformations of the market and points to the necessity of community in the interstices left open by the market and its institutions. Once land, labor, and money completely become commodities, there is little space in which communities can resist the market and thrive. The sociological insights of Weber*, Durkheim*, and Troeltsch* are fundamental here. The point is not necessarily to criticize the logic of the market but to find political and communal means for limiting the market. This ethical approach generally assumes the possibility of a civil society and churches not controlled by the market. It seeks sources other than the market for value creation and prizes the thought forms of democracy* and communitarianism. Theologians and ethicists as different as Rauschenbusch* and other Social* Gospel thinkers, Reinhold Niebuhr*, and William Temple, and two generations of their disciples, ply this way.

A third approach emerged in the late 20th c., when two themes predominated: poverty* and ecology*. The failure of the globalized market following US neoclassical designs to ameliorate poverty and stanch the degradation of nature led to a deeper criticism of market economy. This third trend depends more heavily than the others on a critical retrieval of the Christian Scriptures and tradition and an alternative narrative of economy and Christian faith. Refusing to accept the modern definitions of the market as the criterion of what may be true in the Christian faith, this perspective criticizes the presuppositions of the market and seeks critically to retrieve ancient forms of economy: householding, redistribution, and reciprocity. It also assumes that faith must have its own economy. This trend pays close attention to the fundamental practices of giving, forgiving, and hospitality*, arguing that the market, if unregulated, obviates these practices in its global reach. Yet these practices are necessary for any economy that humanely issues in just production, distribution, human relations, and the survival of nature. See also ETHICS AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

M. DOUGLAS MEEKS

Economy and Christianity: Economic Studies of Christianity. For the 18th-c. Scottish moral philosopher and economist Adam Smith (Wealth of Nations), the discoverable laws of the market are the uncontested standard of what is to be publicly retrieved and supported in Christianity. Following in Smith's and Hume's* footsteps, Christian theology employs economic studies of Christianity of various types and to often divergent ends.

1. Christianity as supporting capitalist principles. The contemporary study of Christianity can be seen in the publications of Acton Institute, which promotes a free society informed by Christian faith and moral absolutes. From this perspective, Christianity is primarily a source of individual virtue and offers little with regard to the actual operation of the market. Forms of this approach are favored by conservative Evangelicals who see capitalist principles as the guarantor of the liberties of free speech, religion, and an unregulated market. Christianity offers justification and support of capitalist principles.
2. Using economic theories to explain Christianity. By and large, neoclassical economic theory considers religion to be outside its bounds. However, a thoroughgoing neoclassical economic reading of Christianity is found in the work of Rodney Stark and Robert B. Ekelund, in which the tools of economic theory illuminate the emergence, development, and crises of Christianity and make normative judgments about the plight of the church and contemporary religion-influenced issues. Market logic (pricing, supply and demand, preferences) can explain all aspects of Christianity. The teachings of Jesus exemplify market rules and the human inclination to accumulate.

The econometric economist Robert William Fogel measures the interaction between religious revival* and political reform and the material conditions in which they take place. According to Fogel, the post-1960s Evangelical revival is primarily about spreading spiritual meaning, now that material needs in the USA have been basically met.

3. Economic studies critical of the foregoing. Karl Marx criticized Christianity as an opiate that numbed the suffering of the oppressed. But he also saw it as a cry of the oppressed. Liberation* theologies, epitomized by Gustavo Gutiérrez and Leonardo Boff, take up the Marxist economic analysis. Postcolonial* theologies follow the economic and cultural analysis of Edward Said and of new forms of empire adopted by Michael Hardt and Antonio Negri.

Another strand of economic study of Christianity (Max Stackhouse and others) has developed from Weber's* hermeneutical approach, which concentrates on the effect of Christian ideas on the development of economies. Weber conjectured that the capitalist pursuit of economic gain was in part engendered by Calvinist* and Puritan* self-denial and planning. Joseph Schumpeter, however, argued that capitalism began not with Reformation influences on the industrial revolution but rather in the 14th-c. small Italian city-states.

Richard Henry Tawney's Christian Socialist criticism of 18th-c. economic and social thought forms a milieu in which contemporary theologians, e.g., John Milbank, rework a Christian Socialist perspective. The steady-state economist Herman Daly and the Process* theologian John Cobb analyze the destructiveness of the global market economy and propose a new autarchy for local economy. Karl Polanyi's critical and prophetic history of the destructiveness of the modern unregulated market is the backdrop for the retrieval of biblical and traditional forms of economy for the practice of the church today. M. DOUGLAS MEEKS

Economy and Christianity: Economic Studies of the History of Christianity in the United States. Christianity in the US colonial period (16th–18th c.) replicated the economic patterns of European and English churches. Religion was a public good, and all members of a particular society were expected to adhere to the established church, whose ministry and ministers were supported by the public treasury. As the colonial period developed, however, early Americans brought an increasing variety of expressions of Christianity to the English colonies; by 1775–83 (the American Revolution) nearly every expression of British or continental European Christianity – established or Dissenter* – existed on the US mainland. National unification of formerly disparate colonies leveled the question of whether there would be a single national church.

The First Amendment to the Constitution (1791), soon followed by similar state constitutions, provided that there would be no national establishment of a particular denomination. This elimination of state establishment forced the privatization of religion as a public good. Without resort to even town-level funding, and without long-established churches supported by an aristocracy or lands, churches quickly turned to their own members for support. The new principle of voluntarily supported churches has profoundly affected the understanding of Christianity in the USA and created the conditions for Christian institutions to both proliferate and compete with one another.

This voluntary model of financial support of Christianity caused a series of innovations in financing technique and a new self-understanding by religious groups and their leaders. In the 19th c., Christian groups became the collective basis for founding most US colleges, hospitals, orphanages, missionary and tract societies, and programs of poor relief. Protestants faced competition from other churches in the same geographic region; they progressively redefined the scale and purpose of religious activity by the sorts of capital investments needed. Without geographical parishes*, US churches became characterized by relatively high expenditures by congregations for church building to attract and retain members in competition from other churches.

After the Civil War (1861–65), church leaders enunciated a divine-command basis for supporting churches as a form of religious obligation. They argued that a biblical tithe* (or 10%) of all one's weekly proceeds had never been repealed, only forgotten. This development paralleled the rise of an income-dependent new middle class that formed the basis of organized Protestantism and increasingly of Roman Catholicism. Middle-class Protestants embraced the institutional* church (which supports social works in the community), and this greatly expanded the scope and expense of the typical congregation's activities. Middle-class Catholics, meanwhile, built a vast system of parochial and diocesan schools supported by voluntary gifts.

The emphasis of the Progressive Era (1890–1920) on responsibility for talent and wealth found an analogue in Protestantism's new emphasis on a person's "stewardship* under God's ownership of all things." This view of stewardship led both to a deemphasis of rule-based obligation and to broadened religious giving and spending. Religious causes well beyond the congregation – colleges, the YMCA* and YWCA*, camps, and missionary boards – with lay control and initiative began to receive greater funding. With support going to philanthropic institution building instead of local congregations, Protestant clergy families sometimes lived in "genteel poverty." Ministers' wives spoke to one another eloquently of the sacrifices and surprises a spiritual domestic life entailed. In Catholicism the labor supply that made the institutional life of schools and parishes possible was based on willing self-sacrifice by hundreds of thousands of women* religious. Priests, nuns, and ministers alike were not especially well paid until the mid-20th c., but their vocations were at the peak of respect conferred by general society.

During the post–World War II years (1950s–1960s), there was tremendous growth in the number of "new church starts" and denominational budgets for new programs. Raising money for Protestant churches, old and new, was relatively easy, but was accompanied by a crisis in understanding of the nature of the professional ministry. Clerical pay reached its high point in US history, but the socially ascribed value of clerical labor began to decline, leading to a later crisis in vocations, particularly acute in Catholicism and rural Protestant church leadership.

Late-20th- and early-21st-c. organized religion in the USA faces pressures wrought by its own successes in the postwar years. Like firms that overexpanded in flush economic times, Protestant churches and Catholic parishes now operated in more than 300,000 locations, maintaining facilities, programs, and staffs, while facing intense competition from one another and with other ways of being religious – North Americans affiliated less with formal religious groups and consumed more spiritual* literature, ranging from the Dispensationalist* Left Behind series to books fusing Eastern religions with the quest for self-fulfillment (see New Age Spirituality and Christianity). In a crowded marketplace, more than half of those who continue to affiliate with a Christian congregation belong to churches with large memberships (500 and more), while congregations of fewer than 100 members form the majority of all religious institutions.

JAMES HUDNUT-BEUMLER

Ecthesis, the decree issued by the emperor Heraclius (638) forbidding discussion of "energies" (activities) in Christ and asserting that Christ's two natures are united in a single will. See also MONOTHELITISM.

Ecuador, straddles the equator (hence its name) on the west coast of South America. The Andes Mountains divide the country into three isolated regions with different cultures (Costa, Sierra, and East) and the Galápagos Islands (site of Darwin's* investigations). The country is multi-ethnic (self-identified native, 7%; black, 3%; mestizo* [racially mixed], 77%; mulatto, 3%; white, 10%) and multilingual (Spanish, Quichua, and a dozen languages of the Amazon region). This cultural diversity finds expression in different religious practices, symbolisms, and customs. Roman Catholicism, embraced by most of the population, shapes the common cultural identity.

The 16th Century. The aboriginal populations had religions related to nature and agricultural cycles. Yet the Incas superimposed on these religions the worship of the sun, Inti, and the moon, Quilla, during the time of the Inca Empire (1438–1533). The development of Christianity marched in step with the colonial* conquest (Quito was conquered in 1534). The Spaniards did not dismantle the existing social, cultural, and religious organizations, but incorporated them into the complex system of colonial Christendom. In 1535

Franciscans*, Dominicans*, and Mercedarians (a Spanish order), and later Augustinians* and Jesuits*, began missionary activities. They wrote grammars for indigenous languages, strove to improve social conditions (introducing new ways of farming and creating trade centers for native arts and crafts), and established various institutions, including monasteries. The first synod (1570), called by Bishop De la Peña, resolutely sided with the natives, defending their rights, but the viceroy of Lima rejected this “excessively pro-native” position. Although the Roman Catholic Church took measures to protect indigenous people from the encomenderos (colonists to whom the Spanish crown “entrusted” the indoctrination of the natives in exchange for services and taxes), the Church most often was the colonists’ docile instrument and condoned the injustices they perpetrated.

The 17th Century witnessed an architectural explosion (the Jesuit and Franciscan churches in colonial Quito, the work of natives and mestizos), the establishment of impressive universities (San Fulgencio, 1586; San Gregorio Magno, 1620; Santo Tomás, 1688), and the Amazon missionary expansion – all as a result of the harsh colonialist exploitation of the natives. The Roman Catholic Church had become a colonial institution; resources derived from colonial exploitation were used to promote the education of the clergy and the development of religious art (to be used for catechesis*) at the famous School of Quito by mestizos and native artists (Pampite and Caspicara, sculptors; Miguel de Santiago and Goríbar, painters), and the construction of sumptuous church buildings. In contrast to many religious, who were considered lax, the first Ecuadorian saint, Mariana de Jesus (1618–45) led a life characterized by mysticism* and asceticism*, although she did not belong to a religious order.

During the 18th Century, cathedrals and religious communities increased their wealth and their ideological-political control over the population. Yet sociocultural turmoil erupted in the late 17th c. and continued with the expulsion of the Jesuits (1767), including Father Juan de Velasco, whose History of the Kingdom of Quito helped to galvanize Ecuadorian nationalism, and with the first declaration of independence (1809) led by men, such as Eugenio Espejo (who died in prison), women, such as Manuela Espejo (his sister) and Manuela Cañizares, and ordinary priests, such as Juan Pablo Espejo (the brother of Eugenio and Manuela), Correa, and Loyola.

In the 19th Century, during the short-lived period (1819–30) of the Republic of Greater Colombia (encompassing present-day Colombia, Venezuela, Ecuador, and Panama), the Roman Catholic Church inherited colonial power and promoted an economic ideology. Subsequently, in independent Ecuador (from 1830), following a concordat* with the Vatican (1862), García Moreno (president 1869–75) used the Church as an instrument to consolidate his theocratic program: leaving education in the hands of European religious and establishing Roman Catholicism as the official and exclusive religion. Three Ecuadorians were remarkable for their social ministry during this period: Mercedes de Jesús, Narcisca de Jesús, and Brother Miguel.

Following the suspension of the concordat (1877), the Liberal Revolution (1895), headed by Eloy Alfaro and supported both by rich exporters and by the poor, brought about a radical transformation of the ideological-political structures. The separation of church* and state left the Roman Catholic Church without its large land estates. The government decreed freedom of conscience and of worship. Protestantism, which since 1820 had had great difficulty establishing itself, could now develop beside Roman Catholicism. Public education took education* out of clerical hands. The conflict between laic anti-clerics and pro-clerics would last until the signing of the Modus Vivendi (1937) with the Vatican. As a result, the Pontificia Universidad Católica del Ecuador was founded (1946).

The 1960s witnessed profound transformations. Vatican* II (1965) and the Medellín* Latin American Episcopal Conference (1968) urged the Roman Catholic Church to abandon its overly defensive anti-liberal stance. Committed Christians led by Monsignor Proaño experimented with Liberation* theology. But with Pope John* Paul II, the process of liberation was reversed. Movements like Opus* Dei – with two archbishops, schools, and centers for higher education – and other integrist* groups began to grow, although they were far removed from ordinary people. With the Law of Religious Liberty (1999), the state guaranteed the right to give religious instructions in all educational establishments, including public schools.

Protestantism in Ecuador. Anglicanism arrived in 1820, and the first pastors, many of them martyrs (professing another religion was a state crime), came mostly from the USA; Diego Thompson (Lancastrian* education), Lucas Mathews, Francisco Penzotty, Andrés Milne, and Zoilo Irigoyen. After the Liberal Revolution, Eloy Alfaro allowed the Methodists to found the first schools for teachers (Juan Montalvo and Manuela Cañizares). Rosina Kinsman created the first kindergarten. Evangelical churches have greatly expanded since 1960. The Ecuadorian Evangelical Confraternity (1968) comprises more than 50 denominations, which are active in health*, broadcasting, and education (HCJB Christian radio station and hospital; the Latin American Christian University). The Latin American Church Council vigorously works for ecumenical dialogue.

Ecuadorian Inculturated Religious Life. Native Andean elements have survived in religious festivities. For instance, the Inti Raymi (Celebration of the Sun) underlies the Corpus* Christi festivities; the singing of the "Salve Regina" is associated with the singing of Yupaichishca, a traditional hymn addressed to the divinity or to the emperor. The prioste is the outstanding figure who sponsors religious feasts. If formal religious ceremonies are brief (Mass* or transitional rites, e.g. funerals, nuptials), attendant celebrations, with a carnival-like flavor (including costumed dancers), may last for days or even weeks. Throughout the country during Christmas, the Pase del Niño (a procession for the Baby Jesus), the feast of Corpus Christi (especially at Cuenca), and the Holy Week processions (Jesus del Gran Poder, Quito; Cristo del Consuelo, Guayaquil), the logic of two cultures is combined: the Spanish and the mestizo*. In Quito the cucuruchos (penitents), dressed in purple, accompany others who compete in self-flagellation, a kind of pageantry of suffering. Besides each locality's patron saint, the most profoundly venerated figure is the Virgin Mary*. The pilgrimages to different sanctuaries (which entail long walks for the sake of expiation or to fulfill promises and are paid for with *ex-voto offerings) culminate in crowded processions in which a special statue of Our Lady is carried with great respect, a cultural climax. Thousands of pilgrims are attracted to sanctuaries such as El Cisne (Loja), Huayco (Guaranda), El Quinche (Quito), and Agua Santa (Baños-Tungurahua).

The Roman Catholic Church, an institution with credibility and influence, has the largest number of believers, with groups promoting ecumenical dialogue. But the Roman Catholic Church faces complex challenges, including the decreasing number of believers, most of whom were baptized but never evangelized. Only some accept Christian values as components of their cultural identity; young people are becoming secularized*, although they reject, not the Church, but its deformed image. The people of God long for a church that discerns without feeling superior, that evangelizes and allows itself to be evangelized, that is sensitive to the cry of the poor and values deeds more than words. There exists a hidden, underground missionary minority with intense evangelical courage that continues working, hoping for the right time for and new signs of a revival. See also MERCEDES DE JESÚS; MIGUEL, BROTHER; NARCISA DE JESÚS; PROAÑO, LEONIDAS.

Statistics: Population (2000): 12.65 million (M). Christians, 12.3 M, 97.6%; (Roman Catholics, 8.7 M, 69.0%; Protestants/Evangelicals, 0.4 M, 4.1%; Pentecostals/Charismatics, 1.6 M, 12.5%; independents: 0.2 M, 1.8%); nonreligious, 0.2 M, 1.5%; other, 1.5 M, 11.8%. (Source: CEHILA [Comisión para el Estudio de la Historia de la Iglesia en América Latina y el Caribe] Studies, 2000.)

LUIS MARÍA GAVILANES DEL CASTILLO

Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians (EATWOT) was initiated by Fr. Sergio Torres, who, while in Nairobi (1974) to prepare for the Fifth World* Council (WCC) of Churches Assembly, held exploratory discussions with several theologians and church leaders, including Kofi Appiah-Kubi (then working for the All Africa Conference of Churches) and Jesse Mugambi (then theology secretary for the World Student Christian Federation, Africa Region). During the Fifth WCC Assembly (1975), Fr. Torres made plans to hold the first meeting of EATWOT at Dar es Salaam (1976), with Appia-Kubi and Mugambi facilitating the local logistical arrangements and Fr. Torres providing the international mobilization.

Theologians from Africa, Asia, and Latin America needed a forum to discuss Christian theology from their own contextual perspectives, without restriction or inhibition by the dominant perspectives from Europe and North America. Thus the self-presentation was as follows: "The Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians – EATWOT – is an association of men and women committed [to] the struggle for the liberation* of Third World peoples, by promoting new models of theology for a religious pluralism, social justice* and peace. As Third World theologians, EATWOT members take the Third World context seriously, doing theology from the vantage point of the poor* seeking liberation, integrity of creation, gender co-responsibility, racial and ethnic equality and interfaith dialogue. Thus Third World theologies are those which offer an alternative voice to the marginalized and exploited people of the planet."

EATWOT was born in Dar-es Salaam, Tanzania (1976), with 22 representatives from Africa, Asia, and Latin America, and one Black theologian from the USA to share with one another theological efforts in their denominations – Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Orthodox. At that time, Third World Christians had become aware that the "universal" theology they had inherited from the West was not pertinent to their context of poverty and marginalization; traditional theology had to be reformulated to become meaningful to peoples struggling for a more just and egalitarian world.

Thus EATWOT endeavors to (1) interpret the gospel using the hermeneutical* circle to link God's word to the life of marginalized people; (2) encourage the interchange of theological views through the publication of books and journals with themes of interest in the Third World, including Liberation theologies; (3) foster the mutual interaction between theological formulation, science*, art*, spirituality*, and ecology*; (4) motivate the interaction of theologies within the diverse cultures and religions of peoples of the Third World; (5) give support to social movements for spiritual, social, and inter-religious liberation; and (6) organize regional, continental, and intercontinental meetings of Third World theologians.

A general assembly of EATWOT was convened in Johannesburg in 2006 (the organization's 30th anniversary) and adopted a five-year program, involving (1) the development of and engagement with gender theologies and new methods for such theologizing that challenge patriarchal privileges and require the reconstruction of ideologies* of all genders; (2) an exploration of the authority of the biblical text (Scripture*) in the theological endeavors of Third World Christians along with naming additional oral and written sources to be engaged and explored in the formation of these new theological endeavors; (3) the reaffirmation of praxis* methods that constructively engage the tensions between action on the ground and theological formulations and constructions; (4) the affirmation of EATWOT members' commitment as theologians to working with gender, racial, ethnic, indigenous, and sexual groups in mutuality, learning from one another to enhance the building of viable liberatory communities; and (5) the development of dialogical styles and approaches to interaction among EATWOT members and with members of other religious groups that are nonhegemonic and affirm the humanity and worthiness of all parties in the dialogue. See also CONTEXTUAL THEOLOGIES.

JESSE NDWIGA KANYUA MUGAMBI

Ecumenical Councils, assemblies of bishops from the "whole inhabited world" (implicitly defined as the Roman Empire), whose decisions on doctrine, ethics, discipline, and worship are held to be binding on all Christians. The list of authoritative councils is disputed.

For the Eastern Orthodox* churches, the seven ecumenical councils are Nicaea* I (325), Constantinople* I (381), Ephesus* I (431), Chalcedon* (451), Constantinople* II (553), Constantinople* III (680), and Nicaea* II (787). All of these were called by Roman Byzantine emperors. Several other councils, while later rejected on various grounds, were similarly called and approved by emperors; these include Sardica (342/3), Ariminum* and Seleucia (359), Constantinople* (360), Ephesus* II (449), and Constantinople* IV (754).

The Oriental Orthodox* non-Chalcedonian churches recognize only the first three ecumenical councils. Most of the churches of the Reformation* recognize only the first four. The Roman Catholic Church, which holds that the pope must call, preside over, and promulgate the decrees of a council, recognizes 14 more, from the Middle Ages through Vatican* II.

Ecumenical Movement. "Ecumenical," a word derived from the Greek oikumene, was used as early as the 5th c. BCE to denote "the inhabited earth." In the rare NT usages, it frequently refers to the whole world (Matt 24:14) or the Roman Empire (Luke 2:1). Over time, "ecumenical" came to refer to the whole church, specifying its universality, and to describe the seven ecumenical* councils convened from the 4th to the 8th c. and held by many as authoritative for the whole church.

Since the World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh* (1910), the start of the modern ecumenical movement, the word "ecumenical" has come to refer to the whole church and to be associated with the movement for the unity of the church, a unity called for by the church's sense of mission. In 1951 the Central Committee of the World Council of Churches (WCC) defined "ecumenical" as pertaining to everything that relates to "the whole world. It therefore covers equally the missionary movement and the movement toward unity." Most often, then, the word is defined as "the whole inhabited earth."

There is not a single expression of the modern ecumenical movement. This can be illustrated by the perspectives of the Orthodox churches, the WCC, and the Roman Catholic Church. In 1920 the Holy Synod of the Church of Constantinople issued an encyclical, Unto the Churches of Christ Everywhere, calling for a global league or fellowship (koinonia) of churches to meet the needs of the world. This was later described by the Dutch general secretary of the WCC, W. A. Visser 't Hooft (1900–85) as "an initiative which was without precedent in church history."

The WCC was formed in 1948 in Amsterdam and has obviously come to be a major instrument of ecumenism. Streams from the Faith* and Order Movement, the Life* and Work Movement, and the missionary movement came together in this formation. The WCC now has more than 350 member churches, largely Protestant (although not all these church bodies wish to be called by that name) and Orthodox.

The Roman Catholic Church has never become a member of the WCC, although increasingly it participates fully in certain WCC activities, notably its Commission on Faith and Order. Since Vatican* II and its decree on ecumenism, Unitatis Redintegratio (1964), the Church's involvement in the movement for the unity of the church has been undisputed. Pope John* Paul II went so far as to affirm, in his encyclical Ut Unum Sint (1995), the "irrevocable commitment" of the Roman Catholic Church to the ecumenical movement as "an organic part of her life and work."

To these instances must be added such activities as the formation of national and regional councils of churches; the organic union of church bodies in countries such as India, Pakistan, Canada, and the USA; the ecumenical activities of the Christian World Communion (Anglican, Lutheran, Reformed, Roman Catholic, and others) expressed frequently in bilateral dialogues on theological issues that historically have divided church bodies from one another; and, surely, the joint witness and activities of church bodies on issues of social justice, e.g. racial and gender discrimination, refugee relief, the struggle to overcome world poverty*, the prevalence of violence in a world at war, and the quest for ecological* sanity.

There is no single "ecumenical theology," although no theology relevant to both the nature of Christian faith and the needs of the world can be without strong ecumenical dimensions. The Faith and Order Movement has fostered a willingness on the part of many ecclesial bodies to face historic theological and ecclesiological issues that have divided the churches. Since the latter part of the 20th c., new streams of theology with clear ecumenical implications have arisen, including such movements, among many, as Third World Liberation* theology, Feminist* and African* American theologies, and new ways of approaching and understanding the classic biblical texts. All of these are frequently concerned to emphasize the corporate, communal nature of the church. And all now deal with new questions of mission in a world that is diverse, pluralist, and increasingly marked by religious fundamentalism* and fanaticism. The ecumenical movement in its many forms has always seen its work as designed such "that the world might believe" (John 17), and that task is increasingly crucial and difficult.

In the long run, the ecumenical movement is not concerned merely with cooperation between church bodies. The quest for the unity of the church – in community and in mission* – is a quest for koinonia, unity as communion* at the deepest levels of life, made possible by the gracious quest of God for communion with God's own creation.

NORMAN A. HJELM

Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople

(present-day Istanbul) is the ranking church within the communion of the 14 autocephalous* churches that constitute Eastern Orthodox* Christianity. The Patriarchate includes metropolitanates, archdioceses, and dioceses in Turkey* and Greece*, as well as in the Americas, Western Europe, Australia, and the Far East. The archbishop of "Constantinople and New Rome" (present-day Istanbul), known as the ecumenical patriarch, is recognized as the presiding bishop within the worldwide Orthodox Church of about 250 million believers.

Early Christian tradition identifies Andrew* the Apostle as an evangelizer in the region of the ancient Greek trading city of Byzantium*. Emperor Constantine* selected this strategic city for the new capital of the Roman Empire (324) and dedicated it as New Rome (330). From then onward, the role of the bishop of New Rome gradually increased. The Council of Constantinople (381) stated (Canon 3) that the bishop of the new capital had “prerogatives of honor” after the bishop of Rome. The Council of Chalcedon* (451) identified the bishop of Constantinople as a recipient of appeal (Canons 9 and 17) and stated that this church had “equal privileges” with that of old Rome (Canon 28). The same council broadened the jurisdiction of Constantinople beyond the boundaries of the Roman–Byzantine Empire and the other ancient patriarchates. Then (from the late 6th c.) the archbishop of Constantinople was also called the “ecumenical patriarch” to indicate his importance not only within the Church but also within the Roman–Byzantine Empire.

From the 4th c., many prominent patriarchs played a leading role in the theological discussions at the ecumenical councils, in missionary work, charitable activity, iconography, architecture, and liturgical developments. With the church divisions following the Council of Chalcedon* (5th c.) and the Muslim conquests of Palestine, Syria, and Egypt (7th–8th c.), the Patriarchate’s influence only increased.

Between the 9th and 15th c., tensions between the Church of Rome and the Ecumenical Patriarchate (chiefly over papal authority and the Filioque) led to a gradual estrangement. Limited excommunications were exchanged (1054). However, a formal schism did not immediately follow, although Constantinople consistently rejected the growing claims of papal jurisdiction throughout the Church. The sack of Constantinople (1204) by Western crusaders and the temporary appointment by Rome of Western bishops in Constantinople and other Eastern cities profoundly compounded differences in theology, church polity*, and liturgical practices. Constantinople sent representatives to the Councils of Lyon (1274) and Florence* (1438–45) to discuss differences. However, the decisions of both were subsequently rejected in the East, and this deepened the alienation between Catholicism centered in Rome and Orthodoxy centered in Constantinople. For the Orthodox, the schism was formalized in 1484.

The city of Constantinople fell to the Muslim Turks in 1453. While the Roman–Byzantine Empire came to a tragic end, the Patriarchate continued under new political conditions that frequently impeded its witness. During the 16th c., the Patriarchate was engaged in limited theological discussions with Lutherans and Anglicans. It also granted autocephalous status to the Church of Russia* (1589). With the subsequent breakup of the Ottoman Empire and the creation of new Balkan nations (19th c.), the Ecumenical Patriarchate granted autocephalous status to the churches of Greece* (1850), Serbia* (1879), Romania* (1885), Albania* (1937), and Bulgaria* (1945). More recently, autocephaly was granted to the Church of Georgia* (1989) and the Church of the Czech* Lands and Slovakia* (1998).

The Ecumenical Patriarchate has expressed its primatial ministry by encouraging greater unity among the autocephalous Orthodox churches and has identified common issues needing attention by the entire Church. It continued to be a center of appeal arbitrating in disputes involving other regional Orthodox churches. The Patriarchate led Orthodox participation in the global expressions of the ecumenical movement and especially the dialogue with both the Oriental Orthodox churches and the Roman Catholic Church. It also was a champion of interreligious understanding and peaceful cooperation, notably in the charitable and environmental areas (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster: Eastern Orthodox Perspective). Finally, the Ecumenical Patriarchate exercised a particular responsibility for overseeing the development of new regional churches beyond the boundaries of other autocephalous churches. Resulting from both missions and immigration, the growth of the Orthodox Church in the so-called diaspora of the Americas, Western Europe, Australia, and the Far East is both significant and complex. In these areas, the Ecumenical Patriarchate has exercised its primacy by guiding a united mission and witness of the Orthodox in these diverse societies. See also AUTOCEPHALOUS CHURCHES; MISSION CLUSTER: AND EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

THOMAS FITZGERALD

Eddy, Mary Baker (1821–1907), US writer, theologian, founder of the Church of Christ, Scientist (1879). Born in New Hampshire, she spent the first 40 years of her life coping with chronic illness. She met “science of health” itinerant Phineas Quimby (1862) and began preaching a version of Quimby’s message after her sudden recovery from a nearly fatal illness (1866). Christian* Science emerged in a period (late 19th c.) marked by intense interest in the relationship between spirituality and health* as well as an increasing respect for science*. In Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures (1875), Eddy combined eschatology*, spirituality, health, and science by offering an authoritative interpretation of Scripture* that focused on healing. She claimed that matter was illusory and Spirit real. A proper, scientific reading of Scripture deemphasized the supernatural aspects of Jesus Christ and focused on his message that disease, sin*, and death* would vanish if a person understood the monistic nature of reality. Although Eddy’s teachings, especially her admonition not to seek medical treatment for illness, disturbed people outside the movement, her message proved particularly congenial to middle- and upper-class urban women. At a time when many such women felt powerless, Christian Science provided empowerment and individual well-being. See also CHRISTIAN SCIENCE. SARAH JOHNSON

Eden (translated “paradise*,” a Persian term, in LXX) is the “garden of delight” where Adam and Eve lived (Gen 2:8) before being driven out after sinning (Gen 3:23–24). Many Christians supposed that Eden was still somewhere on earth, empty, guarded by the angel with a flaming sword (Gen 3:24), probably in Mesopotamia or Ethiopia. Some saw natives of the Amazon, north Mexico, or the South Seas as living in “Edenic simplicity.” Luther* and others with a more radical view of human sin* suggested that Eden had been erased by the Flood*, increasing the sense of transience and deprivation.

Edessa, present-day Urfa, in Southeastern Turkey, center of Syriac* Christianity. Under Roman control from 213 CE, it fell to Persia (609) and was then under Arab rule (from 639) until the Crusades (1098). King Abgar’s* conversion in apostolic times is legendary. Marcionites*, Bardaisanites*, and Manichaeans* flourished in early centuries. A church building existed in 201. The Syriac Church had three martyrs during the Diocletian* persecution (Shmona, Guria, and Habbib) and used Tatian’s* Diatessaron* until the 5th c. Succeeding the school of Antioch*, the school of Edessa, a center of theological education (4th–5th c.; moved to Nisibis*, 489), included the theologians and church leaders Ephrem*, Rabbula, Jacob* of Serug, Bar* Sauma, and Narsai. Its famous icon of Christ (mandylion) was transferred to Constantinople in the 10th c.

UTE POSSEKEL

Edict of Milan. See MILAN, EDICT OF.

Edinburgh Conference (1910), World Missionary Conference, leading to the founding of the International Missionary Council (1921). The Eastern Orthodox* and Roman Catholic churches were not invited, but neither were mission societies seeking converts from these churches; participants were confined to those working among non-Christians (contrast the Panama* Conference of 1916). Non-Europeans were present only as members of delegations from mission societies, not as representatives of “younger churches”; active participation was thus limited to churches based in colonial nations, ironically at the time of nationalist revolutions in Mexico (1910) and China (1911). John R. Mott* chaired most meetings; J. H. Oldham was secretary. The later Faith* and Order Movement grew directly out of Bishop Charles Brent’s protest at the Conference’s avoidance of issues of doctrine and ministry; the parallel Life* and Work Movement was nurtured by Oldham.

Edinburgh Conference (1937), the second World Conference on Faith* and Order, gathering 414 delegates from 122 churches and 42 countries. The Conference was centered on five themes: (1) the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, (2) the church of Christ and the Word of God, (3) the communion of saints, (4) the ministry and sacraments of the church of Christ, and (5) the church’s unity in life and worship. It adopted a theological statement, Affirmation of Union in Allegiance to Our Lord Jesus Christ, and committed the Faith and Order Movement to integration, together with the Life* and Work Movement, into the World Council of Churches officially formed in Amsterdam (1948) after World War II.

NORMAN A. HJELM

EDUCATIONAL PRACTICES AS CHRISTIAN SERVICE CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Educational Practices and Institutions as Christian Service

2) *A Sampling of Contextual Views
and Practices*

Educational Practices as Christian Service
in Africa

Educational Practices as Christian Service
in Asia

Educational Practices as Christian Service in Mexico

Educational Practices as Christian Service in the United States

1) Introductory Entry

Educational Practices and Institutions as Christian Service.

From the earliest development of the Christian faith, education has been a central mission of the churches. Jesus is called “teacher,” and much of what he did in his public life was to transform through teaching. The introduction to the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5:2), a collection of the teachings of Jesus, begins “Then he began to speak, and taught them, saying” (emphasis added).

Early church leaders were engaged in education as teachers and writers. For example, Clement* of Alexandria (c150–215) wrote extensively, served as head of the catechetical school, and influenced the formation of an orthodox tradition. Augustine* of Hippo (354–430), in On Christian Doctrine, wrote profoundly about Christianity’s educational responsibilities; his thought and that of Thomas Aquinas* (1125–1274) have shaped the Roman Catholic understanding of education. The Protestant Reformers, Martin Luther* (1483–1546) and John Calvin* (1509–1564), further developed Christianity’s understanding of education. Luther’s views are contained in the Large and Small Catechisms; Calvin founded educational institutions and was a humanist scholar whose vast publications reflect a strong commitment to the educational dimensions of faith*. Both saw education as a means of conversion* and transformation.

The aims of education within Christianity have been and continue to be (1) to inform, (2) to discover and disseminate knowledge, and (3) to use that knowledge for good. Christians understand the world to be the creative work of God, and this creation* can be understood through education as a means of “loving God with one’s whole mind” (Mark 12:30 par.)

In addition, Christianity has been committed to advancing knowledge as a means of human development, enrichment, and preparation for a life of service. Christians are called (see Vocation) to prepare themselves through education to love God and all people, and to serve the causes of peace and justice.

Christian educational institutions can be found in nearly every corner of the world. They exist within local congregations in Bible study and catechetical teaching for all ages. Schools, colleges, universities, and theological institutions also represent Christianity’s enduring commitment to education. Today, these institutions face all the challenges of the global context and information age – crossing language and culture, confronting resistance from established ways and seats of power, finding the necessary financial resources to sustain the effort, and discerning ways to accommodate the varieties of government policies in different countries.

Many of these institutions provided education well before the rise of public education and have been incorporated into public systems. Some of the distinctive Christian features of these institutions are less visible as a more secular educational model becomes the dominant mode. This is particularly true in Europe and the USA. But the trajectory of the founding values of these institutions, such as dedication to the welfare and development of every student, the teaching of life as a gift to be used for service, and the concern to make a contribution to a more just world, continues into the present.

At every level of education, regional and international associations and institutions exist to advance Christian education, and individual institutions do their work in complex environments. For example, within higher education, there is the United Board of Christian Higher Education in Asia and more than 200 institutions participate in the All India Association of Christian Higher Education. Forman Christian College in Lahore, Pakistan*, recently returned to the Presbyterian Church by the government after several years of nationalization, is thriving, although it is faced with the complexities of being a minority institution in an Islamic republic. The Mar Elias Institutions in the Galilee serve students from many backgrounds and at all levels and include on their faculty Christians, Jews, Muslims, and Druze.

DUNCAN S. FERGUSON

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Educational Practices as Christian Service in Africa. Formal Western education came to Africa with missionaries (see Mission Cluster: In Africa). Most mission stations established schools, hospitals, and sometimes printing presses and agricultural projects. Thus mission stations were centers of faith and educational development.

The primary aim of the schools was to convert* African people to Christianity. All the students of a particular school were to be members of the denomination that established the school. The teaching of the Bible was a priority. The teaching of religion at school had the same goals as Sunday school teaching at church. School teachers were also trained to be evangelists.

Missionaries also introduced professional training of Africans in teacher training colleges, medical and nursing colleges, and training centers for artisans and administrators. Special mission work for women and girls was introduced in order to establish Christian families, following the belief that women shape the next generation and have a great influence on their husbands. Missionaries wanted the mission-trained teachers, evangelists, preachers, and church members to marry Christian women who would encourage their husbands in their faith.

Mission education produced most of the first generation of political leaders in Africa, including Kwame Nkruma of Ghana*, Jomo Kenyatta of Kenya*, Julius Nyerere of Tanzania*, Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia*, and Kamuzu H. Banda of Malawi*. Religion in Africa has continued to contribute significantly to the democratization of politics.

Although independent African governments have taken over as the major provider of Western education, churches continued to manage boarding schools; teacher training colleges and hospitals are still popular among Africans in many countries as providers of the best Western education and medical facilities. In many church schools, the aim of religious education is now educational. Church schools enroll children from different denominations and religions. Girls and boys have the same school curriculum. Some African countries, like Zambia, Malawi, and South* Africa, have encouraged the teaching of multi-faith religious education to promote tolerance among adherents of different religions. This trend has been supported and promoted by International Consultations on Religious Education in East, Central, and Southern Africa.

ISABEL APAWO PHIRI

Educational Practices as Christian Service in Asia. Christian schools were first founded in Asia by missionaries (see Mission Cluster: In Asia) amid the colonial* expansion of the Western powers. Catholic missionaries came along with the Portuguese and Spanish, who were seeking trading opportunities in the early 16th c. (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions; Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). Since their early years of missionary work in places like India*, Siam (Thailand*), Japan*, and especially the Philippines*, the Catholic missionaries have established schools for teaching Christian children and training priests. At the turn of the 17th c., some of these schools in the Philippines were turned into tertiary educational institutions – the oldest universities in Asia.

Later, the Dutch colonial power and its Protestant missionaries arrived (mid-17th c.). Christian schools were set up in Indonesia*, Formosa (Taiwan*), and Ceylon (Sri* Lanka). The greatest influence on the development of modern education in Asia, however, was exerted by the British and US Protestant missionaries. Since the opening of schools by the English Baptists in Calcutta in the first few years of the 19th c., Protestant missionaries had established educational institutions throughout Asia, ranging from preschools to colleges. Catholic missions also continued their educational endeavors, often in competition with their Protestant counterparts.

Aims of Education. Besides serving as an important means of evangelism*, the missionary educational practices also aimed (1) to provide Christian education to converts* and their children; (2) to provide preparatory education for training local preachers, catechists, or priests; (3) to reform oppressive local customs like the exclusion of women from education; and (4) to abolish local superstitions* by transmitting Western knowledge.

As the missionary educational enterprise grew larger (late 19th c.), educational missionaries began to highlight the significance of Christian schools and colleges in transforming Asian religions and cultures* and making the local people more receptive to the gospel. Some missionaries and local Christians also supported the idea of reforming a given nation by building up the character of the people through Christian education.

Education, Culture, and Nationalism.

Before Western missionaries arrived, many Asian peoples already had strong religious cultures, including Hinduism*, Islam*, Buddhism*, and Confucianism*. The beneficiaries of the local dominant cultures often found the mission schools threatening or detestable. Thus in the beginning, mission schools faced resistance from the local dominant cultures and attracted children from underprivileged families or ethnic minorities.

However, with the rise of nationalism (19th c.), the attitude of leaders of the Asian nations toward missionary education became more ambivalent. While they valued the mission schools as an indispensable provider of Western learning for modernizing Asian nations, they also feared that the propagation of Western religion would harm the building of national identity. The general rule was that when resources were sufficient and the nationalistic spirit was high, nation-states would by all means reclaim the control of education. In some extreme cases, like that of Communist China*, all mission schools were closed. More often, Christian schools were allowed to continue but were required to observe some restrictions; e.g. compulsory Bible lessons and religious activities were prohibited.

In general, Christian schools and colleges, if allowed to exist, have become recognized players in national educational systems. Many of them, because of their own long histories, have continued to enjoy a good reputation. They are in direct competition with the public schools, but may also receive subsidies from Asian governments. The balance between the pursuit of academic results and the nurture of Christian values is an important issue that has to be addressed constantly. At the level of higher education, the United Board for Christian Higher Education in Asia has established the Asian Christian Higher Education Institute (Asian Institute), so as to strengthen the Christian presence in colleges and universities.

GUSTAV K. K. YEUNG

Educational Practices as Christian Service in Mexico

Education and Original Evangelization.

In Mexico, education was intimately connected to the evangelization process. Primary education, which took place in courtyards, open chapels, or schools attached to convents, made use of bilingual texts to teach grammar, vocabulary, and catechism, and of theater or painting to represent dogma (and in the process some training in arts and crafts). Priests, sisters, and other religious were assisted by native teachers. The Jesuits'* arrival greatly promoted higher education. The Real y Pontificia Universidad (Royal and Pontifical University) of Mexico (1550s) functioned independently. The Conciliar Seminary (17th c.) offered theological education for the secular clergy, while the education of women, also the Church's responsibility, was provided in convents and in informal women's schools "of friends."

18th and 19th Centuries. The need to instruct the growing population led to the creation of religious schools (18th c.) that offered free education to poor children. Yet the Roman Catholic Church's educational work was reduced during the Bourbon reforms (1750–1808), when the viceroy created primary schools that functioned under the supervision of the government and were publicly financed. The expulsion of the Jesuits (1767) further reduced the role of the Church in education. During the empire of Agustín de Iturbide (1822–23), Lancasterian* schools – schools emphasizing peer tutoring as advocated by the British Quaker educator Joseph Lancaster – were developed, expanding a secular program of popular education. In 1833 the independent state took over the responsibility of education, supervising the schools, without nevertheless relieving the Church of its educational role and its opportunity to provide free education by opening schools attached to convents and in parishes. Likewise, the Catechism of Father Ripalda remained the center of moral education during the 19th c.

From the Revolution to the Present Day.

Porfirio Díaz (president, 1876–80; 1884–1911) gave religious groups permission to come to Mexico and establish private schools. But with the Mexican Revolution (1929), the project of secular education prohibited religious associations from having religious education programs in public schools. This struggle for ideological control between church and state lessened toward the middle of the century, owing to more lenient state policies and a less aggressive attitude of the National Union of Parents of Family and other movements related to the Roman Catholic Church. Today several religious orders – including female congregations – have educational institutions ranging from those offering primary education to those providing university-level education (especially Jesuit, Lasallian, Marist, and Salesian colleges or universities). JAVIER OTAOLA MONTAGNE

Educational Practices as Christian Service in the United States. Christianity emphasized education from its beginnings, following the example of early Christians who met to study the teachings (didache) of the apostles (Acts 2:42) and the “great commission” “to teach them everything I have commanded you” (Matt 28:19–20).

From these injunctions and the growing awareness that Christianity must be taught in order to be understood and practiced, the Christian churches devoted themselves to education. Christian teaching, from its entrance into the USA (16th–17th c.) to the present, falls into three categories: (1) informational, (2) transformational, and (3) vocational. In the family, in the church, and in the institutions of the church, there was a need for people to learn about the basics of Christianity: the stories and content of the Bible, the theology and practices of the church, morality and the expectation of service. These teachings were intended to nurture learners in their spiritual lives and transform them into Christian people. The information that led to transformation in turn pointed to an understanding of vocation*, one’s calling in life.

Numerous institutions devoted to education became a part of the US Christian landscape and have continued to evolve. In the family*, young people were and continue to be expected to learn about faith*. Sunday* school and catechetical classes were and are integral to parish life. Christian schools at all levels and retreat centers were developed by a vast spectrum of denominations and theological perspectives. Theological seminaries for the training of clergy became foundational for providing priests and ministers for the Christian Church. Publishing supported and continues to support this vast educational endeavor.

The educational mission of Christianity in the USA varies among denominations and historical traditions. The Roman Catholic Church has a network of educational institutions that makes it possible for Catholics to receive the majority of their education within Catholic institutions. Generally, mainline Protestants have less complex networks and in many cases have been supportive of public education. There is a growing trend among the Evangelical community to provide schools at all levels in order to cultivate the formation of a Christian mind and spirit.

DUNCAN S. FERGUSON

Edwards, Jonathan (1703–58), born in Connecticut, Yale graduate, Congregational and Presbyterian minister. Because of a major revival*, and his sermons and writing, he became widely known during the 24 years he spent as pastor of a congregation in Northampton, Massachusetts Bay Colony. After losing this pulpit as a result of controversy over the halfway* covenant (1750), he became a missionary to Native Americans in western Massachusetts. Here he had time to write and to teach a few young ministers. They and their successors would dominate theological training in the USA for the next century. Just after assuming the presidency of the College of New Jersey in Princeton, Edwards died from a smallpox inoculation (1758).

Edwards distinguished himself in four areas: in probing the nuances of religious experience, in his brilliant defense of divine sovereignty and moral determinism against Arminians*, in utilizing an idealistic ontology in his understanding of God and of the Trinity*, and in an aesthetic understanding of conversion and human virtue.

Edwards first gained fame for his sensitive, even awestruck description of a remarkable revival that began in his own congregation in 1734. His Faithful Narrative became a literary classic, was widely read in Britain, had a direct impact on John Wesley*, and launched a literary genre in the USA (detailed, moving accounts of great revivals that often converted readers). He believed the revival, or Great* Awakening, was the work of the Holy* Spirit, despite some unwanted excesses. He condemned a cold, unmoving, lifeless form of religion in his Treatise on Religious Affections, a defense of affectional religion and a manual of self-examination that even today remains a widely read devotional guide.

Edwards defended complete piety, or an unqualified love of, or trust in, a sovereign deity. His more soaring conceptions of God as an eternal ground, as a divine mind fully immanent in all its expressions, informed his defense of divine omnipotence. His Freedom of the Will, a powerful philosophical polemic, drew a series of careful distinctions, most importantly between physical and moral determinism. Human choices are not a part of the physical processes of nature. Yet Edwards argued that they have their own order. Humans are able to consider options and to choose among them. This means that they are free. But even human choices have a cause: the developed likes and dislikes of the one choosing. Thus one's identity, one's developed personality, determines choice, but one's identity is not an object of choice. Edwards wrote a devastating critique of the intellectually absurd and morally dangerous beliefs defended by some English Arminians. In their defense of a free will, they argued that human choices reflected no physical or moral determinants. They disassociated choice from developed character, from preferences, from all reasons for choosing one option over another. Such a freedom entailed an absurdity: accidental or uncaused choices. One was free only when nothing determined choice or when one not only wanted an object but wanted to want it (this leads to an infinite regress; see Free Will, Freedom).

Even as a youth, Edwards came to the belief that ultimate reality was "mind-like." Later, influenced by English Neoplatonists at Cambridge and possibly by John Locke's* Essay on Human Understanding, Edwards used idealistic and Neoplatonic motifs in his more philosophical theology. This meant that, to him, the best image of God was that of an all-inclusive mind, whose ideas were emanations outward, or modes of self-expression, or a form of self-edifying communication. The divine ideas of such a mind provided him, like many earlier theologians, with a rationalization of the Logos*, or Son* of God, while the love and spirit of mutuality that obtained between a mind and its thought, or between a figurative father and son, provided an image of the Holy* Spirit. All creation is continuous, not an act in past time. And the physical universe reflects, not rational intent at some point of creation, but the rationality (the harmony, symmetry, and rhythm) of God's own sustaining thought.

Such an idealistic and immanent* conception of God was suffused with aesthetic* content. The whole of being is harmonious, mutually supportive, and beautiful. The divine mind, when perceived in all its beauty, when grasped in an immediate and moving way, is so winsome that no person can do other, morally, than respond to such a sensibly present God with consent, trust, and love. True virtue is the beauty present in such consent to the unity, delightfulness, and sweetness found only in God. God does not coerce humans, but seduces them.

But ordinary humans, without special illumination from the Holy Spirit, without the gift of grace*, never really perceive or grasp the loveliness of God and thus do not, morally cannot, respond to him in faith*. PAUL K. CONKIN

Egeria or Aetheria, a woman, probably a Spanish nun or laywoman, who made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land and holy places in Egypt and Syria (c381–84) and wrote to her circle of women (“sisters” or “ladies”) an account of her travels. Known through a 11th-c. Latin partial manuscript, her account includes a detailed description of the Liturgy of Jerusalem, both daily liturgies (matins, sext and none, and vespers) as well as Sunday services at different times of the liturgical year.

Egypt. Christianity in Egypt is associated with the NT and very early Christian traditions. The Gospel of Matthew* (2:15) mentions that the holy family came to Egypt (the only country outside Palestine where Christ lived) and came out of Egypt as Israel did in the time of the Exodus*. Acts* (2:10) mentions persons from “Egypt and the parts of Libya belonging to Cyrene” among the Jews listening to Peter’s Pentecost sermon in Jerusalem. Similarly, those who debated with Stephen* included Jews from Cyrene and Alexandria (Acts 6:9). Acts 18:24 may allude to a mid-1st-c. Christian community in Egypt. According to a tradition mentioned by Eusebius* of Caesarea, the Egyptian Church was founded by Mark the Evangelist.

In the 2nd c., Alexandria was an important economic and commercial center of the Roman Empire, because of its location at the junction of the great maritime and land route connecting Europe to Africa and Asia. It also had an important cultural role as a major center of Greek learning and as a Christian center where Gnostic* groups and anti-Gnostic groups confronted each other.

Clement* of Alexandria, Origen*, and Didymus* the Blind were influential throughout the church, even as Gnosticism and Manichaeism* were in Egypt (3rd and 4th c.) (see Alexandria, Alexandrian Christianity and its Theology; Nag Hammadi Codices).

The vitality and rapid spread of Christianity in Egypt in the 3rd and 4th c. can be measured by the violent persecutions that the church suffered under the emperors Septimius Severus (193–211; when Leonides, Origen’s father, suffered martyrdom), Decius (249–51), Valerian (253–59), and especially Diocletian (284–305) and Maximus Daia (308–13).

In the 4th and 5th c., after the Edict of Milan was issued by Constantine* (313), the life of the Coptic Church was characterized by theological debates and monasticism*. Preeminent in the theological debates that followed the rise of Arianism* was Athanasius*, viewed as the 20th patriarch of the Coptic* Church (326–73). Born in Alexandria (c295), Athanasius became the secretary and companion of Patriarch Alexander I, accompanying him to the Council of Nicaea*, strongly emphasizing the full divinity of the Word* or Son* of God against opponents whom he labeled “Arians.” Athanasius was exiled five times by Arian emperors. Preeminent in the theological debates against Nestorianism* was Cyril, the 24th patriarch (412–44; see Cyril of Alexandria). An eloquent preacher and great theologian, he confronted Nestorius, who conceived of two centers of operation simultaneously present in the life of Christ, one human and one divine, and thus denied the title Theotokos for the Virgin Mary (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Theotokos). Cyril emphasized the dynamic force of the Incarnation* and affirmed that Jesus was wholly and completely divine, thus a single person.

Egyptian monasticism* is commonly associated with Antony* (c254–356), who, according to Athanasius’s biography, was the founder of Christian monasticism. Antony was a pioneer of desert monasticism who interrupted his solitude to instruct disciples and to perform other pastoral duties. Pachomius* (c292–346) was another early Egyptian monastic leader, commonly described as “the founder of cenobitic* monasticism.” Born of pagan parents, he enlisted in the army, served for several years, and converted; on his release from the army, Pachomius was baptized and later founded a monastic community in Tabennesi (c323). In the Pachomian system, the monastery consisted of a group of buildings surrounded by an enclosure wall.

The late 5th–7th c. was marked by the schisms that followed the Council of Chalcedon* between the non-Chalcedonian churches (see Orthodox Churches, Oriental, Cluster: Coptic Orthodox Church) and the different Chalcedonian churches. Among the significant figures of this period were Timothy Aelurus* (d477), Dioscorus of Alexandria (d530), and Severus* of Antioch (who had fled to Egypt, 518).

During the Arab conquest (635–40), the weakened Byzantine provinces of the Near East were overthrown. After the reign of the Umayyad dynasty (661–750), during which the Coptic Church had eight patriarchs, the church became the target of Arab governors. A tax was levied on monks, and many churches and monasteries were destroyed, including the monastery at Bawit.

With the 10th-c. establishment of the caliphate of Shia Fatimid (909–1171), in independent Egypt Copts enjoyed a fair amount of religious freedom. Yet for nine years, al-Hakim (996–1021) persecuted Christians, including women, destroyed many churches and monasteries, and humiliated, tortured, and exiled Patriarch Zacharias (1004–32) to a monastery. But after 1005, al-Hakim restored all their confiscated property to Christians and allowed the patriarch to return to his see.

After the peak of the golden age of Coptic Arabic literature (13th c.), the Mamluk dynasty started a persecution (late 13th c.); by the 14th c., once again, many churches were destroyed, property was confiscated, and heavy taxes were levied against the Coptic community. The number of Christians drastically decreased, notably as a result of the plague (the Black Death). After experiencing a loss of influence in the 14th and 15th c., during the Ottoman period (especially the 17th–18th c.), Copts occupied important administrative positions in the government, a situation that facilitated the restoration of the churches and the translation of new books from Greek and Syriac.

The relations between the Coptic Church and Western churches began to change in the 15th c. For the first time after the schism following Chalcedon, the Roman Catholic pope entered into contact with the Coptic Church. The Roman pope Eugene IV (1431–47) sent to Cairo his delegate, the Franciscan Albert de Sarteano (d1450). The pope informed his Alexandrian counterpart of the discussion of union between the Western and Eastern churches. A Coptic delegation was sent to the Council of Florence* (1438–45) but arrived late. From the 16th to 19th c., many letters were exchanged between the two prelates. Then, beginning in the 19th c., Protestant missions arrived in Egypt.

What is the status of Christianity in Egypt today? There are no accurate statistics. One can estimate that there are between 7 and 10 million Christians (approximately 10% of the population) in Egypt, mostly Copts. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER: COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH.

Statistics: Population (2007): 80 million (M). Christians, 8 M, 10% (Copts, 7 M; Protestants, 0.5 M; Roman Catholics, 0.3 M; independents, 0.2 M); Muslims, 72 M, 90%. (Source: 2001 studies on Coptic Christianity.)

YOUHANNA NESSIM YOUSSEF

Eighteen Benedictions (Heb Shemoneh 'Esreh), Jewish daily prayer practiced before and after the fall of Jerusalem (70 CE), known only in a much later Babylonian (longer) and Palestinian (shorter) version. Both versions are a prayer for the gathering of the dispersed (Diaspora*), the reinstatement of proper judges, God's mercy on Jerusalem, proper worship in the Temple, and significantly, in the 14th benediction, the coming of a Davidic Messiah* to rebuild Jerusalem – one of the infrequent references in early Jewish literature to a Jewish expectation of the Messiah, although it was certainly formulated in this form after 70 CE. The “blessing against the heretics” (Birkath ha-Minim) was added probably about 80 CE. See also BIRKATH HA-MINIM.

DANIEL PATTE

Ekandem, Cardinal Dominic (1917–95), born into a non-Christian royal family in Obio Ibiono, Nigeria, converted to Christianity, baptized (1925), ordained a priest (1947); the first Anglophone West African bishop (auxiliary bishop of Calabar, 1954). Appointed bishop of Ikot Ekpene (1963) and, after the Nigerian civil war, administrator of the Port Harcourt Diocese (1970–73), he was named cardinal (1976), then metropolitan archbishop of Abuja (1989–92). He presided over the Catholic Bishops Conference of Nigeria (1973, 1976) and the Association of Episcopal Conferences of Anglophone West Africa (1977), promoting inculturation* in the African Church, encouraging evangelization of Africa by Africans, and founding the National Missionary Society of St. Paul.

CAMILLUS UMOH.

ELCA. See LUTHERANISM CLUSTER: IN THE UNITED STATES: EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA (ELCA).

Elder, one who is older (Gk *presbyteros), term used in Presbyterian, Congregational, and Baptist churches to designate both “teaching” and “ruling elders,” ministers of Word and sacrament, and laity elected for church administration, respectively.

Election, God's “choice” of some peoples (i.e. Israel, the Christian Church*) or individuals (“the elect”) for some purpose. As there are both “general” predestination* and “salvific” predestination (see Predestination), there is “election for a specific function” and “election for salvation*.”

In both cases, election is an act of divine freedom through which God favors the “elect.” One can then ask whether God still acts with both justice* and mercy*. Paul addresses this question by affirming that God's choice cannot be understood by human beings (Rom 11:33). He also raises a major issue for Christian theology when he speaks of God's foreknowledge* and mentions it in connection with predestination (Rom 8:29–30). Does Paul imply that predestination is based on foreknowledge? If so, is it foreknowledge of works or of faith? Or did God choose Jacob rather than Esau before they were born and before they had made any choices (Rom 9:11), so that election is based not on works but on God's call (Rom 9:12), as Augustine* emphasized? In the latter case, election is God's free "predilection" for some rather than others, and predestination is God's preparation of the means by which God's purpose will be fulfilled.

Election is often presented as election for salvation – often in apocalyptic texts of the NT (Mark 13; Matt 24) – and, throughout Christian history, is often expressed in views of predestination*. Yet in the OT (especially in Deuteronomy*), this election – as YHWH's free choice – results in a covenantal* relationship in which the two parties (YHWH and the chosen/elect people) have responsibilities; thus the election of Israel is for a particular task: being the people of God among the nations. For the elect, the election is always the blessing of a particular relationship with God and can therefore be equated with "salvation" (in the sense of overcoming the separation between God and the chosen individuals or groups). But in both the Jewish tradition and Paul (in all the aforementioned passages), "election" is associated with "calling" or "vocation" for a particular task. See also VOCATION.

EUGENE TESELLE and DANIEL PATTE

Eli, priest and judge (1 Sam 1–4), who trained Samuel* as a priest and prophet*. Because he failed to discipline his sons, they were killed in battle. When Eli died, he was replaced by Samuel.

Eli, Eli, Lema Sabachthani, Aramaic, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Ps 22:1; Matt 27:46), among Jesus' last words on the cross.

Elijah, considered by the early church to be the greatest prophet, revived the son of a widow at Zarephath, challenged the prophets of Baal at Carmel, and ascended in a whirlwind to heaven (1 Kgs 17–19, 21:17–29; 2 Ks 1–2). Malachi 4:5–6 prophesied that Elijah would return before the day of the Lord, and the NT declares that the prophecy was fulfilled by John* the Baptist (Matt 11:14, 17:1–13; cf. Luke 1:17). Luther* compared the prophet to the Reformers, and the prophets of Baal to the Roman Catholic Church. Elijah's story exemplifies devotion, providence, and divine empowerment. JEFFRY C. DAVIS

Eliot, George (1819–80), pseudonym of Mary Ann or Marian Evans, a translator of scholarly works and author. Following her youthful orientation to Evangelical Christianity, George Eliot was exposed to German critical theology through her translations of Strauss and Feuerbach, and to the "religion of humanity" by followers of Auguste Comte. With the publication of Middlemarch (1872) and Daniel Deronda (1876), she was recognized as the greatest English writer of her time.

George Eliot remained a deeply religious thinker, and religious themes and figures appear in all her novels. She explored how redemptive transformation occurs through ordinary historical and psychological processes. For her the objective of religion is to reorient human beings from self-centeredness to reality-centeredness, with "reality" understood to include other persons, the larger human and natural community, and the ultimate mystery of things. She imagined thinking of God not as a transcendent supreme being but in terms of divine sympathy, suffering, and immediate presence. In her last novel, Daniel Deronda, in which she explores the spirituality of Judaism, the divine presence becomes an omnipresence, a whole that contains and preserves every part as a part. She did not abandon the figure of Jesus. She saw in his story the mythos and pathos of the human story, and his story hovers in the background of the stories of her heroines and heroes, many of whom exemplify an imitatio Christi.

Interest in George Eliot's fiction has revived with feminist literary scholarship, which has found in her work powerful depictions of women. Theologians and ethicists have discovered in her a valuable resource for thinking about questions of meaning, truth, and purpose in the context of postmodernity*. Several of her novels have been successfully adapted to television. PETER C. HODGSON

Eliot, T. S. (Thomas Stearns) (1888–1965), poet, critic, editor, dramatist. Main poet in the 20th-c. revolution in the arts that included Picasso, Stravinsky, and Joyce; educated in literature and philosophy at Harvard and Oxford Universities.

While a student, he wrote "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," an existentialist* monologue of the divided self; after World War I, The Waste Land, a snapshot of personal and cultural trauma; after his baptism, the penitential lyric Ash-Wednesday; and during World War II, Four Quartets, a theodicy*. The last three suggest the stages in Dante's* spiritual journey: hell, purgatory, and paradise. As a literary and social critic, Eliot defended tradition* as a self-renewing community of the living and the dead; he founded and edited an influential journal (Criterion, 1922–39) and wrote five verse plays.

Eliot was born in St. Louis, Missouri, into a family distinguished for its contributions to US culture. His forebears, who lived in New England starting in the 17th c., included preachers, judges, historians, two presidents of the American Unitarian Association, two of Harvard University, and two of the United States (John Adams, John Quincy Adams). His ancestors helped establish Unitarianism* at Harvard Divinity School; his grandfather, transplanted to Missouri, founded the Unitarian Church of the Messiah and Washington University. The "guardians of the faith" in Eliot's circle were the American Transcendentalist Ralph Waldo Emerson* and the English poet and critic Matthew Arnold.

Eliot began his religious quest during the re-evaluation of Christianity forced by the science of Darwin* and the philosophy of Nietzsche*. Dissatisfied with Emerson's Unitarianism and Arnold's Culture, he proceeded down a crooked road leading roughly from aestheticism* (art as religion) to agnosticism* (F. H. Bradley's neoidealism) to relativism (J. G. Frazer's Golden Bough, primitive mythology) to the Church of England. He was baptized in 1927 and soon thereafter became a British citizen and active churchman. Eliot moved forward by looping back to his pre-American English roots and to pre-Enlightenment* Christian orthodoxy, a complex return to origins marked by modern education and experience. His new commitment was evident in his poetry ("Journey of the Magi," Ash-Wednesday, Four Quartets), plays (Murder in the Cathedral), and criticism (Idea of a Christian Society). His journey, religious in the radical sense (religare, "to rebind fragments," "to reconnect"; see Religion as a Concept and Christianity), illustrates a quest for wholeness by a poet of immense intelligence and erudition who found in common life moments that opened windows on transcendence and supported faith in the Incarnation*.

JEWEL SPEARS BROOKER

Elizabeth, wife of the priest Zechariah*, mother of John* the Baptist, and cousin of Mary*, who visited her before the birth of Christ (Luke 1; commemorated in the Feast of the Visitation*).

Elizabeth I (1533–1603), queen of England and Ireland (1558–1603). As Henry VIII's younger daughter, by his second wife, Anne Boleyn, she was illegitimate under Roman canon law (which did not recognize the marriage) and under English law (because her mother was executed, 1536). Yet she was named third in the Succession Act of 1544, should her half-siblings, Edward and Mary, die without heirs, as happened. She succeeded to the throne without challenge.

She was given an excellent education by tutors who were identified as "Christian humanists," or "Evangelicals," and subsequently emerged as Protestants. She was a remarkable scholar, fluent in Latin, French, and Italian, with some Greek and Spanish. Although Elizabeth had held to the Reformed religion since at least 1547, when Mary* (Tudor) succeeded to the throne (1553) she was forced to conform to the established Roman Catholic faith, although Mary (rightly) did not trust her sincerity. Elizabeth spent 18 months in prison and under house arrest. After Mary's pregnancy failed (1555), Elizabeth was generally looked to as the heir.

An orthodox Edwardian Protestant (shaped by Thomas Cranmer* and Nicholas Ridley), Elizabeth took her responsibilities as both monarch and church leader with extreme seriousness. Knowing that most of her subjects preferred the old ways and believed that a woman was disqualified from leading the church, she called herself supreme governor rather than supreme head of the church settlement, keeping it ecclesiastically conservative while theologically Protestant. God had given her the job of shaping and running the English Church, and she would brook no interference with that prerogative and her authority. Her responsibility to God was personal and immediate. Conformity was to her always more important than unity. Thus it was in response to her excommunication by the pope (1570) that she made the Church of England a Protestant establishment.

DAVID LOADES

Elizabeth of Hungary (1207–31). Daughter of the king of Hungary, at 14 she married Duke Louis IV of Thuringia; the pious couple had three children. Following his death during the Crusades*, she took refuge in Marburg, where she founded a hospital and humbly took care of the poor. Exhausted by this work and by acts of penance*, she died at the age of 24. Canonized only four years after her death, she is revered for embodying the spirit of St. Francis* of Assisi. There are many poetic stories and legends about her, illustrated by a rich iconography, in particular that of the miracle of the bread transformed into roses when she carried bread to the poor, despite the interdiction to do so. These hagiographies praise her as a figure who is both emblematic and full of contrasts: of royal standing yet profoundly humble; wealthy and generous; afflicted and patient; with a deep piety and a genuine love for the poor; with an abiding affection for her husband, who was fighting to liberate the tomb of the Christ and after whose death she took a vow of chastity. As such, Elizabeth of Hungary was a figure with great appeal to romantic piety both in and beyond Catholic Germany and Hungary.

GUY-THOMAS BEDOUELLE, OP

Elkesaites, members of a 2nd-c. Jewish sect in Mesopotamia, named from the “Book of Elkesai.” The book was adopted by a Jewish-Christian group similar to the Ebionites*.

El Salvador. Spanish Catholic priests first arrived in El Salvador in 1525, but mission got under way slowly in a country that had no resources that were of interest to the Spaniards. Secular priests under the jurisdiction of the Diocese of Guatemala* initiated mission work in El Salvador. This foreign control of the Church was long resisted, until in the early 19th c., when through the national independence movement (1821) a local bishop was named by the civil government and finally recognized by the pope in 1842. This troubled relation between church and state continued. In 1886 the Liberal government secularized* cemeteries and education*, religious orders were abolished, and religious liberty was affirmed.

In the 20th c., some priests chose to side with the poor against elite dictatorships, rejecting the traditional union of the Roman Catholic Church with the aristocratic landowners. Church leaders, inspired by Liberation* theology’s emphasis of the preferential* option for the poor, became subject to military persecution. The military dictatorship, armed by the USA as part of its anti-Communism crusade, tortured and killed tens of thousands of peasants. Numerous priests and catechists were assassinated, including Archbishop Romero*, four US nuns, and six Jesuit priests (early 1980s). Dissension within the Church lessened institutional loyalty.

As in Honduras* and Nicaragua*, the people are predominantly mestizos* (91%); 5% are Pipil and Lenca (“Indian”), 3–4% white, and a small number black. The great scarcity of priests has made ministry to local churches extremely difficult. About 40% of rural parishes are without priests. Barrett gives a typology of Roman Catholicism in the land: bourgeois Catholicism (traditional, European Catholicism; 4% of Catholics); popular Catholicism (30% of Catholics; see Popular Christian Practices Cluster: In Latin America); Mayanized Catholicism (60% of Catholics; practiced by mestizos who hold onto certain ancient Mayan religious traditions and mix them with Catholicism and popular Catholicism); a kind of Christo-Mayanism (4% of Catholics; practiced by pure Mayans who keep most Mayan traditions in which they introduce Christian practices).

As in much of Latin America, Bible societies were instrumental in initiating “Evangelical missions” (as all Protestant and Pentecostal missions are called in Latin America). Francisco Penzotti began the work (1892) of the Central American Mission. Other groups followed: American Baptists* (1911), Assemblies* of God (1929), and Church* of God, Cleveland (1930). Several independent Pentecostal*/Charismatic churches grew rapidly, becoming about 80% of Protestants in El Salvador by 2000 (Protestants constitute between 16 and 20% of the population).

The religious situation is complex. Base* ecclesial communities (Comunidades Ecclesiales de Base, CEBs) were strong during the civil war (late 20th c.), and some continue. But Catholics are divided on issues of church and society, structural oppression, and attitudes toward the poor. A significant number are Charismatics. Conservative Protestant churches remained largely apolitical during the civil war, except for the Lutherans* and the American Baptists, who supported the peasant movement alongside the CEBs. The rapid growth of Pentecostals/Charismatics* was a response to population displacement, broken community and family bonds, and a sense of hopelessness in troubling times. The message of God’s acceptance, direct access to the divine through Jesus, a concrete ethical code, self-expression through the speaking of tongues, and an assured hope of personal future fulfillment converted many to the new faith. See also MEGACHURCHES IN EL SALVADOR.

Statistics: Population (2000): 6.3 million (M). Christians, 6.1 M, 97.6% (Roman Catholics, 5.7 M; independents, 0.7 M; Protestants, 0.5 M; marginal Christians, 0.1 M, with 15% doubly affiliated – baptized Catholics [still counted by the Catholic Church] who converted and became members of independent Charismatic and Protestant churches); nonreligious, 0.1 M, 1.6%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001. The move toward Charismatic churches continued; according to 2008 estimates, nearly one-third of the population claimed to be “Evangelical.”)

SIDNEY ROOY

Elvira, Council of, a Spanish council (either 300–6 or 312–14) presided over by Hosius*. Its 81 canons are the first to have survived intact; they reflect Christian attitudes just before Constantine’s* victory, when city officials were becoming Christian and there was apprehension that they might take part in idolatrous rituals. The Council stipulated that clergy were to maintain self-control. Lifelong excommunication was specified for a number of sins without reconciliation, even at death.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo (1803–82), leader of the Transcendentalist* Movement, essayist, spiritual philosopher. After resigning from his Unitarian* pulpit (1832), Emerson delivered lectures in Boston that culminated in his 1838 address at Harvard Divinity School, a call for the dramatic reform of conventional theology and lifeless preaching. These lectures, as well as his volumes Nature (1836) and Essays (1841), were the basis of Transcendentalism, a movement of spiritual enlargement, literary innovation, and political reform that deeply influenced US culture. Emerson formulated an intuitive and experiential religion, and emphasized the revelatory powers of nature. He conceptualized God as the “Over-Soul,” a spiritual force both within and beyond the self. His later work stressed the evolution of religion into pure ethics. He was an important figure in US romantic thought, and his work had a profound impact on contemporaries such as Henry David Thoreau, Margaret Fuller, and Walt Whitman, and on later thinkers such as William James* and Friedrich Nietzsche*. See also SPIRITUALITY CLUSTER: CHRISTIAN FORMS OF, IN NORTH AMERICA.

DAVID M. ROBINSON

Emmanuel, Immanuel (Heb “God with us”), a name in Isa 7:14 and 8:8 (probably referring to a child born in Isaiah’s time without connection to the Messiah, as Jewish interpretation posits) and in Matt 1:23, which opens up the possibility of identifying Jesus as the Messiah* or Christ*. The identification of Jesus with “Emmanuel” mentioned by Isaiah encouraged the development of the doctrine of the Incarnation*. See also INCARNATION CLUSTER.

Emmaus, a village 60 stadia (seven miles) from Jerusalem (Luke 24:13), where two disciples recognized Jesus during the breaking of bread.

Encomenderos, Encomienda, in Latin America, colonists to whom the Spanish crown “entrusted” the Christian indoctrination of the natives in exchange for services (slave labor) and tribute (e.g. gold, corn, chickens). See also LAS CASAS, BARTOLOMÉ DE; REDUCTIONS; SUBLIMUS DEI.

Encratism (from Gk enkrateia, “self-control”). The term was applied by the Greeks to the control of both desire and anger. Among Christians it was applied primarily to the former. So-called Encratites, or extreme ascetics*, are attacked by several 2nd- and 3rd-c. writers. Some of the apocryphal* Gospels and Acts may have been written in these circles. It has also been suggested that their views form the background of the emerging doctrine of original* sin.

Enculturation, an anthropological term that designates the process by which people adapt to and assimilate the culture in which they live, integrating themselves into that culture. Since the 1960s, this term has been replaced in the study of Christianity by “inculturation” to indicate that the encounter of a culture and Christianity is a two-way process in which the gospel and the culture of a particular people are integrated and mutually enriched. See also INCULTURATION CLUSTER.

Encyclical, a “circular” letter sent to all churches under the jurisdiction of a bishop or the pope. See also SOCIAL ENCYCLICALS.

Encyclion, decree issued by the emperor Basiliscus (486), condemning Chalcedon* and adopting Miaphysitism* as the religion of the Empire. After Zeno’s restoration as emperor, he issued the Henoticon*, attempting unsuccessfully to reconcile the Dyophysites and the Miaphysites.

England, Church of. See ANGLICANISM CLUSTER: ANGLICAN COMMUNION AND ITS THEOLOGY; UNITED KINGDOM.

English Literature and Christianity. Christianity and the Bible have been important to English literature from its beginnings. The earliest surviving poem in English, “Caedmon’s Hymn,” is a prayer praising God for the creation of the world and humankind, and the most important Old English poem, Beowulf, describes – disapprovingly – “pagan” religious practices, contrasting them with Christian beliefs.

The work of the late medieval poets Geoffrey Chaucer* and William Langland is steeped in biblical allusion and quotations, and is often concerned with ecclesiastic controversies. During this period, Christian drama, both morality plays and biblical mystery plays, lyrics, biblical paraphrases, and devotional prose, were popular.

The language of the various 16th- to early-17th-c. English translations of the Bible*, along with the Book* of Common Prayer, profoundly influenced the language of English literature. Renaissance literature expanded its scope to include more secular subjects, but (Protestant) Christian beliefs and assumptions continued to dominate literary production. In his 1579 Defense of Poesy, Sir Philip Sidney defended literature against Puritan* attacks of frivolousness by arguing that poets create imaginary worlds under God’s inspiration, moved by “the force of a divine breath.” Edmund Spenser’s Faerie Queene (1590) is a highly complex allegorical epic celebrating Protestant faith in a magical, perilous land of giants, monsters, and heroic knights.

Shakespeare’s* plays, though secular in subject matter, resonate profoundly with religious thought and biblical allusions. His position, if any, on contemporary doctrinal issues continues to be a matter of dispute, in part because his use of philosophical and theological material always appears to be generated by the plays rather than vice versa.

Among the poets of the 17th c. who took up explicitly Christian subjects was John Donne*, dean of Saint Paul’s Cathedral. George Herbert’s The Temple is a metaphoric collection of devotional verse that examines the conflicts within his own faith. Robert Herrick, Richard Lovelace, Richard Crashaw, and Andrew Marvell produced important poetry on Christian subjects. John Milton’s* Paradise Lost (1667, 1674) is perhaps the most ambitious English Christian poem, seeking nothing less than to “justify the ways of God to men.” His contemporary John Bunyan*, a Baptist preacher with much less formal education, wrote the enormously popular Pilgrim’s Progress (1678).

During the Enlightenment, Christian themes and subjects gave way to social and political ones, while the romantic period saw these combined in the biblical imagery of William Blake*. John Keats seems not to have been much interested in religious ideas, and Percy Bysshe Shelley was a devout atheist. William Wordsworth’s poetry was produced over a very long career, and both its religious and political ideas shifted from an early radicalism to a later orthodoxy. Samuel Taylor Coleridge* (The Lyrical Ballads, 1798) likewise moved through Unitarianism* and conservative Anglicanism*. Byron’s upbringing in Calvinistic Presbyterianism perhaps lies behind his creation of the “Byronic hero,” rebellious, brooding, guilt-wracked, and exemplified by the defiant hero of the closet drama Cain.

The Victorian period was marked by religious tensions brought on in part by scientific investigations, including the writings of Charles Darwin* on evolution. With the exception of the poems of Gerard Manley Hopkins, Victorian poetry is marked more by expressions of doubt – notably Alfred Lord Tennyson’s In Memoriam – than those of faith. Novelists varied in their doctrinal positions but shared an easy and frequent use of biblical allusion, and Anthony Trollope explored the mundane politics of church life itself.

Twentieth-century English writers only infrequently voice Christian themes, important exceptions being T. S. Eliot* and C. S. Lewis*, but Christian imagery and biblical allusions continue to be important, if operating in heterodox fashion, as in W. B. Yeats’s “The Second Coming.”

JOHN PLUMMER

Enhypostasia, doctrine that Christ’s humanity has its hypostasis*, or existence, “in” (and not separate from) that of the Word.

Enlightenment, an intellectual and cultural movement in the 17th and 18th c. (For a very different kind of enlightenment, see Buddhism and Christianity Cluster: Buddhist Perspective.) The European Enlightenment joined the humanistic spirit of the Renaissance* and the scientific* revolution of the 17th c. and ushered in the modern* world. This diverse, complex, often inconsistent era deeply influenced subsequent Christian thought. It sought to bring about a new order based on the model of natural science, i.e. testing what before had been taken for granted. No longer a received heritage of knowledge, reason was now an ongoing process of autonomous critical analysis. "Enlightenment," the philosopher Immanuel Kant* (1724–1804) declared, "is the release from . . . the inability to make use of one's understanding without direction from another . . . Sapere aude [Dare to know]! Have courage to use your own reason*." It was this insistent revolt against settled assumptions, traditions, and authority that challenged Christianity on many fronts.

Reacting to the bloody religious wars of the 17th c., Enlightenment writers viewed religious dogmatism, intolerance, prejudice, and coercion as the enemies of liberty of conscience and of communal peace. John Locke's* (1632–1704) A Letter Concerning Toleration (1689) became, for writers such as Voltaire (1694–1778), Gotthold Lessing (1729–81), and Thomas Jefferson* (1743–1826), the cornerstone of true religion. Since no religion can indubitably be proved true, forced uniformity denies personal freedom*. Teaching, persuasion, and prayer are the only legitimate means of spreading religious belief. Enlightenment writers further argued that there should be no conflict between religious faith and reason. Beliefs may appear to be above reason but never can be contrary to reason once known. In Christianity Not Mysterious (1696), the Deist John Toland (1670–1722) argued that revelation* never can be inherently mysterious or incomprehensible. Others went further, insisting that biblical revelation can add nothing to a natural religion that is eternal, perfect, and universal. Christianity may be of more recent origin, yet its essentials must have come from an all-loving and wise God, i.e. at creation itself – the theme of Matthew Tindal's (1655–1733) Christianity as Old as the Creation (1730).

The inerrancy* and unquestioned truth and authority of the Bible as Scripture* also were challenged. Voltaire believed that the historical errors, outmoded science, and primitive morals found in the Bible only breed superstition and fanaticism. Biblical scholars, notably H. S. Reimarus (1694–1768) and J. S. Semler (1725–91), were discovering that the Bible consists of various strata and genres of literature, passed on orally, edited, and arranged for certain purposes, thus challenging the Bible's historical veracity and divine inspiration. The result was a series of naturalistic accounts and explanations of the development of the biblical canon and the origins of Christianity itself. Such studies raised an issue current today: the genuine historical reality and message of Jesus vis-à-vis the earliest Christian community's memory and portrayals of him in the NT.

Furthermore, the so-called truths of history, based as they are on testimony, are open to question, and thus can never become the proof of the necessary truths of reason. As the philosopher David Hume (1711–76) put it, "A [historical] miracle can never be proved so as to be the foundation of religion" (emphasis added). Hume and Kant also argued that we cannot know the nature of God, e.g. his infinity, oneness, perfection, or goodness, through our empirical examination of the contingencies and uncertainties of either nature or human history. Religion is, rather, a natural belief, a want of reason, or a deep moral demand. The Enlightenment ran its course, and a Counter Enlightenment followed. Yet the seedbed of the latter is present in the writings of the Enlightenment thinkers themselves. Hence it remains true that Christianity is deeply indebted to the heritage of the Enlightenment.

JAMES C. LIVINGSTON

Enlightenment in the United States. The European Enlightenment had an important influence on religion in the USA in the late 17th and 18th c., especially during the revolutionary era and the founding of the nation. The effects of this relationship were not entirely anticipated. The American Enlightenment was significantly moderated by evangelical Protestantism, by earlier Calvinistic* Puritanism*, the First Great* Awakening (1730–60), and the Second Great Awakening (1800–30). Most Americans were alarmed by the skepticism and cynicism of the radical French lumières, e.g. Voltaire. They also disavowed the likes of the Protestant Dissenter and pamphleteer Thomas Paine's (1737–1809) fiery attacks on the Bible as "a book of lies, wickedness, and blasphemy" (Age of Reason, 1794–96). Yet, surprisingly, Calvinists, liberal Christians, and dissenting Millennialists* allied with Paine's The Rights of Man (1791) and with the radical republicanism of, e.g., Thomas Jefferson, in their revolutionary political aims.

Many Christian moderates, e.g. John Adams* (1735–1826), rejected Calvinism and creedalism, while Christian Deists, e.g. Thomas Jefferson* (1743–1826), censured Protestant orthodoxy as introducing "new absurdities" into Christianity. At the same time, these and more skeptical thinkers, e.g. Benjamin Franklin* (1706–90), spoke openly and warmly of "God's kind providence." Contradictions abounded. What enlightened moderates and radicals together attacked was church establishment, priestcraft, creedal dogmatism, and “enthusiasm.” The Christian religion was to be reasonable, free, and, in its essential part, moral.

The American Enlightenment’s greatest contributions to Christian thought are its principles of religious liberty* and relations between church* and state. James Madison’s (1751–1836) Memorial and Remonstrance against Assessments (1785) insisted on “a perfect separation between ecclesiastical and civil matters,” as did Jefferson’s principle that “the legislature should make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof” (1802), words enshrined in the First Amendment of the US Constitution (1791).

JAMES C. LIVINGSTON

Enoch, Books of

1 Enoch, a collection of Jewish writings claiming to transmit revelations about the cosmos and the end-time received by Enoch (Gen 5:21–24), but actually written between 350 BCE and 50 CE. The various parts of 1 Enoch reflect the political upheavals created by the Hellenistic and Roman overlords of Palestine; internal Jewish disputes, especially about the nature of the calendar and right practice in the Jerusalem Temple; and social tensions between the rich and powerful and the oppressed “righteous and pious,” who were the authors’ clients. Foundational to the Enochic revelations is an interpretation of Gen 6:1–4 that depicts “the sons of God” as angels (“holy watchers”) who rebel against God by revealing forbidden secrets, mating with mortal women, and breeding a race of giants who devastate the earth. Central to the “parables of Enoch” (Chaps. 37–71) is an interpretation of biblical texts about the Davidic king, the “Son* of man” (Dan 7), and 2 Isaiah’s “Servant* of the Lord,” which posits a heavenly figure who will enact God’s imminent judgment against “the kings and the mighty.” Essential to much of the collection is the belief that the audience comprises the righteous and pious of the end-time, constituted by revelation and awaiting vindication in the Judgment.

The myth of the watchers was widely used in early Christianity as an explanation for the demonic* presence in the world. The parables’ expectations about the “Son of man” were a source of early Christian speculation about the exalted Christ and his imminent return as judge. 1 Enoch, however, is considered canonical only by the Ethiopian Church and has been preserved only in manuscripts of its Bible.

2 Enoch, a Jewish apocalyptic writing (c1st–2nd c. CE) that reinterprets a collection of Enochic traditions very similar to 1 Enoch. Its speculation focuses on the content of the seven heavens, it emphasizes ethical obligations, and its eschatology is concerned primarily with the fate of the individual immediately after death. A legend about the miraculous birth of Melchizedek (Chaps. 71–72) is of comparative value for the study of the NT infancy narratives and the Melchizedek–Jesus speculation in the Epistle to the Hebrews. Composed probably in Greek, it is preserved only in Old Church Slavonic manuscripts from the 14th c. and later, which contain various Christian interpolations and revisions.

3 Enoch, a collection of Jewish mystical traditions, the earliest from the 4th to the 9th c. CE, that describe Rabbi Ishmael’s ascent to heaven, where he sees Enoch enthroned as the angel Metatron at the right hand of God and many heavenly mysteries. It is an important testimony to the mystical speculation that continued to flourish in the Middle Ages alongside the Torah instruction embodied in the Talmuds.

GEORGE W. E. NICKELSBURG

Enthusiasm (from the Gk “being possessed by a deity”), term for those who claim to be inspired, usually connoting intensity, excess, lack of control, zeal, and fanaticism. It is roughly equivalent to the German Schwärmerei, used by Luther* in opposing the Spiritual* party. It is also used by scholars to describe the intensely charismatic* group that Paul confronts in his letter to the Corinthians*.

Environment, all that surrounds and supports human life, including society and culture, but especially the natural* world. See also ECOLOGICAL AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Ephesians, Epistle to the, a general Pauline letter* probably composed by an associate after Paul’s martyrdom. Unlike Paul’s letters, Ephesians does not refer to particular situations. Its Gentile Christian audience is to celebrate the divine plan that has incorporated them into God’s holy people. It paints a heroic image of Paul’s suffering for the gospel.

Ephesians incorporates traditional material using an ornate Greek style, unlike Paul’s own: liturgical language of hymns and baptism; elements of Paul’s letters, especially Colossians; and an apocalyptic* emphasis on demonic* powers.

Paul’s descriptions of the local church as the body of Christ (4:1–16) have been combined with hymnic celebration of Christ exalted over all powers in the cosmos (Phil 2:6–11) to produce a vision of the church as a cosmic body with Christ as its head (unlike 1 Cor 11). In adapting the conventional household* code for dominant and subordinate members, Ephesians transforms marriage into a relationship between Christ (husband) and his body, the church (wife; Eph 5:22–33, cf. Col 3:18–19). Paul's argument that both Jewish and Gentile believers are righteous through faith has been reformulated as God's eternal plan or predestination* of the elect*.

Ephesians develops a theology that is both universalist and sectarian. Images of believers as "children of light" who must live in a world of constant combat with powers of darkness are sectarian. Images of the divine Christ as head of a cosmic body in which groups that had been hostile (Jew and Gentile) are united in a new humanity are universalist. Ethical values like the household code match those of the larger society.

Gnostics* in the 2nd c. saw Ephesians as evidence of the true God (light), as opposed to the demonic ruler of the material world. The images of a universal church, of marriage as a sacrament, and of believers as predestined for salvation were key to later Christianity.

PHEME PERKINS

Ephesus, First Council of (431). Summoned by Emperor Theodosius II to settle an emerging dispute between Alexandrine* and Antiochene* views on Christology*, two rival groups met in Ephesus (431). The larger group, under Cyril* of Alexandria and Memnon of Ephesus, affirmed Cyril's Christology, deposed and condemned Nestorius*, "the new Judas," linking him with Pelagius*, and, gathered in the Basilica of Mary, affirmed her as Theotokos (see Mary*, the Virgin, Theotokos); the influence of earlier devotion to Artemis on the cult of Mary has been disputed. The smaller group, under John of Antioch, criticized Cyril's views as Apollinarian* but refrained from passing judgment on Nestorius or the title Theotokos. Although present in the city, Nestorius attended neither gathering, refusing to appear before the first, but not invited to the second. Consistent with an earlier Roman decision against Nestorius and swayed by his purported association with Pelagius, Pope Celestine supported Cyril. The emperor, initially strongly critical of both sides, first ordered Cyril and Memnon as well as Nestorius to be deposed and imprisoned, but eventually endorsed Cyril's group and its decisions, thus giving them the status of ecumenical conciliar decrees. Nestorius's deposition and retirement to his former monastery in Antioch was followed by a compromise Formulary of Union in 433, but the disputes continued. Exiled in 436 to the Great Oasis in Upper Egypt, Nestorius continued to defend his position.

KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Ephesus, Second Council of (449). In the controversy between the Alexandrian and the Antiochene views of Christ (see Christologies Cluster: Introductory Entries; Ephesus, First Council of), an extreme Cyrillian position was voiced by the archimandrite Eutyches* in Constantinople. Eusebius* of Dorylaeum, who in 429 had raised the alarm over Nestorius*, now attacked Eutyches as heretical in the opposite direction. Eutyches acknowledged that Christ was "from two natures" but insisted on "in one nature after the union," seeming to deny the reality of Christ's humanity. But this allowed him to emphasize Christ's divinity as the power at work in transforming other human beings, overcoming the power of evil (rather than emphasizing that the cause of this transformation must be human as well as divine, as Antiochenes did). Flavian*, patriarch of Constantinople, brought Eutyches before a local synod (448), where he was condemned. Eutyches was championed, however, by the emperor Theodosius II and the eunuch Chrysaphius, who set aside the synod's judgment and called for a new council in Ephesus (449). Eutyches was exonerated; his bishop, Flavian, and his accuser, Eusebius of Dorylaeum, were deposed; and the doctrine of the Antiochene leaders, Ibas* of Edessa and Theodoret* of Cyrrhus, was condemned. Because of the manner in which the council was conducted and the extreme doctrine that it adopted, Pope Leo* called it a "robber synod." Its decisions were reversed by the Council of Chalcedon* (451). Yet this council remained significant for Miaphysites* and the Oriental Orthodox* Churches.

EUGENE TESELLE

Ephrata Cloister, founded near Lancaster, Pennsylvania, by a German Pietist, Conrad Beissel (1691–1768), in 1732. At its height, the cloister numbered some 80 members of a celibate sisterhood and brotherhood and, nearby, 200 or more married "householders." Emphasizing Saturday worship, celibacy, and a religious rhetoric strongly influenced by Jacob Boehme* (1575–1624), the monastic* community practiced a highly ritualized liturgical life (its distinctive a cappella music was memorialized in Thomas Mann's Doctor Faustus), composed numerous hymnals and theological treatises, and supported a thriving German-language press. With Beissel's death, the community declined rapidly, despite its energetic and scholarly leader, Peter Miller (1710–96). The last celibate died in 1813.

PETER C. ERB

Ephrem the Syrian (c306–73), theologian, poet, exegete, deacon, saint. Raised by Christian parents, Ephrem spent most of his life in Nisibis* on the Roman–Persian frontier. After the city's cession to Persia (363), he resettled in Edessa*, a city of great religious diversity. He lived the single, ascetic life of the Sons and Daughters of the Covenant, a proto-monastic movement, valued learning, and was a teacher. In Edessa, he organized famine relief.

Ephrem is best known for his numerous hymns (madrashe), sung by female choirs and focused on liturgical, biblical, and theological themes (e.g. the Nativity, Epiphany, the Crucifixion, the Resurrection, the Trinity, the Christian Church). He frequently employed symbols* and types*, parallels and paradoxes* to express theological insights. Drawing on symbols from Scripture and nature, he praised the mystery* of the Incarnation* and God's care for humankind. Other hymns address contemporary events, such as the Persian sieges of Nisibis, the Eastern campaign of Emperor Julian, and Nicomedia's destruction by earthquake (358).

Ephrem commented on many biblical books; extant are commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, and the Diatessaron*. His interpretation of Genesis shows affinities with Jewish exegesis, despite his anti-Jewish polemics in other contexts. Rejecting the diverse theological views flourishing in Northern Mesopotamia, Ephrem allied his community with the normative Christianity of the Roman Empire. In the controversy over Arianism*, he vigorously defended Nicene* theology against neo-Arian positions, especially in his Hymns on Faith and Sermons on Faith. In his Prose Refutations, Ephrem uses arguments from Greek philosophy to refute the followers of Marcion*, Bardaisan*, and Mani.

One of the most eloquent and influential of the Syriac church fathers, Ephrem with his symbolic theology shaped the later tradition. Pseudo-Ephremic treatises exist in many languages, most numerous in Greek. The modern revival of scholarship on Ephrem in the West was initiated by E. Beck's critical editions and studies.

UTE POSSEKEL

Epiclesis (Gk "invocation"), the petition in the eucharistic* prayer that the Holy* Spirit come upon the elements to make them the Body and Blood of Christ. The Eastern Church regards this as the moment of consecration; the Western Church, the words of institution*.

Epiphanius of Salamis (c315–403). Born in Palestine, he lived as a monk in Egypt, led a monastery in his hometown, and was known for his learning. He became bishop of Salamis, or Constantia, on the island of Cyprus (367) and devoted much energy to fighting heresies, especially Arianism*, Apollinarianism*, and Origenism*. His Ancoratus (374) and Panarion (374–77) are important sources of information on early creeds and doctrines.

Epiphany (Gk "manifestation," "showing"), the "shining forth" or revelation of God to humans. More specifically a feast day (January 6) celebrating the revelation of God in human form in the person of Jesus Christ. On this day, Western churches commemorate the visitation of the Magi* to the Baby Jesus and thus his manifestation to the Gentiles. Eastern churches also, and primarily, call this feast Theophany ("manifestation of God") – if they use the Julian calendar, January 6 is the equivalent of January 19 in the Gregorian calendar used in the West – commemorating the baptism of Jesus, his manifestation as the Son of God to the world. See also CALENDARS; LITURGICAL YEAR.

Episcopal Church. See ANGLICANISM CLUSTER,

Epistle Reading, the portion of the NT Epistles read during worship, as directed in the lectionary*.

Erasmus, Desiderius (c1466–1536), educator, scholar of the Christian tradition, theologian; mastered classical literature in both Greek and Latin. He was born in Holland and educated there by the Brethren* of the Common Life; he subsequently studied theology in Paris. His earliest prose works included a collection and commentary on adages from classical literature (1500) as aids to education (and in nine long essays added in the 1508 and 1515 editions, to advocate adherence to the "philosophy of Christ" in both church and state); an attack on the "barbarians" who despised letters and learning; and a treatise on his "philosophy of Christ" (Enchiridion, 1503). The caricatural repackaging of the Enchiridion in his Praise of Folly (1511, augmented 1514), his most brilliant and lasting work, is an ironical and satirical treatise that by its end identifies the fool in a paradoxical* way with the Christian believer as depicted in Paul's letter to the Romans.

By the time Luther* posted his theses in 1517, Erasmus was the most famous humanist in Europe. In 1516 he published the first edition of the Greek NT, together with his own Latin translation and annotations. Augmented editions appeared in 1519, 1522, 1527, and 1535. The publication of Erasmus' first edition gave great impetus to the translation of the NT into various vernaculars and to biblical exegesis*. Luther was lecturing on Romans when the edition appeared, and from Rom 9:16 forward, Luther used it in his teaching. When Luther was in trouble in 1519 and his ruler, Elector Frederick of Saxony, asked Erasmus his opinion of Luther, he replied that opposition to Luther came from the "barbarians." Erasmus's support at this time was important for Luther's survival. But in the 1520s, Erasmus entered into debate with Luther over the question of free will*, publishing a tract against Luther's notion of the bondage of the will (1524), which Luther answered (1525) with his Bondage of the Will. They were never reconciled.

Erasmus published editions of the church fathers, Jerome*, Cyprian*, Arnobius and Athanasius*, Hilary*, Irenaeus*, Ambrose*, Augustine*, John* Chrysostom, Basil*, and Origen*, between 1516 and 1536 – a period when he also wrote much on the sacraments*. With respect to marriage*, he suggested the possibility of granting divorce*, raising questions regarding whether marriage was a sacrament. He always sought reform from within the church and maintained his allegiance to the Roman Catholic Church.

Erasmus was not fully appreciated until the 20th c., when serious scholarship on him began; it continues into the 21st c. ALBERT RABIL, JR.

Erastianism, doctrine that the state should carry out the functions of Christian discipline*. Thomas Erastus (1524–83), a physician from Zurich, championed this approach to church* and state, so as to avoid giving too much power to the Reformed Church and the risk of a new Inquisition*. Erastianism, looking to Josiah* and Hezekiah, Constantine*, Theodosius*, and Justinian* as its models, assumed that government may not only reform the church but supervise its discipline. The exercise of discipline by bishops and elders for many centuries (in the NT as well as the early church) was explained as an "abnormal" situation, resulting from the lack of Christian magistrates. The pope* was called Antichrist* because he had usurped the role of the Christian emperors. The Church* of England has many of the features of an Erastian approach.

Eremitic Monasticism, a solitary form of monastic life, from the Greek eremos, "desert," the classic setting for it; also known as "anchoritic" monasticism (Gk anachoresis, "withdrawal"). Hermits have often lived in relation to a monastic community that provided material and spiritual support.

COLUMBA STEWART, OSB

Eritrea. The history of Eritrea is closely tied to that of Ethiopia*, which throughout history included large parts of what is now Eritrea. In recent times, Eritrea was a colony of Italy (1890–1941), then a British protectorate (1941–52) – although it was in federation with Ethiopia (1952–61) – and a northern province of Ethiopia (1961–93). The history of Christianity in Eritrea is therefore part of the history of Ethiopian Christianity. The Diocese of Eritrea (where, along the Red Sea, Christianity predated Frumentius's* arrival in Aksum) was a strong part of the Ethiopian* Orthodox Tewahedo Church. A vital part of the kingdom of Aksum (Christian from the 4th c.), it was the region in which Islam* encroached on the kingdom (from the 7th c.). While northern and western parts of Eritrea were largely under Muslim rule, efforts to conquer the southern part of Eritrea (10th–15th c.) were stopped by Ethiopian Christians. For instance, Emperor Zar'a Ya'eqob (reign, 1434–68) contributed to the spread of Christianity in Eritrea by granting land to the followers of Ewostatewos. These Ethiopian Christians strictly followed Jewish ritual life (dietary laws, Sabbath, circumcision) and established monasteries in present-day Eritrea.

The Eritrean Orthodox Tewahedo Church played a significant role in the struggle for independence, achieved in 1993 after a long and bloody war with Ethiopia. Now the country is almost equally divided between the Eritrean Orthodox Church, an autocephalous* Oriental Orthodox* Church since 1993 (an autocephaly recognized, though reluctantly, by the Ethiopian patriarch) and Sunni Muslims. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL CLUSTER: ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH

Statistics: Population (2000): 3.9 million (M). Christians, 1.9 M, 49% (Orthodox, 1.8 M; Roman Catholics, 0.1 M; Protestants, 0.02 M); Muslims, 1.9 M, 49%; nonreligious, 0.07 M,

2%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

Eriugena, John the Scot. See JOHN SCOTUS ERIUGENA.

Esau, son of Isaac* and Rebecca*, older twin brother of Jacob*. The two struggled with each other in the womb (Gen 25:22–23), foreshadowing the deception through which Jacob secured Esau’s birthright and incurred his anger. They are viewed as the ancestors of rival nations, Edom* and Israel*.

ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Eschatology

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in Africa

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in Eastern Orthodox Europe

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in Mexico

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in North America

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in North America: Feminist Perspectives

1) Introductory Entry

Eschatology (Gk eschaton, “the final reality”; eschata, “the last things”) typically includes such topics as death*, particular and universal judgment*, purgatory*, hell*, heaven*, the resurrection* of the body, the fulfillment of history, and the destiny of the universe itself. Eschatology offers no guided tour of the afterlife, but seeks to give a critical account of what is to come, in its individual and collective aspects, by extrapolating from what has already occurred in the incarnation*, death, and resurrection of Christ (Rahner*). Through the gift of the Holy* Spirit, the future of God is already present in its active and attractive power, drawing history to its completion (Pannenberg).

The expansive, indefinable reality of the eschaton occurs as a judgment on the present world; it summons to action even though the end is never fully possessed or realized in any age (Moltmann). Thus theology*, as “faith* seeking understanding,” finds a necessary complement in eschatology as “hope* seeking understanding.” There is an eschatological dimension present in every theological theme, even if eschatology is a particular branch of theology dealing with a range of special questions such as the destiny of the individual, history as a whole, and, indeed, the universe in its entirety.

Since medieval times, eschatological reflection has oscillated between a “warm,” often overheated style with dramatic declarations of the imminence of the end and the final age of the Holy Spirit (Abbot Joachim* of Fiore, the Spiritual Franciscans*) and a “cooler”, more objective systematic account of our “last end” (Aquinas*). In the contemporary context of interreligious dialogue*, such polarities continue in new forms. For example, the hopes of Abrahamic religions (Judaism*, Christianity, and Islam*) find God’s promise of fulfillment revealed in history, whereas many Eastern religions and spiritualities (e.g. Buddhism*, Hinduism*, Daoism*) are suprahistorical in their views of enlightenment or self-realization.

Contemporary forms of eschatology attempt to relate hope for the ultimate to practical responsibilities in the penultimate areas of political*, social*, and economic* structures of the present. A hope-filled vision of the end disturbs any acceptance of deficiencies, distortions, and sinfulness as “the way things are.” Insofar as eschatology recognizes that the crucified Jesus has been raised in his compassionate solidarity with the poor and the marginalized, it assumes a socially critical function (see Preferential Option for the Poor). With this “apocalyptic sting” (Metz), eschatology both inspires and learns from the praxis of liberation, which refuses to disconnect the “world to come” from the suffering peoples of the present. If the Eucharist* is the liturgical proclamation of “the Lord’s death until he comes” (1 Cor 11:26), it demands, even now, an energetic anticipation of what God is bringing about in communities based on the values of justice*, peace*, and human dignity (see Human Rights Cluster). Such “sacramental” conduct is both a sign and a present realization of what God has in store.

In dialogue with evolutionary*-oriented sciences*, new questions arise regarding eschatology. For example, how is the ultimate God-given future (“eternal life”) to be related to the genesis of the cosmos and the evolutionary dynamics of life on earth, with its unimaginable dimensions of space and time? How is the resurrection of the body, in Christ and eventually for all, related to the transformation of the material universe? How would the eventual ending of the solar system or the universe itself figure in a scientifically attuned eschatology?

However such questions are addressed, “what God has prepared for those who love him” (1 Cor 2:9) is not simply a homogeneous extension of the present. The form of the eschatological consummation of history lies hidden in the mystery* of God. But because of what is already revealed in Christ, the end is an object of hope and a longing for that fulfillment when God will be “all in all” (1 Cor 15:28). See also APOCALYPTICISM CLUSTER; HOPE. ANTHONY J. KELLY, CSSR

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in Africa. Diviners have been part of African religious traditions and have revealed past, present, and future events for either individuals or communities. In the face of formidable problems that tend to darken one’s future, people need hope*, and they turn to diviners at such critical times. It is not surprising that the Book of Revelation* is popular in many branches of the Charismatic* Movement because of the vision it paints about the end of human history, catastrophic world events, and anticipation of a new heaven and a new earth.

John Mbiti has sought to explain the African fascination with the future. He asserts that the African concept of time* has a long past, a short present, but no future dimension. He goes on to say that African time moves backward into the past and not into the future. Therefore, he suggested that it was Christianity that brought the future dimension to Africa, thus reversing the concept of time among African peoples. For Mbiti, this explains why the Christian faith in Africa is centered now on a future brought about by God and not made by human beings through material development. The eschatological future is the new element in Africans’ philosophy of time.

This theory has been greatly criticized, opposed, and modified by other African scholars. For Jesse Mugambi, the concept of time can be adequately discussed only by taking into account matter, duration, and space. Benjamin Ray and Kwesi Dickson are of the opinion that Mbiti did not take the idea of destiny into account, while Lugano Sankey thinks that to deny people a sense of future is to deny them hope. Others have seen the processes of initiations common in Africa as confirming a future dimension of time. Thus Mbiti did not fully analyze the concept of time.

Furthermore, one of the major reasons that many African Christians adhere to the Christian faith is their aspiration to go to heaven upon death or when Jesus returns. Therefore, one can wait for the end time, since historical time is like being on a watch tower (hence the Watch Tower Movement) or in a waiting room. However, the ideas of heaven*, hell*, and their attendant rewards are all new to the African worldview, which is, according to Mugambi, a monosectoral reality.

AUGUSTINE MUSOPOLE

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in Eastern Orthodox Europe. Although Chiliasm* (Millennialism*) has been repudiated by the Eastern Orthodox* Church Councils, eschatological sentiments were recurrent among mainstream Orthodox churches and dissident groups. Among the theological sources that informed their eschatological outlook were the Book of Revelation* (popular in Slavonic Orthodoxy in the 11th–13th c. despite its rejection by some church fathers) and numerous apocryphal* and pseud-epigraphal* apocalyptic books. Some of the early Christian eschatological texts survived only in Slavonic translation (e.g. 2 Enoch* and the earlier version of the Book of Daniel*). In Russia some of these texts were adopted by popular culture and influenced paraliturgical spiritual verses (dukhovnye stikhi).

In 11th- and 12th-c. Bulgaria*, probably because of the Bogomil* Movement, apocalyptic sentiment was expressed through apocryphal prophecies ascribed to the prophet Isaiah that gave a special place to Macedonia* in the topography of the “last things.” The Ottoman conquest of Bulgaria had also given rise to eschatological prophecies (14th–15th c.).

Eschatological motifs were present in the religiopolitical notion of Moscow as “the Third Rome” (14th c.) and in the symbolism of the reign of Ivan the Terrible.

The Brest*-Litovsk Union between the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches (1596) gave rise to a vigorous Orthodox polemic in Ukraine* in which eschatological prophecies were used to discredit the Union, as in the early-17th-c. anti-Union polemical writings of Zakhariia Kopystenskii, Stefan Zizaniia, and Ivan Vishenskii.

The religious schism in the Russian Orthodox Church (late 17th c.) developed in an atmosphere of intense Millennialist expectations and produced a prolific body of eschatological texts. Apocalyptic sentiments were widespread during the reign of Peter I (1682–1725) and his 18th-c. successors; popular rumor portrayed Peter I as the Antichrist*. Eschatological fears accompanied many state-sponsored campaigns in modern Russia, such as vaccination against smallpox and population censuses. Several religious sectarians practiced various forms of “escape” from the Antichrist: some refused to accept passports or money, some burned themselves alive, while others barricaded themselves in caves.

Millennialism nevertheless was also shared by elites: Alexander I (1801–25) presented himself as the leader of a new mystical union of Europe based on spirituality and devotion rather than on the ideas of the Enlightenment*. Dostoyevsky* (“The Legend of the Grand Inquisitor” in Brothers Karamazov) and Vladimir Soloviev* (Three Conversations, 1900) were inspired by the Book of Revelation. See also MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER. IRINA PAERT

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in Mexico.

The processes of conquest and evangelization had different impacts on the various native peoples of Mesoamerica. In some cases, the reality of a hostile presence was projected into a utopian future through further elaboration of native prophetic or apocalyptic myths. The opposition to the colonial* order was thus at first nourished by the people’s own history and myths. But owing to prolonged contact with the colonizers, these native myths ended up amalgamated with the Judeo-Christian messianism and apocalypticism in socioreligious movements that can be included in the history of resistance to colonialism. Yet in the 19th and 20th c., these movements confronted more directly the plunder and exploitation resulting from the insertion of the country into the modern capitalist system.

Contradicting the image of peace* erected around the colonial history of New Spain, some 30 messianic native movements (with several including blacks and mestizos*) struggled against the abuses of religious and/or political-administrative authorities. These were found primarily in the Mayan region, which includes the Yucatán Peninsula and the current states of Chiapas and Tabasco, as well as among the native people of the states of Guerrero and Oaxaca in the south, and the nomadic and semi-nomadic people who inhabited the area from Jalisco to New Mexico in the north. It is noteworthy that such movements are absent from the center of the country.

The best-known cases include the Mixtón rebellion (1541), those of Tepehuanes (1616), Tarahumaras (1646–1690), Tzeltales in Cancun (1712), and Tepic (1801), and the “caste war” (the revolt of the Maya people of Yucatán, 1847–1901). In each case, the prophetic dreams and apocalyptic hopes of liberation of an oppressed community led the community to seek to free itself from subjugation through anti-Spanish revolts or, as in the case of Cancún, through the creation of indigenous churches. The rise of such indigenous churches was ferociously repressed during the colonial period, but in the 19th c. the Cruzob (People of the Cross) Mayan Church was established (1850), as was the Tzotzil Mayan Church of Chamula (1868). The most recent, nonnative, Millennialist movement is the New Jerusalem colony, in Michoacán, founded in the wake of a series of apocalyptic Marian messages that announced the imminent destruction of the world because of the "Modernist corruption" that had pervaded the Catholic Church since Vatican* II.

JAVIER OTAOLA MONTAGNE

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in North America. The future has always been prominent in North American life. From the outset, this so-called New World has seen itself as the cutting edge of civilization, humankind's "last, best hope." Its true (if unacknowledged) religion has been "the religion of Progress" (George P. Grant). Christianity, North America's culturally established religion, has on the whole accommodated itself to this optimistic predisposition, providing the rhetoric and symbolism requisite to its articulation and celebration.

While such a predisposition in fact constitutes a decisive eschatology, no theological term or emphasis has been less familiar to Christians in North America than has "eschatology." Conventional introductions cryptically labeled it "the doctrine of last things." But the "last things" have not been an existential concern for the North American general public and church, since "the end" (in both its teleological and chronological senses) could appear to be positive and reassuring.

With the breakdown of the modern vision, however, and the impact of globally ubiquitous threats and instabilities on public consciousness, a new and vital interest in this neglected dimension of Christian tradition has emerged in North American Christian circles. Perhaps this interest could be dated from the 1954

General Assembly of the World* Council of Churches in Evanston, Illinois, with its theme, "Jesus Christ – the Hope* of the World." With the postmodern assault on all one-sidedly optimistic assumptions about the future of civilization (especially Western civilization), theologians began to reflect more earnestly on the explicitly Christian sources of hope – a hope that did not require the repression of the data of despair, but could be more realistic about the negations that were appearing on the horizon and more capable of the moral and practical courage required to counter them. It would be hard to underestimate, e.g., the impact of Juergen Moltmann's Theology of Hope on theological dialogue in this context.

At the same time, the "future shock" felt by North Americans since 1960 evoked in much popular Christianity a resurgence of the apocalypticism that had perhaps always been an undercurrent in North America's officially optimistic society, for an exaggerated utopianism easily and regularly begets in some the suspicion that it cloaks devastating possibilities. Moreover, the "otherworldliness" and antiworldliness of much Christian Pietism* in North America naturally favors end views in which salvation* entails the destruction of the fallen creation (see Hal Lindsey's Popular The Late Great Planet Earth).

Clearly, a biblically based faith that affirms the "goodness" of God's creation* cannot endorse such an apocalyptic scenario. It is a questionable redemption* theology that requires the damnation of creation! At the same time, the Christian "liberalism" that locates redemption in historical evolution has difficulty today taking seriously the real threats to planetary existence that are the subject of every honest news broadcast. Eschatology is no longer an addendum to Christian theology, but a necessary ingredient of all serious Christian reflection.

DOUGLAS JOHN HALL

Eschatology and Apocalypticism in North America: Feminist Perspectives.

There is no more potent source of judgment* of the status quo, encouragement of the high-risk prophetic* witness, and hope* for an ultimate vindication and new* creation than the biblical tradition of eschatology – especially when apocalyptically* intensified. Bitter or promising, violent or peaceable, patriarchal* or egalitarian, religious* or secular*, revolutionary or reactionary – every radical movement in the West betrays the traces of the Apocalypse. The Women's Movement comes spiked with images of a positive Millennialism*.

The Shakers* (18th c.) declared that “Woman's Rights are fully recognized, by first giving her a Mother in Deity, to explain and protect them” (DeBerg). Claire Demar (early 19th c.) wrote, “The word of the WOMAN REDEEMER WILL BE A SUPREMELY REVOLTING WORD” (capitals in the original). Increasingly secular, the eschatology of feminism* only mounted: “Peeling! The clock of Time has struck the woman's hour” (a toast at an 1891 Women's Press Club). Yet Feminist theology – as in Rosemary Ruether's New Woman, New Earth – reconnects gender justice* to eschatology.

Still, the deployment of apocalyptic binaries of messianic* vs. demonic* forces requires complex symbolic* maneuvers. A symbolic figure of feminine sexuality* embodies historical evil: the Great Whore, all-consuming and finally consumed, “for all the nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication” (Rev 18:2). John of Patmos's fury against a female competitor as “Jezebel” (Rev 2:20–23) provided a template for fans such as Bockelson, who practiced polygamous and gynocidal terror in his 16th-c. “New Jerusalem,” or for fundamentalism's* inscription of the 19th-c. New Woman as “silly women of the last days.” Apocalypse has promoted an ascetic*, heroic, and dominative masculinity, suffering a perceived (and often real) oppression. Its adherents declared the pope or the Ottoman Turk, suffragists or feminists, the Whore of Babylon, with an absolutism unavailable to “lukewarm” mainstream Christians. Mary Daly answered with a “Holy War waged by Wholly Haggard Whores casting off the bonds of whoredom” – an apocalyptic denunciation of the Apocalypse.

Feminist readings of Christian eschatology may pursue a radical cultural “anti-apocalypse” (Lee Quinby); a theological neo-apocalypse, as in Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza's retrieval of John of Patmos as a hero of social justice; or a “counter-apocalypse,” which proposes to detoxify and recycle eschatological radicalism for a just and sustainable “new heaven and earth.”

A hallucinatory proliferation of gender-charged imagery has always inflected the great drama of good and evil, denunciation and promise, now and then. How would we cease negotiating with its strange angels, messianic warriors, and virgin brides?

CATHERINE KELLER

Escrivá de Balaguer, Josemaría. See OPUS DEI.

Esdras, First Book of (sometimes designated 3 Esdras; See Bible, Canon of the), one of the Apocrypha*. It is a free Greek version of biblical history from the time of Josiah's reform (621 BCE) to that of Ezra's reform (444 BCE) as found in 2 Chr 35:1–36:21 (1 Esd 1:1–55) and Ezra and Nehemiah (1 Esd 2:1–30, 5:7–9:55). The independent text, 1 Esd 3:1–5:3, presents the story of three youths in a riddle contest at the Persian king Darius's court. What is strongest in the world? Zerubbabel won by claiming it was women and truth. As a reward, he obtained permission for the exiled Jews to go home. Josephus* used 1 Esdras as the basis for the post-exilic history of the Jews. It was possibly written shortly after 165 BCE.

DANIEL PATTE

Esdras, Second Book of (also designated 4 Esdras), is better known as Fourth* Ezra.

Esoteric Theology (from Gk “hidden within”), theology communicated to an inner group of disciples and understood only by the initiated. The Greek mystery* religions and Plato's Academy differentiated between esoteric and exoteric teachings; the distinction entered Christianity with the Gnostics*. In mainstream Christianity, there is an analogous principle that faith* is the only path to true understanding*. Since the Renaissance*, esoteric theology has been linked with the recovery of the Hermetic* corpus and the thesis that a “perennial philosophy,” reconciling many different religious traditions, has been available to those who seek it.

See also THEOSOPHY.

Esquivel, Adolfo Pérez. See ARGENTINA.

Essenes, a group of Palestinian Jews (2nd c. BCE to 1st c. CE) devoted to a life governed by a strict interpretation of Torah. Descriptions of the organization, practices, and discipline of the group in Philo*, and especially Josephus* and Hippolytus*, concur sufficiently with some of the Dead Sea Scrolls to indicate that the Qumran* community was an Essene group. Taken together, these texts depict a group that claimed to have a revealed interpretation of Torah* constituting them as exclusively the chosen people of God, and a revealed interpretation of the Prophets (see Peshet) that assured them that they were living in the end-time, when God would vindicate their righteousness. At Qumran, the leaders of the group were Zadokite priests, and strict ritual purity was enforced by stringent sanctions. Celibacy* seems to have been the rule at the male community in Qumran, but not in other Essene settlements in the land. Although the Essenes are not mentioned by name in the NT, aspects of their organization, practice, and eschatological* expectations suggest that some members of some early Christian communities may have come from communities of Essenes or like-minded Jews. See also DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

GEORGE W. E. NICKELSBURG

Essentialism, the assumption that all the members of every species or "kind" of thing have the same characteristics, because these are "essential" to all members of the species. Today Feminist* and Liberation* theologians attack the assumption that all women or all cultures have the same inclinations and needs, regardless of social and cultural factors. See also NOMINALISM; REALISM; UNIVERSALS.

Establishment, in ecclesiastical usage, a relation between church and state established by law, usually favoring one church over others.

Esther, Book of, a 2nd-c. BCE biblical book, recounts how, at the court of the king of Persia, Ahasuerus (Xerxes I?), Esther became the royal consort and with her kinsman, Mordecai, saved the Jews from extermination by the grand-vizier, Haman. It also tells of how the festival of Purim was established to celebrate the destruction of the enemies of the Jews. In the Hebrew Masoretic* text, this story is strikingly devoid of any allusion to God; two Greek versions (the Septuagint* and the "Alpha Text") give Esther a religious dimension by repeatedly mentioning God and by adding chapters (parts of the Apocrypha*).

Because of its secular character, the Hebrew Book of Esther has been historically received with much reluctance in Christian churches (especially in Eastern Christianity). Martin Luther believed that Esther should not figure in the Bible. But rabbinic Judaism, despite dissenting voices, considered Esther to be divinely inspired; Maimonides* ranked it right after the Torah. Such discrepancy is the result mainly of diverging perceptions of the literary genre of the book. To see Esther as a historical report (slanted or not) leads to a legitimate dis-ease with its secularism and its violence. But when it is read as a "carnavalesque" novella in the image of the festival it establishes, Purim, one can appreciate it as the only biblical book that is Diaspora*-oriented with an observance that is not rooted in the land of Israel and is not pentateuchal. In that case, this "ethnocentric" Esther belongs to the Bible as an affirmation of the people of God in the secular world of the Diaspora*.

ANDRÉ LACOCQUE

Estonia had contacts with Christianity from the 11th c. on. With the conquest of Estonia in the 1220s by the troops of the Order of the Brethren of the Sword (see Military Orders; Teutonic Knights), the Christianization of the population took place. Many impressive church buildings and monasteries were built.

The Reformation reached Estonia early, in the 1520s. Swedish rule in Estonia in the 17th c. led to the publication of religious literature in the Estonian language (NT, 1686; complete Bible, 1739) and to theological education (Tartu University, founded 1632). After the annexing of Estonia by Russia (1721), the Russian Orthodox* Church developed. Since the second half of the 19th c., other Christian movements have gained some following in Estonia.

After Estonia became independent in 1918, the Evangelical Lutheran Church was recognized as the main church in Estonia. Under the Soviet occupation, Christians suffered from repressive measures: the property of the churches was confiscated and some denominations were pronounced illegal. However, the majority of the churches were allowed to use the state-owned church buildings.

When Estonia regained its independence (1991), churches had an unprecedented revival. Publishing of religious literature was resumed, and theological education is offered now in at least five institutions, among them Tartu University. Most high school programs include religion. Recently, however, because of secularization*, a decline in membership has been observed in many churches. Many people attend only special services, such as annual festivals, weddings, and confirmations.

Statistics: Population (2000): 1.4 million (M). Christians, 0.89 M; 63.5% (unaffiliated Christians, 0.36 M; Protestants, 0.24 M; Orthodox, 0.23 M; independents, 0.05 M); atheists and nonreligious, 0.50 M, 36%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

HEIKKI SILVET

Eternity, the temporal dimension of infinity. Holding God* to be eternal, Christians consider “eternity” a synonym for salvation* or the Kingdom* of God. Unlike eternity, time* has a beginning and an end, and a course or path, called history*. Like the other monotheistic religions, Christianity gives the “Eternal One” a power and a love that is paternal and royal or – more neutrally – supervisory and loving – through providence*, grace, sacraments, and miracles. Unique to Christianity is the interaction between time and eternity implicit in the doctrines of the Incarnation* and salvation* through the efficacy of divine sacrifice*. From a “pneumatic” perspective, the Holy* Spirit removes “the sacrifice on the Cross from its historical coordinates and propels the redemptive act throughout time” (Vondey). The potential of eternity and infinity to articulate Christian ideas was clear as early as Paul, who expressed fundamental unities by speaking of how “all” may be present “in all” (1 Cor 12:6, 15:28; see also Eph 4:6; Col 3:11) when the world comes to union with its Creator and vice versa.

Especially in the Western* churches, Christian thought orders time by defining the key points as if on a line: creation*, the Fall*, the Nativity*, the Crucifixion*, the Resurrection*, Pentecost*, and the expected Parousia* (the Second* Coming), resurrection*, and the Last Judgment*. Consequent to that reckoning, Christ sentences persons (souls* and their bodies, now reunited) to an eternity in either heaven* or hell*. From these premises, the question arises: Does divine foreknowledge, being eternal, determine human choice? The solution Boethius* proposed radically divides eternity from time (and therefore divine knowledge from sequence). There can be no foreknowledge, because there is no “before” in the Divine Mind.

The Greek terms that imply “eternity” have provoked debate over the duration of hell. Aidion (Rom 1:20, referring to God’s eternity) combines the Greek root aei, meaning “always,” with the adjectival suffix -dion to become an adjective meaning “always-like.” Aionion (Matt 25: 41, 46, balancing eternal life and punishment) derives from aion, for “eon” or “an age,” and could mean “merely” extensive duration. Augustine* defended the eternity of hell (opposing Origen*), arguing that the same eternity applied to hell as to heaven; otherwise the saints would be cheated of unending bliss.

Nicholas* of Cusa (1401–64) and Georg Cantor (1845–1918) have enriched the concept of eternity through their mathematical explorations. See also DAMNATION; JUDGMENT.

ALAN E. BERNSTEIN

ETHICS AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Ethics

2) A Sampling of Other Views and Practices

Ethics and Christianity in Africa

Ethics and Christianity in Eastern
Orthodoxy

Ethics and Christianity as Ethic of Risk and Womanist Ethics

1) Introductory Entry

Ethics. “Christian ethics” refers to the theological or theoretical study of morality (which takes several forms) and often to the subject matter of this study, “morality” (or one of its specific implementations, e.g. business ethics).

Morality is a matter of relationships: right and wrong, good and bad, virtuous and vicious, just and unjust interactions with others. While Christianity is a religion of salvation* and redemption*, it is also a religion of morality, since it is rooted in relationships: with God; with other Christians (in communities of various kinds; see Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: Doctrines of the Church; Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: Types of Ecclesiastical Structures); with other people, including followers of other religions (see Religions and Christianity); and with the world, God’s creation (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster). The foundation of Christian morality is therefore often summarized in the twofold commandment to love God and to love one's neighbor" (Mark 12:30–31, par.; see Love). Christians are called to assume responsibility for their behavior, their acts and their failure to act, in all dimensions of their lives.

Consequently, churches and their theologians have developed social* ethics, economic* ethics, business* ethics, global* ethics, and medical* and biomedical* ethics. They have formulated ethical stances concerning the place in society and the church of women (see Feminist Theology Cluster; Women's Christian Practices and Theologies Cluster; Women's Ordination Cluster) and of other marginalized groups (see African American Cluster; Australian Aboriginal Traditions and Christianity; Black Theology; Dalit Theology; Native American Traditions and Christianity; Palestinian Liberation Theology; Womanist and African American Theologies) and concerning family*, sexuality*, abortion*, ecology*, politics*, refugees*, war*, and justice*, as well as behavior within the church (see Canon Law; Church Discipline; Discipline; Polity).

This concern for ethics and morality does not mean that Christians have not been responsible for much evil throughout church history, be it through sins* of commission or omission (see Colonialism and Imperialism and Christian Theology, as well as entries on countries colonized by Christian nations, i.e. most of the countries in Africa, Asia, Australasia, and Latin America; Crusades; Heresy; Holocaust, Jewish [or Shoah]; Inquisition; Poverty Cluster; Racism and Christianity Cluster). Christians strive to alleviate these evils, even as they unwillingly condone them by participating in societies or cultures that contribute to them.

Many Christians aspire to, or claim to have, an objective and absolutist ethics, such as the "divine* command ethics" that grounds judgments of good and evil in God's commands in natural law and/or Scripture, in contrast to "subjectivist" or "situationist" ethics, viewed as relativist. Yet from an ethical perspective, one cannot ignore the fact that throughout history much evil has been committed by Christians with an objective and absolutist ethics (see Postmodernism and Liberation Theologies; Postmodernism and Theology). Furthermore, history shows that the formulations of "natural* law" – the moral norms shared by Christians and others – vary with cultural and social contexts, as do the formulations of ethical teachings resulting from reading of the Bible as Scripture* (a "Word-to-live-by" that Christians relate to their changing life contexts). The fact remains that Christians envision themselves as moral agents and act on the basis of what they perceive to be self-evidently (and thus objectively and absolutely) good or wrong (see Conviction). They act on the basis of pre-understandings about the moral life. Following philosophers, Christian theologians view these preunderstandings as falling into three broad types, named here following Ogletree.

Perfectionist Ethics emphasizes the formation of the self as moral agent, through the use of moral discernment or "practical wisdom" to reach human happiness (Aristotle*) or everlasting life with God (Augustine*, Aquinas*). When applying moral principles, a moral agent needs "virtues*": a "know-how" to address moral issues in concrete situations, the cardinal virtues of self-control, endurance, wisdom, and justice (Plato and Aristotle), and the theological virtues of faith*, hope*, and charity* (Augustine, Aquinas), which one acquires as "practical wisdom" through imitation of a teacher. In this view (of much traditional moral Roman Catholic teaching), a disciple* is formed through imitation of God and Christ (imitatio Christi*) as well as of dedicated, saintly persons, who might or might not be church leaders. Loving God leads to loving neighbors.

Deontological Ethics emphasizes obligation and duty; a choice is right when it conforms to moral norms, basic moral principles that derive from the intersubjective character of action. For Christians, these basic moral principles, often envisioned as a law*, are God's will as revealed in Scripture*, both in the OT and in its reinterpretations by Christ (e.g. the Sermon* on the Mount) and in church tradition*. Deontological* ethics easily becomes legalistic. Yet for Kant* and, following him, many (Protestant) theologians, conformity to moral norms should not be confused with legalism. Through regard for others, pure practical reason both establishes what morality unconditionally demands ("harm not"; "respect other persons' dignity") and determines the will to do it.

Consequentialist Ethics emphasizes the effects (consequences) of choices and actions, especially their effects on others; it examines the intentionality of actions, since it is goal oriented (as John Stuart Mill's utilitarianism is, e.g., in business). Theological consequentialist ethics is most directly concerned with the for-the-sake-of-whom (unconditional responsibility to and for the other) and therefore with what is desirable for others (rather than the negative "harm not" of deontological ethics). The neighbor is always the middle term between God and me; it is through the face and voice of the neighbor that I am in relation to God (see Levinas, Emmanuel), as Liberation and contextual theologies (preferential* option for the poor) also emphasize.

These classical views of ethics are constantly challenged by situations that call for other types of practices. See also SERMON ON THE MOUNT. DANIEL PATTE

2) A Sampling of Other Views and Practices

Ethics and Christianity in Africa. Classical philosopher-theologian Thomas Aquinas* described ethics in terms of the good* to be done and the evil* to be avoided. But good and evil can be understood only within a certain context. African theologians (e.g. Bujo) and ethicists (e.g. Nyerere) situate ethics in Africa by making community its defining principle.

Approaches to ethics depend on perceptions of sources of ethical criteria: God, individual person, "natural law," state, or community. These lead to distinctive ethical systems or schools: "natural law" ethics, idealism, individualism, situation ethics, rationalism, and communitarian ethics, among others. How do some of these relate to Africa?

Divine will as source of ethics, the common view in mainline African Christianity, bases itself on "revealed" sources, the Bible in particular. Deductive in approach, it preserves the uniqueness of God but often clashes with Africa's aspirations for human freedom. It fails to address Africa's questions about the slave* trade, colonialism*, effects of globalization*, poverty*, or underdevelopment*.

Individual as source of ethics preserves the Christian perception of the person's integrity, yet leads to an un-African overemphasis on the individual at the expense of community. Buttressed by and buttressing laissez-faire capitalism, it promotes competition, contradicting Africa's ethic of sharing and cooperation.

"Natural law" as source of ethics claims that every person has the ability through reason* to know good and bad; the choice for either is open to human freedom*. Preserving the idea of God's image* in every person, this theory is blind to human perversity, exemplified in Africa by tyrants such as Idi Amin Dada (Uganda*) and Mobutu Sese Soko (Democratic Republic of Congo*).

State as source of ethics is expressed radically in communism* and mildly in forms of (African) socialism*. The state is invested with absolute power, much as God is in the divine will approach. This clashes with the African ideal of the individual's rights in community.

Community as source of ethics is the African approach in which moral traditions, found in customs and taboos, safeguard and enhance the life of the community and the individuals within it. God, the foundation of moral order, channels power for ethical conduct through the community in its fourfold dimensions: the ancestors*, the living, the yet-to-be-born, and the community of goods*.

The human potential to choose right or wrong conduct regarding oneself and others is recognized by African moral traditions. Thus theories that deny human beings the capacity for moral freedom, leading to ethics of determinism (in philosophy) or predestination (in theology) are largely foreign to Africa.

LAURENTI MAGESA

Ethics and Christianity in Eastern Orthodoxy. Ethics is the normative aspect of theology, focusing on the “ought” aspect of living the Christian life. The ultimate source of ethics is the “Good,” understood to be the one God in the triune divine reality of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (see Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy).

Humanity as a whole and human beings as persons in community find in God the norm of their personal and corporate human existence as created beings in the “image and likeness of God” (Gen 1:6). In this they follow the injunction of Jesus Christ, “Be perfect as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Matt 5:48), Jesus Christ being the model for this perfection through his incarnation*, example, and character.

For Eastern Orthodox Christianity, there are several sources for implementing this ethic. The “natural moral law” (physikos ethikos nomos) is an elemental ethical guideline allowing for ordered social and personal life, as embodied in codes such as the Decalogue* in the Judeo-Christian tradition, but also expressed by the authorities of other world religions (see Culture Cluster: And Christianity in Eastern Orthodoxy). Yet the corpus for ethical reflection on both theoretical and practical ethical guidelines for living the Christian faith includes the NT, the writings of the recognized church fathers of the first millennium, conciliar canon law, ascetical writings, as well as liturgical texts and, to a lesser extent, the writings of contemporary Orthodox Christian ethicists.

In many practical applications, the Orthodox Church is socially conservative, but the evangelical supreme value of love* (Christian agape) can turn any given situation into an opportunity for radical moral action. In every moral situation, two dynamics are at work: (1) the struggle (agon) against evil and sin*, sin being the absence or denial of the God-like life (*theosis), and (2) the struggle to realize (ascesis, “exercise”) in practice and in each situation God-like behavior and values.

STANLEY S. HARAKAS

Ethics and Christianity as Ethic of Risk and Womanist Ethics.

Katie Cannon’s groundbreaking exploration of “the moral wisdom found in the black women’s literary tradition” (1988) challenged ethicists to rethink our understanding of the nature and sources of ethical action. She found in the work of African* American women a tradition of strength and persistence, which is one of the richest heritages facing humankind. Cannon analyzed the ethical impact of “unshouted courage, . . . the incentive to facilitate change, to chip away the oppressive structures bit by bit, to celebrate and rename their experiences in empowering ways. . . . ‘Unshouted courage’ is the quality of steadfastness, akin to fortitude, in the face of formidable oppression” (Cannon, Black Womanist Ethics).

In the writing of many African American women, we find an ethic of risk, a definition of responsible action within the limits of bounded power. These writers describe the nature of responsible action when control is impossible and name the resources that evoke persistent defiance and resistance in the face of repeated defeats. Within an ethic of risk, actions begin with the recognition that far too much has been lost and there are no clear means of restitution. The fundamental risk constitutive of this ethic is the decision to care and to act even though there are no guarantees of success. Such action requires immense daring and enables deep joy.

The ethic of risk, as expressed in the lives and writings of African American women and men, poses a foundational challenge to Euro-American ethics. Our moral and political imagination is often shaped by an ethic of control, a construction of agency, responsibility, and goodness which assumes that it is possible to guarantee the efficacy of one’s action. We often assume that being responsible means ensuring that the aim of one’s action will be carried out. This understanding of responsible action leads to a striking paralysis of will* when one is faced with complex problems. Euro-Americans are challenged by African American women and men to criticize such understanding of responsible action insofar as it distorts the implementation of communally accepted norms.

The ethic of risk is characterized by three elements, each essential in maintaining resistance in the face of overwhelming odds: a redefinition of responsible action, grounding in community, and strategic risk taking. Responsible action does not mean the certain achievement of desired ends, but the creation of the conditions of possibility for desired social ends, the creation of a matrix in which further actions, further resistance, are possible, sustained, and enabled by participation in an extensive community, a community that offers support in struggle and constitutes the context for work that spans generations.

See also LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER: IN NORTH AMERICA: WOMANIST; WOMANIST AND AFRICAN AMERICAN THEOLOGIES. SHARON D. WELCH

Ethiopia. The history of Ethiopia since the 4th c. is also the history of Christianity in Ethiopia, specifically the history of the Ethiopian* Orthodox Tewahedo Church. Until 1974 Ethiopia was a kingdom or empire of variable size, including for a long time large parts of what is now Eritrea*. Ethiopia claims to have been the second Christian state (after Armenia*).

Early Period. The earliest plausible account of the origins of Christianity in the Aksumite/ Ethiopian kingdom comes from Rufinus* Tyran-nius (4th c.), according to whom Frumentius* was brought to the royal palace (c340) as a servant of the king of Aksum (or Axum). Freed upon the king's death, at the queen's request he stayed to function as regent. Frumentius founded a Christian church in Aksum; he also gathered together Christians already in the kingdom, most of them merchants from the Roman Empire, primarily from Syria and the Byzantine world, along the Red Sea coast, including Adulis. After his regency, Frumentius went to Alexandria (c347) to plead with Patriarch Athanasius* to send a bishop to the new Christian community in Ethiopia. Instead, Athanasius ordained Frumentius himself as the "first" bishop and apostle of Ethiopia (although there might already have been a bishop in Adulis).

Rufinus's account is corroborated by other evidence regarding this period in Ethiopia, including a letter of the Byzantine Arian Roman emperor Constantius (preserved in Athanasius's Apologia ad Constantium) demanding that the Aksumite princes send Frumentius back to Alexandria to be instructed in Arianism*, although this never took place.

There are no reliable sources from which to draw a complete picture of subsequent developments in the Ethiopian Church in Aksum. However, we can assume that, for the next two centuries, basic liturgical books, including the Psalter, and then the entire Bible were translated into Ge'ez, the local language. Yet 6th-c. accounts testify to the strength of the Ethiopian Church and its contact with the Byzantine Christian world. For instance, the monk Abba Matta, who came to Ethiopia and established a monastery, was said to have been supported by the bishop of Aksum and to have collaborated with another monk. Similarly the Egyptian monk Cosmas Indicopleustes's travelogue enthusiastically records his visit to Ethiopia (c525) and its many churches and their bishops.

The arrival (6th c.) from the Byzantine Empire of the "Nine Saints," the fathers of Ethiopian monasticism*, could also have energized the Ethiopian Church. Each of them founded a monastery around Aksum. Dabra Damo, the monastery of their leader, Abuna Aregawi (Ze-Mikael), is still an important religious center. The translation of the Rule of Pachomius* during the same period is probably not coincidental.

Aksum's significant role as an administrative center of the kingdom ended around the 10th c. or earlier. The cause of its fall was probably the revolt of a non-Christian ethnic group against the Ethiopian Church. The uprising put members of the ruling house to flight and inflicted incalculable damage on church property, including the destruction of the church in Aksum. The rebel group did not, however, hold power for long.

The Zagwe Era (1137–1270). Another Christian dynasty, known as Zagwe, took power in c1137, establishing its capital at Adafa (or Roha) in Lasta, the Zagwe's home province (south of Aksum). This new Christian dynasty was more concerned with spiritual matters than with state affairs. Its kings constructed the several rock-hewn churches in Lasta, their lasting monumental legacy. Some of these kings were also priests (now honored as saints by the Ethiopian Church). Still, the dynasty did not seem to have enriched the Church educationally; no literary work of any significance, original or in translation, remains from this time. Actually, some manuscripts copied during the Aksumite era disappeared.

The Solomonic Dynasty (from 1270). The Zagwe were overthrown in 1270 by Yekuno Amlak, an energetic young man who claimed to be a descendant of the Aksumite royal family. Tradition maintains that the Ethiopian Church played a significant role in putting Yekuno Amlak on the throne. In subsequent years both the dynasty founded by Yekuno Amlak and the Church denounced the Zagwe reign as illegitimate.

Yekuno Amlak was a good friend of Abuna Iyyasus Mo'a, the abbot of the Dabra Hayq Estifanos monastery (from the 9th c.) – a monastery that Yekuno Amlak helped strengthen – and apparently a close relative of the abbot of another monastery, Abuna Takla Haymanot. In subsequent years, the Dabra Hayq Estifanos monastery used its political power to contribute to the literary life of the Church. Similarly, according to tradition, Yekuno Amlak rewarded Abuna Takla Haymanot by granting a third of the state's revenue to the Church (actually the Church collected only a tithe [10%] on certain lands – a revenue that ended in the 20th c.).

The Golden Age of the Church. For better or worse, the period during which Yekuno Amlak's dynasty controlled the throne is the most memorable in the Ethiopian Church's history. The king's heirs managed to propagate the idea that Ethiopian Christians replaced the Israelites as God's chosen people, because Ethiopians had accepted Christ as the expected Messiah whereas the Jews rejected him (see Election; Supersessionism). What set Ethiopians apart from other nations that had accepted Christ was reflected in two foundational stories recorded in the Kebra Nagast (the Glory of kings), a book about the origins of the Solomonic line of emperors. The first story claimed that the royal family descended from Menelik, son of King Solomon and Queen Makeda of Ethiopia (or the Queen of Sheba, of the South). The second claimed that the Christian faithful were the descendants of firstborn Israelites who accompanied Menelik from Jerusalem, stealthily taking the Ark (tabot) with them, and settled in Ethiopia. Empowered by this legend, the Solomonic dynasty ruled without challenge, except from several Muslim communities that felt excluded from the national government.

The installation ("restoration" says the tradition) of the Solomonic dynasty coincided with the development of Arabic Coptic literature in Egypt*. The Coptic* metropolitans and their entourages brought to Ethiopia Arabic religious books hitherto not known in the local Church, and so did Ethiopians who visited monasteries in Egypt and the Holy Land. The Dabra Hayq Estifanos monastery and the clergy at the royal palace translated such works into Ge'ez. They also produced important theological works, including the 14th- to 15th-c. works by Metropolitan Salama, Emperor Zar'a Ya'eqob, and Giyorgis of Gasecca as well as the anonymous homilies Retu'a Haimanot (True Orthodoxy). These works were in part prompted by the late-13th-c. controversies regarding the place of icons* (especially of the Virgin Mary*) in worship; should one bow (a form of worship) before an icon? Monks rekindled these controversies (15th c.); they viewed bowing before the emperor and icons as incompatible with their monastic rules, views that were suppressed by the emperor.

Another controversy arose when a group of theologians (Zamika'el and his followers) disapproved of the king's "obsession" with Mary and the king's teaching that observing holy days in honor of Mary exonerates sinners from their sins.

The question of how to reconcile God's unity and God's trinity* also created division. Some of the anaphoras* seem to have been composed to emphasize the Miaphysite* Church's position: "three with one nature" (Anaphora of Mary). Consequently, manuscripts and murals often have three identical pictures, each representing one of the three persons in the Trinity, or have three suns with one light coming from them. Similarly, how does one reconcile the fact that God often has an anthropomorphic image in the Bible and that he is unlimited and invisible? Other sources of controversy were the nature of Christ's second* coming (alone or, according to the Ethiopian Church, with the Father and the Holy Spirit?) and the observance of Saturday as the Lord's Sabbath.

As always, the emperor's words became the position of the Church, including that regarding the scope of Scripture*; Jubilees*, Enoch*, and the Maccabees* provided a basis for the angelology and Millennialism* of Emperor Zar'a Ya'eqob, who also waged a fierce campaign against witchcraft*, magical practices, and fortune-telling, though with little success.

Although his legacy is debated, Emperor Zar'a Ya'eqob voluntarily and involuntarily contributed to the further spread of Christianity. He granted land to the followers of Ewostatewos, Christians who strictly followed Jewish ritual life (dietary laws, Sabbath, circumcision) and systematically destroyed pagan shrines as they established monasteries in present-day Eritrea. Yet he also involuntarily spread Christianity by banishing to non-Christian regions the Estifanosites (monks rejecting much of the emperor's teaching by commitment to their monastic rules), who successfully preached Christianity and built churches in these regions.

The Civil Wars and Their Consequences.

Ethiopia's monarchs have always been Christian, whereas the country's peoples were always diverse in language and religion. Every revolt against the government – by non-Christians, leading to the fall of Aksum (c10th c.), by the Jewish Falasha (or Felasha; 14th c.), and by Muslims (15th c.) – inevitably affected the Ethiopian Church. The most devastating revolt (1527–43) was that against Christian dominance when Imam Ahmad ibn Ibrahim al-Ghazi took control of the autonomous Muslim principality of Adal with help from the Ottoman Turks. The Ethiopian peasant army was no match for the trained Arab mercenaries with guns and cannons. The Imam's army overran the entire country, putting to death Christians who refused to embrace Islam. Monasteries and church buildings were looted. The monks of Dabra Hayq Estifanos were among the fortunate few to save their manuscripts and church building. The rebellion was finally put down in 1543 with military help from Portugal.

The Catholic Challenge. As Emperor Galawdewos (1540–59) was again taking control of his kingdom and the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, the Portuguese claimed that they had provided assistance on the condition that the Church submit to the pope of Rome. The Portuguese claimed that the Ethiopian Church harbored Eutyches' heresy* and taught Judaic practices rejected by the Roman Catholic Church. The Ethiopian Church had to defend its teachings in a written statement of faith by Emperor Galawdewos.

Although the emperor might have been sympathetic to the Roman Catholic demands, local opposition forced him merely to settle the Catholics in some regions where they could practice and teach their faith. In time most Portuguese settlers left Ethiopia. The kingdom and the Ethiopian Orthodox Church were then faced with the problem of migrating Oromo, who invaded the country from the south. Many of the churches that escaped the imam's sword were wiped out by the Oromo people (with long-lasting consequences).

Under continuing pressure from the Oromo in the south and Islamic raids from the east, as well as internal struggles for control of the throne (the capital moving westward to Gondar), despite the successful reign of the politically astute Emperor Sarza Dengel (1563–97), his successors were once again forced to seek help from the Roman Catholic West. Emperor Zaden-gel (1604–1605) began doing away with religious practices to which the Catholics objected, and his successor, Emperor Susenyos (1607–32), officially embraced Roman Catholicism and installed (in 1625) Cardinal Afonso Mendez, a Spaniard, as head of the Ethiopian Church.

The attempt to introduce Roman Catholicism failed. The clergy were asked "to reason" in discussing theological issues, but as Merid Wolde Aregay notes, those "who argued with conviction and zeal were beaten" and countless Ethiopian Christians, including Metropolitan Sam'on, were martyred. The king's demand that all Christians be rebaptized, that the clergy be reordained, and that the Church follow Latin rites brought about a popular uprising. The king was forced to abdicate. His son Fasiladas (1632–67) immediately restored the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, expelling or executing foreigners and their converts.

But the restoration of traditional ways did not bring peace to the Church. A new theological controversy regarding the sense in which Christ was "anointed" rehearsed in a different way the disagreements between Miaphysite Orthodox churches (including the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church) and churches that followed the Council of Chalcedon* (including the Roman Catholic Church). The Ethiopian Church's integrity was preserved by the king's power to resolve theological and christological controversies and by the suppression of dissident views. Ultimately, any deviation from the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church's christological views was rejected by the last royal council (Boru Meda, 1878), which also condemned the worship of Mary, changing the liturgical statement "worshipping [Mary] with her Son" to read "worshipping [Mary's] Son and bowing before her."

The Era of the Princes. From 1769, the emperors were little more than symbols of the unity of the country. Real political power was divided among feuding governors or princes of the provinces. Lawlessness was the order of the day. The Church was again deeply affected.

The era of the princes came to a close with the rise of Emperor Tewodros (1855), who reaffirmed Tewahedo doctrines and practices (proscribing other views). Although nominally under the Coptic* Church of Alexandria (until 1953), the Ethiopian Church has been as much a national institution as the monarchy, and the two have been closely connected. The kingdom was called a "Christian kingdom." As head of the Church, the king appointed all important Church officers, including the abbots of the important monasteries. He presided over national councils dealing with religious matters. In the event of disagreement among the clergy, the king's words became the official position of the Church. Yet individual parish churches remained largely independent of the central administration, although greater supervision appeared when the Church became autocephalous*. The newly arrived Protestant missionaries (late 19th c.-early 20th c.) approached vulnerable peasants and ridiculed Church traditions – most of the time without any awareness of their contents.

Emperor Haile Selassie, born Tafari Makonnen, ruled as regent from 1916 (as Ras Tafari; see Rastafari Movement), was crowned (1930), and reigned until 1974 (except for the Italian occupation, 1936–41). He promoted the formal independence of the Ethiopian Church, which, since the 4th c., had been under the authority of the Coptic pope of Alexandria. In 1948 an agreement between the Coptic and the Ethiopian churches led to autocephaly for the Ethiopian Church, a process formalized by the 1959 crowning of Abuna Baslios as the first patriarch of Ethiopia.

With the fall of Emperor Haile Selassie (1974), the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church lost its status as the state church. The Derg Marxist government (1974–91) nationalized church property and land, and hundreds of thousands, including thousands of priests and monks, were killed during a "Red terror." In addition hundreds of thousands died from famines during the droughts of the 1970s and 1980s. Ethiopia is one of Africa's poorest countries. Since 1991 the renewal of the Orthodox Church (located primarily among Amhara and Tigre rural populations) has been linked mainly to the education and training of priests and laypeople in newly established seminaries and nearly 2,000 schools (not enough in a country where more than half of the 76 million inhabitants are illiterate). Protestant churches have similarly created some 500 schools. Indigenous Charismatic* churches, long underground despite their progression in rural areas, are developing.

Christian Spirituality and Theology. Spirituality is an important matter of daily life for the faithful of the Ethiopian* Orthodox Tewahedo Church. They communicate in prayer not only with God but also with angels and with the "righteous who died in body": the Virgin Mary, the prophets, apostles, saints, and martyrs. The Church teaches that these celestial beings pray for the living and intercede on their behalf. Construing such beings as deities, believers commonly observe their holy days. According to the "Homiliary in Honor of the Archangel Michael," all ailments are caused by demons* from the army of Satan*. Special prayers based on Scripture (some bordering on magic, using God's names to cast a spell) ward off ailments.

Churches are dedicated to a saint, such as Mary, Gabriel, or George, or to one of the names of God, such as Trinity, Savior, Emmanuel, or Jesus. Dedication makes the building a holy place, the dwelling place of God and the saint(s) when the church building is blessed and a tabot is placed in it. A tabot is a replica of the Ark of the Covenant, feared and revered, becoming a personification of the saint or God (as named) to whom it and the church are dedicated. When a church is dedicated to, e.g., Saint Mary, she is in her own tabot, her own "house."

The faithful believe that tabots or the saints they represent have the power to hear and answer prayers. The clergy read about miracles performed by the saints to people (including the sick) who pray to them, observe their holy days, and name their children after them. They vow to bring offerings (carpets, ornamental umbrellas, a cow, or a ram) if their prayers are answered. Churches with especially powerful tabots are centers of pilgrimages.

Eschatology* is framed by the clergy's teaching about rewards and punishments meted out after death, as encapsulated in "Journey (of the Soul) to Heaven" (a recently discovered document). According to it, while the soul* is still in the agony of death, the Angels of Light and the Angels of Darkness ask the soul about its faith, especially about the mystery of the Trinity and Incarnation, and about its good deeds. According to the response, the soul has an easy or difficult journey to heaven to appear before the Lord for judgment, and then is taken either to paradise* or to hell* until the final Judgment*, after the second* coming of the Lord and his reign of 1,000 years with the righteous (see Millennium Cluster). At that time, the righteous move to the Kingdom* of Heaven and the sinners to Sheol (hell). But punishment in Sheol is not eternal. The church father Retu'a Haymanot writes, "No Christians are abandoned . . . even if [they] died in sin, without penance, [they are] given penance in hell commensurate to [their] sin, after which [they are] saved for the sake of Christ."

Judaism in Christianity. Ethiopian Christians observe Judaic practices: circumcision, dietary traditions, and Saturday as Sabbath. Why? This has not been satisfactorily answered. Traditional scholars (pointing to Acts 8:26–38) maintain that Ethiopia accepted Judaism before it accepted Christianity. Most historians propose, instead, that the practices were taken from the OT, when Ethiopians embraced Christianity, because these Judaic practices could be associated with local pre-Christian traditions (e.g. circumcision), and combined OT traditions (e.g. dietary traditions) with teachings of the Apostolic* Church Order and Apostolic* Constitutions (parts of the Ethiopian Bible). See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER: ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH; RASTAFARI MOVEMENT.

Statistics: Population (2008): 80 million (estimate). Christians, 60.8% (Orthodox, 50%; Protestants, 10%; independents, 0.6%; Roman Catholics, 0.2%); Muslims, 32.8%; African Religionists, 4%; other religionists and nonreligious, 2.4%. (Sources: 2008 United Nation Population Fund estimate; 1994 Ethiopian census [for religion percentages].)

HAILE GETACHEW

Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church. See ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER: ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX TEWAHEDO CHURCH.

Ethos. Christian thinkers have used the term "ethos" for a cultural style, tone, or orientation permeating collective life. The Greek, eithos, denoted a person's or group's character as embodying distinctive ideals. "Ethos" is used in contemporary anthropology and rhetoric. In theology, Paul Tillich*, among others, described religious ideals as uniquely carried in the ethos of group and personal life.

MARK LEWIS TAYLOR

EUCHARIST CLUSTER

Eucharist in Eastern Orthodox Churches Eucharist in Oriental Orthodox (Non-Chalcedonian) Churches Eucharist in Western Churches

Eucharist in Eastern Orthodox Churches. See DIVINE LITURGY OF THE ORTHODOX CHURCHES.

Eucharist in Oriental Orthodox (Non-Chalcedonian) Churches follows different liturgical texts. Nevertheless, the theology it involves is not so different, striving to remain faithful to the tradition of the ancient church.

Eucharist is one of the seven sacraments* of Oriental Orthodox churches. Along with baptism*, the Eucharist is deemed essential for salvation*. It symbolizes the final unity of the faithful with Christ through the communion in the Blood and Body of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The Eucharist in Oriental Orthodox churches symbolizes the bloodless sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ on the holy altar, the symbol* of the crucifixion* of our Lord. Through the Eucharist, every believer communes with Jesus Christ and participates in the Lord's Supper, at which only Christ's apostles were present. Through the receiving of the holy sacrament, the believers' relationship with God is transformed; now God dwells in each of them; each of the faithful dies for sin and obtains new life, in union with Christ and in hope of resurrection for eternal life.

The Oriental Orthodox churches strongly strive to preserve that union with Christ: the priest delivers both the Body and the Blood of Christ to the faithful, who, having repented and confessed their sins, are strengthened with faith and approach Christ. According to the apostolic order and as a confirmation of this union with Christ, the priest can celebrate the Divine Liturgy only once, and with one bread and one chalice, so that everyone can be one in Christ: "For we being many are one bread, and one body: for we are all partakers of that one bread" (1 Cor. 10:17).

BISHOP YEZNIK PETROSSIAN

Eucharist in Western Churches. From the 3rd c. onward, the beginnings of a distinctively Western approach to eucharistic theology can be noted. Earlier a diversity of eucharistic meanings and definitions coexisted with little apparent difficulty. But there was also a substantial unity that undergirded the various approaches: the Eucharist was seen as a sacrificial* act of the whole Christian community made in union with Christ, and it provided the nourishment for the community's own self-recognition as Christ's body* within the world. When the debates did eventually come – and there were some very serious ones during the Middle Ages and the Reformation – they often focused on the subject of sacrifice and presence*: the relationship between the sacrifice of Christ on Calvary and the Eucharist, and exactly how Christ was present in the Eucharist elements. What is abundantly clear in the Western patristic eucharistic tradition is the emphasis given to the communal dimension: the grace* that was given in the Eucharist bound members of the liturgical assembly one to another and corporately into the body of Christ, the church*. This is evident in the North African writings of Cyprian* of Carthage (d258) and especially Augustine* of Hippo (d430). Gradually, attention shifted to Christ as both the one who offers the sacrifice and who is himself offered. Ambrose* of Milan (d397) gave emphasis to the personal encounter between the communicant and Christ in the Eucharist and paved the way for a medieval shift toward concerns about the individual in relationship to the eucharistic sacrifice.

The 9th c. witnessed the first controversies over the nature of the eucharistic presence in contrasting the approaches of two monks from the same monastery of Corbie: Paschasius* (d860) defended a more realistic approach that would become normative within medieval eucharistic theology, while Ratramnus* (d868) argued for a more symbolic approach. In the 11th c., a new controversy was introduced by Berengarius* of Tours (d1088), who opposed the real presence of Christ. The Fourth Lateran* Council (1215) definitively established the doctrine of transubstantiation*, affirming that during the Mass* the bread and wine are substantially changed into the Body and Blood of Christ with only the accidents (i.e. outward appearances) remaining. Thomas Aquinas* (d1274) added significantly to the discussion in applying the categories of Aristotelian metaphysics to the Eucharist. Such theological developments led to greater eucharistic devotion outside of Mass (benediction, processions, etc.) and the establishment of the Feast of Corpus Christi (the Body and Blood of Christ) in 1264. Mass came to be viewed as a personal devotion for clergy as well as laity. Private Masses abounded and the “fruit” of the sacrifice of the Mass came to be applied to living and deceased, with monetary offerings given to clergy who officiated. Indeed, 12th-c. England witnessed the emergence of “chantry priests,” who did nothing more than say Mass throughout the day for the list of intentions they had received. Numerous liturgical abuses grew in this period, especially around Mass stipends and the giving of indulgences*.

The 16th-c. Reformation was strong in its condemnation of such abuses and criticized a eucharistic piety that was a far cry from what the patristics had promoted. Faithful to his Augustinian roots, Luther* (d1546) accepted the language of the Mass as a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, but found the medieval language of propitiatory* sacrifice linked to Christ's death on the cross to be more problematic. He also challenged the doctrine of transubstantiation, arguing that during the Eucharist Christ is present “in, with, and under” the elements (consubstantiation*) even as the bread and wine coexisted with the Lord's Body and Blood. The Swiss Reformer Zwingli* (d1531) advocated the Eucharist as a memorial in which the bread and wine remained completely unchanged. Calvin* (d1564) attempted a via media between the two, arguing that through the power of the Holy* Spirit, Christians are raised up to eat and drink with Christ at the Eucharist, whom they receive spiritually by faith in eating the bread and drinking the wine.

The Council of Trent* reaffirmed the doctrine of transubstantiation in its 13th session (1551) in much greater detail than what had been established at the Fourth Lateran Council. Ten years after Trent's decree on the Eucharist, the doctrine of the sacrifice of the Mass was discussed and affirmed at the same council in its 22nd session (1562), stating that the Mass was the true and propitiatory sacrifice instituted by Christ and could be offered for the living and dead, but did not detract from the sacrifice of the cross. Special attention was given to the efficacy of the sacrifice.

Vatican* II (1962–65) reaffirmed the sacrificial nature of the Eucharist as defined by Trent. But it was posited within the wider context of the liturgical community, recognizing the manifold presence of Christ within the Eucharist and the church. Post-Vatican II theology has given much attention to the threefold presence of Christ in the Eucharist: in the gathered assembly, in the Word proclaimed, and in the Eucharist. Moreover, Western churches are recovering the important role of the Holy Spirit in transforming not only the bread and wine but also the community as it lives the Eucharist within the world. The later 20th c. also saw the Christian churches reaching significant convergence not only on liturgical structures but also on how Christians can speak together about eucharistic sacrifice and presence. This was especially evident in the 1982 Lima text of the World* Council of Churches, Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry. Globalization* and postmodernism* offer fresh challenges for the continuing evolution of eucharistic theology in the 21st c. See also ATONEMENT; COMMUNION; SACRIFICE.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Eucharistic Congresses. The First Eucharistic Congress, held in Lille (1881), was initiated by a Roman Catholic laywoman, Emilie Tamisier (d1910), herself inspired by the “apostle of the Eucharist,” Peter Julian Eymard (d1868). The theme was that “the Eucharist saves the world,” offering the remedy of faith in the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist as a corrective to religious indifference (see Secularism and Secularization). During the 20th c., the congresses continued to grow and became internationalized during the pontificate of Pius* XI, being celebrated on all continents and taking on a missionary as well as ecumenical and interreligious dimensions. Their fundamental intention is to increase understanding of and participation in the eucharistic mystery*. In 1986 Pope John* Paul II promoted the Vatican office for International Eucharistic Congresses to the level of a pontifical committee. See also EUCHARIST CLUSTER.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Eucharistic Fast. Less an ascetic* practice than a means of proper disposition for receiving Holy Communion, the eucharistic fast consists of complete abstinence from food and drink until the sacrament has been received. It originated in the 4th c. In the Roman Catholic Church, until the 1950s fasting began at midnight on the night before Eucharist. Changes in the law on eucharistic fasting were brought about by Pope Pius* XII (1953, 1957), Pope Paul* VI (1964), and the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments (1973). The 1983 Code of Canon Law states that one normally abstains from food and drink for one hour before communicating and that the drinking of water does not constitute a break in the fast.

See also EUCHARIST CLUSTER.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Eucharistic Prayer (Canon of the Mass), central prayer of praise and thanksgiving within the Eucharist*. Trinitarian in structure and recited by the president (bishop, priest, pastor), it recalls God's salvific deeds in the paschal mystery of Christ. The Eucharistic Prayer begins with the preface dialogue “Lift up Your Hearts!” and concludes with the “Great Amen.” In the Roman Catholic Church, it was formerly called the “Canon,” meaning something fixed or unchanging, normally referring to the Roman Canon (Eucharistic Prayer I in the current Roman Missal); dating from the late 4th c., it is the oldest extant eucharistic prayer in the West. In the Middle Ages, it came to be prayed silently by the priest both to increase its sacral nature and sense of mystery and because it was no longer necessary for the Mass* to take account of the assembly in a direct way.

Since Vatican* II (1962–65), the consecratory nature of the entire prayer has been recovered, so that consecration is not limited to the words of institution, “Take and eat,” “Take and drink.” Today the Eucharistic Prayer's communal dimension has also been recovered along with the Holy* Spirit's role in transforming not only the bread and wine but also those present who partake of the sacrament. The assembly participates actively in the prayer, singing the various acclamations interspersed throughout. As in the liturgical books of other Christian churches, the current Roman Missal offers a number of new eucharistic prayers to be used in certain contexts and circumstances.

KEITH F. PECKLERS, SJ

Euchological Prayers (of praise to God) include the Eucharistic* Prayers (a major type) as well as, e.g., prayers of dedication of a new or renovated church, the prayer of dedication of a new altar, and the prayer of blessing over the water to be used for baptism.

Euchologion, in Orthodox* churches, a liturgical book that contains the services and prayers used for the sacraments. One of the earliest one (4th c.) is that of Serapion of Thmuis.

Eudocia (c460), Roman empress. Originally named Athenais, probably from Antioch, the daughter of an Athenian intellectual, she was Theodosius* II's wife. Before being married she was baptized, taking the Christian name Eudocia (421). As empress she used her influence to promote tolerance of non-Christian intellectuals and teachers in the nascent "university" of Constantinople. She traveled to Jerusalem (438), visited the monastery of Melania* the Younger on the Mount of Olives*, was at the dedication of the Church of St. Stephen*, and brought back relics of Stephen. Because of rivalry with Pulcheria*, she left permanently for Jerusalem (443) and favored the doctrine of Eutyches* concerning the "one nature" of Christ.

Eudoxius (c300–70), Anomoian* leader. Born in Armenia, he became successively bishop of Germanicia, of Antioch*, and of Constantinople* under the sponsorship of Arian* bishops and emperors.

Eugenius, Mark (1394–1445), scholar and monk declared a saint by the Eastern Orthodox Church (1734). Born in Constantinople, son of a deacon, he served as metropolitan of Ephesus and as a delegate to the Council of Florence*, where he was an outspoken opponent of the Filioque and of reunion with the West. Despite being threatened in Florence, he returned safely to the East and continued to write against Western doctrine and against union. On his deathbed, he persuaded George Scholarius (later Patriarch Gennadios II) to assume leadership of the opponents of the union.

Eunomius (c325–96), theologian. Like his master, Aetius, who was considered a radical Arian*, Eunomius rejected *homoousios. For him Father and Son could be distinct only if their essences were anomoios, "dissimilar," to one another. His followers were therefore called "Anomoians" by their opponents. Appointed bishop of Cyzicus, Eunomius was soon exiled for heresy*. According to his unique theory of language, God's name (expressed verbally as "Unbegotten") revealed his essence perfectly but not discursively. Nicenes and Arians alike rejected him but were required to clarify their own positions. Condemned by the Council of Constantinople*, his church survived into the 6th c.

RICHARD VAGGIONE

Eunuch, castrated male. Commonly used in harems, eunuchs often became important court officials. The Bible refers to their presence in Egypt (Gen 37:36, 40:2, 7), Israel (1 Kgs 22:9; 2 Kgs 8:6, 9:32, 24:15, 25:19), Babylon (Esth 1:10, 2:21), and Ethiopia (Acts 8:27–39). Because of their physical mutilation, eunuchs were initially excluded from worship (Deut. 23:1), but later were welcomed (Isa 56:3–5; Acts 8:36–38).

Europe, History of Christianity in. See HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: EASTERN EUROPE; HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: WESTERN EUROPE.

Eusebian Canons, the tables prepared by Eusebius* of Caesarea to enable readers to find parallel sections in the four Gospels*, often copied in manuscripts of the Gospels. Their function has been succeeded by Gospel parallels and the division of the text into chapters and verses.

Eusebius of Caesarea (c260–c339), Christian Apologist, theologian, scholar. Eusebius studied in Caesarea under Origen's pupil Pamphilus; after Pamphilus's martyrdom, he completed Pamphilus's Apology. Like Origen, he became a prolific theologian and exegete, compiling Onomasticon (a glossary of Hebrew names in scripture), although Eusebius did not adopt Origen's allegorical methods in his commentaries on Luke, Isaiah, and the stories of God's appearances in the OT. His most notable apologetic work is the Preparation for the Gospel, a 15-book compilation of texts designed to reveal convergences of Greek thought and Christianity. Among his early theological works, the 10-book Demonstration of the Gospel corroborates the main tenets of Christianity from the OT.

Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, the chief source of the history of the church before Constantine*, is particularly important because it incorporates unedited documents. The last of its 10 books was heavily revised around 317, after the dissolution of Constantine's alliance with Licinius, the non-Christian emperor of the East; some scholars maintained (though this is doubted) that the original version terminated before the persecution of 303.

Elected bishop of Caesarea (c313), Eusebius welcomed the return of synodical government after Constantine's seizure of the Eastern throne (324). He signed the creed promulgated at the Council of Nicaea* (325), which affirmed the consubstantiality of God the Father and God the Son (see Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy; Trinity in the Western Tradition). But he never admitted that the Son was equal to or coeternal with the Father, and resented the later attempts of Athanasius* to force these views on the church.

There is evidence that Eusebius's enemies secured a condemnation of his views (because of Arian* tendencies) in Antioch before the Council of Nicaea, yet it was not he but his bugbear, Bishop Marcellus of Ancyra (the interlocutor of his Against Marcellus and Ecclesiastical Theology), who was finally deposed. Constantine offered the See of Antioch to Eusebius, who declined it. Admiring the emperor to the point of adulation, he wrote a four-book hagiography of him, again transcribing many original documents, and extolled him as the vicar of Christ on earth in his Tricennial Oration (336).

MARK J. EDWARDS

Eusebius of Dorylaeum (mid-5th c.). A lawyer in Constantinople, he sounded the alarm over Nestorius's* teachings; he accused him (wrongly) of Adoptionism* (429). Once again in reference to the humanity and divinity of Christ, as bishop of Dorylaeum, Eusebius attacked Eutyches'* teaching, claiming it was heretical for committing the opposite error, Monophysitism* (according to which Christ had a single, divine nature) (448). Deposed by the Second Council of Ephesus*, he took a leading role in the Council of Chalcedon* (451) after the new emperor reinstated him.

Eusebius of Emesa (c300–c354/59), bishop, theologian, exegete; born in Edessa*, where he was educated in Scripture and Greek literature. Eusebius was a student of both Patrophilus of Scythopolis and Eusebius* of Caesarea; then he studied in Antioch* and Alexandria*. He declined the Episcopal See of Alexandria during Athanasius's* exile and became bishop of Emesa. His surviving works include Greek fragments, sermons in Latin translation, and Commentary on the Octateuch and Reigns in Armenian translation. As an exegete of the Antiochene school, Eusebius discussed translation problems and drew on Jewish traditions. He opposed Arianism* and emphasized the limits of human knowledge.

UTE POSSEKEL

Eusebius of Nicomedia (early 4th c.). Bishop of Nicomedia and a disciple of Lucian* of Antioch, he championed the Arian* party. He obtained the deposition of Athanasius* (335), baptized Constantine* before his death (337), and was a leader at the Council of Antioch* (341), which attempted to supplement or replace the Nicene* Creed with four others.

Eusebius of Vercelli (d371), a supporter of the Nicene* Creed; exiled in the East (355–62). He was one of the first bishops to live with his clergy under a rule*, a pattern adopted in the Augustinian* Rule and by the canons* regular.

Eustathius of Antioch (early 4th c.). As bishop of Antioch, he played a major role in the Council of Nicaea* (325). Because of his insistence on divine unity and the reality of Christ's human soul, he was accused, respectively, of Sabellianism* and Adoptionism*. He was deposed within a few years at the instigation of Eusebius* of Caesarea and died in exile.

Eustathius of Sebaste (c300–c380), bishop in Pontus, a moderate Arian* who affirmed the Homoiousian* position at the Synod of Ancyra* (358). Later he supported the position of the Pneumatomachi*, denying the full divinity of the Holy* Spirit. He exerted his greatest influence in organizing a new mode of monastic life, with an asceticism* based on the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5–7) and the earliest church (Acts 2:44–45, 4:32–35); he emphasized manual labor and works of charity, and minimized differences of class and gender. He probably influenced Macrina* and Basil* of Caesarea more than they or their admirers acknowledged.

Eustochium, Julia (c368–419/20). Born in Rome, daughter of the Roman senator Toxotius and Paula*, she directed a monastery for women in Bethlehem (404), where she died.

Eustochium was one of five children born to Paula and Toxotius, descending from the Scipios and the Gracchi on her mother's side and the Julians on her father's side (after whom Eustochium was called "Julia"). Around age 16, Eustochium vowed to remain a virgin* (384) and adopted a life of ascetic* discipline, directed by her mother, Paula, and the Roman noblewoman Marcella*. Along with these women, she studied under Jerome* and was praised for her learning, especially her proficiency in Hebrew. After her father's death, she accompanied Paula on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land and a visit to the monks of Egypt. She settled in Bethlehem, helping to establish two monasteries – one for men and another for women – and a hospice for pilgrims (see Hospitality). Upon her mother's death in 404, she assumed supervision of the women's monastery until her own death.

Jerome dedicated to Eustochium several biblical translations and commentaries, and addressed numerous letters to Eustochium, among which is Epistle 22, his best-known outline of (female) ascetic discipline.

KRISTI UPSON-SAIA

Euthanasia (Gk “gentle death”), termination of life for humanitarian reasons: unbearable suffering, incurable physical degeneration, cessation of brain function, loss of quality of life, and even (most controversially) “defective” mental or physical capacity (of infants or adults). Christian views of euthanasia balance in different ways the “sanctity” and “quality” of human life. At the minimum (“passive euthanasia”), euthanasia involves not pursuing extraordinary, difficult, or burdensome means to prolong life, or not resuscitating a patient after heart failure with his or her consent. Intermediate measures (“active euthanasia”) include withdrawal of artificial medical support (e.g. feeding tubes, electrical stimulation). The Roman Catholic Church has explicitly condemned active euthanasia as incompatible with the sanctity of human life, but despite recent ambivalence it has had a long tradition of supporting passive euthanasia. The Eastern Orthodox* Church seeks to maintain a balance between quality of life and sanctity of life. Other churches express even greater concern about the “quality” of human life. Protestant and independent churches hold diverse views all along this continuum. But euthanasia that involves physician-assisted actions to stop vital functions – physician-assisted suicide – is most often rejected. See also DEATH, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER; DYING, CARE OF THE, AN EASTERN ORTHODOX PERSPECTIVE; HOSPICE; MEDICAL ETHICS.

Eutyches (c378–454), archimandrite* in Constantinople. He opposed Nestorianism* (according to which Jesus’ humanity and divinity were joined by will, not by nature) but was accused by Eusebius* of Dorylaeum of taking the opposite view: that of Monophysitism* (according to which Christ had a single nature) (448). He acknowledged that Christ was “from two natures” but insisted on “in one nature after the union,” which seemed to deny the reality of Christ’s humanity. This allowed him to emphasize Christ’s divinity as the power at work in transforming human beings, overcoming the power of evil (rather than emphasizing that the cause of this transformation must be human as well as divine, as Antiochenes did). Eutyches, championed by Theodosius* II, was exonerated at the Second Council of Ephesus (449), but deposed and exiled by the Council of Chalcedon* (451) and rejected by Miaphysites*.

Evagrius of Pontus (345–99), monk, early theorist of Christian mysticism*. Evagrius grew up in Pontus, near the Black Sea. Ordained deacon* by Gregory* of Nazianzus, he earned fame in Constantinople defending (c380) the emerging trinitarian* doctrine. After an affair with an aristocratic woman, he fled to Jerusalem, where Melania* the Elder convinced him to become a monk. In 383 he moved to Egypt, settling first in Nitria (one of the centers of Egyptian monasticism on the cliff separating the Nile from the desert), then in Kellia. He apprenticed under Macarius the Egyptian and emerged as the leader of a circle of intellectual monks.

Evagrius’s writings, terse, technical, and sometimes cryptic, appear mostly in collections of numbered paragraphs (chapters, kephalaia). In The Monk (Praktikos), he classifies temptations according to “eight thoughts,” a scheme that shaped later medieval teaching on the seven deadly* sins. In Chapters on Prayer, he advocates unceasing wordless and imageless prayer* and plots stages in the soul’s* journey to God.

The Second Council of Constantinople (553) posthumously condemned Evagrius for Origenism*; his friends and disciples, branded Origenist heretics*, were hounded out of Egypt. His works survived, preserved mainly under others’ names or in Syriac translations. Twentieth-century scholars rediscovered his works and recognized how profoundly he had influenced classic mystical traditions, in both the East and the West. See also MONASTICISM CLUSTER: SYRIAC TRADITION.

J. WILLIAM HARMLESS, SJ

Evangelical, having to do with the gospel (Gk euangelion). (1) The adjective often refers to the teachings and way of life found in the Gospels*. (2) The verb “to evangelize” has been used, starting with the NT, to refer to the proclamation of the gospel as good tidings (see Evangelism or Evangelization). (3) During the Reformation*, “Evangelical” was the name given to Protestant* churches in Germany and Switzerland because of their emphasis on the gospel of justification* by faith*. Likewise in Latin America it is the common designation for Protestants. The Evangelical* Alliance of the 19th c. was an international partnership of Protestant churches, emphasizing the gospel as that which unified them. (4) Since Wesley* and the Great* Awakening, the term has been applied to movements emphasizing proclamation and personal transformation, usually in reaction against liberalism* or conventional religiosity (see Evangelicals/Evangelicalism Cluster). (5) Negatively, “evangelical” can denote excessive zealousness in proclaiming or defending a cause.

Evangelical Alliance, voluntary organization founded in London (1846), building on the heritage of John and Charles Wesley* and the London Missionary Society. Its initial emphasis was on Christian unity, but it has diverged from the ecumenical* movement because of its stricter Evangelical* doctrinal standards. The organization in the USA is called the World Evangelical Fellowship; globally, the World Evangelical Alliance is based in Vancouver. Parallel organizations are the Lausanne* Group and the National* Association of Evangelicals.

Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA). See LUTHERANISM CLUSTER: IN THE UNITED STATES: EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA (ELCA).

EVANGELICALS/EVANGELICALISM CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entry

Evangelicals/Evangelicalism and Evangelical Theologies

2) A Sampling of Evangelicals/Evangelicalism

- Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Asia
- Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Asia: The Philippines
- Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Australia and the South Pacific

- Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Latin America
- Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Latin America: Mexico
- Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in North America
- Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in the United Kingdom

1) Introductory Entry

Evangelicals/Evangelicalism and Evangelical Theologies. Evangelicalism is a largely modern, interdenominational movement with roots in both early Christianity and the Protestant Reformation*. Evangelicals and their theologies are diverse, but virtually all of them adhere to the authority and sufficiency of Scripture*, the centrality of the cross*, the imperative of transdenominational gospel promotion (see Evangelism or Evangelization), and the necessity of spiritual rebirth. The story of modern Evangelical theology began in Europe, gained momentum in the larger Western world, and now flourishes throughout the Southern Hemisphere.

Evangelicalism in Continental Europe. The 16th-c. Protestant Reformation* in Europe called for a return to what its leaders (Luther*, Zwingli*, most Anabaptists*, Calvin*, and others) deemed the central teachings of the NT: sola fide, sola gratia, sola scriptura, and solus Christus. Most of them taught that Scripture should function as the ultimate doctrinal norm (sola scriptura) and that salvation* from sin* and death* (see Atonement #2) is granted by grace* alone (sola gratia) through faith* (sola fide) in Christ* alone (solus Christus). They differed among themselves over other doctrinal matters (Christology*, the Eucharist*, and the relation of church* and state). But they agreed that the medieval churches needed major reforms and that the reforms they favored had apostolic warrant. This understanding of “Evangelicals” remained nearly unchanged in continental Europe until today.

Evangelicalism in the United Kingdom and North America from the 18th Century. A different understanding of “Evangelicals” appeared in the 18th c. with the renewal movements that spanned the Atlantic Ocean during the so-called Great Awakenings of Great Britain, Ireland, and the Americas. These renewal movements reaffirmed the faith of the Reformation, infusing it with Pietist* and revivalist* practices inspired by British Puritanism* and Continental Pietism. The need for conversion*, personal piety, and ecumenical witness became essential to Evangelicalism after the Awakenings.

Jonathan Edwards* and John Wesley* were key leaders of the Awakenings. Edwards was a Calvinist* minister who clarified the tenets of Reformed Protestantism in the midst of the revivals. His theological treatise Religious Affections distinguished true religion as a matter of love for God, and his Freedom of the Will gave Calvinists theological ground from which to evangelize cross-culturally. Wesley was an Arminian* minister who helped to inaugurate the Methodist Movement within the Church of England. His doctrine of entire sanctification* fueled the development of the Holiness* Movement in subsequent centuries. He believed that Christians should seek and receive a second work of divine grace* (after the first work of justification*). He taught that this “second blessing” rendered them entirely sanctified and no longer prone to sin voluntarily.

During the 19th c., Evangelicals institutionalized revival and used it to foster further renewal through the Holiness* Movement. Holiness people are deeply committed to personal sanctification, set apart from worldliness, and empowered by the Holy* Spirit. Charles G. Finney* and Phoebe Palmer* were their important early leaders. They preached in both Britain and North America. Finney rooted his gradualist notion of Christian perfection (“Oberlin Perfectionism”) on Edwards’s doctrine of “natural ability” (rather than Wesley’s second blessing). Palmer popularized a Wesleyan form of perfectionism by means of her so-called altar theology.

By the late 19th c., Pentecostalism* emerged out of the Holiness revivals. Pentecostals are the most intense Holiness adherents, fervent about the special gifts of the Spirit (charismata*). They practice speaking in tongues*, a third blessing, which they believe attends the baptism* in the Spirit. Charles Fox Parham and William Seymour were key founders of Pentecostalism. The Charismatic* Movement introduced Holiness/Pentecostal concerns in the mainline churches, gaining prominence near the mid-20th c.

Evangelicalism in the Two-thirds World.

Holiness/Pentecostalism proliferated in the Southern Hemisphere during late 20th c., although it had penetrated Africa, Latin America, and Asia in the early 20th c., often from Europe. Thus in Latin America, and often in Africa and Asia, the term “Evangelical” refers to all Protestants, as it does in continental Europe.

Most 21st-c. Christians live in the Southern Hemisphere, and Charismatics* (also known as Pentecostals) there constitute the fastest-growing segment of Evangelicalism today. Africa contains a wide constituency of Evangelicals in African* Instituted Churches and in traditional congregations (e.g. Anglican, Catholic, Methodist, Presbyterian), most of which include charismatic groups. Charismatics account for the vast majority of Protestant growth in recent Latin American history. They also thrive in East Asian contexts, such as China and Korea.

North American and British Evangelicals continue to fight for orthodoxy in cultures inclined to question their convictions regarding traditional Christian worldviews. Fundamentalists* and neo-Evangelicals, e.g., defend the literal truth of Scripture in the face of Modernism*. Non-Western Evangelicals also maintain a vibrant orthodoxy, but do so with less concern for defending the traditions of the West. They stress supernatural intervention in daily living and nurture a Restorationist* desire to repristinate the faith of the apostles. They are spiritually exuberant and exceptionally prolific. Many of them now look to the West with missionary intent. Indeed, Evangelical theology continues to thrive today, shaped by the members of an increasingly global community.

ELIZABETH MASON CURRIER and
DOUGLAS SWEENEY

2) A Sampling of Evangelicals/Evangelicalism

Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Asia.

The word "Evangelical" is rather loosely used in the Asian context. Most Protestant churches in Asia were established in connection with the Evangelical revival* within the mainline Protestant churches in Europe and share with them a common "Evangelical tradition" in theology and spirituality. Furthermore, the conflict in the USA between Christians rooted in a conservative approach to Scripture* and theology and those considered "liberals" would gradually have an impact on countries worldwide, including Asia. Building on the formation of the World Evangelical Alliance (1846), the National Association of Evangelicals in the USA (1942) developed a specific theological and missionary profile that deeply influenced Asian Evangelicalism. In addition, the International Conference on World Evangelization (Lausanne, 1974) popularized and reinforced Evangelicalism in Asia.

The Evangelical Fellowship of Asia (founded in 1983) is a fellowship of national Evangelical alliances in Asian countries, where in various configurations one usually finds two kinds of Evangelical expression. (1) In most mainline Protestant churches, there are groups that identify themselves as "Evangelicals," including youth groups and movements such as the Evangelical Union, Campus Crusade, and Youth for Christ. (2) The National Alliance brings together Evangelical churches, as well as mission agencies and movements with an Evangelical orientation. Evangelicalism in Asia, following the conservative-liberal controversies in the USA, is primarily a theological movement aimed at safeguarding what it views as the "orthodox" Protestant faith, namely the belief that the Bible/Scripture* is divinely inspired and is the final authority in matters of faith and practice; the atoning death of Christ on the cross for human salvation* (see Atonement #2); personal faith*; spiritual renewal through the power of the Holy* Spirit; and the conviction* that Christians are called to engage in the evangelizing mission* to bring others to personal faith in Jesus Christ. Even though these convictions are the kernel of Evangelicalism everywhere, they are developed in various ways in Asia.

Beside safeguarding the "orthodox" Protestant faith, the Evangelical Fellowship of Asia has a seven-point emphasis as it develops networks and strengthens Evangelicalism in Asia: two traditional emphases, mission and church planting, and theology and church renewal; and five forward-looking emphases, regarding religious liberty, social concerns, women's ministry, youth ministry, and leadership development. The Asia Theological Association (since 1970) brings together the theological educational institutions in Asia committed to Evangelical faith and scholarship.

S. WESLEY ARIARAJAH

Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Asia: The Philippines.

In the Philippines, the term "Evangelical" designates the members of the many Charismatic*, Pentecostal*, and fundamentalist* churches and parachurches* that have been organized primarily since the 1950s. The missionaries who established most of these churches came from fundamentalist and Pentecostal groups in North America.

In the 1960s, the leaders of these denominations and parachurches* felt the need to organize but did not want to join the National* Council of Churches in the Philippines because they believed that it had become too "modernist" or "liberal" in its theological orientation. These Charismatic, Pentecostal, and fundamentalist Evangelical groups define an Evangelical as one who affirms the traditional fundamentals of the faith, particularly the divinity, humanity, and substitutionary atonement* (see Atonement #2) of Jesus Christ; the total depravity of humans (see Sin*) and salvation* by grace* through faith in Christ alone (see Faith #3); and the inerrancy* and final authority of the Scriptures* in faith and practice.

In 1964 a core of Christian leaders met at the First Baptist Church Manila and discussed the founding of an organization that would express the Evangelicals' oneness in Christ. After several meetings, they formed the Philippine Council of Evangelical Churches, Inc., composed of more than 54 denominations (in 2000), with Bishop Efraim Tendo as general secretary (from 1993). The two largest denominational members are the Association of Bible Christian Communities of the Philippines and the Christian and Missionary Alliance Churches of the Philippines. See also PHILIPPINES. VICTOR AGUILAN

Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Australia and the South Pacific. Evangelicals were the pioneers of Christianity in Australia* and the Pacific Islands. The convict chaplains were mostly Evangelical Anglicans* and Methodists*. As the number of settlers grew, other denominations were established – Presbyterian*, Baptist*, and Congregationalist* – all strongly committed to Evangelicalism. Another Evangelical strand came with Lutherans* from Prussia. Pacific Islanders were actively involved in regional evangelism as far away as Melanesia. In Australia successive visiting evangelists reinforced the Evangelical message, also regularly proclaimed by ministers, lay preachers, Sunday school teachers, and youth leaders. Agencies such as the YMCA* and YWCA*, Christian Endeavour, and temperance* movements also underlined conversion*, education*, and social service, which fostered Evangelical identity, as did burgeoning overseas missions, and new denominations.

Evangelical theology was challenged by new emphases in biblical scholarship (see Bible Interpretation Cluster: History of), science*, and philosophy*. By the mid-20th c., these dominated the major denominations, but Evangelicals' Bible colleges upheld traditional convictions. The Anglican Diocese of Sydney was an Evangelical stronghold. Melbourne Anglicans founded Ridley College, vital to Evangelical identity. Annual conventions nourished lively piety, missionary enthusiasm, and support by many generous business and professional families. Crusaders in high schools and Evangelical groups in universities linked Evangelical theological positions with modern knowledge. Periodicals, books, and papers kept Evangelicals in touch with worldwide developments. North American influences grew during the late 20th c.; Billy Graham's visits gave Evangelicals fresh inspiration. Sydney Anglicans such as Archbishops Mowll, Loane, Robinson, and Jensen and theologians such as T. C. Hammond and D. B. Knox were influential far beyond Australia. The Evangelical Fellowship in the Anglican Communion owed much to the Sydney leadership, as did the Lausanne* movement. World Vision Australia symbolizes the social conscience of Evangelicalism and its ability to tap into compassion for social justice, making it the largest aid and development agency in Australia (as exemplified by Alan Walker, a Sydney Methodist). Many Pacific Islanders contributed to evangelism in the Papua New Guinea Highlands starting in 1945.

The emergence of strong Pentecostal*/Charismatic* churches and groups in major churches contributed to the renaissance of Evangelicalism. Important networks of Aboriginal* Christians grew out of the revival that started on Elcho Island. Migrant churches from Asia and the Pacific brought additional strands into Evangelicalism. Innovative media work and the development of Christian music and hymnody and of a younger generation of scholars, along with ministerial and lay leaders, have given Evangelicalism the ability to deal with changes. IAN BREWARD

Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Latin America. See PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA.

Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in Latin America: Mexico. "Evangelical" commonly designates in Mexico all Protestant churches (as in continental Europe). North American Protestant missionaries started arriving in Mexico in 1840. By 1916 Protestantism still followed the model of the American Evangelicalism of the Second Awakening* and of revivalism* characterized by individualism, salvation* through Christ's vicarious atonement (see Atonement #2), and sanctification*.

After World War II, a new wave of missionaries belonging to the Holiness*

Movement arrived in Mexico, often emphasizing Millennialist* and fundamentalist* interpretations of the Bible. This early Charismatic* Evangelical Movement represented a “reactionary faith” – a faith reacting to what believers perceived as the threat of secularism*, science*, and communism (see Marxism and Christianity). By contrast, the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Baptist churches were hardly influenced by these reactionary attitudes, although many of the members of this early Charismatic Evangelical Movement came from these churches. This movement was marked by dualism* and Holy* Spirit experience, by an ethics of separation from the “world,” and by a legalistic inflexibility. As in the rest of the Protestant tradition, for this movement the Bible remained the only basis for faith* and ethics*, yet now with a literalistic* reading of the Bible, an emphasis on individual conversion* (being “born again”), and missionary zeal.

With this radicalization of the Evangelical ethos*, and in the context of the cold war, Evangelical communities, particularly in institutions of theological education, developed alternative positions that emphasized, together with a more ecumenical attitude, Christians’ social and political responsibilities. The Congress of Oaxtepec (1979) and the journal Cristianismo y sociedad (Christianity and society) represented a shift in the conceptualization of the mission of Evangelicals in Latin America: an integral component of mission now includes the transformation of society. Similarly, the Latin American Theological Fraternity (1970) reestablished the connection of Evangelicalism with the Evangelical tradition of the 16th- to 17th-c. Anabaptist Movement, and reread the Bible in light of the integral commitment of the mission of the church.

JAVIER ULLOA

Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in North America. Evangelicals in North America are characterized by diversity, voluntarism, and allegiance to their mission of gospel witness around the world. Most members of this movement are Protestant, but others identify with Evangelicalism without affirming all of its tenets. The Evangelical Movement is rooted in a view of classical Christian orthodoxy defined largely by a Protestant understanding of the gospel (see the present cluster: Introductory Entry) and distinguished by its origins in 18th-c. European and North American colonial revivals*.

These practices sprang up during the Great* Awakenings (c1720s–1750s) of Europe and the colonial USA, which called for adherence to biblical teaching from the pulpit, as well as from small-group and individual Bible study. The goal of revivalism* was personal and corporate repentance* from sin* and personal and corporate devotion to Jesus as Lord*, a transformation empowered by Scripture* and the Holy* Spirit. On the social level, the Great Awakening saw unprecedented interethnic, interregional, and interdenominational efforts to promote the gospel in North America, which emerged as the center of the Evangelical Movement.

America’s Second Great Awakening (late 18th c. to the 1830s) was diverse. It was led by Calvinist* Edwardian* ministers in New England, Charles Finney* and his “inconsistent Calvinism” in upstate New York, and Methodists*, along with Baptists* and Presbyterians* with Arminian* tendencies, in the Cumberland River valley. The disestablishment and democratization of US religion accompanied these revivals. Previously marginal groups gained a greater opportunity to minister; grassroots gospel promotion led to a populist orientation and contextual expression of Evangelicalism.

Evangelical institutions propelled by a new voluntarism moved to the center of US culture, spearheading social reform in the early 19th c. Evangelicals, women prominent among them, led the Temperance* Movement, worked for the abolition of slavery*, and ministered to the poor*. The rise of naturalism and Modernism* provoked the 20th-c. fundamentalist* controversy and the retreat of Evangelicals from social involvement. Many Evangelicals gathered around the fundamentals of their faith, defined in the Five Point Deliverance (1910) as the inerrancy* of Scripture, the virgin* birth, penal substitutionary atonement*, Jesus' bodily resurrection*, and the historicity of biblical miracles*, yet many ignored the social implications of these fundamentals.

Neo-Evangelicals emerged from the doldrums of a defeated fundamentalism in the 1930s and 1940s to reengage North American culture. Their goal was "cooperation without compromise": to uphold fundamentalist doctrinal convictions and socio-cultural involvement. Billy Graham was their unmistakable leader.

With the shift of the center of the Evangelical Movement from North America to the Southern Hemisphere, the prevailing tenor has also changed, dominated now by Holiness*, Pentecostal*, and Charismatic* congregations. Since Evangelicals are "people of the book" committed to constant renewal and contextual expressions of historic Christianity, the future of Evangelicalism in North America depends on engagement and collaboration, not only with its historic roots, but also with these newer Christian traditions.

ELIZABETH MASON CURRIER and
DOUGLAS SWEENEY

Evangelicals/Evangelicalism in the United Kingdom. Evangelicals claim to represent the most authentic tradition of biblical Christianity and Reformation Protestantism*, even though their existence as a recognized movement dates only from the late 1730s. In that decade, the preaching of John Wesley*, George Whitefield*, and others not only launched Methodism* but established the broader Evangelical tradition as a seminal influence in British Protestant churches. Evangelicals strongly emphasize the authority of the Bible as Scripture* (although not necessarily insisting on its verbal inerrancy*), the necessity of personal conversion* and acceptance of Christ, the belief in the pivotal theological and devotional significance of substitutionary atonement (see Atonement #2), and zealous activism in spreading the gospel in order to transform society.

By the mid-19th c., Evangelicals had become a substantial party in the Church of England (see Anglicanism Cluster: Anglican Communion and its Theology; United Kingdom), and their influence was a key factor in the Disruption* of the Church of Scotland* (1843). They also had a major impact on the Baptists* and Congregationalists*, as they shaped the ethos of the Methodist* churches. Evangelicals founded numerous societies to promote their evangelistic agendas, notably the London Missionary Society (1795), the Church Missionary Society (1799), the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804), the London City Mission (1835), and the Evangelical Alliance (1846). Wider social and political agendas were promoted by leaders such as William Wilberforce* (1759–1833) in his campaign against the Atlantic slave* trade and Anthony Ashley-Cooper, earl of Shaftesbury (1801–85), in his efforts to ameliorate the working and living conditions of the poor.

There was a loss of momentum in the late 19th and early 20th c. Internal tensions between liberals and conservatives increased, although Britain, unlike the USA, never developed a powerful fundamentalist* movement.

After World War II, however, Evangelicals again became a major force, strengthened by international influences, such as the Billy Graham crusades (1950s), but remained a distinctive indigenous movement. Their renewed strength in the Church of England was apparent at a congress in Keele (1967); the formation of the Evangelical Alliance Relief (TEAR) Fund (1968) was symbolic of their recovery as a strong social conscience and commitment to Third World aid. Since the 1960s, many British Evangelicals have been influenced by the Charismatic* Movement. In the 1980s and 1990s, the Evangelical Alliance, led successively by Clive Calver and Joel Edwards, developed into an influential umbrella organization and pressure group. As liberal and Catholic traditions have declined, Evangelicals have increasingly set the tone of British Christianity.

JOHN WOLFFE

Evangelism or Evangelization (both from Gk euangelion, "good news") is, for many Christians, a term equivalent to "mission*," including any number of local and foreign-soil ministries. From a more Evangelical* perspective, however, evangelism is more the global proclamation of the best news of all – “in Christ God was reconciling the world to himself” (2 Cor 5:19, NIV). Evangelism is a ministry of reconciliation given to us by “God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ” (2 Cor 5:18, NIV). Although the creation and all creatures are totally disconnected from God, God has not only reconciled believers to God, but has chosen to use believers as instruments of reconciliation. “How then, can they call on the one they have not believed in? And how can they believe in the one of whom they have not heard? And how can they hear without someone preaching to them? And how can they preach unless they are sent?” (Rom 10:14).

For Evangelicals, evangelism begins in the OT with a people chosen and blessed by God to be a blessing to others. In Abraham*, the children of Israel* were called to bear witness to a God who was faithful to the covenant* promises, who would deliver and sustain all who would call faithfully on the name of the One who loved them. Israel soon forgot. The sacrifices instituted for covenant renewal became a mindless ritual. God became weary. Centuries of unfaithfulness betrayed the inability of the covenant with Abraham to sustain a lasting relationship with God. Jeremiah* 31:31–34 revealed the ultimate plan. God would institute a new* covenant whereby sin was not only “covered over” (propitiated*), but “rooted out” (expiated*), whereby God would “forgive their wickedness and remember their sins no more” (v. 34) (see Atonement #2). The ultimate good news on which evangelism is grounded is the new covenant sacrifice* of God’s own son that fulfilled this prophecy in “the greater and more perfect tabernacle*” that is not made with human hands, eternal in the heavens” (Heb 9:11) (see Supersessionism).

The church has received the commission from the resurrected Christ to “go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” (Matt 28:19). Acts* describes many examples in the lives of the apostles, who spread Christianity throughout the Roman Empire. The apostle Paul* perhaps best epitomizes the nature of evangelism. Church history reveals countless Christians who have felt that same call, as Christianity would eventually become a worldwide movement that included men and women of all backgrounds and races.

Styles of evangelism vary greatly. For some, evangelism is more “propositional,” seeking to “get the word out.” It attempts to create a need (the unfortunate caricature being, “You are a sinner, and if you don’t do better you will go straight to hell”). For others evangelism is more relational, seeking to establish a relationship and then allowing the need to surface within the relationship so that the gospel* can be applied to a felt need.

Types of evangelism vary as well. Most associate evangelism with mass crusades in which the evangelist proclaims the good news with an invitation to respond as a crisis event. Others see evangelism more as a process whereby individuals are gradually won to faith in Christ. The media* are used for mass appeal through talk shows and televised worship services.

Many Evangelicals believe that local church evangelism is the most effective. Here church members realize that, although there is a “gift of evangelism” (see Eph 4:11), which is available to the few for specific tasks, the overall work of evangelism is the responsibility of the church as a whole. Every member has a sphere of influence in which only he or she can minister most effectively. Women have traditionally played and continue to play an essential role as evangelists in their own important spheres, often praying for wayward sons and daughters and interceding for others; their role in evangelizing should not be overlooked. There are also various parachurch* groups whose focus is evangelism (e.g. Teen Challenge, Youth with a Mission, Campus Crusade). Evangelism can be an appeal to individuals, one on one (a more Western approach) or to groups of peoples in parts of the world where decisions are made in community – in a family, an ethnic group, or even a nation.

Evangelicals insist that in evangelism God takes the initiative in the drama of rescue. The Holy* Spirit is at work the world over preparing the hearts of people to receive the gospel message. When Ananias (Acts 9) got to Saul, the Spirit of God had already done the work. When Peter (Acts 10) got to Cornelius, the Spirit had prepared the way. When Philip (Acts 8) got to the eunuch, the Spirit had gone before him. For many Christians, the heart of evangelism is simply showing up and paying attention. See also MISSION CLUSTER. ROBERT G. TUTTLE, JR.

Evangelist, NT term for one who communicates the gospel through proclamation or otherwise (Acts 21:8); also applied to the writers of the four Gospels; modern Evangelical* Movement term for preachers urging conversion or revival.

Evangelization. See EVANGELISM OR EVANGELIZATION.

Eve, the first and most infamous of biblical women (Gen 2–3), has been judged by Christian tradition as responsible for human depravity and emblematic of the sinfulness lurking in all women; Irenaeus* contrasts Eve as the source of sin* with Mary* as the source of salvation*. Misleading translations and interpretations with their own patriarchal structures made a problematic text for women much worse. Eve's offer to Adam*, and his speedy blame of her (Gen 3:12), led Christian readers to see Eve as primarily a seductress, bringing to humanity the dual problems of sexuality*/fertility and death*. The story also seems to blame women for their own oppression, since not only the pain of childbirth but also women's subordination to men is presented as punishment for disobedience (Gen 3:16).

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Evil, the Problem of. Religions* intend, among other things, to identify that which is problematic in the human situation and to propose a resolution (see Anthropology Cluster). Within Christianity this process is itself problematic because of tensions within Christianity's fundamental presuppositions: God* is all-powerful and benevolent, and God creates* the world good. Why, then, is there evil in the world? A perennial task of Christian theology, then, is to resolve these tensions, first in the very definition of evil and second in rendering that definition compatible with a good world created by a good God.

With regard to the definition, there were traditionally three categories of evil: (1) natural evil, such as earthquakes and floods; (2) physical evil, such as illness and death; and (3) moral evil, such as sin*. Of these, the primacy was given to moral evil. Augustine* considered all evil to be the result of sin and its punishment; were it not for the human sin of pride and disobedience, there would be neither illness nor death, and natural events would not be experienced as evil. Given that there is evil, however, balance is restored to the world through punishments that reestablish the harmony of a good world.

There were two routes for explaining the existence of evil, again in Augustine: (1) the plenitude of being and finitude, wherein God creates all possible forms of existence; and (2) human freedom*: the first humans were given the option of conforming themselves to God's commands. Refusing to do so, humans lost their original purity, turning away from love of God to love defined by lust.

A variation on the plenitude of being approach was developed by Leibniz* in his publication Theodicy (1710). "Theodicy*" refers to the justification of God in the face of evil. For Leibniz God created the very best possible world, but it was not possible to create that world without the presence of evil. Evil must be balanced by harmony, as Augustine also argued; but unlike Augustine, Leibniz maintained that this harmony was accomplished not through an everlasting hell*, but through a city of God composed of all rational spirits, living together in an ultimate preestablished harmony fully determined by God.

The optimism of Leibniz's Theodicy was radically challenged by Voltaire and other Enlightenment* philosophers following the physical and emotional shock waves left by a major earthquake in Lisbon (1755). Voltaire satirized Leibniz in his novel, Candide, which denied that this world is the best of all possible worlds, and suggested instead that finitude is the issue. Other Enlightenment thinkers brought the notion of an "Adam*" into question, and Deistic* notions undercut the need to "justify" God. Moral evil occurs because of environmental influences such as climate and geography, social influences, and the natural frailty of the body.

Twentieth-century theologians continued to follow either freedom or finitude as the fundamental root of evil, in both cases devising intricate arguments that maintained the goodness of God. However, the radical movement toward historicity*, and with it the movement from theoretical accounts of evil to descriptive accounts of evil, changed the dynamics of the topic. Liberation* theologians bespoke the evils of oppression*, systemic evil, and a God of the oppressed, and all theologians had to account for the radical forms of evils in the 20th c. (see Holocaust, Jewish [or Shoah]).

Process* theologies introduced a new dynamic by redefining not the goodness of God, but the power of God, arguing that God's power is persuasive rather than coercive and that God creates with the world, not on the world. In Process views, freedom and finitude together account for the problem of evil and together argue for a shift in the conception of God's power.

MARJORIE HEWITT SUCHOCKI

Evil Spirit. See DEVIL, SATAN, DEMONS, AND DEMONIC POWERS.

Evolution and Christianity. The origination of living species in the ordinary course of events and their modification into a diversity of forms were long found compatible with Christian doctrines of creation* and Providence*. Even the soul* could be thought of as generated during human reproduction (see Creatianism; Traducianism). But no one offered a widely convincing explanation of how species originated until Darwin* (1809–82).

In Europe, theories of “transmutation” were linked with political efforts to undermine established Christianity by ascribing life’s progress and diversity to nature’s powers rather than God’s. Evolution was used to undermine the Bible by making humans the soul-less offspring of apes.

Darwin’s theory of evolution by “natural selection” differed. Its premise was the adaptation of organisms to survive in their environments. Natural* theology saw this as proof of God’s existence and inexplicable. But Darwin asked how adaptation came about. He argued that in the constant struggle for life, according to a law stated by Rev. Thomas Malthus, organisms with some survival advantage tend to leave more offspring than those without it. The offspring inheriting this advantage are better adapted to their environments and thus are naturally “selected,” like the prize livestock selected by breeders. Humans were no exception. Darwin believed that an animal ancestry, far from degrading humans, raised the status of beasts, “our brethren in pain, disease, death and suffering.” For him, when or whether humans acquired an immortal soul* during evolution was no more a problem than the soul’s advent in fetal development.

Before Darwin’s Origin of Species (1859), only a few liberal Christian scholars professed a belief in organic evolution – usually exempting humans from the theory by insisting on the separate creation of the soul. Darwin’s influence made evolution increasingly acceptable to believers, with Unitarians* in the lead, closely followed by liberal clergy and theologians in many denominations. Yet until the mid-20th c., Christian believers seldom accepted human evolution, and almost never the primacy of natural selection. Rather, evolution was commonly seen as a series of divine edicts, or as an organic growth inspired by divine power, or even as a process in which the Divine Being participates and to which that Being is subject. To an extent, this diversity reflected disagreement among biologists about the causes of evolution. Since the late 20th c., theologians have evaluated post-neo-Darwinian theories. Even so, many believers still hold with those in Darwin’s day who argued that evolution calls less for changes in received doctrines than for a recovery and reemphasis of the fullness of the Christian tradition.

JAMES MOORE

Exarchate, a semiautonomous province of the Eastern Orthodox Church under the pastoral jurisdiction of a metropolitan ranking immediately below a patriarch.

Excommunication, the most severe sanction the Roman Catholic Church can impose on a member of the faithful. Its long and sometimes sensationalistic history can obscure the sober canonical realities of the penalty. The chief effects of excommunication are exclusion from the sacraments* (notably the Eucharist*, or Communion, hence the term “excommunication”), restrictions against ministerial participation in public worship, and possible loss of ecclesiastical office or functions (1983 Codex Iuris Canonici [CIC] 1331).

Classified as a “censure,” excommunication is fundamentally oriented to bringing about the reform of the individual; it is not an “expiatory*” penalty intended to uphold legal justice* or defend social values (1983 CIC 1312). This is why excommunication, which assumes the presence of objective grave sin*, cannot be imposed or declared without prior warning (1983 CIC 1347); likewise, once an excommunicated person withdraws from contumacy, he or she has a right to the prompt lifting of the penalty (1983 CIC 1358). Dying excommunicated does not of itself consign one to everlasting punishment*. The Catholic Church claims no jurisdiction over the departed.

Excommunications can be incurred automatically (latae sententiae) for a few very specific ecclesiastical offenses listed in the 1983 Code. In the past 150 years, the number of offenses punishable by automatic excommunication in the Roman Catholic Church has dropped steadily, and Eastern Catholic (Uniate*) canon law has no automatic excommunications. A larger number of offenses are punishable by excommunication if the penalty is imposed or declared as a result of a judicial or administrative penal process.

EDWARD N. PETERS

Exegesis (Gk “leading out of” [the complexity of a text]), detailed exposition, explanation, and interpretation of the Scriptures*, guided by hermeneutics*.

Exemption, a monastic community’s freedom from the bishop’s jurisdiction, making it directly responsible to the pope or to its religious order, first granted to Bobbio (628, 643).

Exiit, the bull* issued by Pope Nicholas III (1279) during the controversy among the Franciscans* over the meaning of poverty. See also POVERTY CLUSTER: POVERTY MOVEMENT; PROPERTY.

Exile, an involuntary departure from one’s homeland. Biblically, it refers to the deportation of Judah from Jerusalem by the Babylonians (597–39 BCE) and the earlier exile of the Northern Kingdom by the Assyrians following the fall of Samaria (722 BCE). The first exiles were actually Adam and Eve (Gen 3), demonstrating that exile is the result of sin* (cf. 2 Kgs 17:7–8; Jer 25:8–11; Ezek 1). Exile prompts the hope of restoration by God on the basis either of repentance* (e.g. Deut 30:1–10) or of gracious redemption* (1 Peter, where Christians are viewed as “exiled,” now with a positive connotation).

JEFFRY C. DAVIS

Existentialism and Christian Thought. Existentialism, partly a reaction against German idealism* (Hegel*), is expressed in Kierkegaard’s* emphasis on how Christianity implies a certain mode of personal “existence” and life that must be appropriated, in contrast to Christian belief as a mere custom or as believing a given doctrinal point of view. After World War I, influenced by dialectical* theology and the rise of phenomenology*, existentialism developed in several directions, building mainly on the insights of Kierkegaard. It concurred with the emphasis in modern Western Christianity on the individual and on choice, and participated in the criticism of bourgeois modes of faith. Along with other anti-metaphysical trends, existentialism offered Christian thought a way out of the dilemma posed by historical* criticism and positivism* by emphasizing that personal commitment, choice, and engagement are what matters, not objectively secured facts of history.

Existentialism was able to establish links with Christianity partly because revivalist* movements also emphasized choice and individuality, and partly because existentialism criticized the depersonalization of humanity often brought about by the modern scientific approach. By emphasizing authenticity, existentialism offered significance to personal existence in the depressed cultural climate on the Continent after World War I. Yet atheistic currents in modern existentialism have sometimes been hostile toward Christianity.

Existentialism is critical of forms of Christianity too closely based on scientific reason (historicism*, neo-Kantianism*, liberal* theology). When choice, anxiety, dread, and death are given a phenomenological interpretation along with the rest of human existence, this interpretation can be articulated within the framework of Christian faith. Hence, faith* is more than belief (“believing that”); it (or the lack of it) also involves psychological conditions that account for the different possibilities for being and becoming a human being. The most consistent existentialist approach to theology is that of Bultmann*. Although mainly a Continental movement, existentialism influenced North American theology, especially through Tillich* and his students.

Existentialism has helped Christian theologians to voice a critique of a modern culture marked by the alienation of individuals and to emphasize that Christian faith is anchored primarily in personal existence rather than in ecclesial life and popular customs. Conversely, it has contributed to the development of a somewhat problematic individualistic mode of Christianity and has sometimes stressed the significance of the present in ways that neglect the importance of Christianity’s historical roots.

JAN-OLAV HENRIKSEN

Exodus, the second book of the HB, contains a master narrative of freedom from bondage and community formation in three parts. Exodus 1:1–15:21 describes the oppression of the Israelites in Egypt and their miraculous release into the Sinai wilderness. Then, in 15:22–24:18, their journey toward the Promised* Land takes them to the mountain of God, where God reveals (through Moses*) community guidelines: the Ten* Commandments and the Covenant* Code. Finally, in Chaps. 25–40 (often called the “tabernacle texts”), God reveals instructions for a national shrine (the Tabernacle*), which is then constructed.

Exodus was most likely given final form during the Exile* (6th c. BCE) or shortly thereafter, when it was important to establish national identity after the trauma of the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem and Judah, but it contains earlier material. The compelling story of escape to freedom in the first part of Exodus is a highly constructed narrative; consequently, the historicity of all its dramatic details (e.g. the 10 signs and wonders; splitting of the Reed Sea) is unlikely. However, the basic storyline – descent into Egypt, servitude in the eastern Nile delta, and escape against great odds into the wilderness – reflects the actual movements of small groups in the 13th c. BCE. The intense experiences of relatively few people were retained, embellished, and expanded by their descendants over many centuries. Early versions of this narrative may date to the first part of the divided monarchy (9th–8th c. BCE).

The second part of the narrative (15:22–24:18) contains the social norms of the Israelites. Its guidelines for community life are presented as constituting a covenant* between Israel and its deity. Although most likely dating to the monarchic period, some of its precepts may be earlier; yet all are presented as having been revealed to Israel in the wilderness.

The same pattern can be discerned in Exod 25–40. The national shrine (the Jerusalem Temple) as it existed at the end of the monarchy or the beginning of the postexilic period, is retrojected into the wilderness period as a portable shrine or tabernacle. Its elaborate and costly details are a product of the exilic imagination remembering the Jerusalem Temple, but the basic concept of a tent of meeting as a community shrine at which divine oracles could be received may be an authentic remnant of the premonarchic and early monarchic era (12th–10th c. BCE).

Although Moses is not called a prophet in Exodus, his prophetic identity is indicated by his call narrative (3:1–10) as well as by the fact that all the community regulations and the instructions for the national shrine are presented as having been conveyed from God to the people by Moses. As ancient Israel's prophet par excellence, he models the importance of prophecy* as the medium for communicating the divine will. Similarly, the important role of Aaron* in effecting the Exodus and especially in serving God through the holiness of the priestly office at the national shrine sanctions the office and functions of Israelite priesthood*.

The narrative of the Exodus provides the paramount HB example of God's salvific involvement with humankind. The covenant section indicates that people can enter into a binding relationship with their deity; in so doing, they take on the obligation to obey God's will and carry out a vocation*. The tabernacle section provides a way for people to experience the abiding presence of God in their midst.

Central aspects of Israelite and then Jewish beliefs and practices – Passover*, circumcision, redemption of the firstborn, covenant, Ten Commandments, Sabbath*, Holy Ark, menorah – are validated by appearing in Exodus as part of the collective memory of the foundational experiences of early Israel.

CAROL MEYERS

Ex Opere Operato, a term that suggests that the sacraments convey grace by being administered, independently of the worthiness or intentions of people involved.

Exorcism, the art of dislodging Evil (as a power that possesses people and things) from persons, places, or objects, exists in most religions. The practice, recorded throughout history, presupposes enabling cosmologies and anthropologies*. Demonic* possession is framed by social, economic, political, and cultural narratives. Exorcism is effective where the Evil is named, identified, expelled, or contained through the deployment of a ritual symbolic apparatus related to these narratives. Since Evil destabilizes the normal/local, it is often identified as an-other, as foreign – Beelzebub* or even “legion.”

The Christian Gospels present Jesus at home with the cosmological assumptions of his time in a context marked by sociopolitical crisis and anxiety that encouraged religious fervor, occult practices, and exorcisms. The Targum on Num 6:24 illustrates such assumptions: Aaron's blessing of the people is expanded to include protection from “demons” of the night, midday, morning, and evening, and “evil spirits.” The line between moral and physical evil is blurred. Through exorcism Jesus identified with and brought relief or liberation to the sufferer, inaugurating the Kingdom* or reign* of God. Consequently, he directed attention away from himself, focused on the Kingdom, and totally opposed the search for scapegoats (“who sinned?”). Jesus' style provides a specific Christian horizon for practicing exorcism. “In the name of Jesus,” the disciples performed miracles and exorcisms. These cosmological perspectives continued to influence the early and later Christian understanding of Evil and practice of exorcism. Baptismal exorcism was a battle launched against the demonic occupant of the candidates. Jesus' command ephphatha (Aramaic for “be opened,” as explained in Mark 7:34) became a baptismal incantation. In the Catholic Church, canonically appointed exorcists engage demons possessing persons, places, and objects.

Modernity and rationalism encouraged the receding of the cosmology and anthropology of evil. Scientific accounts and psychological* theories led people to associate spirits (good and evil), witchcraft*, witch* hunts, and exorcisms with superstition and an unscientific view of the universe.

The postmodern world, wounded by traumatic occurrences like Auschwitz (see Holocaust, Jewish [or Shoah]) and the Rwandan* genocide, is a theater of anxiety, crisis, and a resurgence of Evil inhabiting persons, objects, and places. Mainline missionary churches, Pentecostalism*, African* Instituted Churches, and the Charismatic* Movement have reinvented rituals of exorcism. In places like Africa, spirits inhabiting the ancestral universe that are ambivalent in nature are reduced, in Manichaean terms, to evil spirits or demons. Through exorcisms and deliverance ministries, Evil/Satan is summoned to depart from the possessed or sufferers, who confess they are witches or “containers of the devil.” Exorcism occupies the ritual energy and imagination of these Christian churches.

ELOCHUKWU EUGENE UZUKWU, CSSP

Expiation, making up for an offense against God or neighbor by performing a favorable act. The Crucifixion* as expiation emphasizes the positive merits of Christ; propitiation*, by contrast, emphasizes placating God’s anger* (see Atonement #2).

Exposition of the Sacrament, in Roman Catholicism, displaying the eucharistic host (elevating it during Mass* or placing it in a monstrance*) for veneration.

Ex-voto (Lat “from the vow”), a votive offering to a saint, Christ, or God given in fulfillment of a vow or in gratitude or devotion; often a part of popular* Christian practices and of pilgrimages*. Shrines are often decorated with ex-votos.

Ezekiel, Book of, an OT prophetic book, containing stories about and speeches attributed to the prophet named Ezekiel. The prophet was born in Judah but was taken into Babylonian* captivity in 597 BCE. The content of the book reflects the Babylonian Exile* as well as references to the continuing Judean community.

Ezekiel’s prophecies began in 592 BCE and continued over a span of about 20 years. They included letters to those still in Jerusalem

(before the exile of 587/86) as well as those already relocated to Babylonia. Most of the book (Chaps. 1–39) was probably written during the Exile. Ezekiel combines typical features of a prophetic book (such as oracles against the nations, Chaps. 25–32) with priestly interests, including a focus on the purity of the Jerusalem Temple.

Ezekiel 4–24 concentrates on the fall of Judah, arguing for the rightness and inevitability of Babylon’s conquest of Jerusalem in 587. The prophet performed several sign-acts and pronounced oracles indicating that Jerusalem’s fall was the will of God, justified because of Judah’s sin*.

Despite the exile of the Jews to Babylonia, the Book of Ezekiel does offer hope*. In future times, God will spare those who choose righteousness* over sin (33:10–20). God will place a new heart and a new spirit among these survivors (36:26–28). God will also revive the people who have been reduced to dry bones (37). God will lead the people back to their former homes and pour God’s spirit upon them (39:25–29).

Ezekiel 40–48 details the reconstruction of the Jerusalem Temple. This does not follow the construction plans of the First Temple, nor was the Second Temple (522 BCE to 70 CE) built according to Ezekiel’s plans. Ezekiel’s vision of the Temple was symbolic rather than architecturally practical, for it meant to emphasize God’s presence (48:35).

Ancient Jewish tradition questioned whether Ezekiel should be considered canonical, because it disagreed with the Pentateuch about whether sins affected only the sinner or the sinner’s family (Ezek 18:4, 20, cf. Exod 34:6–7) and provided different dimensions for the Temple (Ezek 40–48, cf. Exod 26–27 and 1 Kgs 6–7). Among Christians, African American tradition has especially treasured Ezekiel, and images such as the dry bones (37) and God’s chariot (1:16) have inspired gospel songs as well as many sermons.

JON L. BERQUIST

Ezra, 4. See FOURTH EZRA.

Ezra and Nehemiah, the Books of, originally a single literary work (written after 332 BCE), tell an idealized story of a reconstituted but small Jerusalem community threatened with obliteration by imperial rule (Ezra 9:7–10), interethnic strife (Ezra 9–10; Neh 13), and abusive excesses of an elite class (Neh 5).

Presented as cultural heroes, Ezra and Nehemiah responded to the Jerusalem community’s suffering by enacting similar internal reforms to strengthen the community's cultural identity and restore order and hope* to a people in disarray.

The positions that Ezra and Nehemiah occupy complicate the story; they are imperial authorities, trusted by the Persian crown (Ezra 7:11–26; Neh. 1:11–2:8), but with loyalties to the Jerusalem collective (Ezra 7:1–6; Neh. 1:1–6). Thus they deploy strategies of both accommodation and resistance. The reforms reflect this ambiguity. The horror of mass divorces that separate Israel from the peoples of the land (Ezra 9:1–4; 10; Neh. 13) and destroy families simultaneously creates a space of cultural flourishing for the Jerusalem community. The reaffirmation of the Law of Moses (Neh. 8) calls the people toward a cultural unity that resists imperial domination and also gives the province the political stability that the Persian officials desire.

The reforms allow both the Persian crown and the Jerusalem community to affirm the same rhetoric, although at cross-purposes. The two officials succeed in appeasing the Persians while saving their people.

The two books culminate in separatist rhetoric (Ezra 9–10; Neh. 10, 13), poignant and provocative in its stark language but morally disturbing in its content. Were Ezra and Nehemiah too intent on pleasing the Persians at the expense of the people? Were they unwittingly complicit in Persian repression by pitting one marginalized group against another, constructing an interethnic conflict that disempowered both and bolstered imperial dominion? Or were their problematic reforms the only reasonable means to ensure the survival of the devoted to YHWH? These are important questions for marginalized communities in struggles against repression.

HERBERT ROBINSON MARBURY

F

Fabiola (d399), Roman matron of the gens Fabia who, as a widow, adopted a life of austerity (asceticism*) and traveled to Bethlehem* to join the monastic* community of Paula*, Eustochium*, and Jerome*. After the outbreak of the Origenist* controversy, she returned to Rome. She was canonized as a Roman Catholic saint*.

Faculty (Canon Law), permission from an ecclesiastical superior to hold an office and/or perform an action.

Facundus of Hermiane (6th c.), a bishop in North Africa who, in his “Defense of the Three Chapters” (547–48), argued that the three accused theologians were in accord with the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon*. After the Second Council of Constantinople* (553), large portions of the Western Church broke communion with Constantinople and Rome. Facundus’s writings are a valuable record of the dispute and its background.

Faith, a term that suggests, in both its everyday and religious meanings, an intense relationship, generally understood in interpersonal terms.

1. Faith as Faithfulness. In most languages, “faith” applied originally to human relationships, namely to the “good faith” with which one makes a promise and to the “faithfulness” with which the promise is kept. In the HB, the primary terms for faith are based on the root ʾmn (“amen”* is derived from this root), which connotes trustworthiness or faithfulness. God has good faith and is faithful to God’s promises. Human faithfulness to God is a response to God’s faithfulness. Paul’s language about “the faith of Jesus Christ” (Rom 3:22) may refer to such a faithfulness of Jesus to God.

2. Faith as Trust. Faith as trusting God the promiser (credere Deo) involves submitting to God and living according to God’s promises (a possible meaning of “the obedience of faith,” Rom 1:5, 16:26). In the Bible, faith often suggests a confident trust in God or in Christ as worthy of trust.

3. Faith as Believing a Speaker’s Words (“Believing That”). When focused on what the trustworthy speaker says, faith means “believing that certain affirmations are true.” Faith is a trustful assent to divine truth or revelation expressed in the words of the prophets, Jesus, the Bible, or other authoritative voices. Faith is then defined by its content.

Augustine distinguished between the faith (“trust”) by which we believe (fides qua creditur) and the faith which is believed (fides quae creditur), or the content of faith, e.g. the 2nd-c. “apostolic proclamation,” summarized in the Apostles’* Creed, elaborated and defined in subsequent doctrinal decisions.

4. Faith, Knowledge, Understanding, and Reason. Paul contrasted people who have “faith” (and might be weak) with those who have “knowledge” (Gk gnosis; 1 Cor 8). The Gnostic Valentinians* also emphasized this contrast. Clement* and Origen* more cautiously affirmed that faith is perfected through knowledge, i.e. personal appropriation and understanding of the content of faith. Augustine often said (following the Old* Latin version of Isa 7:9), “Believe in order to understand.” Then faith is the way toward understanding. Similarly, Anselm* defined theology as fides quaerens intellectum (faith seeking understanding). Through theological understanding, what is already believed gains in consistency and clarity (e.g. Anselm’s Cur Deus homo). Theology has also utilized the more pedestrian activity of reasoning* to seek coherence in what is believed and perhaps to confirm it through argumentation; reasoned knowledge discerns the validity of beliefs.

5. Faith as Movement toward, and Experience of, God. To speak of “believing in” God or Christ is a distinct usage that began in the Septuagint* and was further developed in the NT. “Believing in” (or “faith” without qualifier, as in the synoptic Gospels and Paul) is more than “believing that,” for “even the demons believe and tremble” (Jas 2:19), and more than believing/trusting a promiser; it is a personal adherence to, and movement toward, God (or Christ). In Augustine and Catholic theology, faith as movement toward God is often linked with love*; faith is completed by love (Gal 5:6). Faith, hope*, and love are aspects of the same personal orientation, all working together until love alone persists (1 Cor 13:8–13). Faith as movement toward God can be the beginning of spiritual union with God, as suggested by Gregory* of Nyssa, Dionysius* the Pseudo-Aeropagite, and Maximus* the Confessor. It is an initiation into mysteries*, i.e. being enabled to perceive and understand what is otherwise beyond human perception and understanding. In similar ways, in apocalyptic* and Charismatic* perspectives, faith involves discerning the mysteries of God's interventions in one's present context (see Typology).

6. Faith as Gift. The Protestant doctrine of justification* by faith alone led to an emphasis on faith as trust in the good news (gospel*) of God's purpose of salvation through Christ, linking the believer to Christ through the influence of the Holy* Spirit; faith is not a human achievement but God's gift, receiving God's gift (charisma; 1 Cor 12:9). Protestantism also speaks of faith as "believing that," i.e. assent as well as trust, based on revelation. For 20th-c. Roman Catholic theologians (including Rahner*) the primary constituent of faith is an interior acceptance of God's grace*. Vatican* II affirms the element of assent ("believing that") but subordinates it to the "obedience of faith" (Rom 1:5, 16:26), faith as trust.

The philosophers Hume* and Kant*, by limiting the range of reason, seemed to ascribe a new role to faith. But they also raised the question as to what faith could be based on. Schleiermacher* defined faith as a "feeling of absolute dependence," while Ritschl* emphasized "value judgments" of practical reason. In the 20th c., Barth* tended to follow Ritschl, as he called attention to the Word of God as direct address and faith as total response. Dewey* underlined the religious function of experience as a common, social faith. Tillich* tended to follow Schleiermacher; for him faith was "absolute concern" shaped by specific cultural questions and religious symbols. See also RATIONALISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; REASON; REVELATION.

EUGENE TESELLE and DANIEL PATTE

Faith and Order Movement, a key contributor to the modern ecumenical* movement, was born early in the 20th c. Inspired by the American Episcopal bishop Charles H. Brent (1862–1929), the movement came into being to provide a platform for theological dialogue on fundamental questions of Christian faith and ecclesial structure with the intention of moving churches toward visible unity – "to proclaim the oneness of the Church of Jesus Christ and to call the churches to the goal of visible unity in one faith and one eucharistic fellowship, expressed in worship and in common life in Christ, in order that the world may believe."

This movement was from the beginning parallel both to the Life* and Work Movement, associated largely with the Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work, Stockholm (1925), and to the modern missionary movement that issued from the historic World Missionary Conference, Edinburgh* (1910). Decisions of the Faith and Order and Life and Work movements in 1937 led to their inclusion in the World* Council of Churches (WCC), formed in 1948. Faith and Order retained its existence as a commission within the WCC. Since Vatican* II, the Roman Catholic Church has been a member of the commission, and increasingly persons from the Pentecostal*, Evangelical*, and Charismatic* traditions participate in its work.

Faith and Order has held five important world conferences, from Lausanne (1927) to Santiago de Compostela (1993), including those in Edinburgh (1937), Lund (1952), and Montreal (1963). Its most widely known and significant accomplishment for churches has been the convergence document "Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry," shaped in Lima (1982).

NORMAN A. HJELM

Fall is the answer to the question, What is the beginning of human sin* (Lat lapsus)? Because the answer was found in interpretations of Gen 2–3, the beginning of sin was called the "Fall." The Genesis story suggests that the human situation is not what it might have been: there is pain in childbearing (3:16), laboring by the sweat of one's brow (3:19), and death (3:3, 19; emphasized by Paul in 1 Cor 15; Rom 5). What sin causes these predicaments? A range of answers can be identified throughout church history.

Two emphases are found in traditional interpretations: (1) Adam* bears the primary responsibility, since the prohibition against eating from the tree of knowledge is addressed only to Adam, prior to Eve's creation. (2) Eve* alone had contact with the serpent, and thus appears to be the mediator of temptation – a common interpretation based on the threefold presentation of the serpent, the woman, and the man in that order (Gen 3:1–7, 12–13, 14–19).

Gnostics* followed another line of interpretation. They saw in the eating from the tree of knowledge the victory of more spiritual forces over the bungling or evil creator, the Demiurge*, whose activity is defined by the world of material and animate beings.

Irenaeus* responded by suggesting the gradual development of sin. Adam and Eve were created neither mortal nor immortal, but with the capacity for both mortality and immortality: disobedience would lead to death and obedience to life.

This interpretation was elaborated in two ways: (1) the doctrine of original* sin, according to which Adam and Eve’s sin affects all their descendants, and (2) the Pelagian* doctrine, according to which their sin affected only themselves and is perpetuated by imitation.

Origen*, by contrast, posited that finite spirits were created in union with God. How could free and intelligent beings lapse into sin? Origen’s answer was that they drifted away through koros (carelessness, weariness, satiation).

Augustine* suggested that, before committing any outward act, they sinned inwardly through pride, self-concern, and self-exaltation.

Modern Western approaches to the Fall stem largely from Kant*, who transformed “original sin” into “radical evil” (see Evil, the Problem of): by the time we come to full moral awareness, we find that we have given in to bad rather than good impulses. Since humans are capable of acting on rational incentives, evil, while perhaps inevitable, is still a human responsibility.

Likewise, Schleiermacher* said that humans sin from the first, but added that this occurs through God’s wisdom; God wills that all humans experience guilt so that they will be all the more grateful when they are offered salvation.

In Liberation* theology, original sin or radical evil is understood chiefly as “systemic evil” or “structural evil” of social institutions that perpetuate dominance and slavery, self-indulgence and deprivation.

DANIEL PATTE and EUGENE TESELLE

FAMILY, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER

1) Introductory Entries

Family, Christian Views of, in Eastern Orthodox Churches

Family, Christian Views of, in Western Churches

- 2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices
- Family, Christian Views of, in Africa: African Instituted Churches
- Family, Christian Views of, in Africa: Eastern Africa
- Family, Christian Views of, in Africa: Southern Africa
- Family, Christian Views of, in Asia
- Family, Christian Views of, in Australia
- Family, Christian Views of, in Latin America
- Family, Christian Views of, in North America: African American Traditions
- Family, Christian Views of, in the United States
- Family, Christian Views of, in Western Europe
- Family, Christian Views of, and Worldwide Issues: Feminist Theological Perspectives
- Family, Christian Views of, and Worldwide Issues: Genocide and Modern Wars
- Family, Christian Views of, and Worldwide Issues: Nonheterosexual Two-Parent Families
- Families, Christian Views of, and Worldwide Issues: Substitute Families in Squatter Camps

1) Introductory Entries

Family, Christian Views of, in Eastern Orthodox Churches. For Orthodox, the family is the context in which we work out our salvation* as children of God. In and by meeting the physical and psychological needs of its members, the family nurtures the souls of its members. The daily life of the family in the world serves to purify, sanctify*, and deify (see Theosis, Deification) its members in Christ as the church of the home.

The family, while within and connected to the world and broader culture, is oriented toward the Kingdom* of God. Orthodox understand family life as sacramental*. The Kingdom of God becomes a lived experience in the daily struggles of life. The family is necessarily linked to the eucharistic* faith community and finds its fulfillment within the body of Christ. In and through the family, as the church of the home, we live in the world as citizens of heaven. The family lives out the sacramental reality of church in daily life by living out the gospel mandate to love* God and neighbor; it participates in missions*, outreach, evangelism*, education*, hospitality*, service to the poor*, prayer*, repentance*, and ascetic* practices. The vocation of the family is to nurture the souls of all members in order that they seek first the Kingdom of God and pursue righteousness in all interactions. The family finds its fulfillment as its members live as brothers and sisters in Christ within the body of Christ. In this sense, family is not necessarily limited to a particular structure or arrangement but can comprise a variety of relationships. Nevertheless, Orthodox maintain the marital dyad as the center of the family and child rearing as a central purpose of family life. Within a hierarchy of love (see Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy), all members share an equality of persons while having distinct roles.

The family is called to live in the world as the church of the home – a Christian community of love within a Christian community of love. See also MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER: IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

PHILIP MAMALAKIS

Family, Christian Views of, in Western Churches. “Family” refers to the social unit that includes those related by blood, adoption, or marriage* and, by extension, to the Christian community of those related to one another through faith* in Christ. Tension between these two meanings creates ambivalence within the tradition about the family within Christianity. Scripture* and theology have been used to bolster several different forms of living.

The New Family in Christ. Distinct from Hellenistic Jewish and Greco-Roman religions, which sanctioned the home as one of the sites of prayer, education, and celebration of festivals, the Christian movement gradually shifted religious loyalty from the hearth to extrafamilial relationships. In the synoptic Gospels, Jesus subordinates kinship to discipleship* (Luke 14:26; Matt 10:37) and declares those who do God’s will to be “my brother and sister and mother” (Mark 3:33–35; Luke 8:19–21; Matt 12:46–50). Over the next several centuries, martyrdom* and monasticism* led followers to reject family responsibilities for a more radical testimony. Early Syriac* Christianity identified celibacy* as a higher religious calling than marriage and procreation.

Hierarchical Male-Ruled Families. Other Scriptures endorse marriage, children*, and the patriarchal* family. Gospel texts reveal Jesus blessing wedding wine, welcoming children, and opposing divorce* and adultery. Biblical authors of the “household* codes” (Eph 5:22–6:9; Col 3:18–4:1; 1 Pet 2:18–3:7; 1 Tim 2:8–15; Titus 2:1–10) exhort subordinate family members (wives, slaves, children) to submit to their superiors (husbands, masters, fathers). Reformation theologians reclaimed marriage as a religious calling and interpreted the codes as a definitive statement on the proper relationship between church and family. The family became a “little church” with the father at the helm.

Egalitarian Families. Some scholars argue that early Christianity established communities of greater gender equality. Men and women gathered in “house* churches” that sometimes placed women in important leadership roles (e.g. Rom 16:3). Baptismal creeds leveled human relationships (Gal 3:28). The household codes in fact responded to disruptions caused by the new family ethos of the early movement. Liberation* theology and progressive denominations confirm the importance of mutuality in marriage, shared responsibility for parenting, and support for a diversity of families as representative of basic Christian convictions.

Contemporary debate over the Christian family results from ambiguity in the tradition from the start. Emphasis on freedom in Christ, the priesthood* of all believers, and God as ultimate authority strain family loyalty. At the same time, Christianity has long sanctioned committed marriage, procreation and care of children, and strong families. See also MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER: IN WESTERN CHURCHES.

BONNIE J. MILLER-MCLEMORE

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Family, Christian Views of, in Africa: African Instituted Churches. The view of the family in African Instituted Churches (AICs) is conceptualized in both indigenous and Christian terms. In Africa, family as a lineage–ancestry system is the foundation of social, economic, and religious life, provides identity, and affirms the worth and integrity of every individual. An AIC congregation becomes a surrogate kinship group, with the spiritual leader as its head. Each AIC views itself as a family, “God’s household”; faith in Jesus Christ, our Ancestor*, provides access to the Father in one Spirit (Eph 2:18–19; Gal 3:26, 6:10) and transcends ethnic, gender, and class limitations (Gal 3:28).

Tensions are evident. AICs struggle to balance cultural values, Christian ideals, and modernity. Ethnic composition hinders efforts to be a unified “household of God.” While the lineage structure offers a sense of belonging, it may promote dependency. Monogamy, the Christian ideal, is challenged by polygamy* associated with traditional values and social and economic structures. Women have central roles in AICs’ leadership on a scriptural basis, but their functions are circumscribed by cultural prescriptions about gender roles.

The fact remains that AICs provide an intense experience of community. Despite some limitations, Christian values embodied in the church as “household of God” are experienced and mediated within this new lineage framework.

PHILOMENA N. MWAURA

Family, Christian Views of, in Africa: Eastern Africa. Views of the family in Eastern Africa are multilocal, multi-generational, multiethnic, and multi-religious, owing to migration, marriage, and conversion*, and are marked by tensions between African cultural values and Christian teachings.

While rapidly changing, Eastern African families are primarily socioeconomic units sustaining the life of their members through socialization and multiplication. Christian communities embody the same family values, multiplying their members and socializing them; like any African ancestor*, Christ longs for many descendants. Yet tensions exist regarding reproduction; polygamy* is anti-Christian and celibacy* is anti-African. Consequently, many profess Christian values but practice traditional African values.

Eastern African values reinforce those scriptural teachings advocating a hierarchically patriarchal* family, heterosexual* marriage, and children*, opposing divorce*, and envisioning Christian communities as male-ruled families. Yet households and churches headed by women have emerged with the popularization of women empowerment programs and Feminist* theology (Gen 1:26–28; Matt 13:33–34; Luke 15:8–10; Gal 3:28).

Socioeconomic strains and the breakdown of African cultural values rejected by Christianity have engendered a tragic neglect of familial responsibilities. This crisis is to be attributed to the missionary introduction of Christianity as a profession of faith in Christian values, including celibacy and monogamy, rather than as a way of life that upholds the economic welfare of all members of the extended family according to East African values.

EUNICE KAMAARA

Family, Christian Views of, in Africa: Southern Africa.

Southern African societies can be divided into two groups: matrilineal societies trace their descent from a common ancestress and patrilineal ones from a common ancestor*. Examples of matrilineal societies include the Yao, Chewa, and Bemba of Malawi*, Zambia*, and Mozambique*. The husband settles in his wife’s village and does not pay “bride-wealth.” The offspring of her marriage belongs to the wife and her kinsfolk. However, this arrangement does not amount to matriarchy. In patrilineal societies, the husband pays bride-wealth to the family of the wife. The children and property of the family belong to the husband and his kinsfolk. Examples of patrilineal societies include the Tumbuka, Tonga, Zulu, Xhosa, Shona, Tswana, and Sotho of Malawi, Zambia, Mozambique, Zimbabwe*, Lesotho*, Botswana*, and South* Africa. Christian families simply continued these practices. The Christian missionaries were opposed to the (British) colonial governments' introduction of the "hut tax," which forced men to labor in the colonial economy and to migrate to the cities and neighboring countries to look for jobs and raise money for the tax. In turn this caused the breakup of many Christian families. Similar labor migration is also mentioned by the UN as a contributor to the spread of HIV infection in Southern Africa. ISABEL APAWO PHIRI

